"Cingebant laticea montem teneroque meatu
Corpora multorum clivores atque ossa rigabant.
Non tulit hoc Damasus communis lege sepultos
Post requiem tristes iterum persolvere poenas.
Profluvius aggressus magnum superare laborem
Aggeris immensi deiecit culmina montis, Intima sollicite scrutatus viscera terrae,
Siccavit totum quicquid malefecerat humor,
Invenit fontem praebebat qui dona salutis.
Hanc curavit Mercurius Levita fidelis."

The singular variety of objects discovered within the loculi of the catacombs is an evidence of the permanence of the old heathen idea, which regarded the life after death as a continuation of the present life with its occupations and amusements, as well as of the strength of the universal human instinct, which leads the bereaved to deposit in the grave of their loved ones the tools and ornaments and playthings which had lost their use by the death of their possessor. Boldetti, lib. ii. cc. 14, 15, furnishes us with very interesting details of the results of his investigations in this department, together with engraved representations of some of the more curious and typical objects discovered by him, some of which are still to be seen in the Christian Museum of the Vatican. Among the objects extracted from children's graves are jointed dolls of ivory or bone, similar to those which we learn from Cancellieri de Sac. Basil. Vatican. tom. ii. pp. 295-1000, were found in the bier of Maria, the daughter of Stilicho and wife of Honorius, belonging to the close of the 4th century—little earthenware money-jars,—masks, and a very great abundance of small bronze bells, such as we know to have been in use in classical times for the amusement of children, frequently met with in heathen tombs, and mice in metal or terra-cotta. Female tombs have furnished numerous examples of toilet equipage and personal ornaments; mirrors, combs in ivory or boxwood, bodkins, pins of ivory or bone, visagrettes, treasers, toothpicks, and earpicks; bracelets and armlets, earrings and necklaces; buckles and brooches, rings and seals; studs and buttons, bullae, and other similar objects, setting before us vividly the Roman Christian ladies of the first ages. In not a few instances, according to the same authority (Boldetti, Osserv. p. 297), the false hair worn in life was buried with the corpse. Among other objects of interest discovered in the loculi we may mention dice, ivory knife-handles, nailheads, a lock and key, one half of an ivory egg with portraits of a husband and wife and the Christian monogram engraved on the flat section; tortoiseshell, weights of stone, and small glass fish engraved with numbers, the purpose of which has not been determined.

The number of lamps discovered in and about the tombs is countless. The majority are of terra-cotta, but some have been found of bronze, and some even of silver and amber. One in this last material was found in the catacomb of St. Priscilla (Boldetti, Osserv. p. 298, tav. i. no. 7). By far the greater part of these lamps have only the monogram of Christ impressed on them. But there are a very large number which present other familiar symbols, such as the palm-branch, the dove, the fish, the ship, and A and Ω. The Good Shepherd is of frequent occurrence. The lamps found in the Jewish catacombs almost universally bear the seven-branched candlestick.

The so-called instruments of torture which the eager imagination of pious enthusiasts, resolved to convert every buried Christian into a martyr, has discovered enshrined in the loculi, or incised on their closing slabs, in the opinion of the best informed and most calm judging writers, are nothing more than implements of handicraft. One singular pronged weapon, specimens of which are preserved in the Vatican and the Collegio Romano, has been identified with a heathen sacrificial instrument, and its presence in a Christian catacomb has yet to be explained.

TOPOGRAPHY OF THE ROMAN CATACOMBS.

The following catalogue of the ancient Christian cemeteries of Rome, the names of which stand recorded in ancient historical documents, arranged according to the chief lines of road leading from the city, is derived from De Rossi's great work. The first column gives the name of the road. The second that which De Rossi's investigations have led him to believe to have been the primitive names of the larger cemeteries in the first age of the Church. In the third column appear the designations by which they were known in the fourth century, after the establishment of the peace of the Church. The fourth column gives the titles of certain lesser cemeteries or isolated tombs of martyrs, which are often confused with the larger cemeteries to which they were adjacent, and with which they were sometimes locally connected. The 1 cemeteries formed, subsequent to the peace of Church, occupy the last column.

CATACOMBS OF NAPLES, &c.

To the north of the city of Naples, four subterranean Christian cemeteries are known to exist, in a spur of Capodimonte, no great distance from one another. They have been distinguished by the names of S. Vito, S. Serero, S. Maria della Santità, and S. Gennaro (Januarius) dei poderi. There is also a fifth at some distance under the monastic Church of S. Eufremo. That of S. Gennaro is the only one now accessible. It has been fully described by Pelliccia (de Christianae Eccles. Polit. Neapol. 1781, vol. iv. Dissert. V.), and more recently in an elaborate treatise of great value, embracing the whole subject of interment in the catacombs, by Chr. Fr. Bellermann, Hamburg, 1839.

With many points of resemblance as regards the formation of the graves, and the actual mode of interment, the Neapolitan Catacombs differ very widely in their general structure from those of Rome. Instead of the low narrow galleries of the Roman Catacombs, we have at Naples wide lofty corridors, and extensive cavern-like halls, and subterranean churches. The chief cause of this diversity is the very different character of the material in which they are excavated. Instead of the friable tufa granolare of Rome, the stratum in which the Neapolitan catacombs lie is a hard building stone of great durability and strength, in which wide vaults might be constructed without any fear of instability. To quote the words of Mabillon, Iter Italicum, "altiores habent quam Romana Coemeteria fornices ob duritiem et firmitatem rupis secus quam Romae ubi arena seu topus tantum altitudinis non patitur." It is probable that these catacombs were originally stone quarries, and that the Christians availed themselves of excavations already existing for the interment of their dead. On this point Marchi speaks without the slightest hesitation (Monum. Primitivæ, p. 13).

The Catacomb of St. Januarius derives its name from having been selected as the resting-place of the body of that saint, whose death at Puteoli is placed A.D. 309, when transferred to Naples by Bp. John, who died A.D. 432.

Mabillon speaks of three stories: "triplex ordo criptarum alius supra alium." Two only are mentioned by Pelliccia and Bellermann as now accessible. The galleries which form the cemetery proper, are reached through a suite of wide and lofty halls, with vaulted ceilings cut out of the rock, and decorated with a succession of paintings of different dates, in some instances lying one over the other. The earliest frescoes are in a pure classical style, and evidently belong to the first century of the Christian era. There being distinctly Christian about these. In places these have been plastered over, and a new surface portraits of bishops, and religious paintings, in a far inferior style of a much later date, have been executed. CO.]

Interments are either in loculi, arcosolia, icula. The loculi are cut without order or cement, the larger and smaller apertures all mixed together, with no attempt at mixing space. The arcosolia have barrel vaults. Some of them are painted; one contains a fresco of the peacock, and on the wall above portraits of a mother and daughter whose remains are interred below, with a rudely-written inscription, "Vixit Rufina annos iv. et filia ejus . . . xxxvii." Another also presents the portraits of its occupants, all in prayer; a bearded father, Michelinus; a girl, Hilaria aged 14, and a child Nonnosus aged 2 years 10 months, with spotted frock, pearl head-dress and earrings, necklace, and buckle to belt. In a third is the bust of a young man in white tunic and red pallium, with the inscription "Hic requiescit Proculus." A fourth contains full-length figures of St. Paul and St. Lawrence. The cubicula average 7 palms broad, by 10 palms in height and depth. The roof is horizontal or slightly coved. Each contains from 3 to 8 loculi. The graves were hermetically sealed with slabs of marble. But all have been opened and ransacked. The interments in the lower piano occur in two long parallel galleries, one much wider than the other, communicating with one another by 14 transverse passages. In the upper story the graves are cut in the sides of three large, broad, low vaulted halls excavated out of the rock, and certainly with no original view of sepulture.

At the entrance of the lower piano we find a so-called martyrs' church, with a slightly vaulted roof. It was divided into a nave and sanctuary by two pillars, the bases of which remain, with cancelli between. In the sanctuary stands the altar, built of rough stone, and a rude bishop's seat in an apse behind it. On the South wall are the arcosolia of John I. A.D. 432, and Paul A.D. 764, who, according to Joannes Diaconus, desired to be buried near St. Januarius. In other rooms we find a well and a cistern, recesses for lamps, and the remnants of a Christian mosaic painting. In a niche in the upper piano, which was traditionally the place of the font, is the symbol $\overline{\text{IC}} \mid \overline{\text{XC}}$. Here, according to Pelliccia, iv. 162, NI KA.

a marble shell was discovered, since used as a holy water-basin in the church of St. Gennaro. The inscriptions in these catacombs go down to the 9th or 10th century.

Among other Christian catacombs known to exist in different parts of the shores of the Mediterranean, of which we are still in want of fuller and more scientific descriptions, we may particularize those of Syracuse known as "the grottoes of St. John," and described by D'Agincourt as "of immense size," and believed by him to have passed from pagan to Christian use: the Saracen catacomb near Taormina, with ambulacra as much as 12 feet wide; the loculi at right angles to, not parallel with, the direction of the galleries; each, as in the Roman catacombs, hermetically sealed with a slab of stone: those of Malta, supposed by Denon (Voyage in Sicily, Par. 1788), to have served a double purpose, both for the burial of the dead, and as places of refuge for the living; and which, according to the same authority, "evidence a purpose, leisure, and resources far different from the Roman catacombs;" and those of Egypt. Of these last D'Agincourt gives the ground-plans of several of pagan origin. The most remarkable is one beyond the canal of Canopus, in the quarter called by Strabo, xvii. p. 795, "the Necropolis." The plan of the Hypogaeum is drawn with great regularity, very unlike the intricate maze of those of Rome. The walls are pierced with three ranges of loculi, running, as at Taormina, at right angles to their length. Very recently a small Christian catacomb has been discovered at Alexandria, described by De Rossi (Bullettino, Nov. 1864, Agost. 1865). It is entered from the side of a hill, and is reached by a staircase, which conducts to a vestibule with a stone bench and an apse. This is succeeded by a cubiculum, with an arcosolium on three sides, opening into an ambulacrum containing 28 loculi, all set endways to the passage. The whole is full of paintings, of various dates, on successive layers of stucco. One, of a liturgical character, is assigned by De Rossi to the 4th century. But this is probably much too early.

CATALOGUS HIERATICUS, the name given in the Apostolic Canons (15 and 51, or 14 and 50) to the list of the clergy of a particular church. The term is also said to be applied to that part of the DIPTYCHS which contained the names of those, still living, who were named in the Eucharistic service; viz. of those who had made offerings, emperors, patriarchs, &c., and lastly of the bishop and clergy of the particular church, as above said. [A. W. H.]

CATECHUMENS. The work of the Church in admitting converts from heathenism or Judaism presented, from the nature of the case, very different features, according to the varying circumstances with which she had to deal. Discipline might be more or less highly organised, converts of higher or lower grades of knowledge or character. If we attempt to form a complete picture from data gathered from different churches and centuries, it must be with the reserve that all such pictures are more or less idealised, and that practically there were everywhere departures more or less important from it. It will be convenient to arrange what has to be said under the heads (I.) The Catechumens. (II.) The Catechists or Teachers. (III.) The Place of Instruction. (IV.) The Substance of the Teaching.

I. Instruction of some kind, prior to the admission of converts by baptism, must have been given from the first, and the word, which afterwards became technical, meets us in the N. T. Apollos was "instructed" (κατηχημένος) in the way of the Lord (Acts xviii. 25). Theophilus had been "instructed" in the main facts of the Gospel history which St. Luke inscribes to him (Luke i. 4). The πρώτοι of the apostolic epistles, though not confined to the stage prior to baptism, would naturally include those who were passing through it; and in the στοιχεῖα τῆς ἀρχῆς τῶν λογίων τοῦ Θεοῦ of Heb. v. 12, we have, probably, a summary of the instruction which the writer looked on as adapted for such persons. In practice, however, as in the instances of the Ethiopian eunuch (Acts viii. 36*), and the Philippian gaoler (Acts xvi. 33), it must have been of the briefest and simplest kind. The traces of the process and method of instruction in the sub-apostolic age, and the two centuries that followed, are fragmentary and vague. It is not till we get to the 4th century, with its strivings after a more elaborate organisation, that we meet with the developed system which has now to be described. So far as we may think of it as having actually prevailed, it deserves attention as presenting the most complete plan of systematic mission-work that the Church has ever known.

The converts, it is obvious, might be of any age—might have been Jews, or heathens, or heretics—might be ignorant or educated, of good or bad character. They might have been led to offer themselves by the influence of personal friends, or by the sermons preached in Christian assemblies at the religious services to which even outsiders were admitted. They presented themselves to the bishop or priest, and were admitted sometimes after inquiry into character, sometimes without any delay, by the sign of the cross (August. Conf. i. 11, De peccat. merit. ii. 26) and imposition of hands, to the status of catechumens (1 Conc. Arelat. c. 6, Conc. Elib. c. 3). The Councils, as might be expected, prescribe conditions and allow immediate admission only in cases of sickness and of at least decent conduct. St. Martin, however, in his mission work in Gaul, is reported to have admitted his hearers to be catechumens as they rushed to him catervatim on the spot (Sulpicius, Vita, ii. 5, p. 294). From that moment they were recognised as Christians, though not as "fideles" (1 Conc. Constant. c. 7; Cod. Theod. xvi. tit. vii. de Apostat. leg. ii.), and began to pass under instruction. The next epoch in their progress was the time when they were sufficiently advanced to give in their names as candidates for baptism; and some writers (e. g. Suicer and Basnage) have accordingly recognised only two great divisions, the AUDIENTES, and the COMPETENTES. Others, like Bona and Bingham, have made three or four divisions, though differing in details; and it will be well for the sake of completeness to notice these, though it is believed that the classification was never a generally received one.

(1.) Bingham's first class are the ἐξωθούμενοι, those, i. e., who were not allowed to enter the church, and received whatever instruction was given them outside its walls. The existence of such a body is, however, very doubtful. It rests only upon an inference drawn from the fifth canon of the Council of Neo-Caesarea, ordering that a catechumen (one of the Audientes) who had been guilty of grievous offences should be driven out (ἐξωθεῖσθαι), and there is no mention of such a class either in the canon itself or elsewhere. What is described is the punishment of an individual offender; and even if the offenders were numerous enough to attract notice, there would be no ground for classing them as in a distinct stage of instruction.

(2.) The next division, that of the AUDIENTES, or ἀκούοντες, rests on better evidence. The Greek term is, indeed, not found as the designation of a class till the 4th century, but the Audientes or Auditores are mentioned both by Tertullian (de Pœnitent. c. 6) and Cyprian (Epist. 13 to 34). Over and above the instruction they received from their teachers, they were allowed to attend in churches and to listen (hence their name) to the scriptures and to sermons, sharing this privilege with the unbelievers, but probably occupying a distinct place in the congregation.^a They were not allowed, however, to be present when the strictly liturgical worship of the church began, and when the sermon was over, the deacon, mounting on a rostrum of some kind, proclaimed that it was time for them to go (Const. Apost. viii. 5). As applied to these, or to the whole body of those who were under catechetical training, the missa catechumenorum became the dividing point between the more general worship of the church and the λατρεία, properly so called.

The feeling which showed itself in this discipline arcani kept them in like manner from hearing the Creed or the Lord's Prayer till they took their place among the fideles (Chrysost. Hom. xix. in Matt.). Sozomen (H. E. i. 20) even hesitated about inserting the Nicene Creed in his history lest it should fall into the hands of those who were still in the earlier stage of their Christian training. The practice of repeating the Lord's Prayer secretò, which still prevails in the Western Church, probably originated in a like precaution. Assuming the Audientes to represent the first class of beginners in Christian training, we may fairly identify them with the "rudes" of Augustine's treatise (De catechiz. rudibus) and the ἀτελείωτοι of the Greek Canonists (Balsamon ad Conc. Neocaesar. c. 5). The time of their probation probably varied according to the rapidity of their progress, and the two years specified by the Council of Elberis (c. 42), or the three fixed by the Apostolical Constitutions (viii. 32), can hardly be looked on as more than rough estimates of what was thought advisable. Any lapse into idolatrous practices or other open sins involved, in the nature of things, a corresponding prolongation of the time of trial. Where the offence was flagrant, the term, in which penance rather than instruction was now the dominant element, might be extended to the hour of death, or to some great emergency (Conc. Elib. c. 68).

(3.) Writers who maintain a threefold or fourfold division of the body of catechumens see the ass in the prostrati or genuflectentes (γόνυ-τες). These were admitted, not only to and listen, but to kneel and pray. As thus more prominent, they seem to have been as specially the catechumens, as, e.g., ἐκὼς κατηχουμένων of the C. of Laodicea. The name, it will be remembered, was also to those who were in one of the of the penitential discipline of the Church,

the fideles being degraded from their rightful position and placed on a level with those who were not as yet entitled to the privileges of membership. [PENITENTS.]

(4.) After these stages had been traversed, each with its appropriate instruction, the catechumens gave in their names as applicants for baptism, and were known accordingly as Competentes (συμπετόντες). This was done commonly at the beginning of the Quadragesimal fast, and the instruction, carried on through the whole of that period, was fuller and more public in its nature (Cyril Hieros. Catech. i. 5; Hieron. Ep. 61, ad Pammach. c. 4). To catechumens in this stage the great articles of the Creed, the nature of the Sacraments, the penitential discipline of the Church, were explained, as in the Catechetical Lectures of Cyril of Jerusalem, with dogmatic precision. Special examinations and inquiries into character were made at intervals during the forty days. It was a time for fasting and watching and prayer (Const. Apost. viii. 5; 4 C. Carth. c. 85; Tertull. De Bapt. c. 20; Cyril. l. c.), and, in the case of those who were married, of the strictest continence (August. de fide et oper. v. 8). Those who passed through the ordeal were known as the perfectiores (τελειώτεροι), the electi, or in the nomenclature of the Eastern Church as βεντιζόμενοι or φωτισόμενοι, the present participle being used of course with a future or gerundial sense. Their names were inscribed as such in the album or register of the church. They were taught, but not till a few days before their baptism, the Creed and the Lord's Prayer which they were to use after it. The periods for this registration varied, naturally enough, in different churches. At Jerusalem it was done on the second (Cyril. Catech. iii.), in Africa on the fourth Sunday in Lent (August. Serm. 213), and thus was the time at which the candidate, if so disposed, might lay aside his old heathen or Jewish name and take one more specifically Christian (Socrat. H. E. vii. 21). The ceremonies connected with their actual admission will be found under BAPTISM. It is only necessary to notice here that the Sacramentum Catechumenorum of which Augustine speaks (De Peccat. Merit. ii. 26) as given apparently at or about the time of their first admission by imposition of hands, was probably the εὐλογία or panis benedictus, and not, as Bingham and Augusti maintain, the sali which was given with milk and honey after baptism.^a

^a It may be well to quote the passage referred to:—"Non unus est modus sanctificatio; nam et catechumenus secundum quendam modum suum per signum Christi et orationem et manus impositionem potest sanctificari et quod accipit, quoniam non sit corpus Christi, sanctum est tamen, et sanctius quam cibi quibus alimur, quoniam sacramentum est." Bingham (x. 2, 16). Following Bingham, I infer from a canon of the 3rd Conc. Carth. c. 8, forbidding any other sacramentum than the "solitum sal" to be given to catechumens during the Easter festival, that this must be that of which Augustine speaks; and it is beyond question that this was given during the period of probation, as well as immediately after baptism. It would seem, however, from the canon itself, that some other sacramentum was given at other times; and the words of Augustine, "quoniam non sit corpus Christi," imply, it is believed, something presenting a greater outward likeness to the Eucharistic bread than could be found in the salt. The proviso would hardly have been needed, on Bingham's supposition.

It is clear that many cases would present themselves in which the normal order of progress would be interrupted. (1.) The catechumen might lapse into idolatry or other grievous sin. In that case he was thrown back, and had to go through a penitential discipline, varying, according to the nature of the offence, from a few months to three or five years, or even to a life-long exclusion (C. Elib. c. 4, 10, 11, 68; C. Nicaen. c. 14; C. Neo. Caesar. c. 5). In no case, however, was the sacrament, which was thought of as indispensable to salvation, refused to the penitent when the hour of death approached. Their sins were looked on as committed in their unregenerate state, and therefore less heinous than they would have been in those who had been admitted to full Christian fellowship. (2.) They might, however, through their own neglect, die without baptism. In that case, they were buried without honour, with no psalms or oblations (1 C. Bracar. c. 35), and were not mentioned in the prayers of the Church. The one comfort left to their surviving friends was to give alms to the poor in the hope that thus they might obtain some alleviation for the souls that had passed beyond the grave without the new birth that admitted men to the Kingdom (Chrysost. Hom. 3 in Philipp.). (3.) Where the loss of baptism was not incurred by their own default, the will was accepted, at least in special cases, for the deed. The death of the younger Valentinian led Ambrose (de Obit. Valent. p. 12) to the wider hope. What was true of catechumen-martyrs and the baptism of blood, as supplying the lack of the baptism of water—and this was received almost as an axiom by all Christian writers from Tertullian downwards (see Bingham, x. 2, 20)—was true of one of whom it might be said “hunc sua pietas abluit et voluntas.” Augustine, following in the footsteps of his master, appealed to the crucial instance of the penitent thief against the rigorous dogmatism of those who thought that baptism was absolutely indispensable (de Bapt. iv. 22). (4.) Another common case was naturally that of those who were stricken down by some sudden sickness before the term of their probation had expired. In this case the Church did not hesitate to anticipate the wished-for goal, dispensed with all but the simplest elements of instruction, and administered baptism on the bed of death. [BAPTISM, p. 169.]

II. It is noticeable that, with all this systematic discipline as to the persons taught, there was no order of teachers. It was part of the pastoral office to watch over the souls of those who were seeking admission to the Church, as well as of those who were in it, and thus bishops, priests, deacons, or readers might all of them be found, when occasion required, doing the work of a catechist. The DOCTOR AUDIENTIUM, of whom Cyprian speaks, was a lector in the church of Carthage. Augustine's treatise, de Catechizandis Rudibus, was addressed to Deogratias as a deacon, the Catecheses of Cyril of Jerusalem were delivered by him partly as a deacon, partly as a presbyter. The word Catechist implied, accordingly, a function, not a class. Those who undertook that function were known sometimes as παιδαγωγοί (Constt. Apost. ii. 37), as having a work like that of those to whom that title was applied on board ship. It was their part to of Christ's Church, to tell them of the perils of the voyage which they were about to undertake, and take their pledge for payment of the fare. The word was part of the metaphor which saw in the bishop the steersman, and in the presbyters the sailors, in the Church itself the navis or ship.

III. The places in which catechetical instruction was thus carried on must have varied widely at different times and in different places: sometimes the room or building in which the fideles met to worship, before or after service; sometimes a room in the presbyter's or deacon's house, probably at Alexandria, from the special nature of the case, a lecture-room, like the “school” of Tyrannus in Acts xix. 9. It is not till we come to the fully-developed organisation of the Church that we read of special buildings for the purpose, under the name of κατηχουμενεῖα. They are mentioned as such in the 97th canon of the Trullan Council, and appear, from a Novella of the Emperor Leo's, to have been in the ὑπέρφων, or upper chamber of the church; probably, i.e. in a room over the portico. In some instances the baptistery seems to have been used for this purpose (Ambros. Ep. 33), while in others, again, perhaps with a view to guarding against premature presence at the rite of baptism, they were not allowed to enter the building in which it was administered (Conc. Arausic. c. 19).

IV. The ideal scheme of preparation involved obviously a progress from lower to higher truths. The details varied probably according to the discretion of the teacher and the necessities of the taught; but two great representative examples are found of the earlier stage in Augustine's treatise de Catechizandis rudibus, and in the Catecheses of Cyril of Jerusalem. The range of subjects in the former includes the sacred history of the world from the Creation downwards, and then proceeds to the truths of the resurrection and judgment according to works. The better educated may be led to the allegorical meaning of Scripture, and the types of the law. Then came the Gospel narratives, and the Law of Christ. The teaching of Cyril, as intended for the competentes, took a wider and higher cycle of subjects, and are based (Catech. iv.) upon a regula fidei, including the dogmas (1) of God, (2) of Christ, (3) of the birth from the Virgin's womb, (4) of the cross, (5) of the burial, (6) of the resurrection of Christ, (7) of the ascension, (8) of judgment to come, (9) of the Holy Spirit, (10) of the soul, (11) of the body, (12) of meats, (13) of the general resurrection, (14) of the Holy Scriptures. [E. H. P.]

CATHEDRA (Καθέδρα).—(1) First and properly, in ecclesiastical usage, the actual throne or seat of the bishop in his episcopal church; the βῆμα καὶ θρόνος ὑψηλός of Eusebius (H. E. vii. 30), to which Paul of Samosata arrogantly added a σήμερον,—distinguished by the same Eusebius from the δευτεροὶ θρόνοι of the presbyters (ib. x. 5. 23);—who also speaks of the ἀποστολικὸς θρόνος of St. James at Jerusalem, meaning the actual seat itself still preserved there (ib. vii. 19, 32);—called cathedra relata by St. Augustine (Epist. ad Maxim. cciv.), and linteata by Pacian; and inveighed against by St. Greg. Naz. (Carm. xi.) as ὑψηλοὶ θρόνοι; and so Prudentius speaks of the bishop's seat, “Fronte sub adversa [i.e. as the upper end of the apse] gradibus subline

nal Tollitur" (Peristeph. II. iv. 225). St. Peter's chair is said to have existed for a long time at Alexandria (Vales. ad Euseb. H. E. vii. 9). One assigned to Pope Stephen is said to have been found in the catacombs by Pope Innocent XII. in a wooden chair, with its beaten ivory, representing the labours of Hercules, which is so highly honoured in St. Peter's at Rome as Peter's, is at once the most celebrated, and most unfortunately chosen, specimen of the Episcopal chairs are frequently represented in ancient Christian mosaics or marbles, sometimes adorned with two lions' heads, sometimes with two dogs' heads, sometimes with our Lord Himself represented as sitting in them, sometimes with the B. Virgin, sometimes with open Gospels laid upon them, sometimes the bishop himself (Ciampini, Vel. Mon. I. i. 37, 47, II. tab. 41; and cf. St. Aug. Epist. Novc. lvi.); sometimes raised upon steps (latae, St. Aug. Epist. ad Maxim. ccliii., and ringhi, ii. 325); sometimes "veiled" (see St. Aug. as above, see Bonio, Rom. Sotter. 7). And certain chairs or seats, cut in the stone in the catacombs, are conjectured to have been intended for the bishop at the time persecution compelled the Christians to service there. A Council of Carthage, A.D. 418, forbids a bishop "cathedram collocare in sterno," i.e. to ordain there.

Hence (2) the word was transferred to the seat of the bishop, as in Victor Vitens. Verac. Vandal. iv. So Conc. Milev. ii. 21, 24; and "Cathedrae viduatæ" in Conc. Carthag. i. c. 185, 217; "Cathedrae matris" in Conc. Milev. ii. c. 25; and Cod. Can. i. 123; and "Cathedrae principales," in Cod. Afric. 38. So also Greg. Tur. H. F. iii. 1, when Apollin. repented. And earlier than these, Tertullian (De Praescript. xxxvi.) speaks of "Cathedrae Apostolorum," as stilling in the "Ecclesiae Apostolicæ;" meaning not the literal chairs, but the specially privileged succession of the bishops of those sees.

The word became used for the Episcopal chair itself, "principalis cathedra," in Conc. Carthag. A.D. 418, can. 40, meaning the cathedral posed to the other churches in the diocese: lesia Cathedralis, Conc. Tarracon. A.D. 518, called also "Ecclesia mater," in the Conc. sub Sylvestro, c. 17; and "Ecclesia matrix," in Conc. Mogunt. i. c. 8; and "matrix," simply, in Grand. Breviar. cc. 11, 17, 38. But "cathedralis" used absolutely for the "ecclesia cathedralis," dates from the 10th century, and belongs to the Western Church only. [CATHEDRAL.]

CATHEDRA PETRI. [PETER, FESTIVALS]

CATHEDRAL, also in later times DOMUS, DUOMO: the chief and episcopal church of a diocese; not so called however until the 10th century, when the epithet, derived from the bishop's cathedra or chair, became a substantive name; called previously the mother church, or the ecclesia matrix, in distinction from the pariah churches, which were called ecclesiae dioecesanæ. [CATHEDRA.] It is also sometimes called the "Catholic" church. [CATHOLIC.] The architectural features of a cathedral are treated in the article CHURCH. The gradual formation and character of the cathedral chapter will be found under CHAPTER. And for the immunities belonging to it simply as a church, see CHURCH, SANCTUARY. As a cathedral church, it was held to be what at first and in the earliest times it literally was—the pariah church of the diocese, to which the others stood as it were in the relation of chapels. In it the bishop was formally enthroned: so cathedræ and incathedræ, to enthroned. And in it he was to be consecrated, according to ordinary rule. [BISHOP.] Ordinations also, and diocesan synods, were commonly held there. And manumissions of serfs, in Celtic and Saxon England, took place at the altar of the cathedral in the presence of the bishop. Schools and libraries were attached in course of time to cathedrals. And Charlemagne, who ordered monastic schools, and founded palatine schools, found episcopal schools ready to his hand. [SCHOOLS; CANONIC, p. 281.] [A. W. H.]

CATHEDRATICUM.—(1) A pension paid annually to the bishop by the churches of his diocese, "in signum subjectionis;" acc. to Conc. Bracar. ii. c. 2, "pro honore cathedræ;" and to Conc. Ravenn. A.D. 997, c. 2, "pro respectu Sedis;" both councils limiting the payments in each case to two shillings severally. So also Conc. Bracar. iii. A.D. 572, and Toled. vii. c. 4.—(2) Tributum, a fee paid by the bishop to the bishops who had consecrated him, and to the clerks and notaries who assisted (Julian. Antecessor, Constit. 115, 431; Justinian, Novell. cxviii. c. 3; quoted by Du Cange). [A. W. H.]

CATHISMA (Káθισμα). A section of the psalter.

(1) The psalter in the Greek Office is divided into twenty sections, called Cathismata. Each Cathisma is sub-divided into three Staseis, and "Gloria" is said at the end of each stasis only. These divisions and the order of reciting the psalter will be explained in a later article. The reason for the name assigned is that, while the choir stand two and two by turns to recite the psalms, the rest sit down.

(2) A short hymn which occurs at intervals in the offices of the Greek Church. It consists of one stanza, or troparion (ᾠδὴ ἁπλοῦς), and is followed by "Gloria." The name is said to indicate that while it is sung the choir sit down for rest. [H. J. H.]

CATHOLIC, καθολικός, Catholicus, used in its ordinary sense of "universal," not only by heathen writers (as, e.g. Pliny), but also not uncommonly by ecclesiastical writers also (as, e.g. Justin Martyr, Dial. cum Tryph. 81, καθολικὴ ἀποστολή, and Tertullian, Adv. Marcion. ii. 17, "Catholica . . . bonitas Dei," &c. &c.); but commonly employed by the latter as an epithet of the Christian Church, Faith, Tradition, People; first in St. Ignatius (Ad Smyrn. viii.), in the Martyrdom of St. Polycarp (in Euseb. H. E. iv. 14, &c.), in the Passio S. Pionii under Decius (ap. Baron. in an. 254, n. ix.), in St. Clem. Alex. (Strom. vii. p. 899, Oxf. 1715), and thenceforward commonly, being embodied in the Eastern (although not at first in the Western) creed:—indicating (1) the Church as a whole, as in St. Ignatius above quoted; and so in Arius' creed (Socrat. i. 26), ἐκ ἀπὸ πάντων ἑως πάντων:

(2) that portion of the universal Church which is in any particular place, as ἡ ἐν Σμύρνῃ καθολικὴ ἐκκλησία, as in the Mart. S. Polycarp.: (3) (when it had grown into an epithet ordinarily attached to the word church), used as equivalent to Christian, "Catholica fides" in Prudent. Peristeph. iv. 24, "Catholici populi," id. ib. 30: or to "orthodox," as opposed to "heretical;" as in Pacian. Epist. 1, ad Sempron. "Christianus mihi nomen est, Catholicus cognomen;" and in Conc. Antioch. A.D. 341, αἱ καθολικαὶ ἐκκλησίαι, as opposed to the Samosatensians; and in Conc. Arimin. A.D. 359, ἡ καθολικὴ ἐκκλησία, in like opposition to heretics; and in St. Cyril. Hieros. Lect. Catech. xviii. advising, in a town where there are heretics, to enquire, not, ποῦ ἐστὶν ἀπλῶς ἡ ἐκκλησία, ἀλλὰ, ποῦ ἐστὶν ἡ καθολικὴ ἐκκλησία, &c. &c. So also in the Athanasian Creed, "the Catholic religion," and "the Catholic faith." (4) When men began to look about for a rationale of the epithet, or when driven to do so as in the Donatist controversy (the Donatists meeting the argument against them, drawn from the word, by explaining it, "non ex totius orbis communionem, sed ex observatione omnium praeceptorum divinorum atque omnium sacramentorum," St. Aug. Epist. 93, § 23), taken to indicate the universality of the Church; so in St. Aug. Epist. 52, § 1, "Καθολικὴ Graece appellatur, quod per totum orbem terrarum diffunditur;" and similarly Isidor. Sentent. i. 16, &c. &c. And St. Cyril. Hieros. (Lect. Catech. xviii. § 23) dilates upon the word rhetorically in this sense, as intimating that the Church subjugates all men, teaches all truth, heals all sin, &c. In somewhat like way, the Catholic Epistles are so called (= Ἐγκύκλιοι) as early as the 3rd century (Euseb. H. E. vi. 25, vii. 25); because written, οὐ πρὸς ἓν ἔθνος ἀλλὰ καθόλου πρὸς πάντα (Leont. De Sect. Act. 2). And not only these, but such epistles also as those of Dionysius of Corinth (Καθολικαῖς πρὸς τὰς ἐκκλησίας ἐπιστολαῖς, Euseb. H. E. iv. 23). So Tertullian, again (De Monog.), of Catholic tradition. And similarly the well-known definition of "vere Catholicum," in St. Vinc. of Lerins, as that which had been held "semper, ubique, et ab omnibus." Optatus (Cont. Donat. ii.), in explaining the term by "rationalis et ubique diffusa," was possibly in the first half of his definition thinking of the "Rationalis," who was also called Καθολικός, being the general receiver of the imperial revenue under the Roman empire; but more probably was confounding the real derivation καθ' ὅλον, with a supposed one from κατὰ λόγον. (5) Used also somewhat later of the Church as a building: viz. as the distinctive epithet of the bishop's or cathedral church, as against the parish churches; e.g. in Epiphanius, Haer. lix. § 1 (ἡ καθολικὴ ἐκκλησία ἐν Ἀλεξανδρείᾳ, in opposition to the smaller churches there, and so also Niceph. xv. 22). (6) In Conc. Trull. can. lix. (Labbe. vi. 1170), as the name of the church, as opposed to an oratory (εὐκτηρίῳ οἴκῳ), baptisms (and by inference the eucharist) being celebrated in the καθολικὴ ἐκκλησία, but not in the oratory. (7) In Byzantine Greek times, an epithet of the parish church, which was open to all, in distinction from the monastic churches (Codinus, Balsamon, &c.). (8) Still later, the Patriarchs or Primate of Seleucia, of the Armenians, of the Ethiopians, were styled Catholici

CHRIST. ANT.

(Du Cange). See also Thomassin, I. i. 24. The Catholicus of the Persian Church was so called as early as Procopius (De Bell. Persico, ii.); and the Catholicus of Seleucia was made so independently of the Patriarch of Antioch (Arabic Vers. of Nicene Canons). The term means, more exactly, a primate, having under him metropolitans, but himself immediately subject to a patriarch. [CATHOLICUS.] Καθολικοὶ θρόνοι, in Theophan. (in V. Constant. Copronymi), were the sees of Rome, Alexandria, Antioch, and Jerusalem. (9) The term became a title of the King of France, Pipin being so called A.D. 767; and very much later, of the King of Spain also. (Pearson, On the Creed, art. 'Holy Catholic Church'; Du Cange; Suicer.) [A. W. H.]

CATHOLICUS. "I have ordered the catholicus of Africa to count out 3000 purses to your holiness," said the Emperor Constantine to Caecilian, bishop of Carthage (Euseb. H. E. x. 6). A similar order to indemnify Eusebius the historian for the costs of getting 50 copies of the Bible transcribed for general use was issued by him to the catholicus of the diocese; that is, of the civil diocese called the East (ib. Vit. Const. iv. 36). A former holder of this office, Eusebius elsewhere tells us, named Adauctus, had been martyred under Diocletian (H. E. viii. 11). Apparently there was one such for each of the 13 civil dioceses, and a 14th attached to the imperial household—ἐπὶ τῶν καθόλου λόγων λεγόμενος εἶναι βασιλέως (ib. vii. 10)—who was in later times, according to the Basilics, or code of the Emperor Basil I., called the "logothete" (lib. vi. tit. 23). Various ordinances relating to this office are to be seen there. The two prominent ideas attaching to it were that of a receiver-general, and of a deputy-receiver. It was formerly discharged in England by the sheriff or vicecomes of each county, who forwarded his annual account of receipts and disbursements to the king's exchequer. The ecclesiastical officer called "catholicus" was of a piece with the civil. Procopius, in his history of the Persian war (ii. 25) under Justinian, says that the chief dignity among the Christians of Dubis was called "catholicus," as presiding over the whole country, namely, Persia. But according to Dr. Neale (Eastern Ch. i. 141), this title had been assumed at a much earlier date by the bishops of Seleucia, meaning by it that they were "procurators-general," in the regions of Parthia, for the Patriarch of Antioch, to whose jurisdiction they were subject, till for political reasons their independence was allowed. The "catholicus" mentioned by Procopius was doubtless head of the Nestorians in Persia, whose teaching was speedily carried thither from Edessa, as the well-known letter of Ibas, bishop of the latter place, to the Persian Maris, alone would shew. Having on the death of Acacius, twenty-second catholicus of Seleucia, A.D. 496, obtained possession of that see, they established their head-quarters there, constituting its archbishop patriarch, and styling him "catholic patriarch." By this phrase they must have meant however not deputy-patriarch, which he was no longer, but oecumenical patriarch, which to them he was in fact. So that when the title got into sectarian hands, it seems to have shifted its meaning to some extent, and implied universal rather than vicarious powers. But as it was a dignity confined at first to the eastern portions of the single patriarchate of Antioch, and there common to the orthodox and heterodox alike, we must not expect to find the accounts given of it clear or always consistent. As a general rule the "catholicus" was subordinate to the patriarch, and had metropolitans under him; but the officer answering to this description among the Jacobites was more commonly called "maphrian," or "fruit-bearer;" the Nestorians on all occasions doing their best to monopolize the other title. Still we read of a "catholicus" for Armenia and for Georgia among the former, as well as for Chaldaea and Persia among the latter; and Jacobite patriarchs also called themselves "catholic," in imitation, and to the annoyance, of the Nestorian. (Asseman. De Monoph. § 8, and De Syris Nestor. c. xi.; Du Cange, Gloss. Graec. s. v.) Later writers, again, speak of a "catholicus" of Ethiopia, of Nubia, of the isles and elsewhere: that is to say, this title came to be applied in time to any grade between metropolitans and patriarchs (Bever. Synod. i. 708), and to be no longer peculiar to a single patriarchate.

[C.]

CAUPONA, CAUPONES, tavern, tavern-keepers. The Apostolical Constitutions enumerate the caupo amongst the persons whose oblations are not to be accepted (bk. iv. c. 6). If such oblations were forced on the priest, they were to be spent on wood and charcoal, as being only fit for the fire (ib. c. 10). A later constitution still numbers the caupo amongst those who could not be admitted to the church unless they gave up their mode of life (bk. viii. c. 32). Bingham, indeed, holds the caupo of the Apostolical Constitutions not to have been strictly a tavern-keeper, but a fraudulent huckster, and there is no doubt that the word is to be found used in a more extended sense in many instances. But there is in the present one no reason for diverting it from its ordinary use. It is clear from too many evidences that the ancient tavern—the caupona of the Romans—differed little from a brothel; see for instance Dig. bk. xxiii. t. ii. l. 43; Code, bk. iv. t. i. l. vi. l. 3. A Constitution of Constantine (A.D. 326), whilst declaring that the mistress of a tavern (the words caupona and taberna are here used indifferently) was within the laws as to adultery, yet if she herself had served out drink, assimilated her to a tavern-servant, classing such persons among those whom "the vileness of their life has not deemed worthy to observe the laws" (Code, bk. ix. t. ix. l. 1).

In the work called the "Lex Romana," is considered to represent the law of the population in Italy during Lombard times, which is mainly founded on the Theodosian, a similar provision is contained, but with of the word taberna alone (bk. ix.). This implies that the caupo himself, or the ca or tabernae domina, was undistinguishable from the brothel-keeper, and the forbiddance of the caupo's offering resolves itself into what is contained in Deut. xxiii. 18.

view is confirmed by almost all later authorities. Thus a cleric found eating caupona, unless through the necessities of travel, was by the 46th (otherwise 53rd) of the Apostolical Canons—supposed to be of the 4th century—sentenced to excommunication, the Canon evidently intending a tavern and not a mere huckster's shop. The 24th Canon of the Council of Laodicea (latter half of the 4th century, but the alleged dates varying from 337 to 367), enacts that none of the priestly order (lepariticos), from the presbyter to the deacon, nor outside of the ecclesiastical order to the servants and readers, nor any of the ascetic class shall enter a tavern (καπηλειον; see also the 7th Canon of the so-called African Council, which however itself only designates a general collection of African Canons). The book of Canons of the African church, ending with the Council of Carthage of 419, c. 40, repeats substantially the above-quoted article of the Apostolical Canons.

In spite of these enactments, we find by later ones that clerics, who were forbidden to enter taverns, actually kept them. Thus certain "Sanctions and Decrees" printed by Labbé and Mansi, after the various versions of the Nicene Canons, from a codex at the Vatican, but evidently from a Greek source, require (c. 14) that the priest be neither a caupo nor a tabernarius, making thus a distinction between the two terms, which often appear in later days to be synonymous. A canon ascribed by Ivo to the Synod of Tours, A.D. 461, states that "it hath been related to the holy synod that certain priests in the churches committed to them (an abuse not to be told) establish taverns and there through caupones sell wine or allow it to be sold;" so that where services and the word of God and His praise should alone be heard, there feasting and drunkenness are found. Such practices are strictly forbidden, the offending priest is to be deposed, the laymen, his accomplices, to be excommunicated and expelled (cc. 2, 3). In the East, indeed, it appears certain from the 43rd Novel, that in the first half of the 6th century, and presumably since the days of Constantine, taverns were held on behalf of the church, and must have been included among the 1100 separate trading establishments which were the property of the cathedral church of Constantinople. But apparently this tavern-keeping for the church was not held equivalent to tavern-keeping by clerics, since about sixty years later, the 9th Canon of the Council of Constantinople in Trullo, A.D. 691, bears "that it shall not be lawful for any cleric to have a tavern. For if it be not permitted to him to enter one, how much less can he serve in it, and do there that which is not lawful?" He must therefore either give it up or be deposed. And although the 68th Canon of the same Council uses a compound of the Greek Synonym for caupo, in a more general sense (τοῖς βιβλιοπωλείοις, translated librorum cauponatoribus, i.e. book-sellers), yet in the 76th the strict idea of the tavern seems to recur, where it is enacted that no καπηλειον is to be set up within the holy precincts, nor food or other things to be exhibited for sale. And by the 8th century the original sense of caupo, caupona is palpable through the more modern word (in this application) taberna, which occurs in numerous repetitions more or less literal of the above-quoted Apostolical Canon; as in a Capitulary of Theodulf, Bishop of Orleans, to his clergy, A.D. 797, forbidding them to go from tavern to tavern, drinking or eating (c. 13); one of the injunctions of Charlemagne, from a MS. of the Monastery of Angers, forbidding priests to enter a tavern to drink; the 19th Canon of the Council of Frankfurt, and the emperor's Frankfort Capitulary (794) to the same effect, but extending also to monks; a capitulary of 801 (general coll., bk. i. c. 14), quoting the Council of Laodicea and the African; the 325th chapter of the 5th book; the Canons of the Councils or Synods of Rheims (c. xxvi.), applying to monks and canons, and of Tours (c. xxi.), both in A.D. 813; the Edict of Charlemagne in 814, c. 18.

It will thus appear that whilst the severity of the Apostolical Constitutions against the individual tavern-keeper is not followed in later times, yet that the Western Church, at least during the period with which this work is occupied, persistently treated the use of the tavern by clerics, otherwise than in cases of necessity, still more their personal connexion with it, as incompatible with the clerical character. The witness of the Eastern Church is also to the same effect, but its weight is marred by the trade, including that in liquors, which for two centuries at least seems to have been carried on at Constantinople for the benefit, not indeed of individual clerics, but of churches and charitable foundations. CAVERNENSE CONCILIUM. [AFRICAN COUNCILS.]

CEALCHYTHE, COUNCILS OF. [CALCHYTHENSE.] Exact locality unknown, but certainly in Mercia, and probably Chelsea, originally called Chelcheth, Chelchyth, &c. (1) A.D. 787, or possibly 788, a legate council, George, bishop of Ostia, and Theophylact, bishop of Todi, being the legates for Pope Adrian I. Its object was to renew the "antiquum amicitiam" between Rome and England, and to affirm "the Catholic faith" and the six Oecumenical Councils. But it also appears to have been made the occasion of preparing the way for the erecting of Lichfield into an archbishopric independent of Canterbury, which actually took place in 788. A companion council was held in Northumbria (Haddan and Stubbs, Conc. iii. 444, sq.). (2) A.D. 789, called "Pontificale Concilium;" grants made there now extant (K. C. D. 155; Haddan and Stubbs, iii. 465). (3) A.D. 793, at which a grant was made to St. Alban's (K. C. D. 152; Haddan and Stubbs, iii. 478). (4) A.D. 799, at which a cause was adjudicated between King Coenulf and the Bishop of Delsey (K. C. D. 116, 1034; Haddan and Stubbs, iii. 528). There were several councils at the same place after A.D. 800. [A. W. H.]

CELIBACY

CELIBACY. The history of Christian thought and legislation in reference to this subject is essentially one of development. From first there were the germs of two different tendencies, at first in due proportion, each the complement of the other. Then, under influences which it will be our work to trace, one passes through rapid stages of growth till it threatens to overpower or crush the other. Protests are uttered from time to time, with more or less clearness. The idea which seemed threatened with extinction finally revives and in its turn dominates until it remains for the future to restore the balance which we recognise in the primitive record of the faith.

1. Any preference of celibacy over marriage was, it need hardly be said, foreign to the teaching of the Old Testament. Wedlock and the fruit of wedlock were God's best gifts. To be married or childless was to be under a "reproach" which it was difficult to bear. The asceticism of the later sects of Jews made in this respect a difference. Even the Essenes lived the life of a communist rather than a monastic society; had wives and children with them. No better witness to the Canonical Scriptures is stronger in its protest against marriage, or its condemnation of the sins which mar its perfection than that which represents the ethical teaching of the Judaism of Alexandria (Eccles. xiv. xxvi.). Preference for the celibate life had, it must be confessed, so far as the Christian Church was concerned, its origin in the New Testament. The birth from the Virgin's womb, the virgin-life of the Baptist and of the Son of Man, the strange words of implied blessing to those who "made themselves eunuchs for the kingdom of heaven's sake" (Matt. xix. 12), did not fail to make an impression on the minds of many disciples. The work of the great Apostle whose activity threw that of all others into shade, tended in the same direction. He declared without reserve that it was a good and fitting thing for a man not to "touch a woman" (1 Cor. vii. 1), the touch even of wedded love (1 Cor. vii. 1). Himself leading a celibate life,* he wished all men could follow his example (1 Cor. vii. 1) and laid down principles which, though limited by his reference to a "present necessity" (1 Cor. vii. 26), led on almost inevitably to a generalisation. If the man or woman unmarried was more free from "care," more able to render an undivided service to their Lord, it would be legitimate inference to think of that life as more excellent of the two. The degree of superiority might be exaggerated at a later period, but a higher excellence of some kind was tacitly implied in the language of St. Paul. The vision of the 144,000 in the Apocalypse—those who were "virgins, who were not defiled with women" (Rev. xiv. 4) seemed to carry recognition of that higher excellence into the glorified life of the heavenly Jerusalem.

2. All this was, however, balanced by the fullest recognition of the sacredness of marriage and was as far as possible removed from Manichaean tendencies which afterwards rupted it. The presence of Christ at the marriage-feast of Cana (John ii. 1), his vindication of the sacredness of marriage against the casuistry of the scribes, as resting on God's primeval ordinance and the laws of human life (Matt. xix. 4), his choice of Apostles who had wives (Matt. viii. 14), and probably children (Matt. xix. 27, 29), guarded against any tendency to treat marriage as among the things common and unclean. Nor was the teaching of St. Paul less clear. The great casuistic Epistle recognises it as a divine institution, makes all limitation on the jus conjugii but a temporary means to an end beyond itself (1 Cor. vii. 3-5); allows even, though not approving, the marriage of widowers and widows (1 Cor. vii. 39). The duties of husbands and wives are enforced on new and more mystic grounds than in the ethics of Judaism or Heathenism (Eph. v. 22-33). Their life, in all its manifold relations, was recognised as giving scope for the development of a high and noble form of Christian holiness (1 Pet. v. 1-7). With what might seem an almost startling contrast to his own example St. Paul required the bishop-presbyter to have had the experience of marriage and with at least a preference for those who had brought up children (1 Tim. iii. 2, 4), and extended the requirement even to the deacons of the Church (1 Tim. iii. 11, 12). The writer of the Epistle to the Hebrews at least implied, perhaps asserted, that marriage was, or might be, "honourable in all things and the bed undefiled" (Heb. xiii. 4). "Forbidding to marry" is classed by St. Paul as one of the "doctrines of devils" which were to be the signs of the apostasy of the latter days (1 Tim. iv. 1).

* This is not the place to discuss the question. It is enough to say that it is a rash exegesis which refers to a wife in the "true yoke-fellow" of Phil. 3, 2, not celibacy, but married continence, in vii. 7, 8.

3. The two lines of thought thus traced, ran on through the Church's history, but in unequal measure. Gradually the teaching which St. Paul condemned mingled itself with his, and the celibate life was exalted above that of marriage, not only because it brought with it a scope of more uninterrupted labour and more entire consecration, but on the ground that there was in marriage and its relations something impure and defiling. In the language of some Gnostic sects, it belonged to the kingdom of the Demiurgus, the creator of the material universe and of the human body as a part of it, not to that of the higher Christ-Aeon, who was Lord of the kingdom (Tertull. de Prescript. c. 33; Irenaeus, i. 28; Hippolytus, Refut. Omn. Hæc. i. 16). First, women [VIRGINS], and then men, devoted themselves to unwedded life, as offering a higher spirituality. At first, indeed, the more prominent teachers kept within the limits of Apostolic usage of St. Paul. Ignatius (Ep. ad c. 5) while introducing another thought, the life of celibacy is "in honour of Our flesh," warns men against boasting of this, placing themselves above others. Even Irenaeus, reproducing his own experience, claiming vehemently against second, or mixed marriages, draws, with great power, out of the beauty and blessedness of a marriage which husband and wife are both true members of Christ (Ad. Uxor. ii. 8). Clement and Irenaeus even venture to depict the true mystic as one who marries and has children attain to a higher excellence, because he has more temptations than that of the

celibate life (Strom. vii. 12 p. 741). There were not wanting, however, signs of a tendency to a more one-sided development. Putting aside the treatise de Virginitate ascribed to Clement of Rome,^b as probably one of the many spurious writings for which the authority of his name was claimed, and belonging to the 3rd century rather than the 1st, there remain the facts (1) that, outside the Church, TATIAN and the ENCRATITES developed their rigorous asceticism into a total abstinence from, and condemnation of, marriage; (2) that Athenagoras (Legat. c. 33), while not condemning it, speaks of many men or women as "growing old unmarried, in the hope of living in closer communion with God," and passes sentence upon second marriage as being no better than a "decent adultery"; (3) that Justin confirms at once his statement and his opinion (Apol. i. 15); (4) that Origen claims a special glory in this world to come for those that have chosen the life of consecrated celibacy (Hom. xix. in Jerem. 4), and gave a terrible proof in his own self-mutilation of the excesses to which a literal interpretation of the mysterious words of Matt. xix. 12 might lead. Many bye-currents of theological thought and feeling tended to swell the stream. The influence of Eastern Dualism, the assimilation by the Church of the feeling, if not of the dogma, which culminated in Manichæism, the growing honour for the mother of the Lord as the Ever-virgin, the deepening sense of the awfulness of the Eucharistic sacrifice, the embarrassment caused by domestic ties in times of persecution, perhaps also the difficulty of maintaining the purity of married life in the midst of the fathomless social corruption of the great cities of the empire—^call these led men to take what seemed to them at once the easier and the shorter road to the higher blessedness of heaven. As the monastic life spread, those who embraced it thought of themselves, and were looked upon by others, as being already "as the angels in heaven." The praises of the virgin-state became a common topic for the rhetoric of sermons and treatises; and the dialogue of Methodius of Tyre (Conversations decem Virginum) is probably far from being an exaggerated specimen of its class.

Through all this, however, strong as might be the influence of dogma or of feeling, the question, as regards the lay-members of the Church, was left as St. Paul had left it, as a matter for each man's conscience. The common sense of Christian writers led them to see the absurdity of a rule of life which would have led rapidly to the extinction of the Christian society: their reverence made them shrink from condemning what had been from the first a divine ordinance and had now become the symbol of the mystic union between Christ and his Church. There was no attempt so far to enforce the higher life by any legislation.^d Even second marriages, though

^b The authenticity of the treatise has been defended by Roman Catholic theologians. An English translation has been published in Clark's Ante-Nicene Library.

^c Comp. the picture drawn by Clement of Alexandria (Paedagog. iii. 2, 3), as shewing what was possible even among those who were nominally Christians.

^d A solitary exception is found in the correspondence between Dionysius of Alexandria and Pinyus of Gauson in Eusebius (H. E. iv. 23). The latter, it would seem, had tried to enforce celibacy among those committed to his care. The former warns him against rashly placing a condemned by the more rigorous moralists, were not forbidden. But it was otherwise with the clergy. The feeling that they were bound to exhibit what men looked on as the higher pattern of holiness gained strength in proportion as that pattern was more and more removed from their common life. The passage already referred to in Ignatius (Ep. ad Polyc. c. 5) shews that even then there were laymen who, because they were celibates, looked down superciliously on bishops who continued, after their appointment, to cohabit with their wives.

The practice of the Church of the first three centuries has hardly been fairly dealt with by Protestant controversialists. It is easy to point to the examples of married apostles, of bishops and presbyters, who had wives and to whom children were born long after their ordination,^c and these prove, of course, that marriage was not looked on as incompatible by the Church's law with ministerial duties. But it is difficult, perhaps impossible, to point to one instance in which the marriage was contracted after ordination.^f The unwritten law of the ancient Church was indeed like that of the Greek Church at the present day. Marriage was permitted in the clergy, but, as such, they were not allowed to marry. There were obviously many reasons for a rule which, at first sight, appears illogical and inconsistent. It carried into practice the principle that a man should abide in the state in which a sacred vocation had found him (1 Cor. vii.). It fulfilled the condition laid down by St. Paul, that the bishop-presbyter was to be the husband of one wife, and yet guarded against the risk, so imminent in all religious sects, of priestly influence being exercised to secure a wealthy marriage. It allowed the holiness of married life, yet tacitly implied the higher excellence of the celibate. Towards the close of the 3rd century the principle was formulated into a law, and both the so-called Apostolical Canons (c. 25) and Constitutions (vi. 17) rule that only the lower orders of the clergy, sub-deacons, readers, singers, door-keepers, and the like, might marry after their appointment to their office. Those who disregarded the law, and the offenders were numerous enough to call for special legislation, were to be punished by deposition (Conc. Neo-Cæsar. c. 1). Another council, held about the same time (A.D. 314) at Ancyra, made a special exception (c. 10) in favour of deacons who, at the time of their ordination, gave notice to the ordaining bishop that they did not intend to remain single. If they did not give notice, and yet married, they were to lose their office.

The growing feeling that celibacy was a higher state than marriage affected before long what has been just described as the law of the Church for the first three centuries. The married clergy might from various motives, genuine or affected their shoulders a burden which they could not bear. It is obvious that the rule would be applied with greater stringency to the clergy, who were more immediately under him.

^c One striking example is found in the history of Novatus, who, being a priest, is charged by Cyprian (Epist. 49) with having so ill-treated his wife that she miscarried.

aspirations after greater purity, desire to be free from what they had come to regard as an impediment to attaining it. The penalty of deposition pronounced by the Apostolic Canons (c. 6) on any bishop, presbyter, or deacon who separated himself from his wife "under the pretence of piety," shows that so far the Church was determined to maintain the validity of the contract as still binding.

A more difficult question, however, presented itself. Admitting that the contract was not to be dissolved, on what footing was it to continue? The rigorous asceticism of the time did not hesitate to answer the question by affirming that the husband and wife were to live together as brother and sister, that any other intercourse was incompatible with the life of prayer, and profaned the holiness of the altar. The Council of Elvira (A.D. 305), representing the more excited feelings that had been roused by the persecution of Diocletian, made the first attempt to enforce on the clergy by law, and under pain of deposition (c. 33), what had probably been often admired as a voluntary act of self-control. The Council of Nicaea was only saved from adopting a like decree as a law for the whole Church by the protest of Paphnutius, a confessor-bishop from the Upper Thebaid, who, though himself a celibate all his life, appeared as the advocate at once of the older law of the Church, and of the married life as compatible with holiness (Sozom. H. E. i. 23; Socrat. H. E. i. 11).^g

It is probable, however, that over and above the ascetic view which looked on marriage as impure, there was also a strong sense of some of the inconveniences connected with a married clergy. The wives of bishops took too much upon them, spoke and wrote as in their husbands' name even without their authority, and interfered with the discipline of the diocese. It is significant that the same council which took the lead in condemning the cohabitation of bishops, priests, or deacons with their wives, should have, as its last canon, one directed against the practice, apparently common, of women receiving or giving litteræ pacificæ in their own name (C. Elib. c. 81).

The contrast between the decrees of the Nicene Council and that of Elvira on this matter shows the existence of opposite tendencies in Eastern and Western Christendom, and from this point the divergence, first in feeling and afterwards in legislation, becomes more marked. It will be convenient to trace the paths taken by the two great divisions of Christendom separately. The Council of Gangra was, in this as in other respects, the representative of a healthier and more human feeling. Eustathius, bishop of Sebaste, had taught men to look on marriage as incompatible with holiness, on the ministrations of married priests as worthless, and his followers accordingly held aloof from them. The Council did not hesitate to pass a solemn anathema on those who thus acted. (C. Gangr. c. 4.) The more ascetic view, however, gained ground in Macedonia, Thessaly, and Achaia, and the man who was most urgent in pressing it was the Heliodorus, then bishop of Tricca, who, in earlier life, had written the sensuous, erotic romance of the Aethiopica (Socr. H. E. v. 22). This is one of the instances, however, in which the exception proves the rule, and the general practice of the Eastern Church was not affected by the rigorous asceticism of its European provinces. Even bishops had children born to them after their consecration. This, however, was in its turn opposed to the dominant practice, and the fact that Synesius (A.D. 410) refused to accept the bishopric of Ptolemais unless he was allowed to continue to cohabit with his wife, shews that a dispensation was necessary, and that he too was an exception to the general practice. It came accordingly to be the rule of the Eastern Church that men who were married before their ordination might continue, without blame, to live with their wives, but that a higher standard of self-devotion was demanded of bishops, first by public opinion and afterwards by ecclesiastical and even civil legislation. The feeling found a formal expression in the Council in Trullo, which sanctioned cohabitation in the case of subdeacons, deacons, and priests (c. 13) married before ordination, but ordered the wife of a bishop to retire to a convent or to become a deaconess (c. 48).^b Those who had married after their ordination were however to be suspended, and in future absolutely deposed (c. 36). The strong protest in c. 33 against the growth of a Levitical hereditary priesthood in Armenia may indicate one of the elements at work in bringing about the more stringent enforcement of celibacy. Even the former were subject to restrictions analogous to those which governed the ministrations of the Jewish priesthood, and were not allowed to contract marriage after their ordination, the rule being based on the canon of the Council of Ancyra already referred to, but excluding the power which that conceded of giving notice of the intention to marry, at the time of ordination. The Theodosian Code (De Episcop. 14, 2) enforced the same rule, and children born of marriages so contracted were to be treated as illegitimate (Cod. Theod. de bonis cleric., Justinian. Novell. v. c. 8). The Emperor Leo the Wise (A.D. 886-911) confirmed the Trullan canon, with a modification tending towards leniency. Clergy who so married were not to be reduced as before to lay communion, but were simply degraded to a lower order and shut out from strictly priestly functions. The results of this compromising legislation were probably then, as they are now, (1) that nearly all candidates for the priesthood married before they were admitted to the diaconate, (2) that they continued to live with their wives, but did not marry again, if they were widowers; and (3) that the great mass secular clergy being thus ineligible for ascetic life, the bishops were mostly chosen among the monks.

^g The narrative has been called in question by Baronius and other Romish writers on this ground, that Socrates was biased by his prepossession in favour of the Novatians, who allowed the marriage of the clergy, but is defended by Hefele (Beiträge, i. 129).

It is interesting to note that the Nestorians in the middle of the 6th century relaxed considerably the rules of the Trullan Council, and the Monophysite Abyssinians allowed their clergy to retain their wives and live with them.

^b Council, however, recognized, while it deplored, that bishops continued to live with their wives in Syria, and elsewhere (c. 13). It forbade the scandalous practice, and punished offenders with deposition.

Zacharias, Nuova Qualificazione del Celibato Sacro, pp. 129, 130.] [I. G. S.]

It remains to trace the progress of a more stringent and "thorough" policy in the Churches of the West. The principle asserted at Elvira extended to Western Africa, and was carried further in application. Not only bishops, presbyters, and deacons, but those of a lower grade who ministered at the altar were to lead a celibate life (2 C. Carth. c. 2). It was assumed as an axiom that the intercourse of married life was incompatible with prayer and the sacrifice of the altar, and as the priest ought always to pray, and daily to offer that sacrifice, he must of necessity abstain altogether (Hieron. Contr. Jovinian. i. 34). The bishops of Rome used their authority in the same direction. Siricius, in the first authentic decretal (A.D. 385), addressed to Himerius, bishop of Tarragona, forbade absolutely the marriage of presbyters and deacons. Innocent I. (A.D. 405) in two decretals addressed to Victorinus, bishop of Rouen, and Exuperius of Toulouse, enforced the prohibition under pain of degradation (Corp. Juris Can. c. 4, 5, and 8 Dist. 31). Leo I. (A.D. 443) tried to unite the obligation of the marriage vow and the purity of the consecrated life by allowing those who were already married to continue to live with their wives, but "habere quasi non habent . . . quo et salva sit charitas coniugiorum et cessent opera nuptiarum" (Epist. 167 of Eusebius). If this law were not kept, they were to be subject to the extreme penalty of excommunication. So in like manner the 1st Council of Toledo (c. 1) forbade the promotion of deacons or presbyters "qui incontinentem cum suis uxoris vixerint" to a higher grade. So also the 1st Council of Orange (can. 22, 23, 24) forbade the ordination of deacons unless they make a vow of chastity, and punishes subsequent cohabitation with deprivation. The 1st Council of Tours, as if afraid of the consequences of this extreme rigor, reduced the penalty to the suspension of those who were already priests from priestly functions, and, in the case of others, excluded them from any higher grade than that which they already occupied (1 C. Turon. c. 1, 2), but allowed both to partake of the sacrament of the altar. The subdeacons, perhaps as finding less compensation in the respect of the people and in the nature of their work, held out longer than those of higher grade. The yoke was, however, pressed on them too by Leo (Epist. 34 to Leo of Catania) and Gregory the Great (Corpus Juris Can. c. 14, Dist. 31), and Spain still kept its old pre-eminence to ascetic rigour. The 8th Council of Toledo (c. 6), A.D. 653, condemned both the marriage of subdeacons after their ordination, and continued cohabitation if they were married before. Their work as bearing the vessels of the altar required that they should keep themselves free from the pollution which was inseparable from that union. Offenders were to be sentenced to something like perpetual imprisonment in a monastery. The 9th Council (c. 10), A.D. 659, described every such union, from bishops to subdeacons, as a "coniugium detestandum," and their issue were not only treated as illegitimate and excluded from all rights of inheritance, but treated as slaves "iure perenni" of the Church against which their fathers had offended. It is melancholy, but instructive, to find another Council of the same Church, seventy-two years later (A.D. 731), compelled to pass canons on the one hand against the spread of unnatural crime among the clergy, pronouncing the sentence of deposition and exile on the bishops, priests, and deacons who were guilty of it, and, on the other, against the attempts at suicide which were becoming frequent among those who had been subjected to the discipline of the Church, with its censures and its penances (16 C. Tolet. c. 3 and 4). Stephen IV. (A.D. 769) enforced the rule of the Western as contrasted with that of the Eastern Church (Corpus Juris Can. c. 14, Dist. 31).

One marked exception has to be noted to the general prevalence of this rigour. The Church of Milan, in this as in other things, maintained its independence of Rome, and, resting on the authority of Ambrose, was content with the Eastern rule of monogamy, and applied it even to its own archbishops. "The practice of marriage was all but universal among the Lombard clergy. They were publicly, legally married, as were the laity of Milan" (Milman's Latin Christianity, b. vi. c. 3).¹ The practice against which Peter Damiani raved in the 11th century was clearly of long standing, and it may be noted that it bore its fruit in the high repute, the thorough organization, which made the Milanese clergy famous through all Italy.

It does not fall within the limits of this work to carry on the history further. Enough has been said to shew that when Hildebrand entered on his crusade against the marriage of the clergy he was simply acting on and enforcing what had for about seven centuries been the dominant rule of the church. The confusions of the period that preceded this had relaxed the discipline, but the law of the Church remained unaltered. The exceptional freedom enjoyed by the Church of Milan would but make one who strove after the unity of a theocracy more zealous to put a stop to what he regarded as at once a defilement of the sacred office and a rebellion against divine authority.

[Obviously this rapid and yet gradual development which has been traced of clerical celibacy was very largely, if not mainly, due to the influence of monasticism. Celibacy becomes, step by step, compulsory on all the clergy, while the monastic obligation is rivetted more and more tightly by an irrevocable vow. In the monk celibacy was, as has been indicated, an aspiration after superhuman holiness, intensified by that feeling of despair with which he was apt to regard the world around him, and its apparently hopeless state of corruption; and in subtle combination with motives of this kind was the hankering after wonder and veneration. In every way the example of the monks told powerfully on the clergy. The more devout longed to attain the monk's moral impassibility; lower natures were attracted by the prospect of gaining for themselves the monks' commanding position. Thus the rivalry, which never ceased, between the regular and the secular clergy, made the clergy generally more willing to accept the hard conditions exacted of them by the policy of their rulers. So at least it was in Western Christendom. In the East there was a more complete severance between the monks and the secular clergy, the former being debarred more closely from intercourse with the world, and the latter acquiescing in what was for them ecclesiastically a lower standing.] [I. G. S.]

It is obvious that just in proportion to the stringency with which the law of celibacy was carried into effect were its evils likely to shew themselves. One—and that for a time a very formidable one—will form the subject of a separate article. If men had not wives, while the habits of society made them dependent on the domestic services of women, they must have housekeepers. The very idealism of purity which held that husband and wife might live together as brother and sister, seemed to imply that any man and any woman might live together on the same footing without risk or scandal. The scandal came, however, fast enough—and the SUB-INTRODUCTAE or Συμβιωταί came to occupy a very prominent position in the legislation of the Church. [E. H. P.]

CELLA or CELLA MEMORIAE, a small memorial chapel erected in a sepulchral area over the tomb of the deceased, in which at stated times, especially the anniversary of his decease, his friends and dependents assembled to celebrate an agape, and partake of a banquet in his honour. These were often built over the tombs of martyrs, and were then known as Martyria, Memoriae Martyrum, Concilia Martyrum, and Confessiones. Sepulchral buildings of this character were common both to heathens and Christians. Indeed here, as in so much else, Christianity simply inherited existing customs, purged them of licentious or idolatrous taint, and adopted them as their own. Thus heathen and Christian monuments mutually throw light on one another. A Christian inscription, recording the formation of an area and the construction of a cella, is given in the article CEMETERY.

Directions for the erection of a building bearing the same title, and devoted to a similar purpose by a pagan, are given in a very curious will, once engraved on a tomb at Langres, a copy of a portion of which has been discovered in the binding of a MS. of the 10th century in the Library at Basle. The will is printed by De Rossi in the Bullettino di Arc. Crist., Dec. 1883. In it we find most particular directions for the completion of the cella memoriae, which the testator had already begun, in exact accordance with the plan he left behind him. This cella stood in the centre of an area. In front of it was to be erected an altar of the finest Carrara marble in which the testator's ashes were to be deposited. The cella itself was to contain two statues of the testator, one in bronze, one in marble. Provision was to be made for the easy opening and shutting of the cella. There was to be an erodra, which was to be furnished with couches and benches on the days on which the cella was opened. Coverlets (iodices) and pillows (cervicaria) to lay upon the seats were also to be provided, and even garments (abollae and tunicae) for the guests who assembled to do honour to the departed. Orchards and tanks (lacus) formed part of the plan. It was also ordered that all the testator's freedmen were to make a yearly contribution out of which a feast was to be provided on a certain day, and partaken of on the spot. Additional light is thrown upon the last-named provision by the terms of a long and curious inscription relating to a colleium for the burial of the dead, consisting chiefly of slaves, of the year A.D. 133. One of the regulations was that the members of the confraternity were to dine together six times in the year (Northcote, R. S. p. 51). These cellae were memorial halls for funeral banquets. The Christians were essentially men of their country and their age, following in all things lawful the customs of the time and place in which their lot was cast. The recent investigations of De Rossi do much to dispel the idea of the specific and exclusive character of the Christianity of the primitive Church. Rejecting the abuses arising from the license of pagan morals, there was nothing in itself to take exception at in the funeral feast. Indeed the primitive agapae or love-feasts were often nothing more than funeral banquets held in cellae at the tombs of the faithful, the expenses of which, in the case of the poorer members, were provided out of the arca communis or church-chest. We are familiar with pictorial representations of banquets of this nature derived from the Catacombs. Bottari supplies us with two such of remarkable interest from the cemetery of SS. Marcellinus and Peter (Bottari, Pitture, tom. ii. tav. 107, 109, 127), from St. Callistus (ibid. tom. iii. p. 1, 3). [CATACOMBS.] There was a remarkable indence between the arrangements of the as and heathens in these matters. In only was the cost of the funeral banquet of the general fund, but suitable clothing also provided for those who were present banquets. In an inventory of furniture ted in the Diocletian persecution in a house Christians were in the habit of meeting at Numidia, in addition to chalices of gold ver, and lamps, &c., we find articles of and shoes (tunicae muliebres lxxii, tunicae vi, caligae virides parva xiii, caligae mulieris sicut), and other entries of a similar nature. These cellae were not only used for the funeral feasts, which were necessarily infrequent, but also formed oratories to which the faithful resorted at all times to offer up their devotions over the remains of their departed brethren. The name cella, as applied to such places of reunion, seems to have been restricted to non-subterranean buildings erected in the funeral area, above the grave of the individual whom it was desired to commemorate. Chambers constructed for this purpose in the subterranean cemeteries were known as cubicula [CATACOMBS]. Another appellation by which they were known whether above ground or below, was memoriae martyrum or martyris until they lost their primitive name of cellae, and became known as basilicae (Hierom. Ep. ad Vigilant.). In fact, the magnificent basilicas erected above the tombs of the martyrs in the age of the peace of the Church, by Constantine and other Christian emperors, were nothing more than amplifications of the humble cellae or memoriae built in the area of the cemeteries.

We know from Anastasius (§ 21) that many buildings were erected in the cemeteries by the direction of Pope Fabianus (A.D. 238-354), "multas fabricas per coemeteria fieri praecepit." These fabricae we may safely identify, with Ciampini, Ansaldi, De Rossi, &c. with the cellae memoriae of which we have been speaking. "They were probably little oratories constructed either for purposes of worship, or the celebration of the agapae, or of mere guardianship of the tombs according to the common practice of the Romans" (Northcote, R. S. p. 86). The peace which the Church had at this time enjoyed for nearly 50 years would have encouraged the erection of such buildings, and rendered the use of them free from apprehension.

Cella and cellula were employed at a later time for sepulchral chapels built along the side walls of a church. It is used in this sense by Paulinus of Nola, in whose writings such chapels are more frequently termed cubicula. [CUBICULUM.]

An example of the use of the word in the sense of a monastic cell is given by Combefis, De Templo S. Sophiae p. 260, ἐξέρχεται τῷ εὐχέλῳ καὶ καλλία εἰς τὰ πύριζα κατὰ τῆς τάξεως αὐτῶν.

CELLERARIUS, Cellarius, καλλιάρης, εὐλαβήτης. One of the highest officials in a monastery. As the prior was next to the abbat in spiritual things, so the Cellerarius, under the abbat, had the management and control of all the secular affairs. He was sometimes called oeconomus (οἰκονόμος), dispenser or procurator. According to most commentators on the Benedictine Rule he was to be appointed by the abbat with consent of the seniors, and was to hold office for one year or more (Reg. S. Bened. c. 31, cf. Concord. Regul. c. 40). [I. G. S.]

CELLITAE, Κελλίται. A class of monks, midway between hermits and coenobites. Strictly speaking, they were the anchorites, ἀγκυρῆται, so called because they withdrew or retired from the coenobia, wherein the monks dwelt together, to small cells in the immediate vicinity. On festivals they repaired to the church of the monastery, and thus, being still semi-attached to the community, they differed from the hermits, ἐρημίται, who were independent of control who had refused to swear "by the fortune of Caesar." But for the first two centuries there is no evidence of any such prohibition, and unless the "Acts of the martyrs" are to be altogether discredited, the nucleus of many of the existing catacombs was created by the burial of some famous martyr on the private property of a wealthy Christian. The facilities for burial would be also further enlarged by the existence of legalized funeral guilds or confraternities (collegia), associated together for the reverent celebration of the funeral rites of their members. The Christians were not forbidden by any rules of their own society, or laws of the empire, to enter into a corporate union of this kind. The jurist Marcian, at the beginning of the third century, as quoted in the Digests (De Colleg. et Corpor. lib. xlvii. tit. xxii. 1), when stating the prohibitions against collegia sodalicia, soldiers' clubs, and other illicit combinations, expressly excepts meetings the object of which was religious, "religionis causa coire non prohibentur," provided they were not forbidden by a decree of the senate; as well as associations of the poorer classes meeting once a month to make a small payment for common purposes, one of which was the decent burial of their members, "permittitur tenuioribus stipem menstruam conferre, dum tamen semel in mense coeant" (Digest. ibid.). That such associations existed among Christians with the object, among others, of defraying the funeral expenses of their poorer brethren, is clear from the Apology of Tertullian. He says, speaking of the arca publica, or public chest: "Every one makes a small contribution on a certain day of the month (modicam unusquisque stipem menstrua die. . . . apponit), or when he chooses, provided only he is willing and able, for none is compelled. . . . The amount is, as it were, a common fund of piety. Since it is expended not in feasting, or drinking, or indecent excess, but in feeding and burying the poor, &c. (egenis alendis humanis-que)." Tertull. Apolog. c. xxxix. The first historical notice we have of any interference with the Christian cemeteries is found in Africa, A.D. 203. And this was not an act of the civil power, but was simply an outbreak of popular bigotry. "Areae non sint," Tertull. ad Scapul. c. iii. [AREA]. We do not find any general edict aimed at the Christian cemeteries before that of the Emperor Valerian, A.D. 257; and even this is directed not against the cemeteries themselves but against religious meetings in the sacred precincts, and is absolutely silent as to any prohibition of burial. After this, the cemeteries became expressly recognized by the civil power.

We cannot doubt that places of interment must have been provided by the Church, in its corporate capacity, for its members at a very early period. It was not every Christian whose dead body would be sure of receiving the pious care that attended the more distinguished members of the Church. Their abhorrence of cremation, and repugnance against admixture with the departed heathen forbade their finding a resting place in the heathen columbaria. The horrible puticuli where the bodies of the lowest slaves were thrown to rot in an undistinguished mass, could not be permitted to be the last home of those for whom, equally with the most distinguished members of the Church, Christ died. "Apud nos," writes Lactantius, "inter pauperes et divites, servos et dominos, interest nihil" (Lact. Div. Inst. v. 14, 15). A common cemetery would be one of the first necessities of a Christian Church in any city as soon as it acquired a corporate existence and stability. Rome could not have long dispensed with it. And when we read of Callistus being "set over the cemetery," by Pope Zephyrinus (c. 202), we cannot reasonably question that the cemetery which we know from Anastasius "Callistus made (fecit) on the Appian way, and which is called to the present day the cemetery of Callistus" (Anastas. § 17), was one common to the whole Christian community, formed by Callistus on a plot of ground given to him for this purpose by some Roman of distinction. It is a plausible conjecture of De Rossi that the example of those who had bestowed this cemetery on the Christian community would speedily be followed by other believers of wealth, and that others of the larger cemeteries which surround Rome owe their origin, or fuller development to this epoch. This probability is strengthened when we find it recorded by Pope Fabian, in the early part of the same century (A.D. 238), that "after he had divided the regions among the deacons he ordered numerous buildings to be constructed in the cemeteries" (multas fabricas per coemeteria fieri praecepit), Anast. § 21. It was in one of these memorial chapels that in all probability Pope Xystus II. was martyred, A.D. 261, "in coemeterio animadversum," Cyprian, Ep. 80 (81). Anastasius records that the charge under which he suffered was contempt for the commands of Valerian (Anast. § 25), and, as we have seen, one of the persecuting edicts of that emperor forbade the Christians to enter their cemeteries. Among the internal arrangements of the church attributed in the Liber Pontificalis to Dionysius (A.D. 261-272) is the institution of cemeteries, "coemeteria instituit" (Anast. § 26). From this period large public cemeteries became a recognized part of the organization of the Christian Church. It was considered a duty incumbent on the richer members to provide for the reverent interment of the poor, and where other means were wanting, St. Ambrose sanctioned the sale of the sacred vessels by the Christian community rather than that the dead should want burial (Ambros. de Offic. lib. ii. c. 28).

The form, position, and arrangements of the early Christian cemeteries were not regulated by any uniform system, but were modified according to the customs of the country, the nature of the soil, and the conditions of climate. Attention having been for a long time chiefly drawn to the subterranean cemeteries of Rome, it has been too hastily inferred that all the early Christian burial places were underground vaults. But as Mommsen says, "the idea that the dead were usually buried in such vaults in early Christian times is as erroneous as it is prevalent" (Contempor. Rev., May 1871, p. 166). We know that at Carthage the Christian dead were buried, not in hypogaea, but in open plots of ground, "areae sepulturarum nostrarum." Against these burial places the populace directed their mad attack with the wild cry, "Down with the burial places" (areae non sint), and with the fury of Bacchanals dug up the graves, dragged forth the decaying corpses, and tore them into fragments

(Tertull. ad Scap. 3, Apolog. c. xxxvii.). Half a century later we find the word in use at Carthage. St. Cyprian was buried "ad areas Macrobii Candidiani procuratoris" (Ruinart, Acta Martyrum Sincera, p. 263). It also occurs in the Acts of Montanus and Lucius, "in medio eorum in area solum servari jussit (Montanus) ut nec sepulturae consortio privaretur" (ib. 279). The same term is found in connection with a monumental cemetery chapel, cella memoriae, in a very remarkable inscription from Caesarea in Mauretania (Iol) given by De Rossi (Bullet. di Arch. Crist. April, 1864):—

"Aream ad (ad) sepulchra cultor verbi contulit.
Et cellam struxit suis cunctis sumptibus.
Ecclesiae sanctae hanc reliquit memoriam.
Salvete fratres puro corde et simplici,
Eueplis vos salos sancto Spiritu.
Ecclesia Fratrum hunc restituit titulum.
Ex log. Asteri."

"This graveyard was given by the servant of the Word, who has also built the chapel entirely at his own expense. He left the memoria to the Holy Church. Hail, brethren! Eueplis with a pure and simple heart greets you, born of the Holy Spirit." The remainder of the inscription records the restoration of the titulus, which had been damaged in one of the former persecutions, by the Ecclesia Fratrum. The concluding words, "ex ingenio Asterii," give the name of the poet.

We find sufficient evidence of this custom of burying in enclosed graveyards, according to the modern usage, prevailing in other districts. The language of St. Chrysostom with respect to the immense concourse of people who assembled on Easter Eve and other special anniversaries for worship and the celebration of the Eucharist in the cemeteries and at the martyria, with which the city of Antioch was surrounded, can only be interpreted of cemeteries above ground. There is not the slightest reference to subterranean vaults, which would have been altogether inadequate to receive the multitudes who thronged thither (cf. Chrysost. Hom. 81, ἐν τῷ ἐννοῦα κοιμητηρίῳ; Hom. 65, de Martyriis; Hom. 67, in Drosidem). The same inference as to the position of the cemeteries may be legitimately drawn from other passages of early writers. This is the only satisfactory interpretation of the passage in the Apostolical Constitutions (lib. vi. c. 30), relating to assemblies held in the cemeteries "for reading the sacred books, singing in behalf of the martyrs which are fallen asleep, and for all the saints from the beginning of the world and for the brethren that are asleep in the Lord, and offering the acceptable Eucharist." We learn also from Athanasius op. pro Fidei, p. 704 that during the week Pentecost the people fasted and went out ὑπὲρ τὰ κοιμητήρια. The prohibitions of Council of Elvira (A.D. 305, Canon, 34, 35) of custom of females passing the night in cemeteries, which was the cause of many ills under the colour of religion (cf. Pe. Arbit. Matrina Ephes.), and of the light of candles in them during the day-time, but cereos in coemeteriis non accendi, inquit enim Sanctorum spiritus non sunt" (cf. n. xxviii. 15, "Quare inquietasti me ut suscitari?"), indicate open-air cemeteries surd with martyria, monuments, and memorial chapels, not subterranean vaults. We would explain in the same way the 110th canon of the Council of Laodicea (A.D. 366) forbidding members of the Church to resort to the cemeteries or martyria of heretics for the purpose of prayer and divine service, ἐκτὸς ἢ θρησκείας ἑτέρας. Sidonius Apollinarius, bishop of Clermont, d. 482, describes the burial place of his grandfather as a grave (scrobs) in a field (campus) (Sidon. Apoll. lib. iii. ep. 12).

Nor even in Rome itself, though the actual place of interment was as a rule in a subterranean excavation, now known as a catacomb, does the word coemeterium exclusively denote these underground vaults. De Rossi, following Settele (Atti della Pont. Acad. d' Arch. tom. ii. p. 51) has abundantly shown in his Roma Subterranea (cf. vol. i. pp. 86, 93, &c.), that coemeterium when it occurs in the Lives of the Popes and other early documents frequently denotes the monumental chapels and oratories, together with the huts of the fossores and other officials, erected in the funeral enclosure. "The long peace from the reign of Caracalla to that of Decius might well have encouraged the Christians to erect such buildings, and allowed them to make frequent use of them notwithstanding occasional disturbances from popular violence" (Northcote, R. S. p. 86-87). When we read of popes and other Christian confessors taking refuge in the cemeteries and living in them for a considerable period, we are not to suppose that they actually passed their time underground, under circumstances and in an atmosphere which would render life hardly possible, but in one of the buildings annexed to the cemeteries, either for religious purposes, or for the guardianship of the sacred enclosures.* Thus when we read in Anastasius (§ 60) that Boniface I. in the stormy period that accompanied the double election to the papedom, A.D. 419, "habitavit in coemeterio Sanctae Felicitatis," we find Symmachus, his contemporary, writing without any allusion to the place of his retirement, "extra murum deductus non longe ab urbe remoratur" (Symmach. Ep. x. 73). We have a distinct example belonging to the same period, of residence in a cella of a cemetery. This is the priest Barbatianus, who having come from Antioch to Rome retired to the cemetery of Calixtus, "clam latens in cellula sua" (Agnellus, Vita Pont. Roman.). Ptolemaeus Silvius, quoted by De Rossi, Bullettino, Giugno, 1863, writing A.D. 448, speaks of the innumerable cellulae dedicated to the martyrs with which the areas of the cemeteries were studded. All these buildings taken collectively were often comprised under the name coemeterium. Onuphrius Panvinus (d. 1588), one of the earliest writers on Christian interment, De Ritu sepeliend. Mort. apud et. Christ., p. 85, expressly states that "inasmuch as worshippers were wont to assemble in large numbers at the tombs of the martyrs on the anniversaries of their death, the name of cemetery was extended to capacious places adjacent to the cemeteries, suitable for public meetings for prayer." "We read," he continues, "that the early Roman pontiffs were in the habit of keeping these stations, that is, performing all their public pontifical acts among the tombs of the martyrs. And thus these cemeteries were to the Christians as it were temples, and places of prayer in which bishops used to gather their synods, administer the sacraments, and preach the word of God." ^b [CHURCHYARD.]

That the term coemeterium was not restricted to the subterranean places of interment is also clear from the fact that though interment in the catacombs had entirely ceased in the 5th century, we read of one pope after another being buried in coemeterio (cf. Siricius, A.D. 398, Anast. § 55; Anastasius A.D. 402, ib. § 56; Bonifacius, A.D. 422, ib. § 61; Coelestinus, A.D. 432, ib. § 62). Even of Vigilius, who died A.D. 555, long after the catacombs were disused for burial and had become nothing more than places of devotion at the tombs of the martyrs, we read (ib. § 108), "corpus . . . sepultum est . . . in coemeterio Priscillae" (Anast. § 108). Hadrian I. in his celebrated letter to Charlemagne on images, also makes mention of the pictures executed by Coelestinus "in coemeterio suo" (Concilia, Ed. Mansi xiii. p. 801). (For fuller particulars, see De Rossi, Rom. Sott. vol. i. p. 216, 217). There is an apparent exception in the case of Zosimus, A.D. 418, Sixtus III. A.D. 440, and Hilarius, A.D. 468, all of whom are stated to have been buried "ad Sanctum Laurentium in crypta" (Anast. § 59, 65, 71). But as De Rossi remarks the exception only proves the rule. For this crypt did not at this time form part of the extensive cemetery of St. Cyriaca, but was the substructure of the altar (confessio) of the Basilica erected over it by Constantine, A.D. 330, of which it formed the nucleus. The result of his investigation is thus summed up by De Rossi, u. s.: "It is manifest that the cemeteries in which during the fifth century the bodies of the popes were interred were all buildings under the open sky, and that history is in accord with the monuments in presenting no single example in that period of a burial performed according to the ancient rites in the primitive subterranean excavations."

Although the words κοιμητήριον, coemeterium, were generally applied to the whole sepulchral area, and the buildings included within it, yet instances are not wanting in which it is used of a single grave. The examples adduced by De Rossi (R. S. p. 85) are exclusively Greek. He refers to Corpus Inscr. Graec., n. 9298; 9304-6; 9310-16; 9439-40; 9450; and mentions a bilingual inscription from Narbonne of the year 527, in which the tomb is styled KTMETEPION. In Boldetti, p. 633, we have an inscription from Malta stating that the KOIMHΘPION had been purchased and restored by a Christian named Zosimus. Aringhi also (Rom. Subt. tom. i. p. 5) adduces an example of a sarcophagus bearing this designation, KOIMHΘPION TOTTO ΩK-TABIAAH TH IAIA ITNAIKI ΛATAAKIE. The word is of excessive rarity in the catacombs themselves. The epitaph of Sabinus (Perret V. xxix. 67), in which we read CYMETERIUM BALBINAЕ, is perhaps the only instance known.

The Latin equivalents for κοιμητήριον most usually found were either dormitorium—e.g., FECIT IN PACE DOMINI DORMITORIUM (cf. Reines, Syntagm. Inscr. Antiq. 356); "Pompeiana matrona corpus ejus de iudice eruit et imposuit in dormitorio suo" (Acta S. Maximi, apud Ruinart, p. 264)—or in Africa, accubitorium (De Rossi, R. S. i. p. 86). A long list of other names by which at various epochs and in different countries, Christian places of interment were designated may be found in Boldetti (Osservazioni, pp. 584-586).

CHAIR. [CATHEDRA: THRONE.]

CHALCEDON (COUNCILS OF). (1) A.D. 403, better known as "the Synod of the Oak"—a name given to a suburb there—at which St. Chrysostom was deposed. To appreciate its proceedings, we should remember that St. John Chrysostom had been appointed to the see of Constantinople five years before, and that Theophilus, bishop of Alexandria, had been summoned thither by the emperor Arcadius to ordain him. Theophilus had a presbyter of his own whom he would have preferred, named Isidore, so that in one sense he consecrated St. Chrysostom under constraint. It was against the 2nd of the Constantinopolitan canons likewise for him to have consecrated at all out of his own diocese: but in another sense he was probably not loth to make St. Chrysostom beholden to him, and be possessed of a pretext himself for interfering in a see threatening to eclipse his own, where he could do so with effect. Hence the part played by him at the Synod of the Oak, over which he presided, and in which no less than 12 sessions were occupied on charges brought against St. Chrysostom himself, and a 13th on charges brought against Heraclides, bishop of Ephesus, who had been ordained by him (Mansi iii. 1141-54). The number of charges alleged against St. Chrysostom was 29 at one time and 18 at another. When cited to appear and reply to them, his answer was: "Remove my avowed enemies from your list of judges, and I am ready to appear and make my defence, should any person bring aught against me; otherwise you may send as often as you will for me, but you will get no farther." And the first of those whom he reckoned as such was Theophilus. One of the charges against him was some unworthy language that he had used to St. Epiphanius, lately deceased, who had supported Timotheus in condemning the originists, regarded by St. Chrysostom with more favour. The others refer to his conduct in his own church, or towards his own clergy. The synod ended by deposing St. Chrysostom, having cited him four times to no purpose; when he was immediately expelled the city by the emperor, and withdrew into Bithynia, to be very shortly recalled.

(3) The 4th general—held its first session, October 8, A.D. 451, in the church of St. Euphemia—for the architectural arrangements of which see Evagrius (ii. 3)—having been convened by the emperor Marcian shortly after his elevation. In his circular to the bishops (Mansi, vi. 551-4), he bids them come to Nicaea—the place chosen by him originally—to settle “some questions that he says had arisen apparently respecting the orthodox faith, and been also shown him in a letter from the archbishop of Rome.” But in reality St. Leo had urged a very different course. In his last epistle to the late emperor he had indeed petitioned that a council might be held in Italy, should a council be required at all (ib. 83-5): and when Marcian applied to him “to authorise” the council about to be held (ib. 93-4), his reply was that he would rather it were postponed till the times were more favourable (ib. 114-5). It was only when he found his advice unheeded that he decided on sending representatives thither (ib. 126-9), and then on the solemn understanding that there should be no resettlement attempted of the Nicene faith. Even so, he reminds the empress (ib. 138-9) that his demand had been for a council in Italy; and tells the council expressly that his representatives are to preside there, custom forbidding his own presence (ib. 131-5). His representatives, on their part, warn the emperor that unless he is present in person they cannot attend (ib. 557-8). Hence, to facilitate this arrangement, the council is transferred to Chalcedon. Bishops to the number of 360 attended, in some cases by deputy, the 1st action, and 19 of the highest lay dignitaries represented the emperor. Usually 680 bishops are said to have been at the council sooner or later (Bever. ii. 107). It might have been supposed this total had been gained originally by placing the 6 before, instead of after, the 3: still there are 470 episcopal subscriptions to the 8th action, and members of the council themselves spoke of it as one of 600 bishops (Mansi, vii. 57, and the note).

As to their places in church, the lay dignitaries upied the centre, in front of the altar-screen; one of the most remarkable traits of this council is their control of its proceedings all round. On their left were the legates from Rome, and next to them Anatolius of Constantinople, Maximus of Antioch, Thalassius of Caesarea, Stephen of Ephesus, and other Easterns. On their right were Dioscorus of Alexandria, Juvenal of Jerusalem, with the bishops of Egypt, Illyria, Palestine generally. On the motion of Thalassius, the first legate, Dioscorus was ordered by the magistrates to quit the seat occupied by him in the council, and to take his place in the midst where the accused sat. The charges against him by the legates were that he had held a council and sat as judge, without permission of the apostolic see. Eusebius of Dorylaeum, sitting in the midst as his accuser, complained of the iniquitous sentence passed upon Flavian and himself at the council of Ephesus (see the art. on this) two years before. Dioscorus begged its acts might be read. This was done: but meanwhile Theodoret, bishop of Cyrus, who had been deposed there, having since been restored by St. Leo, and invited to this council by the emperor, entered and took his seat, amidst vehement protests from the bishops on the right. After the acts of the “Robbers’ Meeting” had been read, which included those of the two synods of Constantinople preceding it, all agreed that Dioscorus, Juvenal, Thalassius, and three more, who had been most forward in deposing Eusebius and Flavian, deserved to be deposed themselves. The rest might be pardoned, as having acted in ignorance or under coercion.

Action or session 2 followed, October 10. The judges or lay dignitaries proposing that the faith should be set forth in its integrity, the bishops replied that they were limited to the creed of Nicaea, confirmed at Ephesus, and interpreted by the letters of SS. Cyril and Leo more particularly. On this it was recited by command of the judges, from a book by Eusebius, bishop of Nicomedia, amidst shouts of adhesion. And immediately after, without a word more, by order of the same judges, Aetius or Atticus, deacon or archdeacon of the church of Constantinople, recited from a book what purported to be the creed of the 150 fathers, that is, of the 2nd general council, on which some remarks have been made elsewhere. [CONC. CONST. and ANTIOCH.] But the abruptness of its introduction here merits attention, especially when viewed in connection with a short scene in the 1st action (Mansi, vi. 631-2). Diogenes, bishop of Cyzicus, there remarked that Eutyches had dealt fraudulently in professing his faith in the words of the creed of Nicaea, as it stood originally; for it had received additions from the holy fathers since then, owing to the false teaching of Apollinarius, Valentinus, Macedonius, and their followers; two such being “from heaven” after “descended,” and “by the Holy Ghost of the Virgin Mary” after “incarnate.” This is the first clear reference to the new clauses of the Constantinopolitan creed in this or any other council extant. And it is to be observed that even the creed of Nicaea, quoted in the definition, contains them. But Diogenes had hardly finished his sentence, when the Egyptian bishops exclaimed, “nobody will hear of any additions or subtractions either: let what passed at Nicaea stand as it is.” Dioscorus had urged this all along. Thus advantage was promptly taken of his condemnation to promulgate this creed in the same breath with that of Nicaea, while the account given of the additions occurring in it by Diogenes is such as to connect it at once with those synods of Antioch and Rome, at which the errors of Apollinarius and Macedonius were condemned. Its recital was followed by the same shouts of adhesion as the older form, which is the more remarkable as, up to that time, stress had been laid exclusively, both here and at the synods rehearsed in the first action, on the creed of Nicaea, confirmed at Ephesus, without the slightest reference to anything that had ever passed at Constantinople. After this, the two letters of St. Cyril were read that had been heard already from the acts of the council under Flavian, and then the letter of St. Leo to Flavian—the reading of which had been prevented at the “Robbers’ Meeting”—in a Greek translation. Three passages in it were called in question by the bishops of Illyria and Palestine; but Aetius and Theodoret producing similar expressions from St. Cyril, they were accepted. Five days were allowed for further deliberation.

At the 3rd action, however, October 13, two days in advance from which the lay dignitaries were absent, Eusebius of Dorylaeum having brought another indictment against Dioscorus, fresh charges were produced against him also by two deacons and one layman of his own church, and he not appearing to meet them, after having been twice summoned, was formally deposed—the Roman legates, by general consent, delivering their judgment first, and the rest in order assenting to it—but the sentence of his deposition was framed on the model of that of Nestorius. Letters were written to the emperor and empress and to his own clergy, acquainting them with it.

Action 4 followed, October 17, or rather 15 (see Mansi, vii. 83), when the judges appeared true to their engagement. By their order minutes of the 1st and 2nd actions were read out, to the marked exclusion of what had passed at the 3rd. They then called upon the bishops to declare what had been decided by them respecting the faith. The legates replied by pronouncing the faith of Nicaea, Constantinople, and Ephesus to have been embraced by the council and expounded faithfully by St. Leo in his epistle to Flavian. To this, all present assented; and Juvenal, Thalassius, Eusebius, Basil, and Eustathius, the five bishops who had, in the 1st action, been classed with Dioscorus, were permitted to sit in the council on subscribing to it. Consideration of a petition from 13 Egyptian bishops who objected to do so was adjourned till they had elected a new archbishop. Eighteen priests and archimandrites who had petitioned the emperor were next heard. Among them was Barsumas the Syrian, accused of having murdered Flavian. The burden of their petition was that Dioscorus should be restored. The 4th and 5th canons of Antioch were quoted from a book—in it numbered as canons 83 and 4—against them, and they were allowed 30 days for consideration whether to submit to the council or be deposed. Lastly, Photius of Tyre was heard in behalf of the rights of his church against Eustathius of Berytus, whose city had been created a metropolis by the late emperor. The council ruled, and the judges concurred, that the question between them should be settled according to the canons, and not prejudiced by any pragmatistical constitutions of the empire.

On the 5th action, commencing October 22, the judges called on the bishops to produce what had been defined by them on the faith. When read it gave offence to the legates and some few Easterns, as not including the letter of St. Leo. The former threatened to leave, and were told they might; but on reference to the emperor, he said a synod should be held in the West, if they could not agree. A committee was therefore formed of the principal bishops, and at length the definition appeared with the creeds of Nicaea and Constantinople following in succession, but authorised equally, in the first part of it; and in the second, the synodical letters of St. Cyril to Nestorius and to the Easterns, and the letter of St. Leo to Flavian, as their received exponents on the mystery of the Incarnation. On the doctrine of the Trinity, those creeds, it was particularly said, required no further explanation; nor was any other faith to be taught, or creed proposed for acceptance, to converts from what heresy soever, under pain of deposition in the case of the clergy and excommunication in that of the laity.

At the 5th action, October 25, all subscribed to this definition—the Roman legates attesting merely that they subscribed, the rest that they defined as well. This was done in the presence of the emperor Marcian, the empress Pulcheria, and a splendid suite; the emperor telling them in a short address that he had come thither, like Constantine, to confirm what they had done, not to display his power. After which, he approved of their definition, and announced his intention of punishing all who contravened it, according to their station. At his instance three rules were made; one for making monks more dependent upon bishops, and two more forbidding the clergy to undertake secular posts, or migrate from the church to which they belonged. And here the council, doctrinally speaking, ends.

The other actions, to the 14th inclusively, related to matters between one bishop and another, and occupied the rest of October. At action 7 sanction was given to a territorial arrangement between the bishops of Antioch and Jerusalem, by which the former was in future to have jurisdiction over the two provinces of Phoenicia and that of Arabia—the latter over the three called Palestine. At the 8th action Theodoret, who had already subscribed to the definition with the rest, was called upon to anathematise Nestorius, which he did, including Eutyches, and three more bishops similarly called upon did the same. The 9th and 10th actions passed in enquiring into what had been decided at the synods of Tyre and Berytus respecting Ibas, bishop of Edessa, three years before. Their acts having been rehearsed, and the sentence passed upon him at the “Robbers’ Meeting” summarily cancelled, he was declared orthodox on anathematising Nestorius and Eutyches, and restored to his see. Yet, inconsistently enough, in another case, that of Domnus of Antioch, the judgment of the “Robbers’ Meeting” was allowed to stand, his successor, Maximus, having been consecrated by Anatolius of Constantinople, recognised by St. Leo, and received at this council. Domnus, whose piety was admitted by all, was adjudged a pension out of the revenues of the see in which he had been uncanonically superseded. The Greek account of this proceeding indeed has been lost, but two of the Latin versions containing it purport to have been made from the Greek (Mansi, vii. 177–8, 269–72, and 771–4). Actions 11 and 12 were taken up in hearing a contention between Bassianus and Stephen for the see of Ephesus, as bishop of which, Stephen had hitherto sat and voted at this council. Neither had been canonically ordained in the judgment of the council, so that a fresh election had to be made, but both were allowed their rank and ordered a pension of 200 aurei respectively out of the revenues of that see. In the former of these actions, the 16th and 17th canons of Antioch were read out of a book by Leontius, bishop of Magnesia, numbered as 95th and 96th, and applied to their case. At the 13th action Eunomius, bishop of Nicomedia, complained that the privileges of his church had been infringed by the bishop of Nicaea. Imperial constitutions were quoted on both sides, which, according to the judges themselves, had nothing at all to do with the rights of bishops: and the 4th Nicene canon which Eunomius read out of a book as the 6th, settled the question in his favour. The insertion of a salvo to the see of Constantinople, proposed by its archdeacon, was negatived by the judges, who said that its rights of ordaining in the provinces would be declared in their proper order. At the 14th action, Athanasius and Sabinianus, who had each sat and subscribed as bishop of Perrhe, submitted their respective claims—the former adducing two letters in his favour from SS. Cyril and Proclus, the latter the acts of the synod of Antioch under Domnus, deposing his rival, and the fact of the "Robbers' Meeting" having restored him. For the judgment of the council, see Concil. Hierap. A.D. 445.

What is printed as the 15th action, without date or preface, would seem to be, strictly speaking, a mere continuation of the 10th action by the hierarchy for framing canons after the judges had retired. This would follow from what is said to have passed in the 16th action, October 28—at least, if this date is correct. There the legates complained to the judges of what had been done yesterday, after the latter had retired, and subsequently to their own withdrawal also. Now, October 27 had been the day of the 10th action, and the 11th action was not till October 29. Consequently there was just the interval required for them to have complained on October 28, and had the canon to which they objected read out publicly. Thus, when Ibas had been acquitted, the judges withdrew, and the bishops, probably not expecting any more business, remained to make canons. Twenty-seven in all, including those previously recommended by the emperor, were drawn up, and, according to one of the oldest Latin versions extant, were subscribed to by all, not excepting the legates (Mansi, vii. 400-8). After the legates had retired, the Eastern bishops again remained, and agreed to three more, making a total of 30; but to the last three the legates had not been parties, and equally declined subscribing the day after (Mansi, ib. 429-54). As Beveridge remarks, they are omitted as well by John Scholasticus as by Dionysius Exiguus (ii. 124), nor have they ever been received in the West.

Only the 28th, however, demands any notice. Those who were most interested in it said in their defence that they had asked the legates to take part in framing it, and they had replied that they were without instructions. The judges, on the other hand, had bade them refer it to the council. And doubtless it was as much a question for the council as those which had been settled in the 7th and 13th actions. In one sense it merely renewed the 3rd canon of Constantinople, A.D. 381, conferring honorary precedence (πρεσβεία, throughout—erroneously rendered by the Latins in each case "primatum") upon the bishop of that city next after Rome, and for the same reason as had there been given. And if, in addition, it gave the bishop of that city the right of ordaining metropolitans in the dioceses of Asia, Pontus, and Thrace, still this was afterwards proved to have been done with the full consent of the bishops of those dioceses. And so we are brought to what really passed at the 16th action, opening abruptly with a speech of the legate Lucentius (Mansi, vii. 441), as reported in the Greek version. Here both sides were called upon by the judges to produce the canons on which they relied; and the legates, in quoting the 6th of Nicaea, substituted for the first clause of it, "Quod ecclesia Romana semper habuit primatum." No protest was actually made to these words, but it was cited in its genuine form afterwards by the Constantinopolitan archdeacon. And as for the 3rd of Constantinople, Eusebius of Dorylaeum testified to having read it himself at Rome to the Pope, and to his having received it (ib. 449). The judges at last having delivered their opinion that the primacy before all, and chiefest honour, according to the canons, should be preserved to the archbishop of elder Rome, but that the archbishop of Constantinople ought to have the honour and power assigned him in this canon, it was accepted by all present, in spite of the legates, who had previously desired to have their protest recorded against what had been passed in their absence, for this 2nd speech of Lucentius clearly followed the reading out of the canon, October 28. Afterwards it was denounced in a series of epistles by St. Leo, who nevertheless, neither by his legates, nor in his own name, seems ever to have objected to the 9th and 17th canons of this council, authorising appeals to the see of Constantinople far more fully than the Sardican canons ever had to Rome (Bever. n. 115-6). Yet these form part of the 27 subscribed to by all, including the legates, and received in the West. No others among them, save the first, are worth noticing; but these, perhaps, have never been sufficiently noticed. By the first it is decreed that "the canons of the Holy Fathers, made in every synod to this present time, be in full force"—in other words, the collection of canons published by Beveridge, Justellus, and others, as the "code of the universal Church," is ordered to become law (Bever. ii. 108; Care, Hist. Lit. i. 486-7). It only remains to observe that Evagrius attributes no more than 14 actions to this council (ii. 18), and seems to say that most of the canons were framed at the 7th. Other accounts, that of Liberatus, for instance (Brev. i. 13), vary from his. Before separating, the bishops addressed the emperor in vindication of their definition, and the Pope in vindication of their 28th canon (Mansi, vii. 455-74 and vi. 147-81), telling St. Leo that he had interpreted the faith of Peter to them in his epistle, and presided over their deliberations in the person of his legates, as the head over the members. The Pope was deaf to all argument on the subject of the canon, while setting his seal to their definition. In one of his letters to Anatolius (Mansi, vi. 203) he goes so far as to say that the 3rd canon of Constantinople had never been notified to the apostolic see, though Eusebius of Dorylaeum had testified at the council to his having publicly received it himself. In the same spirit it is, perhaps, too, that he never once mentions the creed of the 150 fathers; in other words, that of Constantinople, by name, though he must have received it with the definition of this council: and indeed he said of it latterly, "tam plenius atque perfectis definitionibus cuncta firmata sunt, ut nihil ei regulae quae ex divina inspiratione prolata est, aut addi possit aut minui" (Ep. ad Leon. Imp., Mansi, vi. 308). Such, however, was his zeal against the canon that he was at one time thought not to have approved of the definition.

Edicts in succession issued from the emperor, ordering all persons to submit to the council, and forbidding all further discussion of the points settled by it. The law of the late emperor, confirming the acts of the "Robbers' Meeting," was repealed; Eutyches deprived of the title of priest; and Dioscorus exiled to Gangra in Paphlagonia. Great opposition was nevertheless made to its reception by their admirers, in Egypt especially, to which the "Codex Encyclicus," or collection of letters in its favour, addressed for the most part to the emperor Leo, on his accession, A.D. 458, was intended to be a counter-demonstration (Mansi, vii. 475-627 and 785-98).

CHALDAEL [ASTROLOGERS.]

CHALICE. (Latin, calix; Greek, ποτήριον, πίνακας; French, calice; Italian, calice; German, Kelch; Anglo-Saxon, calic.) The cup in which the wine is consecrated at the celebration of the Holy Communion, and from which the communicants drink. Chalices have been divided into several classes, of which the more important are—offertorial, in which the wine brought by the communicants was received; communal, in which the wine was consecrated; and ministerial, in which it was administered to the communicants.

Vessels of this description being indispensably required for the celebration of the most important of the rites of the Christian religion it is obvious that from the very earliest period some such must have been in use, but it does not seem possible to determine how soon they began to be distinguished by form, material, or ornament from the cups used in ordinary life. Perhaps the earliest notice which we have of any mark by which a cup used for eucharistic purposes was distinguished from those in ordinary use, is the passage in Tertullian (De Pudicit. c. 10): "Si forte patrocinabitur pastor, quem in calice depingis, prostitutorem et ipsam Christiani sacramenti, merito et ebrietatis idolum et moechiae asylum post calicem subsecutura."

It seems indeed quite possible that at that early period when the administration of the Eucharist was connected both as regards time and locality with the feasts of charity (agapae) the distinction between the vessels used for each purpose was less strongly drawn than afterwards came to be the case, and that in the earliest centuries there was little or no distinction of either form or decoration between the eucharistic cup and that of the domestic table.

The eventually exclusive adoption of the word "calix" as signifying the eucharistic cup, may perhaps be deemed to imply that the form of cup most generally employed in the celebration of the Communion, was that specifically called "calix." This word is held usually to denote a cup with a somewhat shallow bowl, two handles and a foot. Vases of various forms are often depicted on the walls or vaults of the catacombs, but it is generally uncertain how far these are merely ornaments, and it would not appear that in any one instance a representation of what can with certainty be assumed to be a eucharistic chalice has been observed among these paintings. It would at first sight appear extremely probable that among these numerous representations of vases, some at least should be intended to represent that which was above all precious to those for whom these decorations were executed, but the paintings of the earlier period are with hardly an exception allegorical or symbolical, scarcely ever in a primary sense historical, and never liturgical, unless the allusions to the sacraments conveyed by figures of fishes, baskets of bread, and the like deserve to be so called.

Vases from Sarcophagi at Bordeaux.

It has been supposed by some, Boldetti (Osservazioni sopra i Cimiteri dei SS. Martiri) among others, that the glass vessels decorated with gold leaf, the bottoms of which have been found in considerable numbers in the catacombs attached to the plaster by which the tiles closing the loculi were fixed, were, if not actually chalices, at least drinking-vessels in which the communicants received the consecrated wine, and from which they drank. Padre Garrucci (Vetri Ornati d' Oro, Pref. xi) has however shown that this opinion does not rest on any secure foundation. It has also been thought that the figures of vases so often found incised on early Christian in the possession of the church of Monza before the year 600, and may indeed with great probability be supposed to be of even greater age. A rude sculpture over the west doorway of that church, believed to date from circa A.D. 600, represents several chalices of various sizes, some with and some without handles.

Chalices of glass of very similar form are met with, and may with much probability be attributed to the 6th or 7th centuries; two examples are in the British Museum; these are of blue glass and somewhat roughly made. As, however, these bear neither inscriptions nor any Christian symbol, it cannot be affirmed with certainty that they were sacramental chalices. Moroni (Diz. di Erudizione Storico-Ecclesiast.) mentions a chalice of blue glass as being preserved in the church of the Isola S. Giulio in the lake of Orta in Lombardy, as a relic of the saint who lived in the 5th century; this, he says, was without a foot. It is not now to be found there.

In the sacristy of the church of Sta. Anastasia at Rome a chalice is preserved as a relic, as it is said to have been used by St. Jerome; the bowl is of white opaque glass with some ornament in relief, the foot is of metal.

A chalice is preserved (at Maestricht), which is believed to have belonged to St. Lambert, bishop of that city (ob. 708); it is of metal (? silver) gilt, the bowl hemispherical, the foot a frustum of a cone; the whole without ornament.

A chalice of exactly the same form is to be seen in an illumination in the very ancient gospels preserved in the library of Corpus Christi College at Cambridge, and known as St. Augustine's.

Chalice formerly at Chelles.

Until the year 1792 the abbey of Chelles, in the diocese of Paris, possessed a most splendid example of a golden chalice (see woodcut), which ancient inventories asserted to have been the work of St. Eligius (or Eloi), and therefore to date from the first half of the 7th century. Fortunately an engraving of it has been preserved in the Panoplia Sacerdotalis of Du Saussey, and the character of the work corresponds with the alleged date. It is obviously an instance of transition from earlier to later forms, though somewhat exceptional from the great depth of the bowl. It was about a foot high and nearly ten inches in diameter, and held about the half of a French litre.

A singular exception in point of form was the chalice which was found with the body of St. Othbert when his relics were examined in the year 1104; this is described as of small size and in its lower part of gold and of the figure of a lion, the bowl which was attached to the back of the lion being cut from an onyx (Act. Sanct. Boli. 2 Mart.). It may be surmised that this was not really made for a chalice, but had been presented to him and converted to that use.

Of the next century, the 8th, a very remarkable example still exists in the convent of Krems-

münster in Upper Austria; this chalice is (vide woodcut) of bronze ornamented with niello and encrustations of silver. As the inscription shows that it was the gift of Tassilo, duke of Bavaria, it is probably earlier than A.D. 788, the year when that prince was deposed by Charles the Great.

One of the bas-reliefs of the altar of S. Ambrogio at Milan (finished in 835) gives a good example of the form of a chalice in the beginning of the 9th century. It has a bowl, foot, and handles.

So much may be gathered from still existing examples, or representations of them; much may also be collected, especially as regards the size and weight of chalices and the materials of which they were composed, from the notices to be found in various historical documents, and particularly in the Liber Pontificalis.

It has been asserted that in the apostolic age chalices of wood were in use: but for this assertion there is no early authority; St. Boniface indeed is reported in the 18th canon of the Council of Tribur to have said that once golden priests used wooden chalices, and Platina (De Vit. Pont.) asserts that Pope Zephyrinus (A.D. 197-217) ordered that the wine should be consecrated not as heretofore in a wooden but in a glass vessel. The Liber Pontificalis in the life of Zephyrinus, however, merely says that he ordered patens of glass to be carried before the priests when mass was to be celebrated by the bishop. Glass was no doubt in use from a very early date; St. Jerome (ad Rustic. Mon. Ep. 4) writes of Euphrasius, bishop of Toulouse, as bearing the Lord's blood in a vessel of glass, and St. Gregory (Dialog. lib. i. c. 7) says that St. Donatus, bishop of Arezzo, repaired by prayer a chalice of glass broken by the heathens. The use of wood for chalices was prohibited by several provincial councils in the 8th and 9th centuries (Conc. Tribur. can. 18), of horn by that of Chalchythe (Conc. Culcut. can. 10), and Pope Leo IV. (847-855) in his homily, De Cura Pastoralis, lays down the rule that no one should celebrate mass in a chalice of wood, lead, or glass. Glass, however, continued to be occasionally used to a much later date. Martene (De Antiq. Eccl. Rit. t. iv. p. 78) shows from the life of St. Winocus that in the 10th century the monks of the convent in Flanders founded by him still used chalices of glass. Pewter was also in use, and it would seem was considered as a material superior to glass, for we are told of St. Benedict of Aniane (ob. 821) that the vessels of his church were at first of wood, then of glass, and that at last he ascended to pewter (see his Life, by Ardo, c. 14, in Mabillon's Act. SS. ord. S. Benedicti, Sæc. iv.).

A chalice of glass mounted in gold is mentioned in the will of Count Everhard, A.D. 837 (Miraus, Op. Dip. t. i. p. 19). A chalice of ivory and one of cocoa-nut (de nucæ) set with gold and silver are mentioned in the same document; these however may have been drinking-cups, not sacramental chalices.

The use of bronze appears to have been exceptional and perhaps peculiar to the Irish monks. St. Gall (Mabillon's Act. SS. ord. S. Ben. Sæc. 2, p. 241), we are told, refused to use silver vessels for the altar, saying that St. Columbanus was accustomed to offer the sacrifice in vessels of bronze (aereis), alleging as a reason for so doing that our Saviour was affixed to the cross by brazen nails. This traditional use of bronze was no doubt continued by the successors of the Irish missionaries in the South of Germany, and explains why the Kremsmünster chalice is of that material, a circumstance which has caused the question to be raised whether that vessel was anything but a mere drinking cup. The use of niello and of damascening with thin silver in the decoration of this vessel, and the peculiar patterns of its ornamentation, connect it closely with the Irish school of artificers, who were in the habit of employing bronze as the main material of their works.

The precious metals were however from a very early, perhaps the earliest, period most probably the usual material of the chalice. The earliest converts to Christianity were not by any means exclusively of humble station, and it was not until it spread from cities into remote villages that many churches would have existed whose members could not afford a silver chalice: nor do we until a later age find traces of a spirit of asceticism which would prefer the use of a mean material. We have at least proof of the use of both gold and silver in the sacred vessels in the beginning of the 4th century, for we are told by Optatus of Milevi that in the Diocletianian persecution the church of Carthage possessed many "ornamenta" of gold and silver (Opt. Mil. De Schism. Donat. i. 17). The church of Cirta in Numidia at the same time possessed two golden and six silver chalices (Gesta Purgat. Caeciliani, in the Works of Optatus). That it was believed that the churches possessed such rich ornaments at an earlier period is shown by the language which Prudentius puts into the mouth of the Praefectus Urbis interrogating St. Lawrence—

"Argentis scyphis ferunt, Fumare sacrum sanguinem," &c.
(Peristeph. Hymn iii. 69).

The passages in the Lit. Pont. which relate the gifts of Constantine to various churches are with reason suspected as untrustworthy, but are at least of value as recording the traditions existing at an early age. They make mention of many chalices, some of gold, some of silver; 40 lesser chalices of gold, each weighing 1 lb., and 50 lesser ministerial chalices of silver, each weighing 2 lbs., are said to have been given to the Constantinian Basilica (St. John Lateran), and in lesser numbers and of very various weights to many other churches. Whatever, however, may be the historical value of these passages, that churches in the 4th and 5th centuries possessed great numbers of golden or silver chalices, cannot be doubted. Gregory of Tours (Hist. Franc. i. iii. c. x.) tells us that Childebert in the year 531 took among the spoils of Amalric sixty chalices of gold. Many instances of gifts of chalices of the precious metals to the churches of Rome by successive popes are to be found in the Lit. Pont. Of these the following may deserve special mention: a great chalice (calix major) with handles and adorned with gems, weighing 58 lbs.; a great chalice with a syphon (cum scyphone) or tube, weighing 36 lbs.; a covered (spanoclystus, i.e. σπανόκλειστος) chalice of gold, weighing 32 lbs.; all three given by Pope Leo III. (795).

Little is to be found as to the decoration of chalices; occasionally they bore inscriptions, as the case of that made by order of St. Remigius (iii. ob. 533), which Frodoard tells us bore the following verses:—

"Hauriat hinc populus vitam de sanguine sacro, Injerto aeternus quem fudit vulnere Christus, Remigius reddit Domino sua vota sacerdos."

The golden chalices of Monza, it will be seen the woodcuts, were splendidly adorned with gems, which in the painting from which these are have been drawn, are coloured green and red, but the only symbol betokening their destination is the cruciform arrangement of the larger ones on one of them. The chalice found at Urdon also has neither inscription nor Christian symbol, and if it had not been found in company with a paten bearing a cross its destination might have been a matter of doubt.

On the chalice of Kremsmünster are on the bowl half-length figures of Christ and the four Evangelists, on the foot like figures of four prophets.

The division of chalices into various classes evidently belongs to a period when primitive simplicity of ritual underwent a change to a more complex and elaborate system. The earlier Ordo Romanus speaks of a "calix quotidianus," and opposes to this the "calix major" to be used on feast-days ("diebus vero festis calicem et patenam majores"), but says nothing of any distinction between the "calix sanctus" and the "calix ministerialis." Reasons of convenience no doubt caused the use of chalices of very different sizes. The great number of chalices of small size mentioned in the Lit. Pontif. and elsewhere may lead to the supposition that at one period the communicants drank not from one but from many chalices; but this matter is involved in doubt.

A practice existed of communicating the clergy alone by means of the chalice in which the wine was consecrated, and of pouring a few drops from this into the larger chalice which was offered to the laity. When this practice originated or how long it lasted seems obscure. It is suggested in the article "Calix," in Ducange's Glossary, that the verses engraved by order of St. Remi on the chalice which he caused to be made (v. 106) allude to this practice; but this does not seem certain. It is mentioned in the Ordo Rom. (c. 28), but the vessel in which the drops of consecrated wine were mixed with the unconsecrated, and from which the laity drank through a "fistula" or "pugillaris," is called scyphus, and is apparently the same vessel as that carried by an acolyte at the time when the oblations were received from the laity and into which the contents of the calix major (c. 13) were poured when the latter had become filled. Pope Gregory II. (A.D. 731-735), in his epistle to Boniface, disapproves of the practice of placing more than one chalice on the altar ("congruum non esse duos vel tres calices in altario ponere"). When this practice was in use we may conclude that the large chalices with handles were those used for the laity.

The large chalices were also used to receive the wine which the intending communicants brought in amulæ; as in the 1st Ordo Rom. c. 13 ("Archidiaconus sumit amulam Pontificis . . . et refundit super eolum in calicem"). When used in this manner it is called "offerentarius" or "offerendarius." "Calices baptismi" or "baptismales" were probably those used when the Eucharist was administered after baptism, and possibly for the milk and honey which it was the custom in some churches (Conc. Carth. iii. c. 3) to consecrate at the altar and to administer to infants. Pope Innocent I. (A.D. 402-417) is said in the Lit. Pontif. to have given "ad ornatum baptisterii" (apparently of the basilica of St. Gervasius and Probasius at Rome) three silver "calices baptismi," each weighing 2 lbs. Whether the baptismal chalices differed from other chalices in form or in any other respect is not known.

Besides the chalices actually used in the rites of the church, vessels called "calices" were suc-pended from the arches of the ciborium and even from the intercolumniations of the nave and other parts of the church as ornaments. In the Lb. Pontif. we find mention of sixteen "calices" of silver placed by Pope Leo IV. (847-8) on the enclosure of the altar (super circuitu altaris) in the Vatican basilica, of sixty-four suspended between the columns in the same church, and of forty in a like position at S. Paolo f. l. m. Many of these were, however, most probably cups or vases, not such as would have been used for the administration or consecration of the Eucharist. The drawings in MSS. show suspended vessels of the most varied forms; some examples taken from the great Carolingian bible formerly in the Bibl. Imp. Paris, now in the Musée des Souverains in the Louvre, are shown in woodcuts. [A. N.]

CHANCEL (τὰ ἔνδον τῶν κυκλίδων, Theodoret, H. E. v. 18). The space in a church which contains the choir and sanctuary, and which was generally separated from the nave by a rail or grating (cancelli), from which it derives its name. "Cancellus, cantorum excellens locus" (Papias, in Ducange, s. v.; compare CANCELLI). It is a characteristic difference between Eastern and Western churches that in the former the distinction between the bema (or sanctuary) and the choir is much more strongly marked than that between the choir and the nave, in the latter the distinction between the nave and the choir is much more strongly marked than that between the choir and the sanctuary. Compare CHOIR, PRESBYTERY. [C.]

CHANT. [GREGORIAN MUSIC.]

CHAPEL. A building or apartment used for the performance of Christian worship in cases in which the services are of an occasional character, or in which the congregation is limited to the members of a family, a convent, or the like. Greek, παρεκκλησία; Latin, capella, oratorium. In the languages of the Latin and Teutonic families a modification of the word 'capella' is in use, as also in Polish. In Russian pridel.

The derivation of the word 'capella' is a matter of doubt. The Monk of St. Gall (Vita Car. Mag. i. 4) states that the name was derived from the 'capa' or cloak of St. Martin: "Quo nomine (i. e. 'capella') Francorum reges propter capam St. Martini sancta sua appellare solebant." The word 'capella' is said to be found in inscriptions in the Roman catacombs in the sense of a sarcophagus, a grave, or place of burial. It occurs at a later time as used for a reliquary, and for the chamber in which reliques were preserved; as in a charter of Childebert of A.D. 710, published by Mabillon (De Re Dipl.), in which the passage "in oratorio suo seu capella S. Marthini" occurs. The canopy over an altar was also called 'capella' (compare CUPELLA). In the sense of a chamber or building employed for divine worship, it does not seem to have been in use in early times. Among early instances of its employment which have been noticed, are, in the capitularies of Charles the Great (Capit. v. 182), where it is applied to chapels in or annexed to palaces; and in the passage in the laws of the Lombards (iii. 3, 22), "ecclesiae et capellae quae in vestra parochia sunt," where detached buildings are probably referred to. In the earlier centuries "oratorium" would no doubt have been used in either sense, as in the 21st cap. of the Council of Agde, A.D. 506. "Si quis etiam extra parochias in quibus legitimus est ordinariusque conventus oratorium in agro habere voluerit reliquis festivitibus ut ibi missas teneat propter fatigationem familiae iusta ordinatione permittimus;" but with the proviso that the greater festivals should be celebrated "in civitatibus aut in parochiis."

Chapels may be divided into several classes:—1st, as regards their relation to other churches; being (A) dependent on the church of the parish, or (B) independent, in some cases even exempt from episcopal visitation. 2dly, as regards their material structure; being (A) apartments in palaces or other dwellings; (B) buildings forming part of or attached to convents, hermitages, or the like; (C) buildings forming parts of or attached to larger churches; (D) sepulchral or other wholly detached buildings. No strictly accurate division is, however, possible, for in some cases buildings might be placed in either of two classes.

It is here proposed to speak of chapels with regard to their material aspect only; and buildings which from an architectural point of view do not differ from churches will be mentioned under the head CHURCH. As however it is impossible to draw a clear line between churches and chapels, several buildings will be found treated of under CHURCH, which in strictness should perhaps be rather deemed chapels; some of these, as Sta. Costanza at Rome, being too important in an historical point of view, or too extensive and magnificent, to be omitted from any attempt to trace the progress of church building in its main line.

Gatticus (De Orat. Dom.) has collected many proofs of the early existence of domestic or private chapels; but the earliest existing example of the first class is probably the small chapel now known as the Sancta Sanctorum (originally St. Lawrence) in the fragment of the ancient palace of the Lateran which still remains. It was the private chapel of the popes, and appears to have existed as early as A.D. 383; for Pope Pelagius II. then placed there certain relics (MSS. Bib. Vat. ap. Baronius). It is a small oblong apartment on an upper floor. The example next in date has fortunately been singularly well preserved. It exists in the palace of the archbishops of Ravenna, being their private chapel. It was constructed, or at any rate decorated with mosaic, by the Archbishop Peter Chrysologus (elected in A.D. 429). It is a simple oblong with a vaulted roof. Of the same character is the chapel at Cividale in Friuli, which, although forming part of a Benedictine convent, as it measures only 30 feet by 18 feet, can hardly have been other than a private chapel, probably of the abbat. It is attributed on historical evidence to the 8th century. It is a parallelogram without an apse, about two-fifths being parted off by a low wall, to serve as a choir.

Oratory at Gallerus.

Buildings of the second class, viz., conventual chapels, were intended for the private and daily use of the community; the larger churches for celebration on great festivals, when large numbers of strangers attended the services. In some instances even more than two chapels existed in a monastery; for Adamnan (De situ terrae Sanctae, ii. 24) says that at Mount Thabor, within the wall of enclosure of the monastery, were three churches, "non parvi aedificii." In the tower or keep of the convent of St. Marcellus in the Nitrian valley are three chapels, one over the other (Sir Gardner Wilkinson, Handbook of Egypt); but it does not appear what their date is. Sir Gardner Wilkinson (Handbook of Egypt, p. 305) states that a tradition among the monks attributes the foundation of the convent to the 5th century.

In Ireland still exist some small chapels which may be assigned with probability to very early dates. Mr. Petrie (The Ecclesiastical Architecture of Ireland, p. 133) thinks that such structures as the Oratory at Gallerus in Kerry, shewn in the woodcut, may be considered to be the first erected for Christian uses, and as ancient as, if even not more ancient, than the conversion of the Irish by St. Patrick. This example measures externally 23 feet by 10, and is 16 feet high, the walls being 4 feet thick. It has a single window in its east end. On each of the gables were small stone crosses, of which the sockets only now remain.

Of somewhat later date, but Mr. Petrie thinks as early as the 5th or 6th centuries, are such buildings as Tempull Ceannanach, on the middle island of Arran, in the bay of Galway. This measures internally 16 feet by 12, and is built of very large stones, one not less than 18 feet in length. The church of St. MacDara, on the island of Cruach Mhic Dara, off the coast of Connemara, measures internally 15 feet by 11. Its roof was of solid stone, built in courses until they met at the top.

The above-mentioned examples are simple quadrangular buildings without distinction between nave and chancel, but others are met with, apparently of equal antiquity, in which a small chancel is attached to the nave and entered by an archway. In no case is an apse found in Ireland.

The buildings of this class are so rudé and simple that it is not easy to establish satisfactorily any chronological arrangement founded on their architectural character; it would appear, however, that buildings of similar character were constructed until in the 11th or 12th centuries more ornate structures were erected.

Many of these small chapels were, however, constructed of wood, and the whole class was known (Petrie, p. 343) as 'duir-theacha,' or 'dertheachs,' the probable etymology of which is "house of oak." It appears from a fragment of a commentary on the Brehon laws (Petrie, p. 365) that 15 by 10 were customary dimensions for such buildings, and the stone chapels are usually found not to differ very greatly from them.

Buildings of very similar character exist in Cornwall, and their foundation is attributed to missionaries from Ireland: such was the chapel of Perranzabuloe, or, St. Piran in the sand, said to have been founded by St. Piran (or as he is called in Ireland St. Kieran) in the 5th century. It had been completely buried in the shifting sand of the coast, but in 1835 the sand was removed, and the building discovered in an almost perfect state; it is 29 ft. long externally by 16½ broad; as will be seen from the plan, it was a simple parallelogram, but divided into two parts by a wall or screen. The tomb of the saint apparently served as an altar.

The chapel of St. Maddern is very similar in plan, but has the peculiarity of having a well in one angle; that of St. Gwythian has both nave and chancel, the latter entered by a narrow doorway. Mention of several others of like character will be found in a paper by the Rev. W. Haslam, in vol. ii. of the Architectural Journal. The masonry of these buildings is very rude and irregular, but the huge stones, and roofs constructed of stone, which are found in Ireland do not seem to occur in Cornwall. A building of like character was disinterred from the sands of the coast of Northumberland in 1853, near Ebb's Nook, not far from Bamborough; it closely resembles the Cornish oratories. The name seems to connect it with St. Ebba (ob. 683), sister of St. Oswald, king of Northumberland.

Some of the Cornish chapels were perhaps rather those of hermitages than of convents, and the same observation may be applied to the like buildings in Ireland.

Chapels of the third class, those attached to churches, may be divided into three sections: A, those forming part of the main building above ground; B, those connected with the main building, but distinct from it; C, those under ground, or crypts.

Although very many churches built before A.D. 800, exist in such a state that we may feel tolerably certain that we possess an accurate knowledge of their original ground-plans, scarcely any clear examples of chapels which could be placed in the first section can be pointed out. We cannot suppose the apartments which are found in very many of the churches of the 5th and 6th centuries in central Syria on either side of the narthex to have been chapels in the sense of having been used for divine worship; nor were the lateral apses originally constructed for a like use, since we have contemporary testimony (Paulinus of Nola, Ep. xxxii.) that one was used as a sacristy, and the other as a place in which the devout might read the scriptures and offer prayers; if, however, we define the word chapel so as to admit apartments destined to serve as places for prayer, but not for the celebration of the rites of the church, we must consider the lesser apse on the left of the great apse as a chapel. In the description which St. Paulinus has given (Ep. xxxii.) of the basilica of St. Felix, mention is, however, made of 'cubicula' in the following passage: "Totum extra concham basilicae, spatium alto et lacunato culmine geminis utrinque porticibus dilatatur, quibus duplex per singulos arcus columnarum ordo dirigitur. Cubicula intra porticus quaterna longis basilicae lateribus inserta secretis orantium vel in lege Domini meditantium praeterea memoriis religiosorum et familiarium accommodatos ad pacis aeternae requiem locos praebent." [CUBICULUM.]

This passage seems to show clearly that in some instances apartments were placed by the sides of the nave, but this was probably very exceptional, for, as has been said above, no example of such a plan now exists. It should, however, be noticed that in two churches of very early date openings have existed in the side walls with which chapels may have been connected; these are the churches of Sta. Croce in Gerusalemme and that of Sta. Balbina, both at Rome; in the first were five openings on each side of the nave, in the second six. The first of these buildings is, however, held to have been the hall of the palace of the Sessorium, and not originally constructed to serve as a church; the second is believed to date from the 5th century, but to have been reconsecrated by St. Gregory about A.D. 600.

At a very much later date we find in the church of Sta. Christina at Pola de Lena, near Oviedo, in Spain, apartments attached to and entered from the nave. These are no doubt contemporary with the church, the date of which is probably near A.D. 809. These apartments may have been chapels, but it has been surmised that they were really built to serve as sacristies. The like arrangement occurs at Sta. Maria de Naranco, near Oviedo, which dates from A.D. 848.

One almost unique example exists in the church of Romain Motier, where the upper story of the narthex has a small apse on the east, and was therefore probably intended to serve as a chapel; it is nearly square in plan, and divided into three aisles by two ranges of columns supporting groined vaults. As the church of which this forms a part was a large conventual one, this was probably intended to serve as the smaller chapel generally found in convents. The church is believed to date from 753, the narthex to be somewhat later.

The chapels which belong to the second section, viz. those attached to churches, but distinct buildings, are not very numerous, and in most cases their primary object was sepulchral. Such the three attached to the church of St. Lorenzo at Milan would appear to have been, though it has been suggested that that on the south was a baptistery, and that on the north a porch or vestibule.

That on the south, now called the church of St. Aquilinus, is octagonal externally, while internally semicircular and rectangular niches alternate, one in each face; in it are two massive sarcophagi, one of which is believed to contain the remains of Ataulphus, king of the Goths. The conchs of two of the niches retain some mosaics of a very early period, perhaps the 5th century. This building is connected with the church by a vestibule, supposed by Hübsch (Alt-Christliche Kirchen, p. 22) to be of later date; it is a square vaulted chamber with apses east and west. The chapel of St. Sixtus on the north side has exactly the same plan, but is much smaller; that of St. Hippolytus at the east end of the church is also octangular externally, but internally forms a cross with four equal limbs. All three are probably not remote in date from the church itself, which would seem to have been built about the end of the 4th or the beginning of the 5th century.

In like manner Pope Hilarus (461-467) added to the baptistery of the Lateran chapels dedicated in honour of St. John the Baptist and St. John the Evangelist.

Of the early part of the 9th century we have a most interesting example in the chapel of St. Zeno attached to the church of St. Praxedis (Sta. Prassede) at Rome, built by Pope Paschal I.

Sabina (A.D. 425) and Sta. Maria in Trastevere, only very small vaults are found as confes- sions, but in S. Ajel- linare in Classe, at Ravenna, a crypt ap- pears as part of the original structure; it consists of a passage running within the wall of the apse, and another passing under the high altar.

French antiquaries (Martigny, Dict. des Antiq. Chret. art. 'Crypte') have claimed a very high antiquity for crypts under several churches in France, e.g. that under the church of St. Meillon (? St. Gervais), at Rouen, is alleged to of the 4th century. It that in most cases where periods they are ancient oratories, or, possibly, period, and not structural, however, exist, which structural; these are those ons and of St. Victor at of these has a central and ginally by columns which es of which are of brick above there is a strong e central aisle ends in an aid to have been founded The crypt of St. Victor is re catacombs, the original e 5th century. The crypt of vaulted compartments re rectangular piers. pts exist in England, those on and in the abbey church of Hexham: both are attributed to St. Wilfrid, who founded monasteries at both places; that at Ripon between 670 and 678, that at Hexham about 673. It appears from the testimony of Leland (Itin. i. 89, 2nd ed.) that the actual cathedral of Ripon does not occupy the same place as the church of the abbey built by Wilfrid, and there is much uncertainty whether the like is not true of the church of Hexham.

The similarity of the plans and the peculiarity of the structures can leave no doubt that one person planned both, and this can hardly have been any other than St. Wilfrid. The model which he followed was evidently not the confession of a church but the cubiculum and galleries of a Roman catacomb, and the principal vault in each does in fact bear considerable resemblance to the cubiculum adjacent to the cemetery of St. Callixtus (about two miles from Rome in the Via Appia), in which the bodies of SS. Peter and Paul are said to have remained for a considerable time.

The vault in question (Marchi, Roma Sott. pl. xli.; CATACOMBS, p. 310) has an arched roof nearly semicircular, but really formed by five small segments of circles, and has the same height, about 9 feet, and the same width, 8 feet, as the two crypts, but being in plan nearly square, while the crypts are oblong, is only 8 feet long, while they are 11·3 and 13·4. It is evidently by no means unlikely that St. Wilfrid may have intended to construct models of a place in his time most highly venerated and much resorted to, just as models of the Holy Sepulchre were built in later times. Some of the small niches in the walls were probably intended to contain relics or to hold lamps. The ante-chamber to the principal vault is stated to be covered by a demi-vaulted roof, as Mr. Walbran surmises, in order that the steps of the altar might be carried on it. If these structures were not beneath churches, probably small "cellae memoriae," such as will be hereafter noticed, covered and protected the access to them. Whether they were originally provided with altars is uncertain.

A crypt existed in the Saxon church of Canterbury, and was, we are told by Edmer, the chanter (quoted by Gervase, De Combust. et Rep. Dorob. Eccl.), "ad instar confessionis S. Petri fabricata," it was beneath a raised choir, and appears to have had several passages or divisions. Whether this formed part of the early church, or was one of the additions made by Archbishop Odo (cir. 950), is unknown.

A crypt also appears in the plan for the church of St. Gall (made cir. A.D. 800). It consisted of two parts, a "confessio," which was reached by steps descending between two flights ascending to the raised presbytery, and a "crypta," which seems to have consisted of two passages entered from the transepts on either side, but running outside the walls; a third, connecting the former two, and running in front of the apse, and another short passage running from the last mentioned to a spot beneath the high altar. There is a close resemblance between this arrangement and that in the Roman churches of the same period (as Sta. Cecilia) where the crypt follows the line of the wall of the apse. Altars were placed in both crypt and confession.

In the church of Brixworth, in Northamptonshire, which there is evidence for believing to date from cir. A.D. 700, is a crypt running round the apse externally, originally covered with a vault; and, according to Mr. Poole (Reports and Papers of Arch. Soc. of Northants, York, and Lincoln, i. 122) there are also traces of a short passage running westwards from this to the probable position of a "confessio" below the high altar. Mr. Watkins, however (The Basilica &c. of Brixworth), asserts that there could have been no crypt under the apse, as the original floor was on a level with the rest of the church. [CHURCH.]

A remarkable crypt or "confessio" exists under the raised presbytery of the church of St. Cecilia at Rome, and apparently dates from the construction of the building by Pope Paschal I. (817-824). It consists of a vaulted space south of the altar (the church stands nearly north and south), a passage running round the interior of the apse, and another passage running south from the north end of the former, but stopped by a mass of masonry supporting the high altar. Within this mass is a sarcophagus, containing the body of the saint. The passages are lined with slabs of marble set on end: many of these have early inscriptions, and were probably brought from an adjacent cemetery. The same arrangement exists at Sta. Prassede, and nearly the same at SS. Quattro Coronati and St. Pancrazio—all at Rome—and it seems to have been the normal arrangement about this period. It will be observed that it is very much the same as that at Brixworth and St. Gall. At Fulda, in Hesse Cassel, is a crypt which is usually attributed to the 9th century. It consists of a circular passage, within which is a circular space, the vault of which rests on a short clumsy column, with a rude imitation of an Ionic capital.

Buildings of the fourth class, i.e. sepulchral chapels, were constructed at a very early period. The practice of erecting large structures for such purposes being familiar to several nations of antiquity before the Christian era it is not surprising that when they became converts to Christianity they continued a practice which their new faith would rather encourage than reprehend.

The greater part of the chambers in the catacombs near Rome may be considered as belonging to the class of sepulchral chapels. [See CATACOMBS.]

At what time the practice of placing an altar and of celebrating the eucharistic service in a sepulchral chapel was first introduced cannot be stated with precision. We are indeed told in the Liber Pontificalis of Pope Felix I. (250-274), that he "constituit super sepulcra martyrum missas celebrari," but altars not placed over tombs may have already been used. As, however, the practice of praying for the dead existed in the 4th and even in the 3rd century, it seems not unlikely that the practice of placing altars in sepulchral chapels may have come into use in the former of those periods. Perhaps the earliest undoubted instance of a chapel having been constructed to serve at once as a place of sepulture and of divine worship is that of the "Templum Probi," a small basilica attached to the exterior of the apse of St. Peter's at Rome, and built by Sixtus Anicius Petronius Probus, who died A.D. 395. He and his wife were undoubtedly buried in it, and its form makes it highly improbable among them a small window in the form of a cross with limbs of equal length, all the bounding lines of which are convex. The sarcophagus containing the body of the king was probably placed in the centre of the upper chamber.

In one very remarkable instance, however, that of the Minster at Aix-la-Chapelle, the great Emperor founded neither an episcopal nor a conventual church, but constructed a building on a magnificent scale indeed, but essentially on the plan of a mausoleum of the earlier Empire; whether or not it was the intention of Charlemagne to construct at once a Minster and a splendid tomb, it is certain that it has ever been looked upon as the "memoria" of that great man. An account of this very remarkable building will be found under CHURCH.

Detached chapel-like buildings not attached to convents, and not sepulchral, are not often met with, though probably once common. In most instances they have perished either from time or neglect. In the Haouran, however, where since the 6th century the ruined cities have been uninhabited and the country a desert, many buildings which nave, a square central portion, and three large semi-circular niches or apses, the so-called transverse triapsal arrangement. Such a plan was often adopted in order to afford place for three sarcophagi, and hence it may be thought that this chapel was really built as a "cella memoriae;" but it exists in the church of Bethlehem, where it certainly could not have been chosen with that intention.

CHAPLET. (1) It was anciently the practice of some churches to crown the newly baptized with a chaplet or garland of flowers. See BAPTISM, p. 164.

CHAPTER [CAPITULUM], the body of the clergy of a cathedral, united under the bishop (for other senses of the Latin term see CAPITULUM).

1. The origin of chapters themselves, apart from the name, begins from a very early date. The presbyters, and subordinately the deacons of each diocese, constituted from the beginning the council of the bishop of that diocese [BISHOP], joined in his administration of it, and in the approval of candidates for ordination, &c., and in fact, though not in name, were his chapter. And these, at first, all lived in the cathedral city; and as country cures came gradually to exist, served them from that city. In time, however, propos, p. 8) considers to have been oratories or chapels still exist, a good example of these Kalybés is that of Omm-es-Zeitoun, which an inscription engraved on its front shows to have been built in A. D. 282. It must, however, be observed that there seems to be in them no trace of any altar or of any place to receive it, and that, in that at Chagga, is a vault below the building, which latter circumstance gives rise to a doubt whether they may not have been sepulchral.

One example may be mentioned of a detached chapel of an early date, which was not certainly sepulchral, that, namely, built by Pope Damasus (367-385) near the baptistery of the Lateran at Rome, but not now in existence. It had a short country presbyters became fixed in their several localities. And a distinction grew up accordingly, by the period of the great Nicene Council, between town and country presbyters, civitatenses, and diocessani or rurales presbyteri,—the latter being reckoned as a somewhat lower grade than the former. In accordance with this distinction, and as a natural result of their distance from the bishop's residence, the country presbyters (and deacons) became in effect, although never formally, excluded from the Episcopal council or (so to call it by anticipation) chapter. At Rome this state of things became permanent, so that all the city clergy, and they only, became the chapter; and hence, after a lapse of centuries and other changes, the cardinal-bishops, priests, deacons. In general, however, time brought two further but equally gradual changes. The bishop and his more immediate clergy to living a life in common, although each retaining his own special share of church and living upon it. And thus the town in general became separated from those, specially served the cathedral but had no in the city itself. And the chapter (so to it) became gradually restricted to the latter, the cathedrales proper, to the exclusion of former, or general body of the town clergy; yet disused, as before, ceasing naturally in to be recognised as a right at all. 2. The scholares themselves became increased in number by the addition of various diocesan clergy: as e.g. the archdeacon, archpresbyter, vicarius or custos, scholasticus; or again, through the musical services of the cathedral, archicantor; and through the engrafting of the bishop's establishment of seminaries, youths and clergy, the præpositus or provost.

And thus a body of officers grew up, who, through their position and special attachment to bishop and the cathedral, helped yet more to exclude outsiders. The time of St. Augustine of Eusebius of Vercelli may be taken as the point whence the first of these changes began; the latter bishop endeavouring also to engraft monastic life upon the common life of himself and his clergy, which St. Augustin did not; the monastic bishoprics of the Anglo-Saxon Church, established by St. Gregory and the Canons of St. Augustine, and copied through Anglo-Saxon missions in Germany, helping on this time. The British monastic bishops may be referred to, who were anterior to the Canterbury mission; but the Celtic monasteries, with their diocesan and often subordinate bishops, anomalous, and irrelevant to the present time. The progress of the change may be traced, 1, by the Councils of Tours, A.D. 567, of Toledo, A.D. 633, which require the archbishops, deacons, and all his clerici, manifestly town clergy, to reside with the bishop, the exception for those only of infirm health or old age rendered it desirable they should live apart in their own houses; by Conc. Emerit. A.D. 686, can. 12, which requires a bishop to recall a country presbyter to make him a cathedralis;—2, by the gradual limitations of the word Canonici, which in the councils of Clermont, A.D. 549, can. 15, and A.D. 587, still included all the clergy, the minor orders, while the 3rd Council of Arles, A.D. 538, uses it for all on the roll, and 4th, A.D. 548, speaks still of "matricula mine;" but which Gregory of Tours (H. F. lib. fin.), who wrote about the close of the 6th century, speaking of "mensa canonicorum" and earlier of Chilperic, A.D. 580 (quoted by Dugès), restrict to the cathedral clergy (the action of regular and secular canons and the original sense of the term belonging to the latter only after Chrodegang); so that in A.D. 813, 1. Mogunt. and 2. Tron. iii., there had grown naturally to be two classes of "Canonici," regulars under a bishop, and colleges under an archbishop (see also Council of Calchythé, A.D. 785, 4); and these two, under the name of Capitulum mentioned in Conc. Vern., A.D. 755, can.

11. the monks living "secundum regulam;" i.e., of St. Benedict, the clergy of the cathedral "sub ordine canonico." Yet even in the time of Charlemagne "canonicus" still had a double meaning, being either in general any clergyman on the roll (and "canonical" life meaning "clerical" life), or in particular the clergy who lived in common under the bishop (CANONICI). The second change above noticed was also of gradual growth. The offices of archpresbyter and archdeacon were no doubt ancient (ARCH-PRESBYTER, ARCHDEACON), but did not become attached at once to the cathedral, probably not until the 6th or 7th centuries. The Primicerius and Archicantor were of later date still (PRÆCANTOR, PRIMICERITUS); and so also the Scholasticus (SCHOLASTICUS). Two further changes however were needed in order to complete the establishment of the modern chapter,—1, The appointment of a dean, which grew out of the office of præpositus. The latter came into existence under the bishop, in analogy with the præpositus under the abbat among Chrodegang's canons, but his office being gradually restricted to external administration, a decanus was appointed to conduct the internal discipline, after the analogy apparently of monastic decani; the 10th century being the period of the first institution of the office; and the dean gradually supplanted the provost (DECANUS). 2. The conversion of the prebends (in fact though not in name) into benefices, i.e. of customary separate payments to individual cathedral members out of the church stock into a common treasury of the body, together with fixed rights of individual members to definite shares. The first "commune aerarium" in France is attributed to Rigobert, Archbishop of Rheims, after A.D. 700; so that canonici quasi collegiati, although a bad derivation, yet represented at first a real fact; as does also the more plausible derivation from canon = a fixed pension, called aportula by St. Cyprian, and "consuetum clericorum stipendium" by Conc. Valentin., Hispal., and Agath., quoted by Du Cange. Prebends also began to be founded by bishops and other patrons about the same period.

2. For the history of the word chapter, see CAPITULUM. It was used as early as A.D. 755, Conc. Vern., and so at Aix in 789, and Mayence in 813, &c., for the episcopal chapter, as well as that of Chrodegang's canons. And about that time it was that bishops began to make the cathedral clergy their special council. Its restriction to this only, followed in the course of another two centuries.

3. The functions of the cathedral chapter were simply derived, and (so to say) usurped, from those of the original council of the bishop, viz. the diocesan clergy. And the 8th century may be taken as the period when the "chapter" thus absorbed into itself the right of being the special council of the bishop. Administration of the diocese in the bishop's absence or during a vacancy, naturally fell to the bishop's "senate;" and accordingly, even in early times, it was found necessary to enact, "ut presbyteri sine conscientia episcopi nihil faciant" (Conc. Arelat. l. c. 19; and see Can. Apost. 38, &c.). Ordinations, however, were of course always excluded; but not so the patronage, under the like circumstances, of the bishop's livings. And this became the privilege of the chapter about the 8th century.

The right of electing the bishop was not so speedily usurped. It did not become customary for the chapter only to elect until the 11th century. And the final decree, absolutely restricting the right of election to that body (to the exclusion of the comprovincial bishops, as well as of the other diocesan clergy), only dates from Pope Innocent III. in the 13th. The change had run parallel with that which restricted the election of the pope to the cardinals. The charge of the cathedral services of course belonged to the chapter. Other privileges enumerated by Mayer (i. 73) for the most part are merely such as belong to any corporate body as such; as, e.g. the possession of a common seal (the earliest, however, known to Mabillon, dating only A.D. 1289), the right of making bye-laws, the power of punishing the excesses or misconduct of individual members. For the schools attached to cathedrals, see SCHOOLS.

4. The constituent members of a chapter varied in almost every cathedral. The dean, as has been said, was a comparatively late addition, of at earliest the 10th century; while in most cathedrals there was no such office until late in the 11th. The archpresbyter appears to have been at first the principal, under the bishop; until he was supplanted by the archdeacon. And these two, with the custos, or primicerius (so called at Rome, i.e. as the first entered on the wax tablet or list), were styled the "tria culmina ecclesiae." (Chorepiscopi, in name but in nothing else, lingered on in a very few, mostly French, cathedrals. A scholasticus, a SACRISTA or cimeliarcha, an archicantor, &c., also occur: for whom see under the several titles. And there were, besides, a staff of clergy for the general service of the cathedral church, together with lectores, ostiarii, exorcistae, acolythi, &c. A praepositus, or provost, also occurs in the 8th and 9th centuries. But the complete organization of a modern or a medieval chapter—the bishop, the quatuor personae, sc. dean, precentor, chancellor, and treasurer, the archdeacons, canons, &c.—belongs to Norman times and the 12th century. And minor canons, and vicars choral, &c., are an abuse of like date.

5. In the Eastern Church, the body of clergy serving a cathedral church was often exceedingly numerous: e.g. under Justinian, the "Great Church," out of the four at Constantinople, is said to have been served by 60 presbyters, 100 deacons, 40 deaconesses, 90 subdeacons, 100 readers, 25 cantores = in all 415; besides 100 ostiarii, who served all four churches. There were also special officers in Eastern cathedrals, as e.g. πρωτόπαπας, πρωτοψάλτης, χαρτοφύλαξ, σκευοφύλαξ, &c.; for whom see under the several titles. But no such development of the chapter took place as in the West, so as to restrict to it the offices of electing the bishop, acting as his council or representative, &c. &c.

CHAPTER OF BIBLE. [LECTIONARY.]

CHAPTER-HOUSE, a place of assembly for monks or canons, forming part of the conventual buildings; called capitulum, says Papias, because there the capitula, or chapters of the monastic rule, were read and expounded.

For the ancient custom was that after prime, before the monks went forth to their labour, a chapter of the rule was read aloud to them. The meeting of the monks for the purpose of hearing such a reading was itself called CAPITULUM (Ducange's Glossary, s. v. Capitulum). The ancient plan of St. Gall contains apparently no chapter-house; and perhaps the first instance of a house built especially for the general meetings of a brotherhood or college for other than devotional purposes is that mentioned in the life of Abbot Ansegis of Fontanelle (c. 9, in Acta SS. Ben. saec. iv. pt. 1, p. 635), who is said to have built, about A.D. 807, near the apse of the church of St. Peter, and on the northern side of it, a house which he called conventus or curia, in Greek buleuterion, because in it the brethren were wont to assemble for the purpose of taking counsel on any matter (Martene, De Rit. Monach. lib. i. c. v. § 3). [C.]

CHARIOTEERS. Among the callings which were regarded by the Church of the first three centuries, that of the charioteer held a prominent place. It had its chief, if not its sole, sphere of action in games which were inseparably connected with the old religion of the empire. The men who followed it were commonly more or less disreputable, and had been excluded, even by Roman law, from most of the privileges of citizenship (Tertull. de Spectac. c. 22). It was, through the eager excitement which attended it, incompatible with meditation and prayer (Tertull. l. c.). We find accordingly that such persons were not admitted to baptism, unless they renounced their occupation (Constt. Apost. viii. 32). If they returned to it after their admission to Christian fellowship they were to be excommunicated (C. Elib. c. 62,* 1 C. Arelat. c. 5). When the games of the circus were reproduced under Christian emperors, the rigour of the Church's discipline was probably relaxed.

CHARISMATA: literally "graces" which are the effect of grace; that is, of the outpouring of the Holy Ghost, consequent on the Ascension of our Lord into heaven,—all, properly speaking, subjective: yet St. Paul calls the pardon of sin in one place (Rom. v. 15), and eternal life in another (ib. vi. 23), a "charisma"; that is, a gracious or free gift on the part of God through Christ. Again, subjective graces have been dis-

ushed into two classes: 1. those conferring power (gratiae gratis datae); and 2. those which affect the character (gratiae gratum facientes). The locus classicus for both is 1 Cor. xii. the end of ch. xiv. (on which see Bloomfield, ord, Cornélius & Lapide, and others), where they are thrown together without much systematic classification. Of the former class, some were her permanent nor universal, as the gift of healing: others, as for instance, that which he affirms where to be in Timothy by the laying on of hands (2 Tim. i. 6; comp. 1 Pet. iv. 10); in other words, the gift conferred upon all ministers the Gospel at their ordination, fitting them to their respective posts, were permanent, but universal. Both were bestowed primarily for edification of the whole body; not but that could fare better or worse with each individual according to the way in which they were used. "The manifestation of the Spirit given to every man, to profit withal." Of the former class all were permanent and universal, designed primarily for individual sanctification: all had them therefore without exception; any body might double or quadruple his share by his own exertions. Where they lay dormant in any, the fault was his own. Wherever they were cultivated, they would bring forth, a thirty, some sixty, and some a hundredfold. "Now after charity," says the Apostle: this is the fruit of the same character with faith and hope, patient (patientia) and bestowed on all. Therefore degree to which you may become possessed rests with yourselves. As you follow after it, so you will obtain it. For those gifts which are not given to all you can only pray: still I exhort you to pray; and of these "pray rather ye may prophecy;" in other words, that ye "understand the Scriptures" (comp. Luke x. 45), and be able to interpret them for the profit of others, as well as your own;—a gift which is permanent, and for the good of all, like charity. Of ordinary gifts, I have devoted a whole chapter to show that charity should occupy the first place: of extraordinary gifts, I proceed now in the ensuing chapter my reasons for regarding prophecy, taken in its widest sense, as the first also; one is for practice, the other for formation: to understand the Scriptures, and to act upon them aright, for general as well as private profit and edification, is to fulfil every purpose for which grace is vouchsafed. Prophecy, therefore, will mean here the gift of expounding, rather than of foretelling (Corn. & Lap. ad. l.), to the nine extraordinary "charismata" set forth here, correspond the nine ordinary, described as "the fruit of the Spirit," in the Epistle to the Galatians (v. 22). To these last three more have been added, making twelve in all; while faith, hope, and charity have been contrariwise ascribed by themselves as the three theological virtues. [E. S. F.]

CHARITY SCHOOLS. [EDUCATION.]

HARMS. [AMULETS.]

HARTOPHYLAX. One, says Beveridge (vol. ii. 167), who kept the archives and documents or charters of the church. This in the church of Constantinople was a high office; so high, that under Andronicus Junior he was called "Magnus Chartophylax" who discharged it.

His duties were by no means those of a mere librarian or registrar, but included with them those of a chancellor. He wore suspended round his neck the ring or seal of the patriarch; received and examined all letters intended for him, with the exception of those coming from other patriarchs; furnished the list of those who should be promoted to vacant benefices of all sorts; and was entrusted with the authorisation of the nuptial benediction. When the 6th Council opened, it was the chartophylax, or keeper of the archives of the great church, whom the emperor ordered to fetch the books of the previous oecumenical councils from the patriarch's library, then the depository for all authentic ecclesiastical records. As both volumes of the 5th Council were subsequently proved to have been tampered with [CONCIL. CONSTANT. 34] there must have been one dishonest chartophylax at least in the 130 years intervening between the 5th and 6th councils. For the rest, see Gretser and Goar, c. 4 of their Commentaries on Codinus; c. 1, Du Fresne's Gloss. Graec. et Lat.; Snicer's Thesaur. s. v. [E. S. F.]

CHARTULARIUS. An officer entrusted with the keeping of charters or registers; and in the Eastern Church subordinate to the chartophylax. Such was his position, at all events, in the Church of Constantinople, according to the ecclesiastical list of Codinus (c. 1, with Gretser and Goar's Commentaries, c. 13); but from his next chapter we see there was a superior officer called "the great chartularius" attached to the imperial household (c. 2, and Gretser and Goar, c. 3). Elsewhere we read of "chartularii" belonging to the army, navy, and several other departments of state, whose records were voluminous; while the number of ecclesiastical "chartularii" for the different dioceses of the East is regulated by Justinian in the first book of his Code (tit. li. c. 25). St. Gregory the Great calls a monk named Hilary, whom he employed in Africa to transact business for him, indifferently his "chartularius" or "notary"; shewing both offices to have been synonymous in the Church of Rome then (Ep. l. 77, ed. Migne, and the note). And Photius, two centuries and a half later, addresses one Gregory several times, in corresponding with him, as "deacon" and "chartularius" (Ep. iii. ed. Valetta). Later, a very different sense sometimes attached to this word: "Qui per epistolam liber fiebat," says Sirmondus (ad tom. ii. Concil. Gall. p. 679), "chartularius dicebatur." Again, "chartularium," in the neuter gender, stands for the place where charters and such like documents were kept literally; but in the West it has long served to denote those volumes, often called Red or Black Books from the colour of their binding or their rubrics, and written on parchment, in which the charters and customs and properties belonging to each monastery were transcribed (Du Fresne, Gloss. Lat. et Graec. s. v.). [E. S. F.]

CHILDREN. It is the object of this article to bring together the materials for a picture of the home life of Christians of the first eight centuries, so far as it affected the treatment of their children and their thoughts about them. It is obvious that every such picture must be more or less idealised, that in practice its completeness was marred by variations at different periods and in different churches, by the more or less perfect triumph of Christianity over heathenism. Making allowance for this, however, it is hoped that the representation here given will enable the reader to estimate the influence of the religion of Christ in this phase of human life with some distinctness. It is obvious also that in the course of the inquiry we must come in contact with many questions which, separately, demand a more dogmatic and more exhaustive discussion. These it will be enough to notice briefly.

(1.) We may start with the fact that the new faith taught men to set a higher value upon the sacredness of human life. The corrupt morals of the empire had all but crushed out the natural σφοδρῆ which binds the hearts of the fathers to the children. Infants were looked upon as incumbrances to be got rid of. The mothers of illegitimate children, sometimes even mothers who were married, killed or deserted their children without scruple, or called in the aid of women who made a business of the art of abortion. Against all such practices Christian purity raised its voice. Barnabas enumerates the sins in question among the things incompatible with the "way of light" (c. 19). The author of the Epistle to Diognetus speaks of the freedom of the Christian society from these practices as one of the marks of difference between them and the heathens among whom they lived (c. 5). Athenagoras condemns those who expose children, or procure abortion, as alike guilty of murder (Legat. c. 35). Justin speaks against the exposure as a common offence, and dwells on the enormities that followed, children so deserted, male and female, being the chief supply of the market for prostitution (Apol. i. 29). The practice lingered, however, even among Christians, and the Council of Elvira had to treat them as excluding a female catechumen from all but death-bed baptism, one who was already baptized even from death-bed communion (C. Elib. c. 63, 68). The Council of Ancyra, about the same time, acknowledging that the severer penalty had been the rule of the Church, reduced it to ten years' penance (c. 20), that of Lerida (c. 2) to seven, subject however to the condition of continuance in a penitential life; and if the offenders were in orders, to exclusion from liturgical functions.

(2.) We start, then, with the Christian conviction that children were a "heritage and gift that cometh from the Lord," to be received as a trust for which parents would have to render an account. It might have seemed that that feeling would have found universal expression in the dedication of infants, as soon as might be after their birth, by the sacred rite of baptism.

Our Lord's command, "Suffer little children to come unto me, and forbid them not," might seem to sanction, if not to command, the practice. It must be admitted, however, that the traces of infant baptism in the first 150 years are but scanty, that the evidence of the New Testament is far from decisive. The statement of Suicer (Thesaur. ii. 1136) that for the first two centuries no one was baptized who could not make a conscious profession of his faith is, perhaps, overstrained, but it is true that the evidence on the other side is meagre. Justin's statement that "many had been made disciples of Christ, ἐκ παιδων" (Apol. ii. p. 62) is somewhat strained when these words are translated, as Bingham does, "from their infancy." The witness of Irenaeus, who says that "infantes" (as well as "parvuli") "renascuntur in Deum" (ii. 22), and identifies regeneration with baptism is, however, more distinct. That of Origen, however, that the Church's practice was "etiam parvulis baptismum dari" (Hom. viii. in Levit.) is rendered less so, by the distinction drawn by Irenaeus between the "parvuli" and the "infantes." The treatise in which Tertullian urges "cunctatio baptismi" as the safer and better course is rather in the tone of one who is contending against a growing practice than of one who rejects a tradition of the universal Church (de Bapt. c. 18). Wall on Infant Baptism is, of course, the great storehouse of arguments in favour of the primitive and universal use of the rite for infant children. It may be noted, however, (1.) that the command in Matt. xxviii. 19, seems to imply capacity for discipleship as a condition of baptism; (2.) that the "holiness" of Christian children is made to depend, in 1 Cor. vii. 14, not on baptism, but on the faith of one, at least, of the parents; (3.) that the mention of "households" as baptized is, at best, a precarious foundation for a wide generalisation. If baptism were thought of as limited to those who could make a confession of faith, it would not be deemed necessary to mention infants as not included in the "household" that was baptized, any more than it would be necessary to except them if one were speaking of a whole household going forth to fight against the enemy. It may fairly be conceded, however, that at least from the time of Irenaeus, Origen, Tertullian, the practice was common. The further question remained, at what stage in their infancy; and here the answers varied. Some pressed the analogy of circumcision and argued for the eighth day, but this was rejected by Cyprian (Epist. ad Fidum, lix. al. lxiv.) and by a Council of Carthage under his guidance. Gregory of Nazianzum, on the other hand, urged a delay of three years, more or less, that the child might be able to utter its profession of faith with its own lips (Orat. xl. de Bapt.). The Council of Elvira (c. 22) sanctioned the earlier age; but this was done not as resting on an immemorial practice, but on a special dogmatic ground, "quia non suo vitio peccarunt," as though it needed a justification. Generally, except in cases of necessity, their baptism, like that of adult converts, was postponed till the Easter following their birth (Crotaton, H. E. v. 22; C. Anastas. c. 18; August. Serm. de Temp. 110; Ambros. de Myst. sacch. c. 5.)^b The case of Augustine shows, however, that even a mother like Monica, acting, it may be, under the influence of the feeling which Tertullian had been the spokesman, could postpone her child's baptism indefinitely, only eager to hasten it if there were any imminent fear of death (August. Conf. l. 11).^c Even where baptism was postponed, however, the child was claimed for Christ, was signed with the sign of the cross, and made to taste of the salt which was known as the "mysterium" or "sacrament" of catechumens (Ibid.). [CATECHUMENS.] After an interval, varying according to the different views just stated, the child was brought to the font, stripped of its clothes, and baptized, making its acts of renunciation and adherence, if old enough, with its own lips; if still in infancy, through its sponsors. [SPONSORS.] Where children were left orphans, or were deserted by their parents, they were brought by benevolent Christians, who in the sight of the Church took charge of them. The priest announced the fact from the altar, and the child became the "adoptivus" or foster-child of the person so adopting him (I. C. Vasena. c. 9).

Baptism in such cases was followed, after an interval of uncertain duration, by confirmation. If a bishop were present at the baptism, the rule was that both rites were administered in immediate succession. As soon as the child was taken from the water he received the sacred unction and the imposition of hands. (Tertull. de Bapt. c. 7, de Resurr. Carn. c. 8.) In the absence of the bishop there was, of course, a delay; but the modern practice of Protestant churches of treating confirmation as the personal acceptance by the adult of what had been promised by the infant, was altogether foreign to the life of the ancient Church, as it is now from that of the East. In both cases, indeed, in order to guard against any inconvenience which might follow from the prolonged absence of the bishop, the priest was allowed to administer confirmation as well as baptism.

The admission of the infant to the privileges of Christian fellowship did not, however, stop here. There is almost, if not altogether, as weighty evidence for infant communion as there is for infant baptism. It was the recognised practice of the African Church in the time of Cyprian (De laps. c. 25). The Apostolical Constitutions (viii. 12, 13) show that it was also the custom of the East. It was vehemently urged by Augustine as essential to the complete salvation even of the baptized (Epist. 3 ad Bonifac. De Peccat. Merit. l. 20) and was defended against the scorn of unbelievers by the ascetic pseudo-Dionysius (de Hierarch. Eccles. ii. 11). The Sacramentary of Gregory and the Council of Mâcon (c. 6), A.D. 588, are witnesses to its prevalence in the churches of Rome and Gaul. The first intimation of any wish to stop it is found in the third Council of Tours (c. 19), in A.D. 813, and that continued inoperative for nearly three centuries. In this respect the Churches of the East, as in the case of confirmation, follow in the footsteps of antiquity.

So far, then, the child of Christian parents was met at its birth with these symbols, and, as it was believed, assurances of salvation. The work of moral training began with the first dawn of consciousness. He would be taught to make the sign of the cross upon his brow, or lips, or chest, on rising or lying down to sleep, or when he bathed or put on his clothes (Tertull. de Cor. Mil. c. 2). Soon a pious parent would tell him the story of the Gospels, as Monica did to Augustine, even though unbaptized (Conf. i. 17), or give him daily some texts of Scripture to be learnt by heart, as Leonidas did to Origen (Euseb. H. E. vi. 2). He would learn the Lord's Prayer and the Creed as things for daily use, would be taught to pray at midnight, at sunrise, and at every meal (Tertull. de Oraf. c. 20). The stories of martyrs who had suffered, sometimes the actual spectacle of those sufferings, would kindle his emotions. The range of instruction would become wider as he would be led first to the didactic, or sapiential, books of Scripture, the Psalms, Proverbs, Ecclesiastes; then the Gospels, the Acts, and the Epistles; last of all the Pentateuch, the historical books, and the Prophets (Hieron. Epist. 57, ad Lactam). For his general education, however, he would have to go to any school that might be opened, and these were, for four centuries or more, in the hands of heathens. For those who went to such schools Homer was still the groundwork of intellectual culture (August. Conf. i. 23). Grammar, dialectic, rhetoric, geometry, completed the course of teaching (Euseb. H. E. vi. 2). It would be naturally a time of anxious watchfulness for Christian parents. When this was over the child would pass to the responsibilities of adolescence. Negatively we may be sure that no true Christian would allow his child to be a spectator of the games of the circus or the mimes of the theatre; that wherever this was tolerated it would be looked on as a sign of spiritual decay. CHOIR, ARCHITECTURAL (Chorus, Suggestus; Aufschw.). Every complete church consists of at least three parts; bema (or presbytery), choir, and nave. The bema, entered in ancient times by none but the clergy, was devoted to the celebration of the holy mysteries; the choir was for the "clerks," in the widest sense of the word; the nave for the general body of the faithful. The bema corresponds to the space east of the altar-rails (called the sanctuary or presbytery) in an ordinary English church, and the choir to the remaining portion of the chancel. In monastic churches the choir is the place where the brethren assemble to say the ordinary daily offices.

It is extremely difficult to determine the antiquity of the division between sanctuary and choir. Most of the passages of ancient authors bearing upon the matter give the impression that the rail or screen [CANCELLI] separated the whole space devoted to the clergy from that devoted to the people, and that there was no 'chorus' distinct from the sanctuary. It is, in fact, probable that Honorius of Autun (Gemma Animae, i. 140) is right in saying "olim in modum coronae circa aras cantantes stabant," though his etymology is wrong. The canon of the fourth council of Toledo, in the 7th century, quoted below, is perhaps the earliest instance in which the threefold division, sanctuary, choir, and nave, is clearly recognised. The remains of ancient churches give us but little information on this point, as screens are the most destructible and changeable portions. When we do meet with authentic testimony as to the arrangements of churches, we find generally that the whole of the eastern apse was occupied by the sanctuary, which was screened off from the rest of the church, while the choir was a raised space immediately west of the screen of the sanctuary [CHURCH, p. 375]. Whether the Greek SOLEAS was identical with this raised space or suggestus is doubtful.

The description of a church in the Apostolical Constitutions (ii. 57) implies that bishop, presbyters, and deacons occupied the space at the east end of the church, which was set apart for them, but does not mention any barrier between clerks and people. We find however such a barrier existing in the 4th century, when the laity were forbidden to enter the enclosure set apart for the altar and the clergy. This appears from the fact that St. Ambrose deprived the emperors of the exceptional right which they had enjoyed of passing within the screen [CANCELLI]. See Sozomen, Hist. Eccl. vii. 25; Theodoret, H. E. v. 18. To this the emperors submitted; and the edict of Theodosius the younger and Valentinian lays down that the emperors are to approach the altar only for the purpose of making their offering, and to withdraw immediately. In accordance with this the Trullan council (canon 69), while forbidding the laity generally to enter the sanctuary (ἵερὸν θυσιαστήριον), expressly permits the emperors to enter for the purpose of offering their gifts, "according to very ancient custom." This privilege Tarasius, patriarch of Constantinople († 806), threatened to withdraw from Constantine VI. if he contracted the marriage which he was meditating (Life by Ignatius, in Acta SS. Feb. iii. p. 584).

The same privilege which was granted to emperors seems in ancient times to have been conceded to unordained monks (Jerome, Ad Heliodorum).

The 4th canon of the second council of Tours (A.D. 567) forbids the lay people to stand among the clergy, whether at vigils or at mass, and reserves all that portion of the church which is on the altar-side of the screen for the clerks engaged in the service (choris psallentium clericorum); yet the sanctuary (sancta sanctorum) was to be open for the purpose of praying and communicating both to laymen and to women [COMMUNION]. The same canon was repeated in effect by the council of Autun in the year 672.

CHRIST. ANT.

So too a Capitulary of the year 744 (art. 9, ed. Baluz.) forbids the laity to be within the screen in time of divine service, whether mass or vigil. So the council of Rome under Eugenius II., canon 33.

The liberty which in Gaul was given to lay people, of entering the choir to communicate, does not seem to have been given in Africa. St. Augustine (Serm. 392) speaks of the screen (cancelli) as the place where laymen ordinarily communicated; neophytes, however, seem to have drawn near the altar for their first communion (Serm. 224). In Spain the fourth council of Toledo (can. 18) of the year 633 enjoins the [ministering] priest and deacon to communicate before the altar, the rest of clerks in the choir, the people outside the choir.

Women were generally not permitted to enter the choir (Conc. Laodic. c. 44), unless for the purpose of communicating. And although nuns were probably excepted in ancient times (Augustine, Epist. iii.), their exclusion seems in the 9th century to have been general, at least in Gaul (Theodulf of Orleans, Capitulare, c. 6). Ahito, bishop of Basle in the early part of the 9th century (Capitulare, c. 16), ordains that no woman should approach the altar; and that when the altar-cloths required washing, they should be taken off by the clerks, and handed to the women at the door of the screen. The presbyters were also to receive the women's offerings outside the screen. (Ducange's Glossary, s. v. Chorus; Martene, De Ritibus Antiquis, i. 123 ff.) [C.]

CHOIR OF SINGERS. (Chorus Cantorum.) St. Augustine (on Ps. 149) says, "Chorus quid significet, multi norunt . . . chorus est concessio cantantium." Isidore of Seville gives the definition, "chorus est multitudo in sacris collecta, et dictus chorus quod initio in modum coronae circum aras starent et ita psallerent." This etymology is undoubtedly false, but the statement upon which it is founded is by no means improbable. Whether it be true or not, that in the earliest ages the choir was grouped round the altar, we know that at a comparatively early period the choir had a space assigned to it in a church, [CHOIR, ARCHITECTURAL,] distinct from the SANCTUARY, which contained the altar.

"The choirs of our time," says Amalarius (de Div. Off. iii. 4), early in the 9th century, "are clothed in linen (linum)," and he distinguishes between this and the finer vestment of byssus which the singers wore under the Old Dispensation (2 Chron. v. 12). Compare SCHOLA CANTORUM. [C.]

CHOREPISCOPI (Χορεπίσκοπος) = country bishop, vicarius episcopi (Conc. Ancyr., Neo-Caesar., Antioch., &c., Isid. Hispal. De Offic. Eccl. ii. 6, &c.), villanus episcopus (Capit. Car. M. vii. 187), vicanus episcopus (Hincmar), as opposed to the cathedralis episcopus (Du Cange);—to be distinguished, as being stationary, from the περιόδευτος or visitator, who itinerated, although the two became often confounded together:—a class of ministers between bishops proper and presbyters, defined in the Arabic version of the Nicene Canons to be "loco episcopi super villas et monasteria et sacerdotes villarum;" called into existence in the latter part of the 3rd century, and first in Asia Minor, in order to meet the want of episcopal supervision in the country

s of the now enlarged dioceses without subordination:—first mentioned in the Councils of Nicaea and Neo-Caesarea, A.D. 314, and again in the Council of Nice (which is subscribed by fifteen, from Asia Minor or Syria); sufficiently important to require restriction by the time of the council of Antioch, A.D. 341; and continuing just in the East until at least the 8th century, when they were supplanted by ἑπαρχοὶ ἀρχιεπίσκοποι (archiepiscopi):—first mentioned in the West in the council of Riez, A.D. 439 (the Epistles of Pope Damasus I. and of Leo M. respecting them being series), and continuing there (but not in Italy, principally in France) until about the 10th century, after which the name occurs (in a decree of Pope Damasus II. ap. Sigeb. in an. 1048) equivalent to archdeacon, an office from which Arabic Nicene canons expressly distinguish it.

Functions of chorepiscopi, as well as their rank, were of an episcopal, not of a presbyterial kind, although limited to minor offices. They looked the country district committed to them, "loco episcopi," ordaining readers, exorcists, deacons, but, as a rule, not deacons or presbyters (and of course not bishops), unless by express permission of their diocesan bishop. They acted in their own districts, and (in Gaul) are mentioned as consecrating churches (Du Cange). They granted dispensation, or letters dismissory, and country presbyters were forbidden to do so. They had also the honorary privilege (privilegium) of assisting at the celebration of the Holy Eucharist in the mother city church, which country presbyters had not. (Conc. Ancyr. can. 1; Neo-Caesar. can. xiv.; Antioch. can. x.; Basil. M. Epist. 181; Rab. Maur. De Instit. c. i. 5; etc. etc.) They were held therefore to possess the power of ordination, but to lack jurisdiction, save subordinately. And the actual ordination of a presbyter by Timotheus, a chorepiscopus, is recorded (Pallad. Hist. Lausiac. 106). The office also offered an opportunity for a compromise in cases of schism, of which the Nicene council availed itself, by authorising a Catholic bishop (among other alternatives) to find a place chorepiscopus for any reconciled Novatian bishop (Conc. Nic. can. viii.). And the same council (Epist. Syn. in Socrat. l. 9) places reconciled Meletian bishops also in a somewhat similar position, although not calling it by the name of chorepiscopus. It was found also a convenient mode of dealing with "vacant" bishops, when such occurred.

The office continued to exist among the later eastern sects also: so among the Jacobite Syrians, where the chorepiscopus proper, who presided over a rural district, is distinguished from a titular chorepiscopus, more properly episcopos or proto-pope, who was a kind of visiting presbyter in the episcopal city, and from episcopos or visitor, who went circuit; among the Nestorians, where also both chorepiscopus and episcopos existed, as distinct offices (Denzinger, Rit. Orient. Proleg. 116, sq.; see also the Arabic version of the Nicene canons, c. 58 to 70). In both these bodies chorepiscopi were presbyters. And in one at least they are appointed without imposition of hands (Denzinger, ib.). In the West, i.e. chiefly Gaul, the order appears to have prevailed more widely, to have usurped episcopal functions without due subordination to the diocesan, and to have been also taken advantage of by idle or worldly diocesan bishops. In consequence it seems to have aroused a strong feeling of hostility, which shewed itself, first in a series of papal bulls, condemning them; headed, it is true, by two forged letters respectively of Damasus I. and Leo M. (of which the latter is merely an interpolated version of Conc. Hippol. II. A.D. 619, can. 7, adding chorepiscopi to presbyteri, of which latter the council really treats), but continuing in a more genuine form, from Leo III. down to Pope Nicholas I. (to Rodolph, Archbishop of Bourges, A.D. 864); the last of whom, however, takes the more moderate line of affirming chorepiscopi to be really bishops, and consequently refusing to annul their ordinations of presbyters and deacons (as previous popes had done), but orders them to keep within canonical limits;—and secondly, in a series of conciliar decrees.—Conc. Ratisspon. A.D. 800, in Capit. tit. iv. c. 1, Paris. A.D. 829, lib. i. c. 27, Melf. A.D. 845, can. 44, Metens. A.D. 888, can. 8, and Capitul. v. 168, vi. 119, vii. 187, 310, 323, 324,—annulling all episcopal acts of chorepiscopi, and ordering them to be repeated by "true" bishops; and finally forbidding all further appointments of chorepiscopi at all. The title however lingered on for some centuries, in France and Germany, as applied to various cathedral dignitaries in particular cathedrals, but in senses wholly irrelevant to its original and proper meaning (see instances in Du Cange).

That chorepiscopi as such—i.e. omitting the cases of reconciled or vacant bishops above mentioned, of whose episcopate of course no question is made—were at first truly bishops, both in East and West, appears almost certain, both from their name and functions, and even from the arguments of their strong opponents just spoken of. If nothing more could be urged against them, than that the Council of Neo-Caesarea compared them to the 70 disciples,—that the Council of Antioch authorises their consecration by a single bishop, and that they actually were so consecrated (the Antiochene decree might mean merely nomination by the word ἱερεῖας, but the actual history seems to rule the term to intend consecration, and the [one] exceptional case of a chorepiscopus recorded [Act. Episc. Comanen. ap. Du Cange] in late times to have been ordained by three bishops [in order that he might be a full bishop], merely proves the general rule to the contrary),—and that they were consecrated for "villages," contrary to canon,—then they certainly were bishops. And Pope Nicholas expressly says that they were so. Undoubtedly they ceased to be so in the East, and were practically merged in archdeacons in the West. And the non-episcopal nature of the functions to which they came to be limited would naturally lead to such a result. The language of the canons and of the Fathers (e.g. St. Basil M. above quoted, or again St. Athanasius [Apol. II. Opp. l. 200], who distinguishes them both from bishops proper and from presbyters, and again both from city and from country presbyters), naturally implies that at first they were bishops in the common sense of the word. The special rites in the East for their appointment probably belong to a time when they had undoubtedly there sunk down into presbyters. It ought to be said, however, that authorities are divided upon the question: English writers mainly (Beveridge, Hammond, Cave, Bingham, Routh, to whom may be added the weighty authority of Van Espen) asserting their episcopal character, while others (see a list in Bing. II. xiv. 2, 3, to which may be added Morinus and Du Cange) allege them to have been presbyters. It need hardly be said that they are not identical with either coadjutors or suffragans, properly so called: although they do bear a close resemblance to such bishops as, e.g. the Bishop of Dover in pre-Reformation times in England, and to the sundry Irish and foreign and other stray bishops, who are found so numerous doing the work of English bishops for them in the 12th to the 16th centuries, and to the suffragans as intended by Henry VIII., and now actually revived in England. (Bellarm. De Clericis, c. 17; Cellot. De Hierarch. iv. 14; Morinus, De Sac. Ord. and Dissert.; De Marca, De Concord., &c. ii. 13; Du Cange; Suicer; Bingham; Van Espen.) [A. W. H.]

CHORISTER. [CANTOR.]

CHRESTIANI. A heathen variation of the name Christiani. Instead of Χριστιανός, the more classical word, Χρηστιανός, gracious or good, was commonly supposed to have been the name or title by which Jesus of Nazareth was distinguished, and his followers therefore were called Chrestiani. The mistake is noticed by Justin Martyr, Tertullian, Lactantius, and others, but the name having a good signification, they do not wholly reject it. Tertullian however remonstrates with the enemies of the faith for prosecuting Christians merely for their name, a name which, according to either derivation, ought to command admiration rather than hatred. "Christianus, quantum interpretatio est, de unctione deducitur. Sed et cum perperam Chrestianus pronuntiatur a vobis (nam nec nominis certa est notitia penes vos) de suavitate vel benignitate compositum est. Oditur ergo in hominibus innocuis etiam nomen innocuum" (Tertul. Apol. c. 3; Bingham, I. i. 11). [D. B.]

CHRISM. (Μύρον, Χρίσμα; Chrisma. The latter word is sometimes feminine: "miscitat ipsam chrismam," Ordo Rom. I. c. 42.) The sacred oil or unguent used in the ceremony of baptism. The term is also used so as to include the oil blessed for the unction of catechumens and of the sick.

St. Basil (De Spiritu S. c. 66 [al. 27]) mentions the blessing of the oil of anointing for use in baptism as one of the observances derived from the earliest times by unwritten tradition. The earliest extant testimonies to its use, whether in baptism or in other ceremonies of the church, are the following.

Tertullian (De Baptismo, c. 7) says, "next, coming forth from the baptismal font, we are anointed with oil blessed according to the primitive ordinances, in accordance with which men were anointed with oil from the horn as a consecration for the priesthood." He seems to regard the anointing with oil as a symbol of the universal priesthood of Christians.

St. Cyprian (Epist. 70, c. 2, p. 768, ed. Härtel) speaks of the oil sanctified on the altar, with which the baptized are anointed [BAPTISM]; and this oil, he says, the heretics who had no true altar could not have.

In the Apostolical Constitutions (vii. 43, § 3, and 44, § 1) the direction is given, immediately after baptism, "let the ministrant anoint the person baptized with unguent (μύρον), saying over it, 'Lord God . . . grant that this unguent may so effectually work upon him that is baptized that the sweet savour of Thy Christ may abide in him fixed and firm.'" In this case, the unguent was evidently perfumed. There is nothing in the passage to suggest that it had undergone any previous consecration.

Gregory of Nazianzus (Orat. 48, in Julian.) speaks of oil sanctified or consecrated on the spiritual and divine Table; Optatus of Milevis (C. Donatist. vii. p. 102) says that this ointment is compounded (conditur) in the name of Christ; and the Pseudo-Dionysius (De Hierarch. Eccles. c. 4) mentions the use of the sign of the cross in the consecration of it.

The privilege of consecrating chrism was in comparatively early times strictly confined to the episcopal order. The twentieth canon of the first council of Toledo (A.D. 398) censures those presbyters who ventured to prepare chrism for themselves, and desires them to send a deacon or subdeacon to fetch the chrism from the bishop, so as to be in time for the festivities of Easter Day. To the same effect writes Bishop Montanus to the clergy of Palencia and to Theoribius (Hardouin's Concilia, ii. 1143).

The greater quantity of chrism was probably at this time consecrated immediately before Easter, but it does not appear that the consecration was as yet limited to a particular day; on the contrary, the canon above cited expressly lays it down that the bishop might consecrate chrism at any time. But in the 5th century it became an established custom to consecrate the chrism and oil for use throughout the year on Maundy Thursday. Pope Leo complains in a letter to his namesake, the Emperor of the East (Epist. 156, p. 1324), that in consequence of the murder of Proterius, bishop of Alexandria, the oblation was prevented and no chrism was consecrated. Eligius of Noyon († 658), preaching on Maundy Thursday (Hom. 10 in Coena Dom. p. 245, Biblioth. Patr. Colon.) speaks of chrism being consecrated on that day throughout the Christian world. In the empire the consecration on Maundy Thursday was enjoined by a capitulary of Charles the Great (Concil. Germanie, i. 342); yet at a somewhat later date the custom had probably not become universal; for a synod of Meaux of the year 845 forbade (canon 46) the preparation of chrism on any other day, as if such preparation was even then not quite unknown.

The Gelasian Sacramentary has a Missa Chismalis on Maundy Thursday, referring to the consecration both of chrism and of oil for the unction of the sick (Migne's Patrol. lxxiv. p. 1099). The Gregorian Sacramentary has also on the same day full directions for the consecration of oil and chrism in the mass (pp. 66-69); the ceremony consists of benediction, and breathing on the prepared unguent [AMPULLA]. With this may be compared the directions of the Ordo Rom. I. (App. c. 7, p. 34), which are probably of about the same age. Some of the later Ordines (see O. R. X. pp. 97, ff.; XV. pp. 480 f.) also give directions for the benediction of chrism the pope on Maundy Thursday. It appears the Ordo last referred to that it was at one customary for the pope to bless chrism only a year of his coronation, and every seventh afterwards.

appears from the Euchologion that in the Church also the blessing of chrism is one ceremony of Maundy Thursday.

Chrism is not simple oil, but oil mixed with balsam. Eligius of Noyon (Hom. 8, In Dom.) tells us that the mingling of balsam to the oil typifies the union of regal and total glory. Compare Tertullian (De Bapt. cited above. And Gregory the Great (In c. i. 13) refers the balsam of Engaddi to balsam which, mixed with oil and blessed by a bishop, makes chrism, typifying the gifts of the Holy Spirit. For the Eastern Church, Pseudo-Dionysius the Areopagite testifies (arch. Eccl. c. 4) that the sacred unguent or chrism is composed of fragrant substances. The modern receipt for its composition given in the Euchologion prescribes, in fact, oil and wine, thirty-six different kinds of spices.

CHRISMAL (Chrismale). (1) The vessel or in which the consecrated oil or CHRISM was contained [AMPULLA].

A vessel for the reservation of the consecrated Host. In the Rheims MS. of the Gregorian Missal (p. 432, ed. Menard) is given a missale Chrismale, while the Ordo Romanus in corresponding place has the rubric, "Prævasculi in quo Eucharistia reconditur." It is this kind of chrismal that Egbert (Penit. in Haddan and Stubbs' Councils, iii. 428) calls lucifer (Penit. c. 10, p. 701, Migne) speak, a vessel which the priest carried with him and might lose. Some, however, take this name for the CORPORAL.

A cloth used to cover relics. In the Life of St. Ouen, attributed to St. Ouen (ii. 71), we find a miracle wrought upon one who rubbed his face with the fringe of a chrismal which had touched the relics of the saint.

Old-English Chrism. The white cloth laid on the head of one newly baptized, after the anointing with chrism [BAPTISM, p. 163]. This is called in Theodore's Poenitential (ii. iv. addan and Stubbs, iii. 193) "pannus crismalis;" in later authors, "vestis chrismalis," "crismalis pannus," "mitra baptizatorum," "crismale caput." (Ducange, s. v.) [C.]

CHRISMARIUM. The vessel in which chrism is kept (Council of Auxerre, c. 6). It is sometimes however taken for a reliquary (Gregory of Tours, De Mirac. S. Martini, iv. 32; nat. Vita Germani Paris. c. 47). [C.]

to their possessors, there were not wanting ambitious and worldly men who sought to obtain such offices by bribery or other unworthy means. To check and prevent such discreditable practices, severe laws were enacted both in church and state as early as the 5th century. The Council of Chalcedon (c. 2) decreed that if any bishop gave ordination or an ecclesiastical office or preferment of any kind for money, he himself should lose his office and the party so preferred be deposed. Other like decrees occur in the so-called Apostolical Canons (c. 29), the Council of Constantinople under Gennadius, A.D. 459; the 2nd Council of Orleans, Bracara, and many others. The imperial laws also were no less stringent in regard to this abuse. E.g. it was enacted by one of Justinian's Novels (123, c. 1), that whenever a bishop was to be chosen, the electors should take an oath and insert it in the election paper that they did not choose him for any gift or promise or friendship, or any other cause, but only because they knew him to be a man of the true Catholic faith and of unblemished life and good learning. And in another law (Novel 137, c. 2) it is further provided that the party elected shall also at the time of his ordination, take an oath upon the holy Gospels that he neither gave nor promised by himself or other, nor hereafter will give to his ordainer or to his electors, or any other person, anything to procure him an ordination. And for any bishop to ordain another without observing the rule prescribed, is deposition, by the same law, both for himself and the person so ordained.

These were some of the securities required by the ancient Church against the practice which they stigmatized by the designation of Christemporeia (Bingham, iv. 3, 4). [D. B.]

CHRISTIACUM CONCILIUM. [CREST.]

CHRISTIANA, or CHRISTINA, virgin, μεγαλομάρτυς, martyr at Tyros in Italy (?) A.D. 200, is commemorated July 24 (Mart. Bedæ, Rom. Vet., Usuardi, Cal. Byzant.).

CHRISTMAS (FESTIVAL OF) (ἡμέρα γενεθλίων, τὰ γενέθλια, Natalis, Natalitia, Nativitas, Domini, &c. From the latter is derived the name of the day among peoples of the Latin race [e.g. the French Noël], and also among the Celtic nations, which were Christianized by Latin-speaking missionaries. In Germany the day is called the Wohnachstfest from the solemn vigils which preceded the festival itself. The English Christmas [so the Dutch Kerstmas, Keremus, whence Kerst-mas, a name for December], analogous to such forms as Candlemas, Lammas, Michaelmas, Childermas, superseded the older name Yule [Anglo-Saxon, Geol], by which the day is still known among the Scandinavian nations).

I. Origin of Festival.

It is not hard to understand why the Christian Church should have commemorated by an annual festival the Saviour's Incarnation. How far, however, the church was led by the possession of actual historical evidence to assign, as it has done, December 25 as the date of the Nativity, is a matter on which it is impossible to speak otherwise than most doubtfully.* On the one hand, due weight must be given to the unanimous agreement of the Western Church as far as the tradition can be traced back, and to the almost universal acceptance of this view by the Eastern Church at an early date. It is certainly not altogether impossible that there may have been some trustworthy tradition, some foundation for Tertullian's remark as to the archives of the Jews stored up at Rome, some slight substratum of truth underlying the legend as to the investigation of the day by Julius I. (vide infra). Further, sundry independent considerations, astronomical and otherwise, tend to make it probable that our Lord's birth took place near the end of the year. On this point reference may be made to Seyffarth's Chronologia Sacra, which refers the Nativity to December 22 (p. 239), see also Ideler, Chronologie, vol. ii. pp. 385 sqq. On the other hand, some have argued on various grounds in favour of the greater probability of the Nativity having been in the autumn. Thus Lightfoot (Horae Hebraicae et Talmudicae, vol. ii. p. 32, ed. Gandel) would make it coincide with the Jewish Feast of Tabernacles, and associate it with that Festival in the same way in which the Passover and Easter, Pentecost and Whitsuntide correspond. His arguments mainly turn on the interpretation of Old Testament prophecies; e.g. our Lord died in Nisan, and if His ministry lasted three years and a half, as Lightfoot infers from Daniel ix. 27, then since our Lord at the beginning of His ministry was ἔτι τριᾶκοντα ἀρχόμενος (Luke iii. 23), we have, reckoning back from His death, Tisri or September for the season of His birth. Again, he infers from a comparison of Zechariah xiv. 16, 17, that it would be most improbable that the Feast of Tabernacles alone of the three great Jewish festivals should fail of the honour by which the Passover became exalted into Easter, and Pentecost into Whitsuntide. To decide the matter thus, however, in the absence of any more tangible historical evidence, is obviously unsafe. To the same end but on different grounds argues Jablonsky (Dissertationes ii. de origine Festi Nativitatis Christi in Ecclesia Christiana. quotannis stato die celebrari solita, in his Opuscula, vol. iii. pp. 317 sqq. Amsterdam 1809. See also Münter, Der Stern der Weisen, p. 110, Copenhagen 1827), maintaining for example that St. Luke's statement (ii. 8), of the shepherds keeping watch over their flocks by night would hardly have been possible on the assumption of the December date, seeing that it would then have been the rainy season, and the flocks would therefore have been under shelter. A further discussion, however, on this point rather belongs to the province of Biblical Chronology.

Many learned men have seen in the particular period at which we celebrate Christmas, evidence in favour of our viewing the Christian festival as an adaptation of previously existing Jewish or heathen festivals; to the more striking views of this kind we shall now briefly refer.

* Even in very early times the great uncertainty of the matter was clearly felt. Thus Jacob, bishop of Edessa (ob. 578 A.D.), is quoted by Dionysius Bar-Salibi as saying, "No one knows exactly the day of the nativity of the Lord: this only is certain, from what Luke writes, that He was born in the night" (Assemani, Bibl. Or. vol. ii. p. 163).

(α) Some, as Oldermann (De festo Encaeniorum Judaico, origine festi Nativitatis Christi, 1715) have viewed Christmas as a continuation and development of the Jewish Feast of the Dedication, a festival of eight days' duration beginning on Cisleu 25 (= December 17), which was the anniversary of the purification of the temple by Judas Maccabaeus after the outrages of Antiochus Epiphanes (see 1 Macc. iv. 52-59; 2 Macc. x. 1-8; Josephus, Antiq. xii. 7, 6). Still while there seem to be several coincidences between the two feasts, such a transference from Judaism to Christianity of which no hint whatever is given in early times is exceedingly unlikely.

(β) Others have derived it from some one or other of the Roman festivals held in the latter part of December, as the Saturnalia, or the Sigillaria which followed them, or the Juvenalia established by Nero. A more striking parallel, however, than any of these is to be found in the Brumalia, or the Natalis Invicti [Solis], when the Sun, then at the winter solstice, was, as it were, born anew, even as Christ the Sun of Righteousness then dawned upon the world. This is the view of Wernsdorf, De origine Sollemniis Natalis Christi ex festivitate Natalis Invicti. Wittenberg 1757; of Jablonsky partly [supra]; also of Mr. King (Gnostics and their Remains, p. 49), who derives the Roman festival from the Mithras-worship of the Sun. Then as Mithraicism gradually blended with Christianity, changing its name but not altogether its substance, many of its ancient notions and rites passed over too, and the Birthday of the Sun, the visible manifestation of Mithras himself, was transferred to the commemoration of the Birth of Christ. Numerous illustrations of the above remarks may be found in ancient inscriptions, e.g. SOLI INVICTO ET LUNAE AETERNAE C. VETTI GERMANI LIB. DUO PARATUS ET HERMES DEDERUNT, or ΗΑΙΩ ΜΙΘΡΑ ΑΝΙΚΗΤΩ (Gruter, Inscriptiones Antiquae, p. xxxiii.) In the legend on the reverse of the copper coins of Constantine, SOLI INVICTO COMITI, retained long after his conversion, there is at once an idea of the ancient Sun-God, and of the new Sun of Righteousness. The supporters of this theory cite various passages from early Christian writers indicating a recognition of this view. The sermon of Ambrose, quoted by Jablonsky, is certainly spurious, and is so marked in the best editions of his works; it furnishes, however, an interesting illustration of an early date. The passage runs thus, "Bene quodammodo sanctum hunc diem Natalis Domini Solem novum vulgus appellat, et tanta sui auctoritate id confirmat, ut Judaei etiam atque Gentiles in hanc vocem consentiant. Quod libenter amplectandum nobis est, quia oriente Salvatore, non solum humani generis salus, sed etiam solis ipsius claritas innovatur" (Serm. 6, in Appendice p. 397, ed. Bened.). In the Latin editions of Chrysostom is a homily, wrongly ascribed to him, but probably written not long after his time, in which we read, "Sed et Invicti Natalem appellant. Quis utique tam invictus nisi Dominus noster, qui mortem subactam devicit? Vel quod dicunt Solis esse Natalem, ipse est Sol Justitiae, de quo Malachias propheta dixit, Orietur vobis timentibus nomen ipsius Sol Justitiae et sanitas est in pennis ejus" (Sermo de Nativitate S. Joannis Baptistae vol. ii. 1113, ed. Paris, 1570). Leo the Great de fault with the baneful persuasion of some uibus haec dies solemnitas nostrae, non tam Nativitate Christi, quam de novi ut dicunt is ortu, honorabilis videtur" (Serm. 22, § 6, . i. p. 72, ed. Ballerini). Again, the same her observes, "Sed hanc adorandam in caelo in terra Nativitatem nullus nobis dies magis am hodiernus insinuat, et nova etiam in electis luce radiante, coram (al. totam) sensibus istis mirabilis sacramenti ingerit claritatem" (Serm. 26, § 1, p. 87).

We may further cite one or two instances from cient Christian poets: Prudentius, in his hymn Natalis Domini, thus speaks (Cathemerinon init., p. 384, ed. Arevalus):—

"Quid est, quod arcum circum
Sol jam recurrens deserit?
Christiane terra nascitur Qui luce aeger tramitem?"

ulinus of Nola also (Poema xiv. 15–19, p. 382, Muratori):—

"Nam post solstitium, quo Christus corpora natus Sole novo gelidas mutavit tempora brumae, Atque salutiferam praestans mortalibus ortum,
Procedente die, secum decreverat noctes Jussit."

ference may also be made to an extract in semani (Bib. Or. ii. 163) from Dionysius Barlibi, bishop of Amida, which shows traces of a nular feeling in the East; also to a passage in an anonymous Syrian writer, who distinctly lers the fixing of the day to the above cause;

are not disposed, however, to attach much ight to this last passage. More important for r purpose is the injunction of a council of Rome 43 A.D. "Ut nullus Kalendas Januarias et oma (= brumalia) colere praesumpserit" (can. Labbé vi. 1548), which shows at any rate that a long time after the fall of heathenism, ny traces of heathen rites still remained. A nular mention is found also in the proceedings the Quinisext Council (692 A.D.), τὰς ὁβρὺς γομίας: Καλῆρας καὶ τὰ καλοῦμενα Βρουμάλια in. 68, Labbé vi. 1170).

(7) Others have even derived Christmas from e Northern festival (Yule) in December, in our of Freya (cf. Loccenius, Antiq. Sueo-Goth. . i. c. 5, Holmiae, 1645; Scheffer, Upsalia istiqua, p. 296, Upsal, 1868).

(8) Jablonsky, while considering, as we have d, that in the festival of the Natalis Invicti to be found the origin of the celebration of r Lord's Nativity by the Roman Church, mainus (op. cit. pp. 381 sqq.) that the Christians rived this festival primarily from the Basilius. These, as we learn from a passage of ement of Alexandria cited at length below, ebrated Christ's baptism as being His munitation to the world on Tubi 11 (= January 6), d Jablonsky argues that this particular day a suggested to them by the Egyptian festival the Inventio Osiridis or Festum Osiridis nati renadi (cf. Juvenal viii. 29; Athenagoras, gatio, c. 22, p. 299, ed. Maranus), itself a comoration of the renewed life of the sun from ar to year, which he thinks was celebrated on at day. (On this last point, however, much ubt exists. Wyttenbach, Anmadversiones in utarchi Moralia; De Iudo et Osiride, p. 366 F, asiders that if Plutarch's text is correct, the tival took place in Athyr or November, and Kircher, Oedipus Aegyptiacus, vol. ii. part 2, p. 262, would fix it in Choeac or December.)

(e) Some writers have argued that the Christian festival was not so much a transformation of a previously existing non-Christian one, as an independent festival set up as a counter-celebration at the same time with the heathen festival; this distinction, however, is rather apparent than real. Augusti, for example (Denkwürdigkeiten, vol. i. p. 226), sees in it a standing protest against those sects which denied or obscured the great truth of the Incarnation, such as the Manichaeans, Gnostics, Priscillianists, and the like.

II. History of Festival.

We do not find in the earliest Christian times uniformity of observance as to the day on which our Lord's Nativity was commemorated. The earliest allusion to it is made by Clement of Alexandria, and is of so much importance that we shall give it at length. After speaking of the year of our Lord's birth, he proceeds: "And there are some who over curiously (επιτιγόμενοι) assign not only the year but even the day of the birth of our Saviour, which they say was in the 28th year of Augustus, on the 25th day of Pachon.^b And the followers of Basilides celebrate also the day of His baptism (οἱ δὲ Ἀρῆ Β. καὶ τοῦ Βασιλιδῆος ἀποβαῖν τῆς ἡμέρας ἑορτάζουσι), spending the night before in readings, and they say that it was in the 15th year of Tiberius Caesar, on the 15th of the month Tubi, but some say that it was on the 11th of the same month. . . . Further, some of them say that he was born on the 24th or 25th of Pharmuthi." (Stromata, lib. i. c. 21, vol. i. p. 407, ed. Potter). The two days here specified as those on which the Nativity was celebrated, Pachon 25, and Pharmuthi 24 or 25, are respectively May 20, April 21 or 22 (see Bede, De temporum ratione, c. 11; Patrol. xc. 345). Jablonsky (op. cit.), and Le Nourry (In Clem. Alex. opp. Diss. ii. art. 5) infer from the language of Clement that Tubi 11 or 15 (January 6 or 10) was observed by the followers of Basilides as the day of the baptism as well as of the Nativity. We should venture to doubt this idea, but it is perhaps supported by the passage cited below from Epiphanius. Gieseler also (Kirchengeschichte, vol. i. p. 154, ed. 3) considers the inference incorrect.

We may probably assume the above-quoted passage to be decisive against any general celebration of the Nativity in Clement's time. Possibly indeed, though as we have already said the inference seems doubtful, he may refer to a celebration of the day by some of the sects of the time, since he speaks of the Basilidians "observing also the day of the baptism." Further, it would seem as if Clement rather censured the attempt to fix accurately the day of our Lord's birth, itself conclusive evidence against a general recognition of the festival in Clement's time.

It was the general custom in early times, in the East, to fix the Nativity on January 6, which thus served as the anniversary both for the Birth and the Epiphany. An illustration of this, not however applying to an Oriental Church, may perhaps be derived from the accounts of the visit of Julian the Apostate, when at Vienne in Gaul, to a church with the view of seeming in accord with the religion of his soldiery. Ammianus Marcellinus (lib. xxi. c. 2) speaks of this visit as taking place on the Epiphany ("feriarum die quem celebrantes mense Januario Christiani Epiphania dictitant"), and Zonaras (Annal. lib. xiii. c. 11) on the Nativity (τῆς γενεθλίου σωτῆρος ἡμέρας ἐφ' ἑσθ' ἡμέρας). It is just possible, however, that the references may be to different events.

To derive illustrations of the practice from distinctly Eastern sources, we may refer in the first place to a letter attributed to Cyril of Jerusalem, which professes to be addressed by him to Julius, bishop of Rome, on this subject. This letter, though a palpable forgery, affords interesting evidence of the existence of the practice of combining the two feasts on January 6. We derive our knowledge of it from two sources: (1) a summary of it given in a letter, De Nativitate Domini, of John, bishop of Nicaea (end of the 9th or beginning of the 10th century) to Zacharias, Catholicos of Armenia Major (Combes, Haeresis Monothelit. pp. 298 sqq.); and (2) an anonymous Ἀναγκάλια διήγησις, published by Cotelier from a MS. in the Library of Paris (Patres Apostolici, i. 316, ed. 1724). The general substance of these is to the effect that the bishop of Jerusalem complained of the inconvenience of celebrating the Nativity and the Epiphany on the same day, seeing that as he went in person to scenes commemorated by these events, Bethlehem and the Jordan, it was difficult to perform both journeys in one day, and the services were necessarily mutilated. He therefore requests information as to the proper day of the Nativity, adding that Titus carried away to Rome the archives of the Jews from which the fact might be cleared up. (For this point, cf. Tertullian contra Marcionem, lib. iv. c. 7.) The pope in answer declares that he has examined the records and finds that December 25 is the day on which the Nativity should be held. The latter of the two documents we have referred to adds that this decision caused much murmuring—"Now at that time Gregory Theologus [Nazianzen] was at Constantinople, and there arose no small murmuring among the citizens, as though he had been dividing the feast, and they said, Thou hast divided the feast, and art casting us into idolatry." According to this document the name of the bishop of Jerusalem in question was Juvenal, a successor of Cyril (see Cyril. Hierosol. p. 370, ed. Touttée).^c

A possible allusion to this affair may be cited

^c The unhistorical character of these documents is equally obvious whether we take Cyril or Juvenal: for Julius was dead nearly a century before the time of the latter. Again as for Cyril, the letter, according to Cotelier's obvious correction, claims to be written not by the well-known Cyril ("who wrote to Constantine" [leg. Constantinus] concerning the appearance of the luminous cross over Jerusalem), but a later one in the time of Valerius, mentioned by Epiphanius (Haer. lxvi. 20). This however is impossible, for the end of the pontificate of Julius only just overlaps that of Cyril. Even if, in spite of the letter, we referred it to Cyril I., we are no better off, for it is clear that the practice of celebrating the Nativity and the Epiphany together continued in Jerusalem after his time.

from the Laudatio S. Stephani by Basil of Se-leucia, who flourished at the time of the Council of Ephesus (Patrol. Gr. lxxxv. 469), who says of Juvenal that he "began to celebrate the glorious and adorable salvation-bringing Nativity of the Lord," which not improbably means celebrated as a distinct festival. Possibly the explanation of the whole thing is that Juvenal initiated some change in accordance with the Western practice, which was then explained as a direct action of the Roman See, and was finally associated with the more famous name of Cyril.

To show that the change was not at once made in Palestine, we may further appeal to the Latin homily De Nativitate Domini, found in Latin editions of Chrysostom, which though not received as a genuine writing of that Father, is assigned by Touttée (op. cit. p. 369) to the 4th century or the beginning of the 5th. The writer is contending that the Western plan of dividing the festivals is correct, and finds fault with Orientals who clung to their old method on the ground that they must know best in whose land our Lord's earthly life was past (Chrysostom, vol. i. p. 1116, ed. Paris, 1570).

Important testimony on this point may be derived from Cosmas Indicopleustes (Topographia Christiana, lib. v.; Patrol. Gr. lxxxviii. 197), who after referring to the message of the angel to Zacharias and the visit of the Virgin to Elizabeth, says that Christians concur in celebrating the Nativity in the ninth month, on Choeac 28 (=December 24), "but the people of Jerusalem, as though from what the blessed Luke says that Christ was baptized when 'beginning to be about thirty years old,' celebrate the Nativity on the Epiphany." He then appears to say that the people of Jerusalem were right in supposing that our Lord's baptism fell on the anniversary of His birth, but that the Church had wisely postponed the celebration of one of these events for twelve days lest either festival should meet with insufficient attention. Thus Jerusalem was incorrect in taking the later day for the anniversary of the Nativity. "But the people of Jerusalem alone by a reasonable conjecture, yet not accurately, celebrate [the Nativity] on the Epiphany, and on the Nativity they celebrate the memory of David and of James the Apostle." We further gather from the letter of John of Nicaea already referred to (op. cit. 1141) that the Church of Jerusalem appealed to the authority of James, the Lord's brother, for their practice of celebrating the Nativity on January 6. He adds that in the time of Honorius the patriarchs of Constantinople (Chrysostom), Alexandria, Jerusalem, and Antioch formally acquiesced in the Western plan.

We shall now adduce evidence to show that the practice of the Alexandrian Church agreed in this matter with that of the Church of Jerusalem. In his notes to his Latin translation of the Arabic Preface, Canons and Constitutions of the Nicene Council, Abraham Ecchelenensis cites from the Constitutions of the Alexandrian Church, "In die autem Nativitatis et Epiphaniae eo tempore quo concilium Nicaenum coactum fuit, praeceperunt ejus patres ut noctu missa celebretur" (Labbe ii. 402).

Cassian^d again (Collatio x. c. 2; Patrol. xlix.

^d It would almost seem as though there were grounds for believing the change to have taken place in Egypt by

820) speaks of it as the custom in Egypt in his day: "Intra Aegypti regionem mos iste antiqua traditione servatur, ut peracto Epiphaniarum die quem provinciae illius sacerdotes vel Domini Baptismi, vel secundum carnem Nativitatis esse definiunt, et idcirco utriusque sacramenti solemnitate non bisarie ut in occidentis provinciis, sed una diei huius festivitatem concelebrant . . ." (cf. Isidore, De Eccl. Off. i. 27); Genadius (De Scripturis Ecclesiasticis, c. 58; Patrol. lviii. 1092) speaks of a certain Bishop Timotheus who composed a book, not now extant, on the Nativity of our Lord "quam credit in Epiphania factam." Taken in conjunction with what we have already said of the Egyptian practice this may refer to Timotheus, bishop of Alexandria.

We next pass on to notice the evidence for the practice of the Armenians in this matter. Euthymius (Panoplia Dogmatica, tit. 23; Patrol. Gr. cxix. 1175) says of them: "These deny the birth of Christ according to the flesh and the mystery of the true incarnation, saying that they took place only in appearance; nor do they celebrate the Annunciation of the Mother of God on the day that we celebrate it, that is on March 25, as the inspired Fathers, the great Athanasius and John Chrysostom and those of their time and after their time have handed it down to us, but on January 5; in a very short time they fancifully and obscurely pretend that they celebrate the Annunciation and the Nativity and the Baptism of Christ, to the deceiving of the uncorrupt and not according to truth." Similar evidence is forthcoming from Nicephorus (Hist. Eccles. xviii. 53; Patrol. Gr. cxlvii. 440): "They deny also the Nativity of Christ according to the flesh, and say that He was born only in appearance; and differing from us who observe them separately, they extend the fast to the 15th [doubtless for ε here we should read ϵ] day of the month January, and celebrate together the Annunciation and Nativity and Baptism." The inquiry of the Armenian Catholicos Zacharias from John of Nicaea, which called forth the letter of the latter, is also evidence throwing a light upon the matter in question.

We shall next cite from the answers of John, bishop of Citrum, to Constantine Gabasilas, archbishop of Dyrrachium (quoted by Cotellier, Patres Apostolici, i. 316, ed. 1724, from MSS. in the Library of Paris, though not given in the printed editions, as Leunclavius, Jus Graeco-Romanum, p. 323): "We abolish the twelve days' [fast] for the overthrowing of the fast of the Armenians. For they fast for these twelve days before Epiphany, and so celebrate together on the fifth of January the three feasts: I mean the Annunciation and the Nativity and Baptism of Christ." He proceeds to attribute this to the heresiarch Ichanias, who held Docetic views.

Cotellier further quotes from a MS. in the same

Caesian's time; for in the heading of a homily by Paul, bishop of Emesa, delivered at Alexandria before Cyril, we find Αρχιεπίσκοπος Κωνσταντίνου (= December 25) . . . εἰς τὴν γέννησιν τοῦ κυρίου ἡμῶν Ἰησοῦ Χριστοῦ. (Conc. Ephes. Pars III. c. 31; Labbé, III. 1098.)

* The writer here doubtless appeals to the Questions ad Antiochum Duem, 88 (Patrol. Gr. xxviii. 432), once attributed to Athanasius, but universally acknowledged now to be spurious.

Library a form of renunciation to be gone through by Armenian heretics on joining the Roman Church. Among other things is, "If any one does not celebrate on March 25 the Annunciation, and on December 25 the Nativity of Christ, let him be Anathema." He had previously (op. cit. p. 238) printed from the same MS. an attack on the δοκασθε ὁμοφύση τῶν κατόρθων Ἀποστόλων, where we find: "And on January 5 in the evening, they celebrate the feast of the Annunciation. . . . And in the morning they celebrate the Nativity of Christ, and in the Liturgy the Holy Epiphany."

Finally, for the Armenian practice reference may be made to two invectives (λόγοι ἐναντιοφρονικοί) of Isaac, Catholicos of Armenia, in the 11th or 12th century (l. 3, il. 10, Combefis, Haereticis Monothelit. pp. 333, 405). The modern Armenian Church still retains this practice (Neale, Holy Eastern Church, Introd. p. 741).

The Western Church, so far as we can trace the matter back, seems to have kept the two festivals of the Nativity and Epiphany always distinct. Jerome says unhesitatingly (Comm. in Ezech. l. 1, vol. v. 6, ed. Bened.): "Et dies Epiphaniarum hucusque venerabilis est, sive ut quidam putant Natalis in carne, tunc enim absconditus est, et non apparuit."

We may cite the very ancient Calendarium Carthaginense (Patrol. xiii. 1227), which marks December 25 thus: "viii. Kal. Jan. Domini Nostri Jesu Christi Filii Dei," with a note of the Epiphany on Jan. 6. We shall only cite here from two other ancient calendars, that of Bucerius and the Leonine, which Muratori (De Rebus Liturgicis, c. 4) refers approximately to the dates 355, 488 A.D. respectively. These severally mark the day, "Natus Christus in Bethleem Judae," "Natale Domini" (l. c.). Other Liturgical monuments will be treated of separately.

Evidence, however, is forthcoming to show that in the Roman Church the Epiphany was probably the older of the two festivals, and therefore in some respects the more important, for the ancient Ordo Romanus (In vigilia Theophaniae, p. 21, ed. Hittorp, Cologne, 1568) remarks: "Nec hoc praetereundum est, quod secunda Nativitas Christi (i.e. the Epiphany), tot illustrata mysteriis, honoratior sit quam prima (i.e. Christmas)." Still this is after all only a matter of relative importance, and the Nativity is evidently accounted a festival of the highest order in the Leonine Sacramentary, which is certainly older than the Ordo which Hittorp refers to the time of Pepin and Charlemagne.

We shall now endeavour to show that the change of the day to December 25, in accordance with the Western plan, began to take place in the East towards the end of the 4th century. The old way was that believed in by Ephrem Syrus (ob. 378 A.D.), who is cited as saying, "On the 10th day [of March] was His Conception, and on the 6th day [of January] was His Nativity" (Asemanni, Bibl. Or. II. 163). The change, however, must have been gradual. For,

* It will be noticed that the Western Church marks the Epiphany by a Greek name, and the Nativity by a Latin name. It is a reasonable inference that the former took its rise in the East, and was thence introduced into the West; while the latter as a separate festival was of distinctly Western growth.

to say nothing of Armenians, we find Epiphanius saying (Haer. li. 24, vol. i. p. 446, ed. Petavius): "For since He was born in the month of January, that is, viii. Id. Jan. which is according to the Romans January 5, according to the Egyptians Tubi 11, according to the Syrians or the Greeks Andyneus 6, according to the Cyprians or Salaminians the 5th of the 5th month, according to the Paphians Julius 14, according to the Arabians Aleom 21, according to the Cappadocians Atarta 13, according to the Hebrews Tibieth (Tebeth) 13, according to the Athenians Maemacterion 6" It does not appear whether Epiphanius means that all these nations celebrated the Nativity on the day thus indicated: it is more probable that he is merely giving the various equivalents for the day in different systems of reckoning. Indeed his mention of the Romans is perhaps conclusive.

The most important piece of evidence, however, towards fixing the date of the change in the East by which December 25 became recognized as the day of the Nativity is to be found in a Homily of Chrysostom to the people of Antioch, εἰς τὴν γενέθλιον ἡμέραν τοῦ Σωτῆρος ἡμῶν Ἰησοῦ Χριστοῦ (vol. ii. p. 354, ed. Montfaucon), which Montfaucon (p. 352)* gives strong reasons for believing to have been delivered on December 25, 386. After saying how earnestly he had wished to see on the day of the Nativity a congregation like that which was then met together, Chrysostom proceeds: "Nevertheless it is not yet the tenth year since this day has been made manifest and plain to us, still as though it had been handed down to us from the beginning (ἀνωθεν) and many years ago, it has flourished thus through your zeal. And so a man would not err who should call it at once new and ancient,—new, in that it has recently been made known to us; but old and ancient, in that it has speedily won an equality with older festivals. . . ." And as plants of good stock speedily grow up and produce fruit, "so this day too, known from the beginning to those who inhabit the West, but brought to us not many years ago. . . ." The change, however, at first meets with opposition. "I know well," he adds, "that many even yet dispute with one another about it, some finding fault with it and others defending it, . . . since it is old and ancient, for the prophets already foretold His birth, and from the beginning it has been manifest and notable to the dwellers from Thrace even to Gades." Again (§ 2) he refers his hearers to the archives at Rome as a source whence certain evidence on the point could be obtained, and adds "from those who have an accurate knowledge of these things and inhabit that city, have we received this day. For they who dwell there, observing it from the beginning and by old tradition, themselves sent to us now the knowledge of it." Again (§ 5) after fixing April as the time of the Annunciation, he arrives for the Nativity at the month Apellaeus (December),

"this present month. in which we celebrate the day."

From the above-quoted language of Chrysostom, we may notice; (1) that about the year 386 A.D. the festival of the Nativity, as distinct from and independent of the Epiphany, was a novelty of a few years' standing in the East; (2) that Chrysostom believed that the Western Church had celebrated an independent festival "from the beginning and by old tradition;" (3) that the change was met with opposition, and therefore would be gradual.

Combining, then, Chrysostom's definite testimony with the fact that Epiphanius had, perhaps a little before this time, concurred with the old Eastern view, and that at the time of the Council of Ephesus the change was tacitly recognized at Alexandria, we may fairly argue that except in those parts of the Eastern Church where the old plan was still continued (Jerusalem possibly and Armenia certainly), the Western plan was being gradually adopted in the period which we may roughly define as the last quarter of the 4th and the first quarter of the 5th century.

Whether before the time of Chrysostom any part of the Eastern Church observed the Nativity on December 25, it is difficult to say. The date of the various parts of the Apostolic Constitutions (see the Article) being so doubtful, we shall merely cite from them a passage bearing on this point: "Observe the days of the festivals, brethren, and first the Nativity, and let this be celebrated by you on the 25th day of the ninth month. After this let the Epiphany be very greatly honoured in your eyes, on which the Lord revealed to you His Own Godhead; and let this be held on the 6th day of the tenth month" (v. 13; cf. also viii. 33, where the two festivals are again distinguished). Cotelier in his introduction (op. cit. p. 197) also cites a passage found in some MSS. of Anastasius, which professes to be quoted from the Apostolic Constitutions, in the present text of which, however, it is not found: "For our Lord Jesus Christ was born of the Holy Virgin Mary in Bethlehem, ἐν μηνὶ κατὰ Αἰγυπτίους Χοιδὰκ κε' [probably a mistake for κεθ', which = December 25] ἑρὰ ἐβδόμῃ τῆς ἡμέρας ἣ ἐστὶν πρὸ ὀκτῶ καλανδῶν Ἰανουαρίων."

The result of all this investigation then is roughly this. In the case of the Eastern Church there is no certain evidence pointing to a general celebration of the Nativity on December 25 before the time of Chrysostom. Till then it had been held on January 6 in conjunction with the Epiphany, and even after this date some churches of the East retained for some time their old plan.

In the West we are told that the festival had been recognized, and celebrated on December 25 "from the beginning." We are not able to produce any very ancient witnesses from Western Fathers, but may fairly assume that it had existed sufficiently long for Chrysostom to be able to use reasonably and without fear of contradiction such a word as ἀνωθεν. We have also called attention to the recognition of it in ancient calendars.

Since the time of Chrysostom, the Nativity has been received by all Churches of Christendom as one of their most important festivals. Thus, in a sermon attributed to Gregory of Nyssa, but

* Montfaucon here cites Athanasius (Frag. Comm. in Matth. vol. i. p. 1025, ed. Bened. 1787) as speaking of December 25 as the Nativity. But in the first place the Benedictine editors had considerable doubt of the genuineness of the fragment ("si non aperte spurium admodum suspectum videtur, in quo sunt pleraque μυθωδή"); and in the next, it seems rather the death of Herod which is indicated than the birth of our Lord.

of doubtful authenticity, it is said: "Now is heard accordant throughout the whole inhabited world the sound of them that celebrate the east" (Patrol. Gr. xlvii. 1148). Chrysostom (In 2. Philogonum 4, vol. i. 497) speaks of it as second in importance to no festival, "which a man would not be wrong in calling the chief μνησφόρις of all festivals."

Several sermons are extant of Pope Leo I. on the subject of the Nativity, further exemplifying his statement (Serm. 21-30, vol. i. pp. 64 sqq. d. Ballerini).

It is curious that in one of his epistles Augustine does not seem to recognize the Nativity as a festival of the first order, where after referring to the Divine institution of the Sacraments, he proceeds to those things "quae non scripta sed tradita custodimus" on the authority of the Apostles and the Church, "sicut quod Domini Passio et Resurrectio et Ascensio in caelum et Adventus ex caelo Spiritus Sancti anniversaria solemnitate celebrantur" (Epist. 54 § 1 [collm 118]; Patrol. xxiii. 200). Yet he deemed the festival of such importance that he has written not a few sermons on the day, showing the celebration of this festival in Africa (see Serm. 184-196, 369-372; Patrol. xxviii. 895 sqq., xxxix. 1655 sqq.; the authenticity of the latter group, however, is doubtful).

III. Liturgical Notices.

The Roman Church evidently accounted the Nativity one of the most important feasts from very early times. Their earliest Sacramentary, that of Pope Leo, contains nine Masses for the day (vol. ii. 148 sqq.). There is, however, no trace of a Vigil. In the Preface in the first Mass is said: "Quoniam quicquid Christianae professionis devotione celebratur, de hac sumit solemnitate principium, et in huius muneris mysterio continetur." See again the Preface in the seventh Mass: "Atque ideo sicut primis fidelibus extitit aui credulitate pretiosum, ita nunc excusabilem conscientiam non relinquit, quae salutaris mysterii veritatem, toto etiam mundo testimonio non sequitur."

In the Gelasian Sacramentary four Masses together are given: (1) For the Vigil at Nones; (2) For the Vigil in nocte; (3) For the Vigil ante prima; (4) For the Nativity in die: that is to say, there are practically three Masses on the Nativity itself. After this again are several prayers for the Nativity, whether at Vespers or Matins.

The Gelasian Sacramentary borrowed a good deal from the Leonine here. The Collect and credo for the services of the Vigil at Nones and Mane prima, and a Collect and the Preface for the Nativity itself as well as two (the 2nd and 4th) of the added prayers all come from the large number of Masses for the day in the older sacramentary (Patrol. lxxiv. 1055 sqq.). We now pass on to the Gregorian Sacramentary. Here, in the previous case, there are altogether four services with a large number of alternative forms. The second mass is connected in some MSS. with the church of S. Maria Major; thus, Natalis Domini ad S. Mariam Majorem (MS. Rodradi), or octe ad S. Mariam (MS. Ratoldi); and the third contains also the commemoration of S. Anastasia, and one MS. mentioned by Ménard (in loc.) gives no prefaces for the day, one for the Saint and the other for the Nativity (cf. Greg. Sacr. col. 5 sqq. ed. Ménard). See also the Antiphonary, where, as before, four Masses in all are recognized (ib. col. 657 sqq.), and a still more elaborate set of forms is given in the Liber Responsorii attributed to Gregory (ib. col. 741 sqq.).

The Ordo Romanus (ed. cit. p. 19) prescribes three Lections from Isaiah for the Vigil of the Nativity: (1) ix. 1-x. 4; (2) xl. 1-xli. 20; (3) lii. 1-15. The Ambrosian Liturgy of the Church of Milan (Pamelius, Liturg. Latt. vol. i. pp. 293 sqq.) gives one Mass for the day.

We may now briefly examine the Liturgical monuments of the Gallican Church. In the ancient Lectionary of that Church, there were originally twelve Lections for the Vigil of the Nativity. Those which are yet extant, five in number, are: Isaiah xlii. 23-xlvi. 13; an extract from a sermon of Augustine^b De Nativitate Domini: Isaiah lii. 1-lxi. 7; Malachi ii. 7-iv. 6; St. John i. 1-15.

The Lections for the Nativity itself are Isaiah vii. 10-ix. 8 (with some omissions); Daniel [Benedicite] cum benedictione; Hebrews i. 1-13; St. Luke ii. 1-19 (Mabillon, de Liturgia Gallicana, lib. ii. pp. 106 sqq.). In illustration of this plan of having twelve Lections for the Vigil of the Nativity, here doubtless equivalent to the Matins of the Nativity, Mabillon (l. c.) cites from the Regula of Aurelian, bishop of Arles: "In Natale Domini et in Epiphania tertia hora surgite: dicite unum nocturnum et facite sex missas [= lectiones] de Isaia propheta; iterum dicite nocturnum, et legantur aliae sex de Evangelio" (Patrol. lxxviii. 396).

It will be seen that in the Gallican Lectionary one Mass only is presupposed for the day of the Nativity, and in accordance with this the Gothico-Gallic Missal (op. cit. pp. 188 sqq.) gives us one Mass for the Vigil and one for the day. In the ancient Gallican Missal are found forms of the Preface "ad vespem Natalis Domini" and prayers "ad initium noctis Natalis Domini," "in media nocte Natalis Domini."

The Mozarabic Missal gives us but one Mass for the day and ignores the Vigil. The Prophetic Lection, the Epistle, and the Gospel are respectively Isaiah ix. 1-7; Hebrews i. 1-12; St. Luke ii. 6-20 (ed. Lealie, pp. 37 sqq.). The Breviary gives Matins for the Vigil; and for the day of the Nativity, (1) Vespers—that is on the evening preceding December 25; (2) Matins and Lauds. Into the Vesper service enters the noble hymn, "Veni Redemptor Gentium."

It will have been noticed that the Roman Liturgies, the Gelasian and Gregorian, give three Masses for the Nativity, while those for the Churches of Milan, Gaul, and Spain give but one. In the case of the Gallican Church this may be illustrated from Gregory of Tours, who in the life of Nicetius of Lyons (Vitae Patrum, viii. 11, p. 1196, ed. Bened.), says: "Facta quoque hora tertia, cum populus ad missarum solemniam conveniret, hic mortuus in ecclesiam est delatus." On the other hand, we must mention that in a writing of Eldefonsus, a Spanish bishop, who wrote 845 A.D., is an allusion to a triple Mass on the Nativity, Easter, Whitsunday, and the Transfiguration (Patrol. cvl. 888). This is probably a leaning to the Roman plan, or it may be a custom of independent origin.

The cause of the triple Mass in the Gelasian and Gregorian Sacramentaries is thus explained by Mabillon (l. c.), that in consequence of three being the number of "stations" discharged in ancient times in Rome by a Pope on that day, three Masses were instituted.¹ We shall again quote the ancient Ordo Romanus on this point (p. 19): "Prima die Vigiliae Natalis Domini hora nona canunt Missam ad S. Mariam. Qua expleta canunt vespertinalem synaxim, dehinc vadunt ad cibum. In crepusculo noctis intrat Apostolicus ad vigiliis in praefatam Ecclesiam, tamen non cantant ibi invitatorium ad introitum, sed expletis vigiliis et matutinis, sicut in Antiphonario continetur, ibidem canunt primam Missam in nocte. Qua expleta, vadunt ad S. Anastasiam canere aliam Missam de nocte. Dehinc pergunt ad S. Petrum, ut ibi vigiliis celebrent, ab eo loco ubi invenerit eos psallere qui ibidem excubant. Ipsi enim intrant ad vigiliis debito tempore in processu noctis et canunt invitatorium et prosequuntur ordinem Antiphonarii. Unde etiam dupla officia in Romanorum Antiphonariis hac nocte describuntur." The above will account for the commemoration of S. Anastasia at the Mass Mane prima. The Ordo then adds the obviously groundless statement that the institution of these nocturnal Masses is to be referred to Pope Telesphorus (ob. 138 A.D.).

Attention has already been called to the fact of the early recognition of the Vigil of the Nativity. In addition to the examples cited, we may further appeal to a still older witness, Augustine, who speaks of it in one of his letters (Epist. 65 ad Xantippum [olim 236]; Patrol. xxxiii. 234). It differed in this respect from the ordinary type of Vigil in that it continued through the night, making with the Nativity itself one great solemnity. Thus we read in the letter of the Bishops Lupus and Euphronius to Bishop Talasius: "Vigilia Natalis Domini longe alio more quam Paschae Vigilia celebranda, quia hic lectiones Nativitatis legendae sunt, illic autem Passionis. Epiphaniae quoque solemnitas habet suum specialem cultum. Quae Vigiliae vel maxime aut perpete nocte aut certe in matutinum vergente curandae sunt. Paschatis autem Vigiliae a Vespere raro in Matutinum usque perducitur" (Patrol. lviii. 66). In the Capitula of Theodore of Tarsus, archbishop of Canterbury (ob. 690 A.D.), the difference of the practice of the Latin and Greek Church in this matter is pointed out, in that the former began the Vigil at Nones, the latter late in the evening (Capit. 66; Patrol. xcix. 957). The Gelasian, Gregorian, and Pamelius' Ambrosian Sacramentaries give also Masses for the Octave of the Nativity, January 1. which would also of necessity be the anniversary of the day of the Circumcision, by which express name it is denoted in some other Liturgies. [CIRCUMCISION.]

The existence of the group of important festivals between Christmas and the Epiphany seems to point to a wish on the part of the early Church to render the whole season one great festival, by redeeming as much as possible of the time from ordinary worldly business, in commemoration of persons more or less indirectly connected with our Lord's Nativity. Thus a Council of Tours declares: "Inter Natale Domini et Epiphania omni die festivitates sunt itemque prandebunt" (Concil. Turonense ii. can. 17; Labbé, vol. v. 856). From the great importance of the festival, the Nativity, if happening to coincide with a fast, claimed the right of overriding the fast. Indeed there was a fast preceding the Nativity which just stopped short of it. Thus Aurelian, already quoted, says (l. c.), "A Calendis Novembris usque ad Domini Natale quotidie jejunandum absque Sabbato et Dominico." Cf. also the canon we have just cited of the Second Council of Tours, "De Decembri usque ad Natale Domini omni die jejunent." We may further cite in illustration Epiphanius (Adversus Haereses: Expositio Fidei 22, vol. i. p. 1105), who, after saying that there is no fast throughout the fifty days of Pentecost, adds, "Nor on the day of the Epiphany, when the Lord was born in the flesh, is it lawful to fast, although it happen to fall on the fourth or the sixth day of the week." It will be remembered from a previously cited passage of this writer that he follows the Eastern plan in this matter, so that his day of the Epiphany is at once Epiphany and Nativity.

As a festival of so great importance, Christmas was one of the seasons, on which it was especially enjoined on all, clergy and laity alike, to communicate. Thus the Council of Agde (506 A.D.) orders: "Ut cives qui superiorum solemnitatum, id est Paschae ac Natalis Domini vel Pentecostes festivitibus cum episcopis interesse neglexerint, cum in civitatibus communionis vel benedictionis accipiendae causa se nosse debeant, triennio a communione priventur ecclesiae." Again: "Si quis in clero constitutus ab ecclesia sua diebus solemnibus defuerit, id est Nativitate, Epiphania, Pascha vel Pentecoste, dum potius saecularibus lucris studet quam servitio Dei paret, convenit ut triennio a communione suspendatur. . . ." (Concil. Agathense, can. 63, 64; Labbé, iv. 1393). Springing from the same tendency is the injunction of the First Council of Orleans (511 A.D.): "Ut nulli civium Paschae, Natalis Domini vel quinquagesimae solennitatem in villa liceat celebrare, nisi quem infirmitas probabitur renuisse" (Concil. Aurelianense i. can. 25; ibid. 1408). It was allowed by the Council of Epaon (517 A.D.) for people of rank (cives superiorum natalium) to invite their bishop to themselves at Christmas or Easter to receive his blessing (Concil. Epaonense, can. 35; ibid. 1580).

IV. Christmas Presents. As coming at the beginning of the ecclesiastical year, and as being in itself a time when from the Great Gift then given by God to man, all memories call to peace and friendship, the season of Christmas has from lme immemorial been associated with the mutual giving of presents and the interchange of ordinal wishes.

A similar custom prevailed among the Romans, who on the Calends of January offered to the emperor or to their patrons presents called strenae (hence French étrenne). See, for instance, Suetonius, Calig. 42; cf. Aug. 57, Tib. 34; also Dion Cassius, liv. 85.

That the Christian custom is derived from the above we do not of course affirm, although we are far from denying the possibility of such an origin.

Traces of the custom are to be found in the Greek Church, as we learn from Gaar (Notes to Jodinus, De Officiis Constantinopolitanae, c. 6; Patrol. Gr. clvii. 308), who speaks of boys and youths running about the streets at this season, and "ad amicorum portas modulis sonis ac nusces instrumentis πολυχρόνια [wishes for long life and happiness; see Ducange, Glossarium a. v.] perstreperunt, xenia reportaturi, cunctique χριστιανικαῖς pro natalitiis Christi muneribus se cumulant certatim."

The custom of the strenae as an offshoot of heathenism, did not find much favour in the eyes of the early Church. Thus in a sermon De Calendis Januarii, wrongly attributed to Augustine, we read, "Disbolleas etiam strenas et ab aliis accipiant et ipsi aliis tradunt" (Patrol. xxxix. 2002, 2004).

CHRISTOPHORI. A name sometimes applied to Christians in the ancient Church, as expressing the Presence of Christ within them by His Spirit. As early as Ignatius we find the appellation Theophori in use, to signify that Christians are the Temple of God; and Christophori also occurs in the early writers in a similar sense: e.g. in the epistle of Phileas, bishop of Thmuis, recorded by Eusebius, l. viii. c. 10, we find him speaking of the martyrs of his own time as Χριστοφόροι ναῖοι, because they were temples of Christ and acted by His holy Spirit (Bingham, l. 1, 4). [D. B.]

CHRISTOPHORUS. (1) Martyr in the city of Samos, A.D. 256, is commemorated July 25 (Mart. Rom. Vet., Usuardi); April 28 (Mart. Bedae); May 9 (Cal. Byzant.).

(2) Monk, martyr at Cordova, Aug. 20 (Mart. Usuardi). [C.]

CHRONITAE, Χρονίται. A name of reproach given to the Catholics or orthodox Christians by Arius the Arian and his party: intimating that their religion was but for a time, that its day was being fast spent, and that it must soon give place to the more enlightened system of Arianism: a conceit which has been characteristic of heresy in all ages of the Church (Bingham, l. iii. 16). [D. B.]

CHRONOLOGY. The object of the several articles in this work relating to chronology is to describe the methods used by the writers of our period in measuring time, and the reduction of their methods to that at present in use in this country. This evidently involves the consideration of the various non-ecclesiastical calendars, or modes of reckoning time, employed by writers of the first eight centuries, and of the modifications introduced into them by the influence of Christianity.

To place an event in time, we must have a fixed epoch or era from which to measure, and a fixed, or at least a determinable, standard by which to measure the interval from that era. The principal epochs from which intervals of time have been measured are given under ERA. The great natural divisions of time are days, lunations, and solar years; and almost every nation has either endeavoured to discover the relation which lunations bear to solar years [EPACT], and so to keep the lunar months in some kind of correspondence with the seasons of the solar year; or has abandoned the observation of the moon in its division of time, and divided the solar year into twelve months, somewhat longer than lunar months. See MONTH, YEAR. Further, nearly all nations have adopted for the convenience of common life purely conventional divisions of time, not corresponding to any natural division, such as the Roman Abundantia. The conventional division with which we are principally concerned is the WEEK.

As the various events of Christian history received annual commemoration, the days of such recurring commemorations became recognised as elements in chronology [CALENDAR]. The principal modification which the calendar underwent in consequence of ecclesiastical considerations is that which arose from the annual variation in the observance of Easter, and the festivals connected with it. See EASTER, PASCHAL CYCLE, GOLDEN NUMBERS. [C.]

CHRYSANTHUS, martyr at Rome under Numerianus (A.D. 283), is commemorated Dec. 1 (Mart. Usuardi); March 19 (Cal. Byzant.) [C.]

CHRYSOGONUS, martyr at Rome under Diocletian, is commemorated Nov. 24 (Mart. Hieron., Rom. Vet., Bedae, Usuardi). Some MSS. of the Hieronymian Martyrology give Aquileia as the place of martyrdom. [C.]

CHRYSOSTOM, LITURGY OF. [LITURGY.]

CHRYSOSTOM, ST. JOHN, is commemorated Nov. 13 (Cal. Byzant., Ethiop.). Translation of his relics to Constantinople, in the reign of the younger Theodosius (A.D. 435), Jan. 27. The Byzantine had also in more recent times a festival of SS. Basil, Gregory Nazianzenus, and Chrysostom, on Jan. 30. The Mart. Rom. Vet., and Mart. Usuardi place the Natalis of St. Chrysostom on Jan. 27, and do not mention the Translation. [C.]

CHRYSOSELUS, presbyter, martyr at Cordova, is commemorated April 22 (Mart. Bedae, Rom. Vet. Usuardi). [C.]

'Ἀνατορες [see ANACTORON] as equivalent to silica is used by Eusebius (De Laude Constant. 9), but is only rarely employed. Churches erected specially in honour of mars were called Μαρτρία, Martyria, Memoriae, ἑσπια, Tropaea, Τίτλοι, Tituli.

Those who wrote in Latin, in the dark ages, appear to employ the word basilica for the most part, when they wrote of a large church, orarium when of a chapel or oratory. Those who wrote in Gaul, in the 6th and 7th centuries, are said by De Valois (v. Du Cange, Gloss. art. 'Basilica') to have used basilica for the church of a convent, and ecclesia for a cathedral or parish church. Gildas in the 6th century employs ecclesia and basilica, adding to the latter word martirium.

II. Early History.—At what time the Christians began to erect buildings for the purpose of celebrating divine worship is unknown, but it is obvious that inasmuch as they held frequent assemblies for religious purposes, suitable places for such assemblies would be required, and that when the congregations became large, rooms in private houses would cease to afford the requisite space.

The assertions of some of the earlier Christian writers, as Arnobius (Disputat. adv. Gent. lib. vi. 1), Origen (c. Col. lib. 7, c. 8), Minucius Felix (c. 8, 10, 32) that the Christians had neither temples, altars nor images, that God could be worshipped in every place, and that his temple on earth is the heart of man, should, would appear, be understood, not literally—for there is positive evidence of the existence of churches in the 3rd century—but that they did no temples or altars in the Pagan sense of the words, and that their religion was spiritual, did not depend upon places or rituals.

The passage from Clemens Alexandrinus (Strom. 5, p. 846) and those from other writers, quoted by Bingham (Antiq. bk. viii. c. 1, § 13), prove at a certain place was called ἐκκλησία, but, in witness, not that it was a separate building, constructed and set apart for that purpose. The documentary evidence of the next century, the 4th, is, however, much more decisive. The chronicle of Edessa (In Assemani, Bibl. Orient. xi. 7) mentions the destruction of temples of Christian assemblies in A.D. 292.

Aelius Lampridius in his Life of the Emperor Alexander Severus (A.D. 222-235), narrates that the Christians having occupied a certain place, it was confirmed to them on the ground that it was better that God should be worshipped there in any manner, than that it should be given to the adverse claimants, the 'popinarii,' or tavern-keepers. Gregory of Nyssa, in his Life of Gregory Thaumaturgus, bishop of Neo-Caesarea, states that he built several churches there in the adjacent parts of Pontus. In addition to which, many other testimonies of a like nature might be adduced.

The edict of Diocletian, usually attributed to the year 302, ordering the destruction of the churches and the confiscation of the lands belonging to them, confirms these statements, and Constantine's account (De Mort. Persecutorum, c. 1) of the destruction of the church at Nicomedia in A.D. 303, shows that some of them at least were considerable edifices.

There is some ground for believing that in the 3rd century those plans and arrangements of churches which we find to prevail in the 4th and following centuries were, at least in part, already in use; St. Cyprian (Ep. 59, p. 688, Hartel) imagines Pagan altars and images usurping the place of the altar of the Lord, and entering into the "sacrum venerandum consensum" of the clergy. In this there seems to be an evident allusion to the arrangement usual in later times, in which the altar was placed in the apse, and the clergy sat on a bench around it.

So also in the passage in Tertullian (De Pudicit. c. 4), when that writer speaks of certain sinners being removed not only from the 'limen' but also 'omni ecclesiae tecto,' not only from the threshold of the church itself, but even from every dependent building, such as the narthex, the atrium, or the baptistery. It is doubtful whether any now existing church can be attributed, upon good evidence, to this century. One which had been believed so to date, is the basilica of Reparatus, near Orleansville, in Algeria, the ancient Castellum Tingitanum. It is about 80 feet long by 52 wide, and is on the "dromical" or as we now say basilican plan, that is, in the form of a parallelogram, longer than wide. It was divided into a nave and four aisles by four ranges of columns. It has now an apse at each end, both internal to the line of walls. According to an inscription, still remaining, the earlier part of the building dates from 252, but the era is most probably not that of Christ, but of Mauritania, and the date corresponds with A.D. 325; the other apse was added about A.D. 403, to contain the grave of the saint.

The earlier apse, with the ground in front of it, is raised about three feet; and below it was a vault, in which were two sarcophagi. It is not, however, clear whether this arrangement was original. Another African church, that of D'jemila, which is believed to date from the latter part of this century, presents the remarkable peculiarity of being without an apse. It measures 92 feet by 52. Near the end furthest from the entrance door is an enclosure entered by a doorway in front and one on each side. This, no doubt, surrounded the altar and the seats of the priests.

Some other churches which have been supposed to belong to this century, as the cathedral of Trèves (v. Hübsch, Die altchristl. Kirchen, pl. vi.), and the small church at Annona, in Algeria, though on the basilican plan, are much wider in proportion to their length than is usual in the later examples. In the case of Trèves the building is, in fact, a square (or very nearly so), measuring about 120 feet internally with an apse. The roof was supported by two monolithic columns of granite, about 40 feet high, on each side. If the church were not square, but oblong, about which there is some doubt, there were probably three, and perhaps even five of these columns on each side. By some, however, as by Kugler, Gesch. der Baukunst i. 404, this building is attributed to about the year 550, but it seems very improbable that so bold a plan, involving arches of great span, supported on monolithic columns nearly 50 feet high (including bases and capitals) was conceived and executed at that time. The church at Taffkha, in central Syria, exhibits the same square form, with a semi-ovoid apse projecting from the side opposite to the entrance. This building, in style and construction, most closely resembles a basilica at Chagga, which M. de Vogüé ascribes to the third century, and it must be presumed that he considers the church to be of the same date. It depth by a little less in width, and being about 20 feet high internally.

Some of the churches in Egypt and Nubia, as at Erment in Egypt and Ibrihm in Nubia (v. Kugler, Gesch. der Baukunst, i. 376), are, no doubt, of a very early date, perhaps of the end of the 3rd or the beginning of the following century, but no certain date can be affixed to them. In both those named the apse is enclosed within the walls, the angles of which are occupied by chambers. This arrangement, indeed, seems to have been very early adopted and very generally adhered to in the East. Some early examples of the same plan may be found also in the West, as in the Church of St. Croce is constructed like many other buildings in the same part of Syria, in a very peculiar manner, being entirely roofed with large slabs of stone, which rest on arches spanning the nave at intervals of about 7 ft. 8 in. The flat roofs of the aisles formed galleries.

One very remarkable feature in this building is the tower which ranges with the façade and rises to a height of about 43 feet. If this church be of the date to which it would seem to belong, this must be considered as the first appearance of a tower in ecclesiastical architecture.

The church is not large, measuring externally (exclusively of apse and tower) about 57 feet in in Gerusalemme at Rome: but it does not seem to have been frequently used.

When, in the year A.D. 313, the Emperor Constantine had published the edict tolerating the Christian religion, and still more when, in A.D. 324, he took it under his patronage, a great increase in the erection of churches, and in the size and splendour of the edifices, naturally ensued—the emperor himself setting the example by erecting at Jerusalem and elsewhere churches of great magnificence.

It has been shewn that churches of the basilican type were erected before the period of Constantine, and it is probable that sepulchral or memorial churches of circular or polygonal

1, and oratoria or chapels of many various kinds, may have been also built, but it is not till the 4th century that we have examples of three of these classes, the date and character of which are well ascertained. Typical forms of the two first classes were established in the buildings erected during the reign of Constantine, and have influenced the construction of churches down to the present day.

The basilican, or, as the Greeks called it, the memorial plan, continued, in the great majority of instances, to be in use in the West (though with certain modifications) until after the period traced by this work, and in Rome until after the year 1000.

It was almost equally prevalent in the East till the genius of the architect of St. Sophia at Constantinople had evolved from the other typical form, viz. that of the memorial church, a combination so striking and impressive as to have permanently influenced the church architecture of Asia and of the east of Europe in our day, a modification of the memorial type; while in the West, churches the plans of which thence derived, continue to be, as they had been before, exceptional; such are S. Vitale at Ravenna and S. Lorenzo at Milan.

In the earlier period the choice of form would not have been guided by the intention most strongly present to the founder. Where special mention of doing honour to the memory of a martyr existed, the circular form was chosen, where this was not the leading thought, the basilican; the latter lending itself better to the celebration of divine services with a large attendance of worshippers. In several instances basilican and a memorial church were placed close proximity, as at Jerusalem by Constantine, Kalat Sema'an in Central Syria, at Nola by Eusebius, at Constantinople in the churches of Sergius and of St. Peter and Paul, and several others, the circular or polygonal church being in almost all these cases dedicated in honour of a martyr.

It will be most convenient when describing churches erected from the time of Constantine to that of Justinian to divide them according to the threefold division mentioned above, viz., 1st, basilican; 2nd, memorial or sepulchral churches; and 3rd, oratoria (which are placed under the head CHAPEL), without paying much regard to the country in which examples are found. During this period, in fact, so much unity, as well of ritual and practice in religious matters as of style and feeling, prevailed throughout the Roman Empire, that the differences between the ecclesiastical architecture of its various provinces are chiefly differences of detail.

At the beginning of the period which follows, that from Justinian to Charles the Great, the great development of the Byzantine style takes place, and the architecture of the East is henceforward widely different from that of the West. Soon afterwards the fragments into which the empire had divided were formed into new kingdoms, most of whom developed something of their own plan or new style in their ecclesiastical buildings, and it will therefore be necessary to treat of the architectural history of most of these nations separately. This part of the subject may be divided into the following sections:—

1. The western part of the territory of the Eastern Empire; 2, Armenia and the adjacent provinces; 3, Italy; 4, France, Germany, and Switzerland; 5, Spain; 6, Ireland; 7, Scotland; 8, England.

III. The Period from Constantine to Justinian.

—It has been thought by some writers (v. Martigny, Dict. des Antiq. Chrétiennes, art. Basilique), that the crypts or chapels of the catacombs near Rome have served as models for the primitive Christian churches, by which it would appear that churches of the basilican type are meant. This opinion would, however, appear to rest on no sufficient foundation, for the so-called chapels are in general either a series of two, three, or even five, chambers, usually not more than 6 or 7 feet square, connected by doorways, as in the instance of the "chiesa principale" of the cemetery of St. Agnes (v. Marchi, lavori, xxxv. xxxvi. xxxvii.), or hexagonal, polygonal, or oblong excavations, without apse or any of the usual features of a church, such as the crypt discovered by Bosio in the cemetery of the Via Salaria Nuova, but not now accessible, which has been held to have been a church (v. Marchi, lavori, xxxii.). In this an octagon of about 23 feet in diameter is connected by a doorway about 4 feet wide, with an oblong chamber about 12 feet wide by 32 long. [CATACOMBS.]

The so-called basilica of St. Hermes, in a cemetery near the Via Salaria Vecchia, of an oblong form, terminating in an apse, was, no doubt, reduced into its present form by Pope Hadrian I., as the Lib. Pontif. tells us of that pope that he "basilicam coemeterii sanctorum martyrum Hermetis, etc., mirae magnitudinis innovavit."

No church of the period of Constantine has come down to modern times in a complete state, but fortunately a contemporary writer (Eusebius) has left us such detailed accounts, that, with the assistance which we can obtain from existing remains, we can form a very complete picture of a church of that period.

The earliest church of the building of which we have a distinct account is that which Paulinus built in Tyre between A.D. 313 and A.D. 322. Eusebius (Ecclesiastical History, bk. x. iv. c. 37) states that the bishop surrounded the site of the church with a wall of enclosure; this wall, according to Dr. Thomson (The Land and the Book, p. 189, c. xiii.) can still be traced, and measures 222 feet in length, by 129 in breadth. In the east side of this wall of enclosure he made a large and lofty portico (προπύλαιον), through which a quadrangular atrium (αὐτὸπριον) was entered; this was surrounded by ranges of columns, the spaces between which were filled by net-like railings of wood. In the centre of the open space was a fountain, at which those about to enter the church purified themselves.

The church itself was entered through interior porticoes (τοὶς ἐνδοτέροις προπύλαιον), perhaps a narthex, but whether or not distinct from the portico which bounded the atrium on that side does not appear. Three doorways led into the nave; the central of these was by far the largest, and had doors covered with bronze reliefs; other doorways gave entrance to the side aisles. Above these aisles were galleries well lighted (doubtless by external windows), and looking upon the nave; these were adorned with beautiful work in wood. The passage is rather obscure, and has been variously translated: the above is the sense of Bunsen's paraphrase (Basiliken des Christ. Roms, s. 31). Hubsch (Alt. Christ. Kirchen, s. 75) thinks that the word εἰσβολαῖς (entrances) stands for windows, and that the woodwork was in them. It seems, however, more probable that the εἰσβολαῖ were the openings from the galleries into the nave, and the woodwork the railings or balustrades which protected their fronts.

The nave or central portion (βασιλῆος οἶκος) was constructed of still richer material than the rest, and the roof of cedar of Lebanon. Dr. Thomson states that the remains of five granite columns may still be seen, and that "the height to the dome was 80 feet, as appears by the remains of an arch." Nothing which Eusebius says leads to the supposition that it was covered by a dome, and the arch was probably the so-called triumphal arch through which, as at St. Paolo f. l. m. at Rome, and many other basilican churches, a space in front of the apse somewhat like a transept was entered. Hübsch has made a conjectural restoration of the church thus arranged.

The building, having been in such manner completed, Paulinus, we are told, provided it with thrones (θρόνοις) in the highest places for the honour of the presidents (πρυέδρων), and with benches, or seats (βάθροις), according to fitness, and, placing the most holy altar (ἅγιον ἁγίων θυσιαστήριον) in the midst, surrounded the whole with wooden net-like railings of most skilful work, so that the enclosed space might be inaccessible to the crowd. The pavement, he adds, was adorned with marble decoration of every kind.

Then on the outside he constructed very large external buildings (ἐξεδραι) and halls (οἶκοι), which were attached to the sides of the church (τὸ βασιλῆιον), and connected with it by entrances in the hall lying between (ταῖς ἐπὶ τὸν μέσον οἶκον εἰσβολαῖς). These halls, we are told, were destined for those who still required the purification and sprinkling of water and of the Holy Ghost.

In A.D. 333 Constantine caused a basilica to be erected at Jerusalem near the site of the sepulchre of our Lord, which was either included in this building or in a circular or octagonal adjacent structure, the basilica being called ἐκκλησία Σωτήρος—church of the Saviour. What the plan and situation of these buildings were, and whether anything now existing be the remains of these buildings, are questions full of difficulty and have been the subject of much controversy (v. Fergusson, De Vogüé, Eglises de la Terre-Sainte).

To discuss the various theories and the arguments on which they are founded would occupy far too much space. Eusebius unfortunately has written of the subject in a somewhat rhetorical manner, so that the plan of the structure cannot be clearly made out, but some interesting particulars may be gathered from his account of the basilica.

It had (Life of Constantine the Great, lib. iii.) double porticoes or, as we should say, aisles (δίττων στοῶν), or rows of piers with colonnades (παράσταδες) in two stories above and below or on the ground, which stretched throughout the whole extent (μήκει) of the temple.

CHRIST. ANT.

By καταγείων we should perhaps understand not subterranean but on a level with the ground, the "ἀνάγεια" corresponding with the triforium of a mediaeval church. Recent investigations have shewn that extensive subterranean galleries exist on a part of the site (according to Mr. Fergusson's views) of this church, but their character and date has as yet not been satisfactorily ascertained. The inner rows were of highly decorated piers, the exterior of enormous columns (iii. c. 37). If we understand as Bunsen (Die Basiliken Roms, s. 33) does, that the rows stretched across the front as well as along the sides, we may perhaps understand by interior (αἱ δὲ εἴσω τῶν ἐμπροσθεν) those which ran lengthwise, and by the exterior (αἱ ἐπὶ προσώπου τοῦ οἴκου) those which ran across the front.

The three doors by which it was entered looked to the east. Opposite to these doors was the hemispherical head region (κεφάλαιον τοῦ παντὸς ἡμισφαίριον) of the whole; i. e. the apse. This was decorated with twelve columns, on which were as many large silver vessels. The walls were built of hewn stone in regular courses, and covered internally with slabs of variegated marble. The roofs were of wood richly carved and gilt, and covered externally with lead (c. 36).

Before the entrances was an atrium. There was a first court with porticoes, before which were the entrances of the court; then on the middle of the market-place the propylaea or outer gateways, whose magnificence astonished all who saw them. Mr. Fergusson thinks that the so-called golden gateway on the east side of the Haram enclosure, is one of these propylaea.

Another building in the Holy Land, the church at Bethlehem, has strong claims to be considered as the work of this period (v. De Vogüé, Eglises de la Terre-Sainte, p. 46). It has an oblong atrium, a vestibule divided into three portions, the central of which alone opens into the church, double aisles with columns of the Corinthian order, and at the end opposite to the atrium the transverse-triapsal arrangement—i. e. one apse at the end of the building, and two others, one at each end of a transept-like space; beneath the centre of this space is the crypt of the Nativity.

As to the churches built in Rome during the reign of Constantine much uncertainty exists: the Liber Pontificalis attributes to him the erection (in several cases at the request of Sylvester, then bishop of Rome) of seven churches in that city, and describes at much length the ornaments and vessels of precious metals with which they were decorated. As, however, these accounts are for the most part not confirmed by other authorities, and contain many matters of an improbable character, they are not generally accepted as trustworthy. That the churches of St. John Lateran, of St. Peter, Sta. Croce in Gerusalemme, and Sta. Costanza, were erected or converted into churches at this time is however universally admitted. Of the first nothing of the period of Constantine is now visible and no distinct account of its size or plan has come down to us. Of St. Peter's, though it no longer exists, we have a full account and careful drawings and plans. It will be seen by the accompanying woodcut that it was of the same type as the churches which Eusebius describes, a five-aisled basilica ending in an apse, before the front iscina or font. The probability would appear that it was erected as a mausoleum for the Justinian family. This building is about 100 feet in diameter, the dome being about 40 feet high. If we admit Mr. Fergusson's theory that the building erected by order of Constantine over the sepulchre of our Saviour, it must be classed among memorial churches. This appropriation of the building has been the subject of much controversy, but in the present state of our knowledge the question can scarcely be satisfactorily decided. Whoever compares the engravings of the capitals in the church at Bethlehem, given by Count de Vogué (Eglises de la Terre Sainte, p. 52) with that of the capitals in 'Dome of the Rock' (The Holy Sepulchre, James Fergusson, p. 68), must see that both of one closely similar design and probably the same date, which there can be little doubt is the earlier part of the 4th century. 'Dome of the Rock' is an octagon 155 feet in diameter, with two aisles and a central dome, supported by four great piers, between two of which are three pillars supporting arches opening direct from their capitals; the space between these and the external wall is divided into two aisles by a screen of eight piers and four pillars—two pillars intervening between each pier. On the capitals of these pillars rest arches which carry a frieze and cornice; these arches carry arches above which was a second cornice. The whole building has undergone much restoration, and these capitals and friezes appear to be the best preserved portions of the original plan.

It seems clear that one of two hypotheses must be held; either that the existing remains are those of a building of the period of Constantine, erected on the spot and still retaining its original architectural arrangement, or that the remains of such a building have been removed to another site, and re-erected where we now find them.

Eusebius (De Vita Constant. iii. 50) tells us of an octagonal church erected by order of Constantine, of which no trace now remains. It was at Antioch; Eusebius describes it as a wonderful height, and surrounded by many numbers (οἶκους) and exedrae (ἐξέδρας), which could appear were entered from the galleries (συναγωγὰς) which both above and below ground encircled the church.

A church was also built by Constantine at Constantinople (Eusebius, Vita Constant. iv. 58, as a memorial church of the Apostles (μνημεῖον ἐπὶ μνήμῃ τῶν ἀποστόλων), and at the same time as a place for his own burial. This building was destroyed by Justinian, and its precise form is unknown; but that it was in some manner cruciform appears from the distich of Gregory of Nazianzus, in the poem of the dream of Anastasius:—

Σὺν τοῖς καὶ μεγάλαισιν ἔδοξ' ἡριστοῖς μαθηταῖς
Πλατυαῖς σταυροῦσι τετραχὺ περιμένειν.

It would seem that it stood in the centre of a large atrium, surrounded by porticoes. Bunsen (Die Basiliken des Christl. Roms, s. 36) thinks that in this edifice we may discern the germ of the Byzantine type of church.

It is a matter of some difficulty to distinguish between a sepulchral chapel or tomb and a memorial church; the one class in fact runs into the other, the distinction between them depending upon the object which the builder had in view; when he constructed a large edifice in which services were to be frequently held, still more if this building was intended to be the cathedral church of a bishop or the church of a district, the structure must be considered as a church, although it was also constructed in order to honour a martyr and to protect his tomb; when on the other hand it was of small size, and its primary object was to contain the tomb or tombs either of the builder or of some saint, it must be considered as only a sepulchral chapel although containing an altar, and although services were occasionally celebrated within it.

Several remarkable buildings of the 5th century belong to the first class. One of these is the church of St. George at Thessalonica, which consists of a circular nave 79 feet in diameter, covered by a dome, a chancel, and an apse; the walls of the nave are 20 feet thick, and in them are eight great recesses, two of which serve as entrances and one as a sort of vestibule to the chancel, the roof is covered with a magnificent series of mosaics. The cathedral at Bosrah, in the Hauran, the date of which is ascertained to be A.D. 512, has a plan with several points of similarity to that of St. George, particularly as regards the chancel.

In Italy some circular churches were constructed to carry, not domes, but wooden roofs; of these the most remarkable example is St. Stefano Rotondo, at Rome, built between A.D. 467 and A.D. 483. This church had originally two aisles and is of very large size, having a diameter of about 210 feet.

The church of St. Lorenzo at Milan, once the cathedral of the city, is very remarkable, as shewing an attempt to combine the circular with the square plan. Its real date has not been ascertained, but it is probably of the earlier part of the 5th century. The main building has lost all original character through repairs, but according to Hubsch the original walls exist to a height of nearly 40 feet, and the ground plan may therefore be accepted as original.

It will be observed that chapels are annexed to the church on the north, south, and east; that on the north is supposed by Hübsch to have been a vestibule, that now called St. Aquilino on the south is thought to have been constructed as a baptistery, that on the east in all probability was constructed to serve as a sepulchral chapel, a purpose to which, whether it was originally destined or not, the chapel of St. Aquilino was also applied as early as the beginning of the 5th century, if the sarcophagus said to have contained the body of Ataulphus (ob. A.D. 415) really did so, and if this was its original place of deposit.

Hübsch, however, gives it as his opinion, founded chiefly on the character of the brickwork, that the chapels are later in date than the main church.

In this instance we have the two classes, the memorial church and the sepulchral chapel, in juxtaposition. A few instances of the latter class remain to be mentioned, and firstly the two large circular edifices which stood on the north side of St. Peter's at Rome, one of which was afterwards called the church of St. Andrew, and the other having been the sepulchre of Honorius, or at least of his two wives (Besch. der Stadt Rom., II. i. 95), was afterwards dedicated to St. Petronilla.

St. Stefano Rotondo, Rome.

The building of the church of St. Andrew is attributed to Pope Symmachus (A.D. 498–514) on the authority of the Liv. Pontif., but the position and connexion of the buildings was such that it seems probable that both were built at the same time, which was apparently that of the Emperor Honorius. According to the plans which have come down to us they had no apses, but seven square-ended recesses in the thickness of the walls. They were of large size, about 100 feet in diameter.

A still existing building of the same class is the chapel at Ravenna, built by the Empress Galla Placidia (ob. 450), which, though more properly a sepulchral chapel than a church, cannot be wholly passed over here. It is in plan a Latin cross without an apse: from the intersection of the arms rises a tower enclosing a small dome. This example is of peculiar interest, as the earliest known instance of this plan which afterwards came to be so extensively used in Western Europe. Recent excavations have shown that the chapel was originally entered by a portico, which was in connexion with the atrium or narthex of the adjacent church of Sta. Croce. (De Rossi, Bull. di Archeol. Crist. 1866, p. 73.)

A further account of sepulchral chapels will be found under CHAPEL.

Although heathen temples were in consequence of their plans little suited for adaptation to Christian worship, they were occasionally during the earlier centuries of the Christian era, as well as in later times, converted to this purpose. One of the most remarkable early examples of this transformation is that of the temple of Venus at Aphrodisias, in Caria, where the original building was enclosed by a wall and an apse added at one end, the cella demolished, the columns of the posticum removed and placed in a line with the lateral columns, and a wall pierced with windows was raised on the lateral colonnades so as to form a clerestory. A church was thus formed of large size, about 200 feet long by 100 feet wide. Messrs. Texier and Pullan (Byz. Arch. p. 89) believe this transformation to have taken place between the periods of Constantine and of Theodosius.

The period of Justinian is one of special importance in the history of ecclesiastical architecture. From this time the basilican plan went, in the East, almost or entirely out of use, and a modification of the plan of St. Sophia was almost exclusively adopted, the modified plan being a quadrangular figure approaching a square with a dome covering the centre, and a large internal porch or narthex at the entrance. This plan, however, did not originate with the architect of St. Sophia, the germ of it is perhaps to be found in the domed oratories or Kalybés of Syria; from such a simple dome—a building like the cathedral of Ezra, in which the dome is surrounded by an aisle, and an apse added—is readily derived, this example dates from A.D. 510; and if to such a plan a narthex be added, we have the typical Byzantine plan, as in the church of SS. Sergius and Bacchus at Constantinople, built under Justinian, but somewhat earlier than St. Sophia. The peculiar feature of the latter church is the placing of the dome not upon piers and arches on every side, but upon semi-domes east and west, by which means a vast space, more than 200 feet long by 100 feet wide, totally unencumbered by piers or columns, was obtained. This construction has, however, never been copied in Christian churches, but it has served as a model for the mosques of Constantinople.

All the minuter peculiarities of construction and of detail, however, henceforward prevail in the East, to the exclusion of the Roman style, which previously was in use. In the West, examples of Byzantine character continue to be very rare. St. Vitale at Ravenna is perhaps the only prominent example, until a much later period. The church of St. Sophia is, however, in itself a monument of such importance as to require to be noticed in some detail.

It is a building of very considerable dimensions, covering about 70,000 square feet, exclusive of the portions of the atrium (or exo-narthex), the baptistery, and other annexed buildings.

From the exo-narthex, the principal or eso-rather, 205 feet in length internally, by 26 feet breadth, is entered. The principal mass of the building forms nearly a square 235 feet north and south, by 250 feet east and west, with an apse projecting on the east side. The central dome is 107 feet in diameter by 46 feet in height, and rises 180 feet from the floor. The semi-domes are of the same diameter. The aisles are spacious, but, in consequence of the exigencies of a constructional arrangement, are so divided as with ornaments in relief; but those now existing do not seem to be of the period of Justinian.

All the columns, capitals, &c., are of porphyry or marble. The floors and all other flat spaces are covered with marble slabs of the richest colours, the domes and curved surfaces with gold ground mosaics.

Little is known as regards the precise position of the various fixed appliances by which the church was fitted for divine worship. The altar form rather a series of chambers than continuous galleries. There is, it will be seen, but one apse, in front of which is a shallow chancel apse, covered by a barrel-vault. On the upper floor are chambers corresponding with those below, which furnished places for women.

The windows are filled with slabs of marble, pierced with square openings filled with thick pieces of cast glass. When the windows are large they are divided into three or six parts by columns and architraves. The doors are of bronze, is supposed to have stood in the chancel space or bema, in front of the apse; the iconostasis appears, according to Salzenberg, to have been placed at the western end of the bema, and to have been about 14 feet high. From the poem of Paul the Silentiary, we learn that it was of silver, had three doors, the central the largest, and 12 columns raised on a stylobate, and was adorned with figures (probably bust figures) of our Lord, the Virgin Mary, Prophets and Apostles, in discs or medallions. Whether these figures were in the sometimes, however, stucco painted was the cheaper substitute. When the building was, as was always the case at Rome, of brick, the same decoration, by means of marble slabs or of stucco, was, if not actually carried out, in all probability almost always projected for the whole exterior of the building. In only one case at Rome—that of the transept of S. Pietro in Vincoli, built A.D. 442—is the finish of the brickwork such as to lead to the conclusion that it was intended to remain uncovered.

The doors were of bronze adorned with sculptures in relief, and frequently gilt, or of wood, often richly inlaid or carved. Curtains of the richest stuffs, often of purple or scarlet, embroidered with gold, hung at the doors, to exclude the heat of summer or the cold of winter while the doors stood open.

In the interior the whole floor was covered either with tessellated pavements or with slabs of many-coloured marbles arranged in beautiful patterns. The aisles were separated from the nave by ranges of marble columns whose capitals supported either arches or horizontal architraves. The great width of the nave, in a first-class basilica frequently more than 80 feet, and the forest of columns on either hand (one of the colonnades often containing 24 or more columns) when there were double aisles, produced an architectural effect of great magnificence. The clerestory wall was pierced by numerous immense windows with arched heads, one of which was over each intercolumniation. These windows were no doubt divided by columns or pilasters and architraves, and the divisions fitted with slabs of marble pierced in a variety of patterns—these perforations were in many or most cases fitted with talc, alabaster, or other transparent or semi-transparent stones, or with glass either plain or coloured.

The roof was flat and of wood, where magnificence was sought it was richly adorned with carving and gilt. The semi-dome which covered the apse was covered with mosaic pictures, the subject being usually Christ, either seated or standing, with his apostles ranged on each hand. The earliest existing example of this arrangement is in the church of Sta. Pudenziana at Rome, which although it has been much injured and largely repaired, still shows so much goodness of style that it can hardly be attributed to a later date than the 4th century. Where a transept existed it was usually divided from the nave by an arch, the face of which fronting the nave was often also covered with mosaics; a colossal bust of Christ was often the central object of the picture, being placed over the crown of the arch, while on either side and below are represented the seven candlesticks, the symbols of the evangelists, and the twenty-four elders.

Details as to the arrangement of the fittings of churches will be found under the respective heads; it may be sufficient here to say that the apse was furnished with a bench following its circumference for the higher clergy, in the centre of which was a raised seat (cathedra) for the bishop; that the altar was usually placed on the chord of the apse at the top of a flight of steps, and parted off from the nave by railings (cancelli); below it was often a platform or space (soleas), and beyond this a quadrangular, usually oblong, enclosure (chorus, presbyterium;

the last perhaps improperly), in which the singers and readers were stationed. This enclosure was formed by railings or dwarf walls, and connected with these was the ambo or reading desk. At Rome, and probably elsewhere, a space on either side of the chorus was also railed in, that on the right being called 'senatorium,' and appropriated to senators or other men of rank, that on the left, called 'matroneum,' to women of the same degrees. Where a gallery, or, as we now say, a triforium existed, it was set apart for women, but this arrangement was not very common in the West.

Benches or other seats were probably provided in the chorus, the senatorium, and the matroneum, but the rest of the church was left altogether open and free. These seats were either of marble or of carved wood, in many instances gilded, the railings of the same materials or of bronze. Over the altar was a lofty and richly decorated canopy (ciborium), from the arches of which hung curtains of stuffs of the richest colours interwoven with gold. Like curtains often depended from the arches of the nave, and hung at the doors. Vases, crowns, and lamps of silver or of gold hung from the arches, or were placed upon the dwarf walls or partitions which separated the various divisions of the edifice.

According to the proposed plan, the history of the ecclesiastical architecture of the period which follows, viz. from the death of Justinian to that of Charlemagne, will be treated of under separate sections.

IV. The Period from the death of Justinian to the death of Charlemagne.—1. The western part of the territory of the Eastern Empire.—During the reign of the Emperor Justinian, churches were built on the basilican plan, as well as on one derived probably in part from such churches as that at Ezra, in central Syria, in part from the circular or polygonal churches which had been constructed throughout Christendom. Soon after the time of Justinian the basilican type was no longer followed, but a peculiar plan was adopted, that in which the building assumes a form approaching to a square, the central part being covered by a dome placed on a drum pierced with windows. The period which followed the death of Justinian was one of political trouble, and hence examples of the progress of Byzantine architecture during the latter part of the 6th and the 7th centuries are somewhat deficient. The church of St. Clement at Ancyra, however, probably belongs to this period, as the dome is raised on a low drum pierced with windows; in plan the church approximates to that of the later Greek churches. The church of St. Irene at Constantinople, which may probably date from the earlier half of the 8th century, shows a further advance, as the dome is there raised on a lofty drum pierced with windows; some features of the earlier plan are, however, preserved, as there is only one apse, and as its form is oblong. The church of St. Nicholas at Myra is perhaps more modern than either; it has a double narthex, three apses, a lesser on each side of the larger, and a dome raised on a drum in which are windows. If the remains of the iconostasis and ciborium shewn in plate lviii. of Texier and Pullan's Byzantine Architecture are those of the original construction, the whole space east of the dome was parted off from the bema. This church is of considerable dimensions, about 100 feet in extreme length by 60 wide in the eastern part, the narthecus extending in width to about 115 feet.

Another church of much interest, and probably of about the same date, is that which exists in ruins near the remains of the ancient Tralala in Lycia.

2. Armenia and the adjacent provinces.—The churches remaining in these countries have not as yet been studied with sufficient care and knowledge to allow very satisfactory conclusions to be formed as to the real dates of those now existing. The Persian invasions in the 5th and 6th centuries, and the Mahomedan conquest in the 7th, must have caused damage and destruction to a great portion of the older buildings; a high antiquity is nevertheless claimed for several churches, but how much of the existing building is really of early date, is very uncertain.

One of the earliest is apparently that at Ingour near Ani in Armenia, which Mr. Ferguson thinks may be referred to the 7th century. It bears an evident resemblance in style, though not much in plan, to some of the churches of the Hauran dating from the previous century.

triforium carried over the aisles and along the wall of the front. At S. Lorenzo the aisle roofs have been destroyed, but no doubt once existed, in other respects they do not differ from the earlier churches.

The church of SS. Vincenzo ed Anastasio alle tre Fontane, near Rome, founded 625-638 and rebuilt 772-795, is however very remarkable in an architectural point of view, as it is not constructed with columns taken from older buildings, but altogether of new material and with considerable originality.

In the early part of the 9th century three churches were built in Rome by Pope Paschal I. (817-824), Sta. Prassede, Sta. Cecilia, and Sta. Maria, in Domeneica. All still exist, and though badly injured by repairs and alterations, still present very much that is interesting and original. The first has a nave and aisles, a transept, and a single apse. The columns dividing the nave from the aisles are antique and support an entablature, the panges are broken by three oblong piers, which carry arches spanning the nave, but these, according to Hubsch, are not original, but inserted not very long after the construction of the building. The transept is entered from the nave by a triumphal arch, the front and soffit of which

88. Vincenzo ed Anastasio.

The church of St. Hripsime near Etchmiadzin is believed by Dr. Neale (Holy Eastern Church, i. 204) to date from the 6th century, and he considers its peculiar plan to have been the form followed in a large proportion of the Armenian and Georgian churches. The germ of the arrangement, however, exists in the cathedral of Bzrah in the Hauran of A.D. 512.

The two recesses in these Armenian churches which flank the apse in which the altar stood, were doubtless used for the prothesis and diaconicon, but to what use the other two were applied must be matter of conjecture.

The primatial church of Armenia, that of Etchmiadzin, has something of the same arrangement, but wants the western chamber. It was probably founded in 524, but underwent many alterations and reparations, one very important one in 705.

The church of Usunlar is said to have been erected between 718 and 726; its plan is rather Byzantine than distinctively Armenian.

3. Italy.—In Rome but few important works were undertaken during the 6th, 7th, or 8th centuries, the rebuilding of S. Lorenzo fuori le Mura (578-590) (the present choir), and of S. Agnese (625-638) were among the most considerable undertakings. These buildings are alike in one respect, viz. that they have a gallery or are covered with mosaics, as are also the apse and the wall on each side of it. All these were placed there by Pope Paschal, and are most valuable monuments of the state of art of his period.

Below the raised tribune is a "confessio"—a vault under the high altar. The west end of the transept (the church standing nearly north and south) was at an early time parted off by a wall, and on this a low tower has been raised. The part thus walled off is of peculiar interest, as perhaps no portion of a church of so early a date remains in so unaltered a state. The walls are covered with remains of frescoes which seem to be coeval with the mosaics, and the windows retain the pierced slabs of marble, the apertures of which still contain fragments of the laminae of tale through which light was admitted.

The chapel of S. Zeno, attached to the east side of the nave, has been noticed under CHAPL. The doorway leading into it is of great interest to the architectural antiquary, as it shows that in the beginning of the 9th century the prevalent style of ornament was that formed by knots or platted patterns of the same character as those in use in England and elsewhere between A.D. 700 and A.D. 1000. The execution is feeble, scratchy, and irregular.

Sta. Cecilia has been greatly altered, but retains very interesting mosaics, also the work of Pope Paschal. The distribution and subjects are much the same as those at Sta. Prassede.

The Roman churches of this date, however inferior in style to those of the earlier period, must have presented an appearance of equal splendour; mosaic and precious marbles were not spared, nor doubtless gilded roofs. Doors were of bronze, or even of more costly materials, for Honorius I. is said in the Lb. Pontif. to have covered the doors of the Vatican basilica with silver weighing 975 lbs.

Examples of churches of the period under consideration, with well-ascertained dates, are not so readily to be found in other parts of Italy as in Rome; but a few buildings exist which can be assigned on historical data to this period, the character of which is quite in accordance with that of those of other countries whose date can be ascertained. Such are the Duomo Vecchio and Sta. Giulia at Brescia, and SS. Apostoli at Florence. The first of these is by some assigned to the latter part of the 7th century, by others, with greater probability, to about A.D. 774; it is a large circular church about 125 feet in diameter, covered by a dome of 85 feet internal diameter; it is extremely plain, having no shafts or columns, but piers carrying square-edged arches springing from very simply moulded impost; the whole is roughly and irregularly built.

Sta. Giulia forms part of a convent founded by Desiderius, King of the Lombards (757-773) and is a basilican church.

SS. Apostoli at Florence is believed on respectable authority to have been dedicated in the presence of Charles the Great; it is a small basilican church with antique columns, probably brought from Fiesole.

The Duomo of Torcello, near Venice, is believed to have been originally built in the 7th century, but largely repaired or rebuilt in A.D. 1000. It is on the basilican plan, with ranges of columns dividing the nave from the aisles; it is particularly interesting, as preserving in a more perfect state than elsewhere the internal arrangement of the apse, the bishop's cathedra being placed against the central point of the curve at the top of a flight of steps, on either side of which are six concentric ranges of steps for the presbyters; the altar is placed on a platform in front, and a screen divides the presbytery or chorus from the nave. Under the apse is a small crypt. In front of the church are the traces of a baptistery, square externally, octagonal within. The apse is flanked by two minor apses, which may probably date from the rebuilding. This church has much resemblance to the cathedral of Parenzo in Istria. Close to its west front stands the small church of Sta. Fosca, which by some is believed to be of the same date as the Duomo, by others is referred to the 9th or 10th century. S. Giovanni in Fonte, the baptistery of the Cathedral of Verona, though much altered and repaired, probably dates from a period not later than the 9th century; it is a small building with nave, aisles, and apse.

4. France, Germany, and Switzerland.—Though many and large churches were constructed in the opulent cities of the Roman provinces of Gallia during the period of Roman occupation, nothing has come down to our time except a few fragments. The description given by Sidonius Apollinaris (Epist. xii.) of the gilded roof, the glass mosaic of the walls, the variously coloured marbles, and the stony wood of columns seems to shew that in their pristine glory the churches of Lyons or of "opulent Vienna" were little inferior in splendour to those of the imperial city.

Churches continued to be constructed under the rule of the Teutonic conquerors, although doubtless of much diminished magnificence. Gregory of Tours (Hist. Franc. ii. 14) describes the basilica built by Perpetuus at Tours, in honour of Eustochius, in the following words: "Habet in longum pedes centum sexaginta, in latum sexaginta; habet in altum usque ad cameram pedes quadringenta quinque, fenestras in altario triginti duas, in capso viginti; ostia octa, tria in altario, quinque in capso."

Hübner (Alt-Christ. Kirchen, pl. xlviii. figs. 6 and 7) has made a conjectural plan and section of this church, believing it to have been planned as parallel-triapsal.

The same historian (il. 16) describes the church built by St. Namatius at Clermont, as 150 feet long, 60 feet broad, and 50 feet high, with a round apse, and aisles on each side. It had, he says, 42 windows, 70 columns, and 8 doors. The walls of the altarium were adorned with "Opus sarasurium," i.e. sectile work, of various marbles.

At Perigneux are said (J. H. Parker, Archæologia, xxxvii. 248) to be remains of a church of this period, remarkable as having barrel vaults carried on arches transversely across the aisles. At Beauvais, attached to the cathedral, is a portion, no doubt the nave and aisles, of a much earlier church known as the Basse Oeuvre; it closely resembles in character the buildings in Italy, such as SS. Vincenzo ed Anastasio near Rome, which are believed to date from the 7th or 8th centuries; but it may even be older, as it is simply a building Roman in style, and so plain as to give none of that assistance towards the formation of an opinion as to the date which mouldings or ornament afford. The great size of the windows is, however, perhaps, an indication of early date. Several other smaller examples of like character are said to exist within the diocese of Beauvais.

In the baptistery at Poitiers we have an example of a somewhat more ambitious attempt at classical architecture; but the manner is which the ornamental pieces are put together denotes an utter barbarism and want of architectural knowledge or taste.

Somewhat akin to this building are some churches not far from the Loire, as St. Genesès near Poitiers, Savenières in Anjou, &c.; both these shew a reminiscence of Roman methods of building, and the former has much decoration by triangular pediments and a sort of mosaic in brickwork, probably a variety of the opus saracenum of Gregory of Tours. The buildings of this class are ascribed by the French antiquaries with much probability to the period from the 6th to the 8th century.

In the valley of the Rhone and the adjacent territories, where are abundance of remains of Roman architecture and plenty of excellent and durable freestone, the classical models were so well copied for several centuries that it is matter of great doubt to what date many buildings should be assigned. One very characteristic example is work, but the imposts generally are of the rudest kind, though one or two shew mouldings of a somewhat complicated character and apparently properly cut, whether these are the work of a later time or not is not clear. Beneath the central tower is a sort of cupola resting on pendentives, and pierced in the centre with a large orifice.

When, however, the influence of Charles the Great, whose regard for architecture is well known, began to make itself felt, we find a marked improvement in architecture; besides the most remarkable monument of his reign, the minster of Aix-la-Chapelle, we have several other churches erected either under him or his immediate successors, which enable us to form a definite conception of the style of the period.

Before these are described one building of very anomalous character should however be mentioned, this is the gateway at Lorsch, not far from Worms. It is a two-storied parallelogram, the porch of the cathedral of Avignon, which has all the character of a building of the lower empire, but in Mr. Fergusson's opinion is not older than the Carolingian era. The same ornaments are found on this porch and in the interior of the church, and it would therefore seem that the whole building is of about the same date.

In the Jura, not far from Orbe, at the convent of Romain-motier, a church was dedicated in A.D. 753 by Pope Stephen II., and the nave, transepts, and tower now existing, are believed to be those of the original structure. The two-storied narthex Mr. Fergusson thinks may be a century or two, but Blavignac (Hist de l'Architecture Sacree, &c.) only a little later. The columns of the nave are circular masses, only three diameters in height, corbelled out square at the top, the bases quadrangular blocks. The arches have a sunk face, but no ornament or moulding. Some shafts in the eastern part of the church have capitals rudely imitating Roman the lower storey pierced with three large archways, and was no doubt the gateway leading into the atrium of the church of the monastery, of which class of buildings this is perhaps the only existing example (at least in the west), of an early date.

The most remarkable and most authentic work of the period in Germany or France is the minster of Aix-la-Chapelle, the original character of which, though hidden by repairs and mistaken attempts at decoration, can still be satisfactorily ascertained: it was commenced in 796, and dedicated in 804; it is externally a polygon of sixteen sides, to the west is attached a tower-like building, flanked by two circular towers containing staircases. What the original arrangement of the east end was is unfortunately unknown, as in the 14th century it was replaced by a new choir. The building is about 105 feet, the dome 47 feet 6 inches in diameter, and the latter rises about 100 feet above the floor.

In the interior are eight compound piers, made up of rectangular figures and without shafts, which support plain round arches; the triforium is very lofty, and the arches opening from this into the central space have screens of columns in two stories, the lower carrying arches while the upper run up to the arch which spans the openings. Above there are eight round-headed windows, and the whole is covered by an octagonal dome. The columns of the triforium are antique, and so it would appear were their capitals; the bases seem to have been made for the building, and according to Kugler (Gesch. der Baukunst, i. 408) are very shapeless. The best preserved part of the interior is the belfry over the porch; this is covered with a plain waggon vault, and shews plain rectangular piers with moulded bases, and imposts carrying equally plain arches. The severely simple character of the building is very well seen in this chamber, which is on a level with and originally opened into the triforium. The dome was once covered with mosaic, which has wholly disappeared; but Ciampini (Vet. Mon. ii. 41) has engraved a part of it, three of the eight segments of which it was composed. In the central of these is a colossal figure of Christ seated on a throne, surrounded by concentric rings of colour representing the rainbow, the ground on which this figure was placed was golden with red stars, below are seven of the twenty-four elders of the Apocalypse. The simple grandeur of this picture must have harmonized well with the whole character of the building. The triforium would seem to have been paved with mosaic and other pavements brought from Ravenna or Rome: two fragments still remain, one of black and white tesserae, the other of sectile work, in marble slabs of various colours. The fronts of the openings from the triforium to the central space are protected by cancelli of bronze, doubtless also brought from Ravenna or Rome; they are of several patterns, some of classical Roman character, others Byzantine.

A vault is said to exist beneath the centre of the church, and to have served as the burial-place of the great emperor; but it is not accessible, and nothing seems to be known as to its character. The western doors are of bronze.

The exterior is very plain, the only ornament being some pilasters at the angles of the drum of the dome; these have capitals of classical character, but in their wasted state it would be difficult to decide whether they are really antique or copies of antique work.

A document of the utmost value as affording information as to the arrangements of a large conventual church, is the plan preserved in the public library of St. Gall, and first published by Mabillon (Ann. Ben. Ord.). It appears to have been sent to Abbot Gospertus, who began to rebuild the church and monastery in A.D. 829, and very probably was prepared by Eginhard, who was prefect of the royal buildings under Charles the Great. The annexed cut represents that part which contains the church and its appendages.

The plan is without scale, and little or no reliance can be placed on the proportional size of the parts, as Professor Willis has observed; the church is said, in legends written upon it, to be 200 feet long and 80 feet broad; but in the plan, if we assume the length to be 200 feet, the breadth would be only 56 feet. The drawing must no doubt be considered rather as a scheme for a great monastery than as a plan to be carried out by an architect; its peculiarities will be readily seen; first among these are the apses at each end, an arrangement afterwards common in Germany, but of which we have no earlier instance. The circular towers are also remarkable. At the east end the drawing is confused by the attempt to shew both the crypt and the choir; the space marked by slanting lines bears in the original the legend "involuto arcum," and no doubt is meant to represent an arched passage, from whence proceeds a short passage to the confession.

The church of Granson, near the lake of Neuchâtel, according to Mr. Fergusson, is of the Carolingian era, though others are disposed to place it in the 11th century.

In France the most important examples of the Carolingian period seem to be the nave of the church of Mortier en Der, near Vassy, which exhibits a style very nearly akin to that of the Minster of Aix-la-Chapelle, and the remains of the church of St. Martin at Angers. This last was founded some years before 819, as the Empress Hermengarde, who died in that year was the foundress, and was interred within it. It consisted of a nave and aisles, a central tower, and a rather long transept; the eastern part having been replaced by a choir of the 12th century. The piers separating the nave from the aisles are oblong, but chamfered at the angles, and carry plain unmoulded arches of rectangular section; there is no triforium, but a clerestory of windows of rather long proportion. The tower has a dome which originally sprang from the capitals of four massive circular pillars, which, as they are engaged in the piers which carry the tower, shew only the fourth of a circle. The capitals have some shallow carving, chiefly patterns of plaited work. In several parts of the church two or three courses of flat bricks are introduced between the courses of stonework.

The church of Germigny-sur-Loire is a building of very remarkable character, and in it, incised on the abaci of the two eastern capitals of the tower piers, is an inscription recording its dedication in 806. The plan, it will be seen, is peculiar, having a tower in the middle of a square, with an apse projecting from three of the faces, and two small apses flanking the eastern apse. The piers are square, and have imposts of blocks and some knotwork in shallow relief. Among the most peculiar features are the small shafts attached to the piers at the entrance of the eastern apse. These recall some of the details of Romain-motier, as the imposts do those of St. Martin at Angers.

5. Spain.—As in Gaul, little or nothing remains in Spain of the churches built before the invasion of the barbarians; and those which the latter constructed were destroyed by the Arabs. Some capitals and fragments, probably of enclosures of 'chori cantorum,' exist at Cordova ('Monumentos Arquitectónicos de España'), and some other fragments and capitals have been found at Toledo on the sites of the basilicas of St. Leocadia, built A.D. 600, and of St. Gines, said to date from the 8th century ('El arte Latino—Bizantino en España,' by Don José Amador de los Rios). At Venta de Baños, near Palencia, the church built by Reccesvinthus in A.D. 661, is stated to remain in a tolerably complete state.

The only other churches which can be supposed to date from a period even as early as the 9th century which have as yet been noticed, are a few in the Asturias, not far from Oviedo.

These, however, present many remarkable peculiarities of plan, having square ended chancels, and chapels or apartments attached to their sides. One of the group, Sta. Maria de Naranco is stated to have been built cir. 848, and as the others are somewhat plainer and ruder in style they are more probably earlier than later. The most remarkable is that of the Ermita de Sta. Christina, near la Pola de Lena, which retains the original partition separating the choir from the nave: the choir is raised above the nave, and the altar recess above the choir, these as well as the western part of the church are vaulted over, so that there are chambers above them. The central space is covered by a waggon vault. The circular panels in the upper part of the choir screen are pierced, the central panel below carved with ornament, having much affinity with that to be seen on the crowns of the 7th century found at Fuente de Guarrazeo, near Toledo.

S. Salvador de Valdedios, near Villaviciosa, has aisles, but the same system of vaulting over both ends of the church exists, and as in the others there are small chambers right and left on entering by the western door. One of these probably served as a baptistry, as is the case at Sta. Maria de Naranco. A porch and other chambers are attached to the south side, and may have served as dwellings for priests or attendants on the church. This has been attributed to A.D. 892.

Sta. Maria de Naranco is nearly on the same plan, and appears to have always been a parish church.

The upper chambers in all these churches are open to the church, not closed as in Ireland, and capable of being used as dwelling places.

These buildings are all small, Sta. Cristina being about 50 feet long, Sta. Maria de Naranco about 70, but have a good deal of ornament, and exhibit a peculiarity of style, the origin of which cannot be traced to any other country, and which was probably developed from the earlier imitations of Roman work. A clue to the reasons for the peculiarity of plan seems altogether wanting. The square end of the chancel may perhaps be thought to indicate some Irish influence as that country is the only one where this form is anything but the rarest exception.

Although, as has been said, the churches of the earlier period have disappeared, Spain has preserved in a remarkable manner some of the traditions of the arrangement of churches in the earlier periods; thus the 'coro,' instead of beginning to the east of the transepts, is, like the "chorus cantorum" of the early basilicas, extended into the nave, and the central lantern tower is called the 'ciborio,' in memory, doubtless, of a time when it served as the 'ciborium' of the high altar, now placed in the elongated choir, or, as it is called by the Spaniards, 'capilla mayor.' Probably these traditions were handed down through a chain of numerous links, the earlier of which have perished.

6. Ireland.—We find here a great number of very small churches very roughly built, with very little attempt at any decoration, frequently lighted only by one very small window, but constructed usually with extremely large stones, and not unfrequently built with that material exclusively, the roof being formed by horizontal courses, each brought forward until they met at the top.

Such are the churches or chapels of Tempull Ceannanach, on the middle island of the bay of Galway (Petrie, Eccl. Arch. of Ireland, p. 189), of St. Mac Dara on the island of Cruach Mhic Dara, off the coast of Connemara (id. p. 190), of Ratass, Co. Kerry (id. p. 169), of Fore, Co. Westmeath (id. p. 174), and many others. The two first of these churches form single apartments without any division into nave and chancel, and measure, the first 16 feet 6 inches, by 12 feet 6 inches internally; the second 15 feet by 11 inches; both are roofed with stone in the manner described. The two other churches are in a less complete state, but their doorways are remarkable for their square heads, and the immense size of the stones of which they are constructed; in that of Ratass the lintel is 7 feet 6 inches long, 2 feet high, and extends through the whole thickness of the wall. There appears in this doorway an evident intention of imitating the architecture of a Greek or Roman building. In that of Fore the lintel is 6 feet long, 2 feet high, and 3 feet deep, and is sculptured with a cross within a circle, on a projecting tablet. Both these churches are attributed by Mr. Petrie to the 6th or 7th centuries. It is a question of much interest whence the builders of these churches derived their ideas of architecture, these buildings resembling in no respect any contemporaneous structures in England, France, or Italy. Improbable as the suggestion may at first sight appear, it would seem that it was Central Syria which furnished the models; that country abounds with churches and monasteries constructed between the 3rd and 7th centuries in a style founded upon the Roman architecture of the time, but with many peculiarities both of construction and of detail. Among the former of these is the use of very large stones, and the practice of roofing small buildings by advancing each course somewhat nearer the centre than that below; examples of both will be found in plenty in Count Melchior de Vogue's Syrie Centrale. Although in these buildings arched doorways are the most common, those formed precisely in the same manner as the Irish examples, with one large block for a lintel, are frequently found; and one of these (Syrie Centrale, p. 99, fig. 4), may almost pass for the original of which the lintel at Fore is the rough copy. The Irish buildings have far more the appearance of such copies of the products of a cultivated school of architecture as might be achieved by native workmen under the direction of immigrants, bringing with them recollections, rather than accurate knowledge of the edifices they had left behind, than that of the first rude essays of an uncivilised race.

seems to have been entirely depopulated about that period. It at that time contained many monasteries and many monks, and it is quite possible that among the numerous foreigners who sought an asylum in Ireland at that period may have been Syrian monks. In the litany of St. Aengus, written, it is believed, in the year 799 (Petrie, p. 137), among the scores, and even hundreds, of strangers of various nations, mention is made of seven Egyptian monks buried in Disert Ulidh. The greater part of these immigrants are in the litany simply called "peregrini," without indication of nationality. Dr. Petrie (p. 127), however, seems to think the peculiarities of construction of these early buildings are due to the colonisation of the country by "the Firbolg and Tuatha de Danann tribes, which our historians bring hither from Greece at a very remote period; which tribes," he says, "were accustomed to build, not only their fortresses, but even their dome-roofed houses and sepulchres, of stone without cement, and in the style now usually called Cyclopean and Pelasgic."

Besides the small churches which have been mentioned above, larger structures were also erected in Ireland at an early date. The cathedral church of Armagh, whether that erected in the time of St. Patrick or of a later date, would appear in the 9th century to have been 140 feet in length (Petrie, p. 157). The more usual length of a church of the first class would, however, appear to have been 60 feet; this dimension having, according to the tripartite life of St. Patrick, been prescribed by the saint for the Domnach Mor (Great Church), near Teltown, in Meath, appears to have been invested with a sort of sacred character; and it is worth notice that the church at Glastonbury, founded according to tradition by a St. Patrick, but undoubtedly by missionaries from Ireland, was 60 feet long, by 26 feet broad; it seems to have been of wood.

These larger churches had usually a chancel—in plan a parallelogram—attached to the larger oblong which formed the nave.

Two peculiarities mark the ecclesiastical architecture of Ireland, one, that the altar end is invariably rectangular, the other that the towers found near the early churches are always circular. Perhaps the most probable explanation of the former is that the form was originally used as that most suitable for a very small oratory, and perpetuated in consequence of the extraordinary veneration which the Irish have always entertained for anything connected with their early saints. [For the round tower see TOWER.]

7. Scotland.—Irish ecclesiastics founded the celebrated monastery of Iona, and spread Christianity through the isles and mainland of Scotland, but very few buildings which can be referred to the period under consideration have been observed. The most remarkable would seem to be the church at Eglishay in Orkney, which bears a close resemblance to one of the early Irish churches, and is specially remarkable as having a round tower attached to it. The nave is 30 ft. by 16 ft., the chancel 11 ft. by 9 ft. 7 in., the latter is covered by a plain semi-circular vault, over which was a chamber constructed between it and the external covering of stone. The nave also is stated to have had a stone roof. The tower is entered by a door in the west wall of the nave; the chancel arch is described as of a horse-shoe form, but this may probably be occasioned by a settlement of the work. The windows are few and small, the doorways plain, round-headed arches. As in the Irish islands there were numerous oratories scattered over Orkney and Shetland; the parish of Yell in the latter is said (Hibbert's Scotland, p. 530) to have contained twenty chapels. The churches constructed by the Christian Picts were probably either of wood or of earth, which is the reason of the entire absence of any buildings within their territory which can be assigned to a period before A.D. 800, it is the more remarkable as the numerous sculptured monuments show that the people who dwelt within the limits of the Pictish kingdom could carve stone with extraordinary skill for the period.

8. England.—Though the Christians of Britain must undoubtedly have possessed churches of considerable size before the occupation of the country by the Saxons, Jutes, and Angles, no certain remains of such buildings have as yet been met with.

The historians of Canterbury assert that Ethelbert gave to St. Augustine an existing church in that city (Willis' Arch. Hist. of Christ Church, Canterbury, pp. 20, 30) which became the cathedral. Bede mentions the church of St. Martin as an ancient church given in like manner, some portions of wall in the latter have been thought to have formed part of the ancient church. Of the Saxon cathedral nothing remains.

Three influences it will be seen contributed in unequal degrees according to circumstances and locality, to form or to modify ecclesiastical architecture in England; viz. 1, that of Roman architecture either as derived from buildings still existing in the country, or from designs imported by ecclesiastics and other church builders; 2, that of the Irish missionaries; 3, that of the native school of timber architecture. The first of these we may trace in the plans, in the style of some churches, and in the frequent assertion that a church was constructed "opere Romanorum;" the second, perhaps, in the preference of a rectangular east end over an apsidal, which last, as we find it all but universal in England in the 12th century and common in the 13th, was probably the prevalent plan in earlier centuries; the third, in construction evidently copied from wooden buildings, and in the fact that the baluster shafts, which more than any other feature characterize the ante-Norman style, were turned in a lathe as if they had been wood. It seems probable that the Roman and the native style were concurrent, for we find the two mixed together, as in the curious doorway at Monkwearmouth which there seems to be ground to believe is part of the church built by Benedict Biscop, A.D. 671. Here we have an arch and impost which are evident imitations of Roman work, supported by coupled balusters, and an excessively exaggerated base carved with interlacing ornaments or snakes by a hand which no doubt was accustomed to execute similar work in wood.

The existing remains of English churches, dating between 600 and 800, are unfortunately, with very rare exceptions, only fragments. These scanty remains, assisted and illustrated by what contemporary or somewhat later writers have told us, will however enable us to form tolerably clear ideas as to the character of the churches which were built in the above-mentioned period.

Of the metropolitan cathedral of Canterbury we have a detailed account, written by Edmer the Chanter, in which he describes the edifice as it existed before the fire of 1067. The annexed plan is copied from that drawn up by Professor Willis (Hist. of C.A. Canterbury) from Edmer's description. The church, Edmer says, was built "Romanorum opere et ex quadam parte ad imitationem ecclesie beati apostolorum principis Petri," meaning of course the great Vatican basilica. The western apse was probably added by Archbishop Odo about A.D. 950.

Of another church of the larger class we have some important remains. This is that of Stow, in Lincolnshire, where a bishopric was founded in A.D. 678. The church there is cruciform, measuring 150 ft. from east to west, with a breadth of 27 ft. in the nave and 24 ft. in the chancel; the transept is 90 ft. from north to south by 23 ft. wide; the side walls are about 35 ft. high. It has been shown that the transept is evidently the work of two periods, the wall up to a certain height having all the appearance of having suffered from fire, while that above shows no trace of such damage. There is ground for believing that in 870 the church was burnt by the Danes, and that it was extensively repaired between 1034 and 1050 (v. Rev. G. Atkinson, On the Restorations in Progress at Stow Church, in Reports and Papers of the Architectural Societies of Northants, York, and Lincoln, i. 315; and the same writer in v. 23 of the same publication, On Saxon Architecture), the existing chancel being added in the early part of the next century.

Another church, that of Brixworth, in Northamptonshire, has strong claims to be considered to date from the same period, for Leland tells us, on the authority of Hugo, a monk of Peterborough, that Lanulphus, abbot of Peterborough, about 890, founded a monastery there, and the existing edifice may be reasonably supposed to be the original church. The repairs which were finished in 1865 enabled the ground plan of the church to be correctly ascertained, and it will be seen to be somewhat peculiar, consisting of a square tower, the lower part of which forms a porch at the west end, with a chamber on each side opening into the porch and also into the aisles, a nave and two aisles with chambers at their east ends, a short chancel without aisles, and an apse surrounded by a corridor or crypt entered by steps from the chancel. The piers are oblong masses; the arches, which spring from square imposts, are of Roman bricks in two courses and wholly without ornament; over each pier is a rather small clerestory window with arched head, also turned in Roman bricks. Attached to the west side of the tower is a circular stair turret of different and less careful work, and therefore probably a later addition. The bases of piers which have been found show that at the west end of the chancel were probably three arches, through which it was entered from the nave.

Another church still exists in a state so far complete that there can be no doubt as to its original plan, but there is no historical evidence as to its date, and its architectural character is such as scarcely to warrant a decisive opinion. This is the church in the castle of Dover, which, in consequence of recent repairs, can be studied more satisfactorily than was previously the case. A short account of it was published by the Rev. John Puckle in 1864, from which the ground plan is taken; from this it will be seen that it is a cruciform church, with a tower between the nave and chancel.

The churches described are undoubtedly examples of "opus Romanum." Some others which have been destroyed were, doubtless, of like character, and as the contemporary or later descriptions contain points of interest, it will be well to cite them. The most remarkable is that of the church built by St. Wilfrid, at Hexham, about 673, written by his disciple Stephen Eddius (Vita S. Wilfridi, ap. Mabillon, A.A. SS. O. S. Ben. sæc. iv., pt. i., p. 646), running as follows: "cujus profunditatem in terra cum domibus mirificis politis lapidibus fundatam, et super terram multiplicem domum columnis variis et porticibus multis suffultam, mirabilique longitudine et altitudine, murorum ornatam, et variis linearum suarum viarum, aliquando sursum, aliquando deorsum, per cochleas circumductam, non est meae parvitatibus hoc sermone explicare." Richard, the prior of Hexham, in the 12th century, describes it (Twyssden's Scriptores Decem,

p. 290) as a noble building of hewn stone, with crypts beneath, and walls rising to a great height.

Unfortunately, however, the church was not in existence at the time the prior wrote, having been burnt by the Danes, in 875, but his testimony is not to be altogether disregarded, particularly as his mention of crypts and subterraneous oratories and winding passages is confirmed by the still existing crypt, a plan of which will be found under CHAPEL, p. 344.

If, however, the church had three stories and columns, some square, some of various forms, it must have been in advance of any building now existing of as early a date, and it seems probable that in his zeal for the glory of St. Wilfrid, the prior somewhat exaggerated the architectural splendour of the building.

Of the church built at Ripon by the same prelate, Eddius tells us "in Hrypis basilicam polito lapide a fundamentis in terra usque ad summum sedificatam, variis columnis et porticibus suffultam, in altum erexit" (Mabillon, A.A. SS. Ben. saec. iv. pt. 2, p. 563).

About the same time Benedict Biscop built (A.D. 671) a monastery at Monkwearmouth, the doorway of the church of which has been already commented on, and Bede (Hist. Abbatum Wearmouth. c. 5) gives some very interesting notices of his proceedings. He went, we are told, into Gaul, and brought from thence "caementarios qui lapideam sibi ecclesiam juxta Romanorum, quem semper amabat, morem facerent," and afterwards sent to the same country for makers of glass to glaze the windows of his church. At a later time he went to Rome, and brought thence pictures of the Virgin Mary and the twelve apostles, "quibus mediam ejusdem ecclesiae testudinem ducto a pariete ad parietem tabulato praecingeret, imagines evangelicae historiae quibus australem ecclesiae parietem decoraret, imagines visionum Apocalypsis beati Johannis quibus septentrionalem aequae parietem ornaret." As it appears from this passage that there was a nave with aisles, the north and south walls were probably the ends of the transept, and the church was therefore perhaps cruciform. That in the 7th century the founders of churches in England strove to emulate the splendour of the Continental churches, we may learn from the verses of Aldhelm (pp. 116, 117, ed. Giles) on the church built by Bugge, daughter of Kentwin:—

"Praeclara mole moellum
Bugge construxit supplex vernacula Christi,
Quae fulgent arae his aeno nomine sacrae,
Insper spem sibi consecrat Virginis aram.

Aurea contortis flavescent pallia filis,
Quae sunt altaris acri velamina pulcra,
Aureis atque calix gemmis fulvecit opertus.
Ut coelum rutilat stellis ardentibus aptum,
Sic lata argento constat fabricata palata.
Hic cruce ex auro fulgescit lamina fulvo,
Argentisque simul gemmis ornata metalla;
Hic quoque thuribulum capitella undique cinctum
Pendet de summo fumosa foramina pendens,
De quibus ambrosiam spirabant thura Sabaea, Quando sacerdotes missas offerre jubentur."

The influence of the Irish missionaries upon church architecture in England is perhaps rather to be inferred than proved from existing examples; carrying, as they did, their principles of asceticism even into their churches their rude and humble chapels offered no models which could compete with those supplied by the architects brought from Gaul or Italy who built in the manner of the Romans; but when we call to mind how large an extent of country they occupied, and more or less Christianized, and in what great veneration they were held, it is difficult to believe that the peculiarities of their ecclesiastical architecture were wholly without influence upon that of England. But for the eventual triumph of the Roman system over theirs, more tangible proofs of this would no doubt have existed, but it is possible that the preference of a square over an apsidal termination, which is so strongly shown in English churches from the 12th century downwards, is really due to the habit of imitating the forms of the oratories which St. Cuthbert, St. Aidan, or their disciples, may have constructed. That the influence of the Irish school upon ornamentation was very great, there can be no doubt, as it is amply proved by existing manuscripts, as the Gospels of Lindisfarne, written about A.D. 710. That these patterns of interlacing ribbons and animals were copied in stone may be observed in the doorway of Monkwearmouth, and on many crosses and other monuments of the period.

No existing example shows what a large church would have been if constructed without Roman influence, but the little oratories of Cornwall and that at Ebb's Nook, in Northumberland (c. CHAPEL), will serve to show what was the character of their lesser religious buildings.

The third influence, that of an existing school of timber architecture, made itself felt more in the smaller class of churches than in the larger, and though very many portions of churches which exhibit marks of it exist, no entire church of any early date which manifests it has remained. The chief peculiarity is the use of narrow stones placed upright, dividing the wall into sections, exactly in the same manner as timber quartering. No better example of this can be found than the tower of the church of Earls Barton, in Northamptonshire; but it is difficult to find any safe ground for assigning a date to this building, as it is certain that the style was continued into the 11th century. Another peculiarity is the use of the baluster as a shaft, and it has been supposed that this was copied from some Roman example; but the facts that these balusters were turned in a lathe, that they were in use at a very early date, and in every part of England, all seem to point to their having originated in an indigenous style of wooden architecture.

Many churches were constructed entirely of wood. Bede (Hist. Eccl. iii. 25) tells us that Finian, who came from Iona, built at Lindisfarne a church "episcopali sede congruam, quam tamen more Scottorum non de lapide sed de robore secto totam composuit atque harundine texti;" and according to an Irish writer of the 11th century, Conchubean (Vit. S. Modurnae, A.A. SS. Boff. 8, Jul. 11), the Scots were accustomed to build with boards "tabulis dedolatis," or, as we may perhaps understand the passage, with timbers not left in the round, but smoothed with the adze. In this way, though no doubt at a much later date, the church at Greenstead, in Essex, was constructed, the slabs of oak left after a plank had been sawn out of the middle having been smoothed on the inside with the adze, and placed upright with the curved portion outwards, side by side, so as to form a wall. Very many such structures, no doubt, were erected in districts where wood was plentiful and stone scarce. [A. N.]

CHURCH-BOOKS (Libri Ecclesiastici). Under this name the following classes of books are understood to be included:—

1. Such works as were necessary for the performance of the sacred offices, whether of the altar, the baptistery, or the choir [LITURGICAL BOOKS].

2. Certain pastoral letters of venerable bishops, canons of councils, and acts of martyrs, which were occasionally read in public. For instance, we have the testimony of Dionysius of Corinth in Eusebius (H. E. iv. 23, § 11) that the epistle of Clement to the Corinthians was preserved and publicly read in the Corinthian Church [CANONICAL BOOKS]. The so-called Canons and Constitutions of the Apostles were probably regarded as libri ecclesiastici in many churches. On the use of acts of martyrs, see Ruinart, Acta Sincera, pref. § 5.

3. Not unfrequently in ancient times the term church-books included all books contained in the library of a church [LIBRARY].

4. In some cases the church-registers, whether of the baptized or of the dead [DIPTYCHS], seem to be included under the term libri ecclesiastici. [C.]

CHURCHES, MAINTENANCE OF (Fabrica Ecclesiarum). The funds for the maintenance of the fabric of a church are, and have been from ancient times, derived from two sources,—estates appropriated to that purpose and voluntary offerings. As early as the 5th century we find ordinances, that a definite proportion of the general income of a church should be set apart for the maintenance and repair of the fabric. According to decrees of Pope Simplicius, A.D. 475 (Ep. iii. in Binusius, Concilia, iii. 582), and Pope Gelasius, A.D. 494 (Ep. iz. Binusius, iii. 636), this proportion was to be a fourth part; while in Spain a third part was to be appropriated to this purpose. See the Council of Tarragona (A.D. 516), c. 8; the second of Braga (A.D. 572), c. 2; of Merida (A.D. 686), cc. 14, 16; the sixteenth of Toledo (A.D. 693), c. 5. In the Frankish kingdom the repair of the fabric was provided for by setting aside for that purpose a certain part of the endowment of the church; a provision the more necessary, as the voluntary contributions diminished in proportion as the endowments increased. And as estates of the church often fell into the hands of laics, a Diet of the Empire held at Frankfort in 794 laid down the principle, that the maintenance of the fabric of the church was a charge upon church-lands, in whatever hands they were (Pertz, Monumenta Germ. iii. 74). A similar provision was made by some of the ecclesiastical councils held in the year 813 by command of Charlemagne; as in that of Mentz (c. 42), the fourth of Arles (c. 25), and the third of Tours (c. 46). At a somewhat later date, the obligation of forced labour for the benefit of the fabric was laid upon the tenants of the church. (Herzog, Real-Encycl. i. 737). There are special treatises on this subject by Helfert (Von der Erbauung, Erhaltung und Herstellung der kirchlichen Gebäude, 2nd ed. 1834), by Von Reinhardt (Ueber kirchliche Baulast, Stuttgart, 1836), and by Permaneder (die kirchliche Baulast, München, 1838). CHURCH SCHOOLS. [SCHOOLS.]

CHURCH (SYMBOLS OF). Early representations of the Church of Christ are very numerous, and may be divided into (A) personifications and (B) symbolisms; both of the highest antiquity. Those derived from Holy Scripture may be taken first.

(A) 1. The Lord's comparison of Himself to the Good Shepherd, constantly represented in the Catacombs, and supposed to be the most ancient of purely Christian emblems in painting or sculpture, has frequently united with it pictures of two or more sheep at His feet, besides the one carried on His shoulders. The word "fold" represents the Church, exactly as the word "church" the congregation of Christ's people. [LAMB, GOOD SHEPHERD, &c.] The fresco in the Calixtine catacomb (Bottari, tav. lxxviii., and Aringhi, vol. i. lib. iii. ch. xxii. p. 327, ed. Par. 1657), of the Shepherd sitting under trees, and surrounded by sheep, or sheep and goats, as here, may be taken as one example out of many. See also that at tav. xxvi. In another (Bott. vol. ii.

tav. cxviii.) the sheep are issuing from a small building, seeming to stand for a town, at whose gate the Shepherd stands, or leans on His staff. The sheep of the Gentile and of the Jewish Churches are distinguished in the painting in Ciampini (Vet. Mon.), where two flocks are issuing from separate towns or folds, Hierusalem and Bethleem, and moving towards our Lord. [See BETHLEHEM.] In a woodcut given by Martigny, He stands on a small rock, which, by the winding lines at its base, and the word IORDANES above, would seem to refer to His baptism, and our baptism into His death, by which the sheep reach Him. (See Martigny, Dict. s. v. "Eglise.")

In a mosaic mentioned by Martigny at Sta. Sabina's, Rome, the two churches are represented by two female figures, standing each with an open book in hand. (See also Aringhi, lib. iii. c. xxii. p. 327.) Over one is inscribed ECCLESIA EX CIRCUMCISIONE, and St. Peter stands above her; the other is named ECCLESIA EX GENTIBUS, and above her is placed St. Paul. (See Gal. ii. 7.) The same subject occurs in a compartment of the ancient gates of the cathedral of Verona, treated with somewhat of the quaintness of Lombard fancy, but quite intelligible as to meaning. The twofold church is represented by two women, shaded by trees; one suckling two children, the other two fishes. [FISH.] Martigny gives a woodcut of an interesting plate in P. Garrucci, Hagioglypt. p. 222. It represents two lambs looking towards a pillar, which symbolizes the Church, and is surmounted by the Lamb bearing on his back the decussated monogram of Christ. From it spring (apparently) palm-branches; and two birds, just above the lambs, may be taken for doves. The figures of St. Peter and St. Paul, with their division of the Church into Jewish and Gentile, seem to be represented in the fresco given by De Rossi (vol. ii. Tav. d'Aggiunto A.); but are almost destroyed by the opening of a tomb, which has been broken into through the fresco, as so frequently happens. There can be no doubt that the Orante, or praying female figures in the Catacombs, are for the most part personifications of the Church. (See Bottari, tav. xxxviii., Orante with doves placed next to Good Shepherd.) In the corners of the square ceiling of the well-known crypt of Lucina, in the Callixtine catacomb (De Rossi, R. S. tav. x.), the Orante alternates with the Good Shepherd. In a recently discovered painting in St. Callixtus (De Rossi, IXOTC. tav. i. n. 2), the Orante is offering the eucharistic sacrifice by the hands of a consecrating priest.

2. A few representations exist within our range, of Susanna and the elders, as typical of the Church and its persecutors, Jewish and Pagan. Martigny names three sarcophagi as the only certain examples of this subject in old Italian art. For one he refers to Buonarrotti, Vetri, p. l. Of the two others one is from the Vatican, the other from St. Callixtus. They are found in Bottari, tav. xxxi., and lxxxv., sarcoph. from St. Callixtus. In Southern Gaul they are more numerous (Millin, Mémoires de la F. pl. lxx. 5; lxxvi. 8; lxxviii. 4). All these are bas-reliefs, containing the elders as well as Susanna; and the third represents them as eagerly watching her from behind trees. An allegory is given below in woodcut, drawn from vol. i. pl. lxxviii.

of M. Perret's work, of a sheep between two wild beasts: SUSANNA and SINIORIS are written above.

3. The Woman with the Issue of Blood has been considered as a type of the Gentile Church, which would account for the frequent representations of that miracle to be found on ancient sarcophagi. (See Bottari, tavv. xix. xxi. xxxiv. xxxix. xli. lxxxiv. lxxxv. lxxxix. cxxxv.) So St. Ambrose (lib. ii. in Luc. c. viii.).

(B) Symbolisms of the Church (it is not generally observed how important the distinction between symbolism and personification is) begin with the ark of Noah; passing by easy transition to the ship of souls and the ship of Jonah in the storm. It is singular that our Lord's similitude of the net is very rarely found illustrated by the graphic art of early Christendom. The idea of the Lord's drawing forth the sinner from the waters, as with a hook and line (see BAPTISM, p. 168), seems to have prevailed over that of the sweeping net. The net is perhaps assigned to St. Peter in the Vatican sarcophagus there represented (Bottari, tav. xli.). A small net is used on one side of the bas-relief. [FISH, SHIP.]

The ark is very frequently used as a type of the Church militant. On tombs it is held to imply that the dead expired in full communion with the Church. In Bottari, tav. xlii., an olive-tree stands in the ark, in the place of Noah. It is of a square form, a chest in fact (Bottari, tavv. xl. cxx. clxxii. &c.); and in tav. cxviii. it is placed in a boat or ship. The dove appears with the olive-branch in almost all these, or is represented by itself; in Bottari, tav. cxxxi., it is placed on the poop of the ship of Jonah. In tav. xxxvii. and passim, Noah stands in a square chest on the shore, receiving the dove in his hands; Jonah is being thrown from a boat into the sea next him. This ship represents the Church militant, and is one of the most frequent of all symbolic works in the Catacombs, no doubt on account of the Lord's own comparison of Himself to the prophet. For representations in the catacomb of Callixtus and elsewhere see De Rossi and Bottari. The ship "covered with the waves" is represented in Martigny, from a fresco lately discovered in St. Callixtus. A man stands in the waist or near the stern of a sharp-prowed vessel with a square sail, such as are used in the Mediterranean to this day. The waters are dashing over her close to him, and he is in an attitude of prayer: far off is a drowning man who has made shipwreck of the faith. The vessel in full sail (Boldetti, pp. 360, 362, 373) is also common as the emblem of safe-conduct through the waves of this troublesome world; that with sails furled, as quietly in port resting after her voyage (as in Boldetti, pp. 363, 366), is the symbol of the repose of individual Christians in death.

An even more interesting symbolism is where not only the ship is painted as analogous to the Church, but the actual fabric of a church is made like a ship. This was the case with many of the early Romanesque churches, where the apse which completed the basilica had the bishop's throne placed in the centre, as the steersman's place, with semicircular benches below for the clergy; so that a real and touching resemblance followed. See the memorable passage in Ruskin's Stones of Venice, vol. ii., on the ancient churches of Torcello, the mother city of Venice, and an extract in Martigny (s. v. Navis) of a long passage in the Apostolical Constitutions (ii. 57) to the same effect,—the bishop being likened to the steersman, the deacons to seamen, the faithful to passengers, and the deaconesses, strangely, to the collector of fares.

The ship placed on the back of a fish is found in a signet illustrated by Aléandre (Nav. Eccles. referent. Symb. Romas, 1628; see also s. v. FISH). Another such gem is in Ficoroni's collection (Germ. Ant. Litt. tab. xi. 8, p. 105). A jasper given by Cardinal Borgia (De Cruce Veltorn. p. 213 and frontispiece) places the Lord in a galley of six oars on a side, holding the large steering oar. This rudder-oar—or rather two of them—are inserted in the rudest ship-carvings, where other oars are omitted.

The column surmounted by a dove is mentioned by M. Leblant in his Inscriptions Chrétiennes de la Gaule, vol. i. p. 187, as existing on a lamp said to have been found at St. Just. Another had on it the monogram of Christ on a column. Reference is made to Bosio, p. 167, for a column between two doves turning to look at it; but is inclined, see p. 167, to regard it as a symbol of Christ Himself rather than of the Church. [R. St. J. CHURCHING OF WOMEN; or, THANKSGIVING OF WOMEN AFTER CHILDBIRTH. (Mulierum post Partum Purificatio; sometimes called Inthronisatio post partum: see Herzog's Real-Encycl. xix. 671.)

The Mosaic law lays down (Lev. xii.) precepts for the offerings and purification of women after childbirth; and these legal precepts were observed by the Mother of the Lord herself. Possibly in Jewish-Christian communities this observance passed over, like some other ceremonies, with little change into the Christian congregation; but of this nothing certain is known. There is no mention of any purificatory ceremony after childbirth in the works of Clement of Alexandria, in the Apostolical Constitutions, or in the works of the Pseudo-Dionysius the Areopagite. The notion, however, that childbirth occasioned some kind of defilement continued to prevail among the Christians of the East, hence the rituals of the Oriental Churches in relation to this matter refer more to purification from defilement than to thanksgiving for safety. Dionysius of Alexandria (canon 2; in Beveridge's Pandectæ, ii. 4) lays it down as a matter admitting of no question, that a woman ought not to be present in church, nor to receive the Holy Communion, within forty days after having given birth to a child. To the same effect, the ninth of the Arabic canons of Nicaea enjoins: "Women ought to abstain from entering the church and from partaking of Holy Communion for forty days after a birth; after which, let the woman carefully wash her garments and bathe her person and the child; then let her, together with her husband, present him in the church at the steps of the altar; whom, with their accompanying friends, let the priest receive, and say for her the prayer of purification and bless the child according to the prescribed ceremonies of the Church." The forty days' period, then, was clearly regarded as the necessary extent of the woman's purification. Meantime, however, she was not wholly neglected by the Church. Immediately after the birth, a prayer was said over mother and child, and the child signed with the cross. This rite is thought to be alluded to by Chrysostom (on 1 Cor., Hom. 12, p. 108, ed. Montfaucon). The office which accompanies it is believed by Goar to be of modern origin. On the eighth day the midwife, or some other matron, brings the child to the church. Before the door the priest again signs it with the cross, and carries it into the church, when the name is given which it is to bear after baptism. Such a ceremony took place, though not in a church, at the birth of the emperor Theodosius II. (A.D. 401), related in the following manner in the life of Porphyrius of Gaza, a contemporary witness: "When seven days were accomplished from the birth of the child, the empress Eudoxia approached and met us at the door of the chamber, bearing the infant wrapped in purple. She bowed her head, and said, 'Bless me, O fathers, and the child which the Lord hath granted me through your holy prayers;' and gave the infant into their arms, that they might sign it with the cross. Then the holy bishops signed both her and the infant, and after praying sat down." (Acta Sanctorum, Feb. iii. 653). If the child was in danger of death before the stated period for baptism, it was at once baptized, but the unclean mother was no longer allowed to suckle it, or even to enter the room where it was (Mansi, Supplement. Conc. i. 815). If the mother died within the period of uncleanness, her body was taken into the church, and the prayers of purification said over it; after which it was regarded as clean (Canon. Nicaeno-Arab. c. 10; in Hardouin's Concilia, i. 512).

On the fortieth day after the birth, the mother and the child, accompanied by the godfather, went solemnly to the church. Before the church-door the priest received them, signed the mother with the cross, and said over her several prayers. He then took the child, made the sign of the cross with it, and carried it up to the altar; the godfather then received it from the priest and left the church. In the Ethiopic Church, mother and child are anointed on the brow with holy oil, and receive the Eucharist.

In the Latin Church, also, we find traces of the same feeling that exist in the East with regard to the purification after childbirth. Even St. Augustine lays down that the Levitical law of the forty days was still binding under the new dispensation (Quaest. in Levit. lib. iii. quaest. 64). That Theodore of Canterbury held the same opinion is not to be wondered at, as he brought Oriental opinions from his early home in Tarsus. He (Penitential, I. xiv. 18, in Haddan and Stubbs' Documents, iii. 189) prescribes penance for a woman entering a church within forty days after childbirth. Augustine of Canterbury, however, had previously appealed to Pope Gregory I. for his opinion on this point, who answered, with characteristic largeness of mind, that the Mosaic law was not binding on Christians, and that if a woman went to church to give thanks to God on the very day on which she had given birth to a child, she sinned not, although the old custom of keeping at home for forty days was not to be blamed, when it was observed in a right spirit (Gregorii Ep. xi. 64; p. 1158). Gregory's decision influenced subsequent capitularies of the Franks and canons of councils in the West. Even a council of the Maronites (Mansi, Supplement. Conc. vi. 1217) rejected the "simplicity or superstition" of repelling women from church for the space of forty days after the birth of a child.

2. It will readily be supposed that no thanksgiving followed the birth of a child which was the fruit of adultery or fornication. As women who sinned in such sort were excluded from the congregation until due penance had been done, they were of course excluded from a service which included thanksgiving for the fruit of the womb. Herard of Tours (†871), enjoining women to return thanks in church as soon as may be after a birth, expressly makes the exception, "nisi forte sit adultera" (canon 60, quoted by Binterim, Denkwürd. vi. 2, 196). To the same effect are some decrees of later councils.

of the 14th century, and none probably are, in their present form, very ancient. [C.]

CHURCHWARDENS. These officers would seem to be the representatives in the later Church of the seniores ecclesiastici, of whom frequent mention is made by St. Augustine and Optatus. We gather from these writers that the seniores ecclesiae were a sort of elders who were not of the clergy, but yet had some concern in the care of the Church. Thus, St. Augustine inscribes one of his epistles to his own church of Hippo, "Clero, senioribus et universae plebi." Some of these seniores were the chief men or magistrates of the place, such as we still call aldermen; who also formed a sort of lay council of the bishops, giving advice and assistance in many weighty matters of the Church. But there were others known more properly as seniores ecclesiastici, who were entrusted with the utensils, treasure, and outward affairs of the Church, but had no concern in its government or discipline; and these may be regarded as the predecessors of our churchwardens. The lay elders, so called, of modern times are ranked above the deacons in their own communities, and cannot therefore be identified with the seniores ecclesiastici of the ancient Church, who, not being reckoned of the clergy, were ecclesiastically inferior to the order of deacons (Bingham, ii. 18). [D. B.]

CHURCHYARD. The subject of places set apart for Christian burial has already been considered under AREA, CATACOMB, and CEMETERY. The present article relates simply to burial in the precincts of churches.

The laws of the empire against burying in cities of course prevented the use of churchyards within the walls for the purpose of interment so long as those laws continued in force. The first attempts to bury in or near churches seem to have occurred in the case of those churches or memorial cells which were built over the remains of apostles or martyrs; for both Theodosius (Codex, lib. ix. tit. 17; De Sepulc. Viol. leg. 6) and Justinian (Codex, lib. i. tit. 2; De Eccl. leg. 2) expressly provide against such churches being made exceptions to the general law. When the church had kings for nursing-fathers, the privilege of being buried within the precincts was sometimes extended to Christian emperors. Thus Constantine desired (Euseb. Vita Const. iv. 71) to be buried near the apostles whom he had enshrined, and his son Constantius carried out his wish by causing him to be buried in the ATRIUM of the church; a fact to which Chrysostom more than once alludes (On 2 Cor., Hom. 26, p. 929, ed. Paris, 1616; Quod Christus sit Deus, c. 8, p. 839). Theodosius the elder, Arcadius, and Theodosius the younger, are said by a late historian (Nicephorus, H. E. xiv. 58) to have been similarly buried. The council of Braga of the year 563 (can. 18) allows corpses to be buried, if need be, around the church (de foris circa murum basilicae), but utterly forbids any to be buried within, alleging the respect due to the relics of saints.

Archbishop Theodore of Canterbury laid down (Penitential, II. i. 5 and 6, in Haddan and Stubbs' Councils, iii. 190) the following rule: In a church in which bodies of unbelievers are buried it is not lawful to consecrate an altar; but if the church itself is of good material, let it be pulled down and rebuilt after the logs of which it is composed have been planed or washed. If the altar has been previously consecrated, mass may be said upon it if 'religious' persons are buried there; but if a pagan be buried there, it is better that the altar should be purified and taken out of the building. It is clear from this passage that burials frequently took place in the rude wooden churches of the 7th century in England, and that only the bodies of pagans were held absolutely to desecrate the place, though the practice of burying in churches does not seem to be looked upon with favour. The council of Nantes, held probably towards the end of the 7th century, in the 6th canon, permits burials in the atrium or fore-court, in the cloister, and in the outbuildings (exedrae) of a church, but utterly forbids them in the church itself and near the altar, where the Body and Blood of the Lord are. The same precept is repeated in the canons of later councils, as in the 52nd of that at Mentz in 813, which however expressly excepts bishops, abbots, worthy presbyters, and faithful laymen. Similar to this is the injunction of Theodulf of Orleans (Capitul. ad Presbyt. ix.). The council of Tribur (A.D. 895), repeating the prohibition with regard to laymen (can. 17), implies that the prohibited burials had already taken place, by the provision that bodies buried in churches in times past were not to be exhumed; but in case the multitude of tombs was such that the ground could not conveniently be levelled, it provides, in almost the same terms as Theodulf, that the altar should be removed, and the church made a mere cemetery-chapel or catacomb.

In the East, the Emperor Leo VI., about the year 900, abrogated (Novell. 53) all the old laws against burying in cities, and left men at liberty to bury either within or without the walls; a permission which no doubt gave occasion to burving in the precincts of city churches.

We conclude, then, that burying in the precincts of churches was practised, in the case of very distinguished persons, from the 4th century; more generally, from the 7th century; but that the increasing practice of burying in churches was constantly resisted by ecclesiastical authorities during the whole period with which we are concerned, and was held to be almost a desecration.

Monastic bodies had from very ancient times burying-grounds of their own, that they who had consorted together in their lives might rest together in death (Isidore of Seville, Regula, c. 23); these were however originally outside the precincts of the monastery, as we see from the instances of Pachomius, Benedict, and many others. Bede, in the Life of St. Cuthbert, speaks of a dead monk being carried to his burial in a cart, which would not have been necessary if the interment had taken place within the monastery. It appears that in many places a chapel or oratory was built on the spot chosen for the interment of the brethren. For instance, Abbot Bertinus (A.D. 660) enclosed a graveyard for his monastery on a neighbouring hill, and built in the midst of it a church dedicated to St. Mary (Acta SS. Bened. saec. iii. pt. 1, p. 110). Afterwards, graveyards were formed within the convent walls, but not within the cloister, and were provided with a separate church. Of this kind is believed to have been the cemetery formed by Elgil at Fulda, the church of which was dedicated in the year 822 (Life of Elgil by Candidus, c. 20, in Acta SS. Bened. saec. iv. pt. 1, p. 238). Benedict of Aniane also caused an oratory to be constructed in the cemetery of his monastery (Life, c. 39, in Acta SS. Bened. saec. iv. pt. 1). The ancient plan of St. Gall shows only a cross in the midst of the graveyard within the convent walls. And in process of time burials took place in the cloister itself. Abbot Walfrid, when dying (A.D. 765), desired to be buried in the midst of the cloister (Life, c. 8, Acta SS. Bened. saec. iii. pt. 2); and it appears that other monks of that rule were buried in the cloister (u. s. c. 14). Later instances are frequent. Monks of distinguished sanctity were occasionally buried in the church itself, as St. Vouel of Soissons in the 8th century (Acta SS. Bened. iv. p. 550). Except in the case of very saintly persons, burial was not permitted within the first eight centuries in monastic more than in secular churches. (Bingham's Antiquities, bk. xxiii. c. 1; Martene, De Ritibus Eccl. Ant. lib. iii. c. 7, §§ 10-14; De Rit. Monach. lib. v. c. 10, §§ 100-104; Binterim, Denkwürdigkeiten, vi. 3, 443 ff.) [C.]

CINGULUM. (Zavh, Zona, Balteus, Fapis.) The girdle, in ancient times, was generally associated with the idea of active exertion, inasmuch as it served to confine and to gird up the long flowing garments which, when unconfined, interfered with all activity. But as a richly-ornamented girdle commonly formed a part of the robes of state worn by Eastern monarchs, we find the girdle occasionally alluded to as a symbol of royal dignity. So Patriarch Germanus of Constantinople, c. 715 A.D., Myst. Theor. p. 206, speaks of the girdle, then worn as part of a priest's dress, as signifying the beauty wherewith Christ entering upon His kingdom did gird Himself withal, even the beauteous majesty of Godhead. See Vestiarium Christianum, pp. 84, 85. Lastly, through yet other associations, which will be obvious to all students of antiquity, the girdle connected itself with the idea of chastity; and it is in this connexion that it is commonly referred to by the later ecclesiastical writers. See, for example, St. Jerome on Ezek. xlv. c. 23; Celestine, bishop of Rome, 432, apud Labbe, Concilia, ii. 1618 ("in lumborum praeracione castitas . . . indicatur"); Rabanus Maurus, de Instit. Cleric. lib. i. c. 17; Pseudo-Alcuin, de Div. Off. (Vest. Christ. p. 111); Ivo Carnotensis (ib. p. 121). Both in East and West it formed part of the monastic dress from the earliest times. Among Western writers see the Life of Fulgentius, bishop of Ruspa, by Ferrandus Diaconus ("pelliceo cingulo tanquam monachus utebatur"); Salvianus, ad Eccl. Cathol. lib. iv. (addressing a monk of unworthy character—"Licet religionem vestibus similes, licet fidem cingulo afferas, licet sanctitatem pallio mentiaris," &c.); Joannis Cassiani, de Coenob. Institut. lib. i. c. 11, apud Migne, Patrol. xlix. 60; the Regula of St. Benedict, Migne, lxxi. 490 ("vestiti dormiant, et cincti cingulis aut funibus").

Hildemar, in the 9th century (apud Migne, tom. c.), explains the distinction between 'cingulum' and 'funis.' "Funis est qui de cannaba fit vel lino in rotundum; cingulus (sic) autem corrigia est de lana vel lino, sed non in rotundum sicut funis, sed in latum sicut tricia." For Eastern usage see St. Jerome, Praefat. in Regulam S. Pachomii, opp. ii. 49; Palladius, Lausiaca, cap. 38 (Migne, lxxiii. 1157) and St. Germanus of Constantinople, in a passage above referred to. He there says of the monastic habit that it was like that of John the Baptist, whose raiment was of camel's hair, and who wore a leathern girdle about his loins. Celestine, bishop of Rome, in his letter to the bishops of Vienna and Narbonne, already referred to, dating about 430 A.D., marks the time when the wearing of a girdle as part of the episcopal dress (probably in imitation of the monastic habit) was first introduced into Gaul. He reproves those to whom he writes for dressing in a pallium and wearing a girdle about the loins, and so seeking to observe the truth of Scripture not in the spirit but in the letter. "Amicti pallio, et lumbos praecinctorum, credunt se Scripturae fidem non per spiritum sed per litteram completuros." See Labbé, Concilia, ii. 1618; Vest. Christ. p. 45. [W. B. M.]

CIRBA, COUNCILS OF. [AFRICAN COUNCILS.]

CIRCUMCELLIONES. (1) A name given to the Donatist fanatics in Africa during the 4th century, from their habit of roving from house to house, plundering (Aug. c. Gaudent. i. 32). They went about in predatory gangs, consisting chiefly of rustics, on the borders of the Gaetulian desert, ravaging Numidia and Mauritania, provinces at that time neither thoroughly Christianised nor thoroughly subjected to Roman law. According to Augustine they were notorious for their lawless violence against the Catholics (Aug. c. Gaudent. i. 28, 32; Haer. 69; c. Parmen. i. 11; c. Crescon. iii. 42, 46, 47; Epp. 88, 105, 185), as well as against property (Aug. Epp. 15, 85, 185). To restrain their turbulence their own bishops were constrained to invoke the aid of the Roman counts. Augustine defends Macarius and Taurinus from the charge of having been unduly severe against them, and reproves the exultation of these fanatics over the death of Ursacius (Aug. c. Litt. Petilian. cc. 22, 25). At the Conference of Carthage in 411 A.D. the imperial commissioner decreed a fine on those districts wherein the "circumcelliones" were not kept in order (Coleti Conc. t. iii.). At Bagai they fought, but unsuccessfully, against Roman cavalry. The war-shout of these "avengers" or "champions of God," as they styled themselves (ἀγωνιστικοί, Optat. Milevit. De Schism. Donat. iii. 4), "Deo Laudes," in opposition to the "Deo Gratias" of the other party, was terrible to all peaceful people as the roar of a lion (Aug. in Ps. cxxxii. v. 6). Instead of swords, which for some time they felt a religious scruple against using (cf. St. Matt. xxvi. 52), they brandished clubs at first, which they called "Israels" (Aug. in Ps. x. v. 5). Like the Syrian "assassins," the followers of the "Old Man of the Mountain" in the time of the Crusades, the "Circumcelliones" courted death, wantonly insulting the Pagans at their festivals (Aug. c. Gaudent. i. 32, 49; Epp. 12, 16, 185); and, in their frantic eagerness for martyrdom, challenging all whom they met on their way to kill them (Aug. c. Crescon. iii. 46, 49; c. Litt. Petil. ii. 114; De Unit. Eccl. 50; Theodoret. Haer. iv. 6). Among the titles which they assumed was that of "Agnostici," to indicate their contempt for learning (Aug. in Ps. cxxxii. v. 6). Though pledged by profession to celibacy, they were guilty of frequent outrages on women, if their opponents may be believed (Aug. c. Litt. Petil. i. 16, ii. 195; De Unit. Eccl. 50). For these and similar offences, as well as on the charge of aiding the Vandals, they were ordered by Honorius, 412 A.D., to be fined (Hefele in Kirchenlex., iii. 261). Gibbon compares these "circumcelliones" to the "camisards" of Languedoc in the commencement of the 18th century (Decline and Fall, ii. 445, Bohn, 1855).

Circumcelliones (2) were vagabond monks, censured by Cassian, under the name of Sarabaitae, for roving from place to place (Coll. xviii. 7). Probably the name was transferred to them from the Donatist fanatics. St. Augustine rebuts this comparison as unmerited, at least within his experience (in Ps. cxxxii. v. 6). But elsewhere (De Oper. Monach. 28) he inveighs with characteristic warmth against the idle, vagrant monks, "nusquam missos, nusquam fixos, nusquam stantes, nusquam sedentes," &c., who scoured the country for alms, vending fictitious relics. Benedictus Anianensis quotes Isidorus de Offic. Eccl. (ii. 15) against these "circumcelliones" or "circilliones" as spurious Anchorites (Concord. Regg. c. 3, cf. Menard, ad loc.). These vagabond monks were condemned as unstable and scandalous (Conc. Tolet. vii. c. 5); and as mock-hermits (κυκλάριοι ψευδερημίται) in the Synodica Epistol. Orientalis addressed to the Emp. Theophilus (Suicer. Thesaur. sub voce). They are denounced also by Nilus (Epp. iii. 19); and are probably the "gyrovagi" censured in the Regula St. Benedicti (c. 1). The name occurs so late as in Monachus Sangallensis, who relates how a monk, one of the "circumcelliones," "ignarus disciplinae imperatoris," intruded into the choir in the presence of Carl (De Gest. Carol. M. i. 8, v. Canisii Antiqu. Lectiones). [I. G. S.]

CIRCUMCISION. As a Jewish rite, or as connected with the controversies of the Apostolic age, this ordinance does not come within the limits of this work. It claims a place, however, even in a Dictionary of Christian Antiquities, as having been adopted from a remote period in the Church of Abyssinia, and as still in use there. In this, as in many other practices, the influence of a large Jewish population has made that community the representative of a type of Judaeo-Christianity which must have been common in the first two centuries, but which has since been lost. It has to be noted that circumcision is practised there (and the present usage rests upon an immemorial tradition) before baptism, between the third and the eighth day after birth, and that an analogous operation is applied to female children.

Stanley, Eastern Church, p. 12. [E. H. P.]

CIRCUMCISION, FESTIVAL OF.

I. Origin of Festival.—From the necessary connection of the event commemorated on this day with the Nativity, we must obviously not look for notices of its celebration at a date earlier than that at which we first meet with those of the Nativity itself.

It will follow from the prescribed interval between the birth of a child and its circumcision that the festival of the Circumcision will fall on the octave of the Nativity; and consequently we continually find January 1 thus marked, even where the service contains references to the day as the anniversary of the Circumcision. It is not until later that we find the day to have acquired sufficient independent rank to bear the title of the Circumcision rather than of the octave as its special distinguishing mark.

It is hard to say when the earliest traces of an observance of the day under either designation are to be found. There is extant a long homily by Zeno, bishop of Verona in the 4th century, which would appear to have been meant for delivery on this day; but, on the other hand, it is not mentioned in the Kalendarium Carthagenense, or in that of Bucherius, both probably documents of the 4th century. Now it has been shown elsewhere [CHRISTMAS] that the first certain allusions to an observance of Christmas as a distinct and independent festival occur towards the end of the 4th century, and that this observance of it was later in the East than in the West. This agrees with what is said above, and with the instances we shall further quote, which tend to disprove the existence of any save perhaps a more or less local recognition of the festival before the end of the 4th century. Here, as in the case of the parent festival of the Nativity, our earliest illustrations come from the West.

Thus we find the day noticed in the Gelasian Sacramentary, the Gregorian Sacramentary and Antiphonary, the Gallican Sacramentary and Lectionary, in the Calendar of Fronto, the Mozarabic Liturgy and Breviary, and the Martyrologium Hieronymi.

Passing on to the Eastern Church, we find that in the calendar of the Coptic Church given by Selden (de Synodis Ebraeorum, lib. iii. c. 15), the Circumcision is reckoned among the minor festivals, and that the Apostolic Constitutions, a work doubtless of Oriental origin, ignores it altogether.

In process of time the day became more and more recognized, and at last the observance became universal.

A reason for the Church's apparent slowness in recognizing and commemorating so important an incident in our Lord's earthly life, at which He received the name Jesus—an event, one would suppose, itself of more than ordinary interest—is doubtless to be found in the fact that on the Kalends of January was held a great heathen festival, characterized by an excessive amount of riot and licentiousness. The Christians, anxious to avoid an apparent toleration of these abominations by holding a festival of their own, even though of a totally different character, on the same day, enjoined a solemn fast, as a wholesome protest and as a means of guarding the unwary from being led astray. See Augustine, Sermon. 197, 198 (Patrol. xxxviii. 1024 sqq.).

There is also an allusion to this in a canon of the 2nd Council of Tours, A.D. 567 (Conc. Turonense II. can. 17; Labbé, v. 857). Further we find in the Martyrologium Romanum (January 1), that a certain Almachius suffered martyrdom for saying, "Hodie octavas Dominici diei sunt, cessate a superstitionibus idolorum et a sacrificiis pollutis." If, as is asserted, this Almachius be the same with the Telemachus mentioned by Theodoret (Hist. Eccl. v. 28), this event must be referred to the time of Honorius, and will point to a certain recognition of the day by the Roman Church at the end of the 4th century. To the subject of this fast we shall briefly refer again.

We shall now proceed to discuss the observance of the day more in detail.

II. Liturgical Notices.—It is impossible to determine the character of the evidence borne as to this day by the Leonine Sacramentary, for it is mutilated at the beginning, and commences with the month of April. The last section in it, however, is "In jejuniis mensis decimi," for which five Masses are given, thus furnishing evidence for the observance of the time, though none for the name by which the day was known (ii. 156, ed. Ballerini). It may be added, however, that with this exception there is no allusion to the day in the writings of Leo I., although he has many sermons on the Nativity itself. The Gelasian Sacramentary gives a Mass for the day, In Octavas Domini, and there follows one Prohibendum ab idolis, pointing to what we have already said as to the heathen festival on this day (Patrol. lxxiv. 1061). In the former Mass, the main idea is evidently of the octave of the Nativity, and not of any special commemoration of the day itself, there being merely a passing allusion to our Lord's Circumcision, as contrasted with such expressions as "Cujus hodie octavas nati celebrantes . . ." and the like.

In the Gregorian Sacramentary the Mass for the day is headed In Octavis Domini (Greg. Sacr. col. 13, ed. Menard), but the Gospel treats of the Circumcision, Luke ii. 21-32. Of two collects given, one has special reference to the Virgin, the other to the octave, and in Pamelius' edition of the Sacramentary, and in the Cd. Reg. Suec. is read Ad S. Mariam ad Martyres; in the Kalendarium Romanum is Natalo S. Mariæ, and thus in the Gregorian Antiphonary (op. cit. 660) we have De Sancta Mariæ in Octava Domini.

All this points to a twofold commemoration of the day, the one having regard to the octave of the Nativity or the Circumcision, the other to the Virgin, and hence the special prominence given to the mention of her in the Mass for the day in the modern Romish Missal. The Preface and the Benediction in the Gregorian Sacramentary do indeed refer to the Circumcision—"Cujus hodie Circumcisionis diem et Nativitatis octavam celebrantes—"; but there is a certain amount of evidence against their authenticity, they are omitted by Pamelius and are wanting in the Cd. Reg. Suec. Possibly, therefore, they are a later addition.

We may next briefly notice the ancient liturgical documents of the Gallican Church. The ancient Lectionary published by Mabillon (de Liturgia Gallicana, p. 112), gives lessons In Circumcisione Domini for matins and for the Mass; for the former, Isaiah xlii. 24-xlii. 7, and for the latter, Isaiah i. 10-20; with 1 Cor. x. 14-31 and Luke ii. 21-40 for the Epistle and Gospel, the Gospel being the same as in the Gregorian and Mozarabic liturgy; the prophetic lection and Epistle in this last being Isaiah xlviii. 12-20 and Philippians iii. 1-8. It will be observed that the Epistle in the Gallican liturgy has reference to the idol practices which characterized the day. The Gothic-Gallic Missal (ib. 200) gives an Ordo Missae in Circumcisione Domini nostri Jesu Christi, and the Mozarabic Breviary and Missal style the day Circumcisio Domini.

It is thus probable that we must look to Gaul and Spain for early examples of this title of the day. The first definite instance that we have observed is to be found in the canon of the 2nd Council of Tours (567 A.D.) already referred to, which, after remarking that every day was a festival from Christmas to Epiphany, adds, "excipitur triduum illud, quo ad calcandam Gentilium consuetudinem patres nostri statuerunt privatas in Kalendis Januarii fieri litanias, et in ecclesiis psallatur, et hora octava in ipsis Kalendis Circumcisionis Missa Deo propitio celebratur" (Labbe, l.c.). There is also some evidence for supposing that the title of the Circumcision was applied to the day in Spain before the death of Isidore (636 A.D.), for we read in one place, "placuit etiam patribus a die Natalis Domini usque ad diem Circumcisionis solemne tempus efficere" (Regula Monachorum 12; Patrol. lxxiii. 880). Arevalus does indeed suggest (not. in loc.), from the belief that the title Circumcision is probably of later date, that the original words of Isidore here may have been Kalendas Januarias; but when the passage is taken in conjunction with the above quoted canon, there seems the less reason for having recourse to this hypothesis. Further, remarks in the laws of the Visigoths shew that by the middle or latter part of the 7th century the day ranked in Spain of so high importance that on it the law courts were closed, and that it then bore the name of the Circumcision (Codex Leg. Visigoth. lib. ii. tit. 1, lex 11; lib. xii. t. 3, l. 6; in Hispania Illustrata, iii. 863, 1004, Frankfurt 1806). Still, the old name survived, for we find it at the end of the 8th century in the Regula of Bishop Chrodegang (Patrol. lxxix. 1090), and in the proceedings of the Council of Mainz, 813 A.D. (Conc. Moguntinum, can. 36; Labbe, vii. 1250).

Briefly then to sum up the results so far obtained: we have seen that the a priori expectation, which would assign the end of the 4th century as the earliest possible date of the recognition of the day under either title, is borne out by the fact of the absence of allusions to it before that date; and further that, until at the earliest the middle of the 6th century, it was solely as the octave of the Nativity, and not as the Circumcision that the day was known. It may be remarked here that the whole of Christendom agrees in celebrating the Circumcision on January 1 except the Armenian Church, which still adheres to the old Eastern practice of commemorating the Nativity and Epiphany together on January 6, and necessarily therefore celebrates the Circumcision on January 13.

The primary idea of the day as a fast and not a festival has already been referred to. The canon of the 2nd Council of Tours which we have cited shows the state of the case in France; that the same custom prevailed in Spain is shown by an allusion in a canon of the 4th Council of Toledo, A.D. 633 (Conc. Tol. iv. can. 11; Labbe v. 1709); cf. Isidore, de Eccl. Off. lib. i. c. 46 although it must be added that a heading in the Mozarabic Breviary points to the three day before the Epiphany as the period of the fast "Officium jejuniarum in Kal. Jan. observatur tribus diebus ante festum Epiphaniae." Lastly we may refer to the Ordo Romanus, which, after speaking of the heathen abominations which defiled the day, adds, "Statuit universalis Ecclesiae jejunium publicum in isto die fieri" (p. 20, ed. Hittorp.).

It will, of course, be inferred from what has been already remarked that there is an absence of homilies or sermons for the day in the work of early patristic writers. We may here again however, refer to the discourse of Zeno of Verona de Circumcisione (lib. i. tractat. 13, p. 98, ed. Ballerini, where see note 1). In an ancient MS of this of the 9th century (the Cd. Remensis) I added a note in the margin of this discourse In Octava Domini pontificis nona lectio. The Ballerini consider these notes to have been written at the time when Archbishop Hincmar (ob. 88. A.D.) gave the MS. to the abbey of St. Remigius at Rheims, and while the MS. belonged to the Church of Verona (Præf. § 5), and that this discourse was there spoken on the octave of the Nativity. They infer from the marginal note the relative importance of the day, considering that such a remark about the ninth lection would be made only in the case of the more important festivals. Bede has written a homily for the day on Luke ii. 21 (Hom. x.; Patrol. xciv. 53).

When the fast became a festival it is impossible definitely to say. Probably the process was a gradual one, and the period varied in different countries. The statutes of St. Boniface (ob. 755 A.D.) include it among the special festivals on which no work was to be done (D'Achery, Syneclogium ix. 66). Still, at a period subsequent to this, traces of the old state of things survived, the latest we have observed being in the Capitula of Atto, bishop of Vercelli in the 10th century, who dwells on the expediency of maintaining the ancient protest (Patrol. cxxiv. 43). CLAVUS. We continually find in ancient Christian frescoes and mosaics garments decorated with long stripes of purple, sometimes enriched with embroidery or an inwoven pattern, called clavi. These generally run from the top to the bottom of the garment, and are broader or narrower according to the dignity of the wearer. Thus, the Lord is often distinguished by a broader clavus than those of the apostles, as in a fine fresco in the cemetery of St. Agnes (Perret, Catacombs, ii. pl. xxiv.). Undistinguished persons also wore clavi, but very narrow. In nearly all cases these clavi are two in number, and run from each shoulder to the lower border of the dress. This arrangement of the clavi is alluded to in the Acts of Perpetua and Felicitas, where the Good Shepherd is said to have appeared to the former "distinctam habens tunicam inter duos clavos per medium pectus" (Ruinart, Acta Sincera, p. 32, ed. Verona). Tertullian (De Pallio, c. 4) speaks of the care which was taken in the selection of shades of colour.

There are a few examples of the single clavus, running down the centre of the breast, which Rubenius believes to have been the ancient fashion of wearing it. These occur only in representations of the Three Children in the fiery furnace (Bottari, Sculture e Pitture, tav. cxlix. clxxx.). Clavi are common to both sexes; women may be seen represented with that ornament, for instance, in pictures of the Wise and Foolish Virgins (Bottari, tav. clviii.); and female figures are sometimes found adorned with two clavi on each side. Jerome (Epist. 22, ad Eustochium) alludes to the use of the clavus by women, single as well as married. It is also common in early art to personages of the Old Testament and the New; it is given to Moses, for instance, in a painting engraved by Perret (i. pl. xxiv.), and to the apostles in nearly all representations of them, whether in fresco, in mosaic, or in glass. Angels also wear the clavus in early mosaics, as may be seen in examples given by Ciampini (Vet. Mon. i. tab. xli. ii. tab. xv.), in the Menologium of Basil (see particularly Dec. 16 and Dec. 29), and in several ancient miniatures.

These purple stripes were worn on the penula as well as the tunic: a fresco from an arcosolium in the cemetery of Priscilla (Bottari, tav. cxlii.) furnishes three examples. They are found also in the pallium: a mosaic of St. Agatha Major at Ravenna represents our Lord with clavi of gold on such a garment. The dalmatic and colobium were similarly decorated: the latter seems to have had only one broad band of purple (latus clavus) descending from the upper part of the chest to the feet. See the Christian sarcophagi engraved by Bottari (tav. xvii. cxxvii. and others).

Priests, after the example of the senators of old Rome, are said to have worn the broad clavus, while deacons contented themselves with the narrow one on their tunics or dalmatics. The clavus is sometimes represented as descending only to the middle of the chest: it is in these cases decorated with small discs or spangles, and terminates in small globes or bullae. This is said to be the kind of decoration which is sometimes called paragaudis. CLERESTORY, or CLEARSTORY. An upper story or row of windows in a church, rising clear above the adjoining parts of the building. As the clerestory was a common feature in the old civil basilica, it was probably soon adopted in buildings of the same type used for ecclesiastical purposes. See for instance, the ancient basilica of St. Peter at Rome, under CHURCH, p. 370; also p. 381. [C.]

CLERGY. [CLERUS; IMMUNITIES OF CLERGY.]

CLERMONT, COUNCILS OF. [ARVERNENSE.]

CLERUS, deacon, martyr at Antioch, Jan. 7 (Mart. Rom. Vet., Usuardi). [C.]

CLERUS (and CLERICUS = one of the Clerus), at first equivalent to the whole body of the faithful, as being the lot or inheritance of the Lord (1 Pet. v. 3 = κληρονομία, v. Theodoret, ad loc., and so still used by e.g. Theophanes, Hom. xii. 70, quoted by Suicer); but appropriated almost immediately to all, "qui in ecclesiastici ministerii gradibus ordinati sunt" (Isid. Hispal. De Eccl. Offic. ii. 1); the distinction of clergy and laity being found in 1 Cor. xiv. 16, and in St. Clement of Rome, and the term being applied to the former exclusively, "vel quia de sorte sunt Domini, vel quia Ipse Dominus sors, id est, pars clericorum est" (St. Jerome, Ad Nepotian., followed by Isidore, as above, and by Rab. Maur. De Instit. Cleric. i. 2). The more modern derivation, from the lots cast at the appointment of St. Matthias (so e.g. Suicer), seems set aside by the fact, that clergy were not chosen by lot. The word clericus was further subdivided when the minor orders came into existence; all being called clerici (πάντας κληρικούς καλοῦμεν, Justin. Novell. cxxiii. 19), but the name being also sometimes given in particular to the lectores, psalmistae, ostiarii, &c. who "clericorum nomen retinent" (Conc. Carthag. iii. A.D. 397, c. 21); and who in later centuries are often so called exclu-which appointed also a festival day for both St. Gregory the Great and St. Augustine of Canterbury. (4) A.D. 794, called "Synodale Concilium," and "Sanctum Concilium": two grants are extant made there (Kemble's Codex Diplomaticus, 164-167; Haddan and Stubbs, Councils, 483-485). (5) A.D. 798, referred wrongly by Spelman to A.D. 800: some charters were passed there (Kemble's Codex Diplomaticus, 175, 186, 1019; Haddan and Stubbs, iii. 512-518). There are intimations also of the annual synod having been held, but without mention of the place (e.g. A.D. 704, and 736 or 737, both Mercian councils, and again, A.D. 755, Haddan and Stubbs, ib. 267, 337, 390), which may easily therefore have been Clovesho, and probably was so. [A. W. H.]

COADJUTOR BISHOP, with a right of succession, was distinctly against canon; on the principle that such an appointment interfered with the right of election in clergy and people, &c. [BISHOP.] The institution of chorepiscopi appears to have been among the earliest plans for meeting the case of overgrown dioceses. But instances must have occurred at all times of bishops incapacitated by sickness either of body or mind, or by old age. And under such circumstances resignations were, although grudgingly, permitted. [BISHOP.] Nevertheless, coadjutors also,—meaning by the term full bishops, but acting simply in place of the proper occupant of the see (still remaining so), and with no right of succession,—occur, although at first rarely; almost every early case being mixed up with the succession-question. St. Ambrose certainly speaks of a coadjutor in this special sense being given to Bishop Bassus, "in consortium regendae ecclesiae" (Epist. 79). And the 5th Council of Paris (A.D. 577), considerably later, contemplates the case as an exceptionally legitimate one. "Nullus episcoporum se vivente alium in loco suo eligat, . . . nisi certae conditiones extiterint ut ecclesiam suam et clerum regere non posset" (can. 2). And in course of time such coadjutors became at length common, and were provided for by, e.g. Boniface VIII. (in Sexto c. Pastorale). St. Gregory the Great meets the case of temporary sickness by the temporary help of a neighbouring bishop; but in more permanent cases he distinctly recommends a coadjutor, but without right of succession, as, e.g. in the case of John of Justiniana Prima (St. Gregory M. Epist. ix. 41). [A. W. H.]

COABB (Cowart, Comharba, Latinized into Corba, = Conterraneus, or eiusdem terrae, or districtus—so Colgan), the title in the Celtic-Irish and Scottish churches, of the abbatial successor of the original founder of a monastery. So an abbat of Hy would be called the Coarb of Columba; of Armagh, the Coarb of Patrick; of Raphoe, the Coarb of Adamnan, &c., &c. The word occurs much earlier in the Annals; but its common use dates from late in the 8th century, when such abbacies had become hereditary in many cases, and not only so, but had passed into the hands, in some instances, of laymen, while a prior discharged the spiritual office. The transformation in lapse of time of the Heremach or Airchmoneach, who was originally the representative of the lay Advocatus of the monastery, but gradually usurped the position of hereditary lay possessor of his original third of the produce of monastic lands, brought him also by a different line to a condition closely resembling what the lay coarbs became (as e.g. at Dunkeld); so that the coarb became to a monastery what the heremach was to any church, monastic or not. A female coarb occurs once or twice (Reeves, ad Adamn. V. S. Columbae, Add. Notes, p. 404). Coarbs that were still clergy, became styled in Ireland in later times Plebani = rural deans, or archpresbyters, or chorepiscopi (in the later sense of the word), i.e. the head of a "plebs ecclesiastica," viz. of clergy who served chapels under him as rector. [Reeves, Colton's Visitation, pp. 4 note, 145, 209; Spelman, Gloss. in v. Corba; E. W. Robertson, Early Scotl. i. 330.] [A. W. H.]

COAT, THE HOLY. Its miracles are commemorated on Oct. 1 in the Georgian Calendar.

COCHLEAR. [SPOON.] [C.]

COCK. Representations of this bird occur frequently on tombs from the earliest period. When not associated with the figure of St. Peter, as Bottari, tav. lxxxiv., or placed on a pillar, as Boldetti, p. 360; Bottari, tavv. xxxiv. xxiii., &c., it appears to be a symbol of the Resurrection, our Lord being supposed by the early Church to have broken from the grave at the early cock-crowing. A peculiar awe seems always to have attached to that hour, at which all wandering spirits have through the Middle Ages been supposed to vanish from the earth. Hamlet and the ancient ballad called The Wife of Usher's Well occur to us as salient examples of an universal superstition. Prudentius' hymn Ad Galli Cantum (Cathec. i. 16) adopts the idea of the cock-crowing as a call to the general judgment ("Nostri figura est iudicis"); and further on (45 seqq.) he says:

'Hoc enim signum praecedit
Noverunt promissae spei,
Qua nos opore liberti
Speramus adventum Dei.'

And again, 65 seqq.:

"Inde est, quod omnes credimus,
Illo quietis tempore,
Quo gallus exultans canit, Christum redire ex inferis."

See Aringhi, vol. ii. pp. 328-9 (in a complete list of animal symbols). Fighting-cocks (see the passage last quoted) seem to symbolize the combat with secular or sensual temptations. The practice of training them for combat has probably always existed in the East, and certainly was in favour at Athens (cf. Aristoph. Av., αἶψα μάχεσθαι, εἰ μάχεσθαι, &c.). For a symbol drawn from such a pastime, compare St. Paul's use of the word ἀγωνίζεσθαι (1 Cor. ix. 27). See Bottari, vol. lli. t. 137.

UNIVERSAE.

To treat of them in their chronological order, we must reverse their alphabetical, and proceed from the last to the first. Dionysius Exiguus, in dedicating his own collection (Migne's Patrol. lxxvii. 139) to Stephen, bishop of Salona, speaks of two collections anterior to it; one in Greek of 165 canons, according to him, terminating with the Council of Constantinople, A.D. 381; and another in Latin, long ago translated from the Greek, which he had in fact been asked to improve upon. The Greek collection was composed of 20 canons passed at Nicaea; 25 at Ancyra (which he reckons as 24); 14 at Neocaesarea; 20 at Gangra; 25 at Antioch; 59 at Laodicea; and 6 at Constantinople (which he gives as 3). All had been framed in the 4th century; and as they begin with the first General Council and end with the second, the probability is that they were put together so as to form a collection before the date of the 4th Council, by the 1st canon of which they were confirmed, and in the acts of which they are more than once cited as still numbered in this collection. [CONCL. CHALCED.] To it we may suppose to have been appended meanwhile—Justinian (Patrol. x. p. 29) thinks by Stephen, bishop of Ephesus, who attended the 4th Council, as there seems to be a collection of his still extant containing them—the 8 canons of Ephesus: and it was further enlarged by the canons of Chalcedon on being confirmed there. In this shape it was ordered to have the force of law by the Emperor Justinian in his 131st Novel. Whether it included more than 27 canons of Chalcedon is, however, open to question; as Dionysius, who must have translated it rather before then, ends with the 27th, telling Stephen expressly, "in his Græcorum canonum finem esse declaramus." And so far is he from standing alone in this, that even John Scholasticus, a presbyter of Antioch, who became patriarch of Constantinople in the last year of Justinian, attributes no more than 27 canons to the Council of Chalcedon in his collection, by which he means of course the first 27. With these, therefore, this code terminated. The Ephesine canons indeed are not translated by Dionysius, nor in the old Latin version of which he speaks; but they are particularly named by Justinian: and John Scholasticus, though he reckons them at seven, has quoted the 8th, passing over the 7th in all probability for no other reason than its irrelevancy to the subject-matter of his collection. Still this code, though it was probably confirmed at Chalcedon, and became law for the empire under Justinian in this shape, seems never to have been received in this shape precisely by the Roman or the Greek Church. John Scholasticus, whose description of it, checked by the number of canons assigned to it by Dionysius, has been here followed in preference to the Greek version edited by Justellus, which is of later date (v. append. ad op. S. Leon. ap. Migne, Patrol. lvi. p. 18), prefixes it by 85 canons of the Apostles, as he calls them; interpolates it with 21 canons of Sardica; and tacks to it 68 of St. Basil. Similarly, Dionysius Exiguus, prefacing it with 50 canons of the Apostles, omits the Ephesine, but appends, over and above the 21 Sardican, no less than 138 African canons: in other words, the entire code of the African Church elsewhere described. Out of these two collections were formed separately, (1) the code of the Roman, and (2) the code of the Greek Church.

1. Dionysius, as we have seen, speaks of an old Latin version anterior to his own; and all he remarks on it is its "confusion." It was first published by Voellus and Henry, son of Christopher, Justellus, A.D. 1661, vol. i. pp. 276-304 of their Bibliotheca Juris Canonici Veteris; and afterwards in a more perfect form by the Ballerini, in their learned disquisitions "De antiquis collectionibus et collectoribus canonum," appended to their edition of the works of St. Leo (Migne's Patrol. lvi. 747-816). It exhibits 24 Ancyran canons, 14 Neocaesarean, 21 Nicene (besides the creed), 21 Sardican, 20 Gangran, 25 Antiochian, 27 Chalcedonian, 4 Constantinopolitan; and then unnumbered, but as though belonging to the last, the 28th canon of Chalcedon, "De primatu ecclesiae Constantinopolitanae." This doubtless was its "confusion" in the eyes of Dionysius; and of course the canons of Constantinople should have preceded those of Chalcedon. But further, at the head of the bishops subscribing to the 28th canon of Chalcedon, immediately before the Roman legates, is Nectarius, who had been previously and rightly mentioned among the framers of the Constantinopolitan canons. Dionysius corrected this inaccuracy by omitting the 28th canon of Chalcedon altogether. The fact of its existence there proves, however, that this old version could not have been very much earlier than that of Dionysius himself, and also that it could never have been of any authority in the Roman Church.

That there was any regularly authorised collection in the Roman Church, in short, before Dionysius brought out his, seems improbable for the very reasons which the Ballerini bring forward in proof of one; namely, that till then the Sardican and Nicene canons, undistinguished from each other, and cited under the latter name, formed its exclusive code: for this rather shews—conformably with what passed between Pope Zosimus and the African church—that up to that time Rome was not conscious of having accepted any but the Nicene canons. At all events, no earlier collection of a public character including more than these, and used there, has been brought to light on their own shewing (x. p. 63-88), as with the collections obtaining in Africa, Spain, Britain, and France we are not concerned. That the want of a similar collection at Rome had been felt, we may infer from the immediate welcome given there to that of Dionysius. Cassiodorus, his contemporary, and a Roman by birth, says in his praise that "he com-

id luckily, and with great flow of eloquence, in Greek sources, those canons which the new church was then embracing, and using largely" (Dion. Lect. c. 23): and Dionysius de them doubly acceptable there by supplementing them with a collection of the decrees of Roman pontiffs from Siricius to Anastasius II., from A.D. 385 to 498; which, in his dedicatory lucio to Julian, "presbyter of the title of St. Anastasia," he says he had arranged on the same as his translation of the canons—a work which he understood had given his friend so much pleasure. Whether Dionysius omitted the canons of Ephesus, as not being canons in the ordinary use of the word—which they are not [CONCIL. N.—or because they were not in the old Latin version, as observed before, or because they were not in the particular Greek version used by him, is not, and probably will never be clear. Again, why he added the Sardican canons, carefully distinguished from the Nicene, another question of some interest. What he says is that he gave them as he found them published, in Latin. Had they not, then, been published in Greek likewise? Certainly, whether published in Greek as well as in Latin originally, translated into Greek since, we know from what John Scholasticus says—of which presently. But there must have been at least one Greek collection of canons extant, at once containing and citing them as the canons of Sardica—not of Nicaea—when he published his, so that it would have been useless for any Latin to have tried to pick up the delusion of their being Nicene ones any longer. But then supposing him to have been willing to do so, had it been possible, his own spontaneous adoption of the African ones would have been a still greater puzzle. If the canons of Sardica distinctly countenance, by making provision for, appeals to Nicaea, the African canons contain the most positive declaration against them to be found in history. [AFRICAN COUNCILS.] By his adoption of the African canons, therefore, which he says cited in Latin, and, as there seems every reason to think, in Latin only then, from their not being cited by John Scholasticus, he placed his own doubt beyond dispute; thus enhancing the intrinsic merits of his collection. How he came by his materials for the second part, or appendix to it, consisting of the decrees of the Roman pontiffs from the end of the 4th to the end of the 5th century, he omits to explain. He merely says that he had inserted all he could find; which is as much as to say, surely, that there is no collection of them extant to his knowledge before his own. That there was one somewhere, notwithstanding, the Ballerini think highly probable (ib. p. 200-6). However, they readily admit that in each case the excellence of his collections was so generally recognized as to make them adopted everywhere. One speedily became known as "Codex Canonum;" the other, "Liber Decretorum;" and both were presented, with some other additions to each, as some think of his own effort or adoption, by Pope Adrian I. to Charlemagne, A.D. 787, with a dedication in verse at all points as from himself, ending in these words: "legem nunquam diaccede, hæc observans statuta." It was printed at Mayence A.D. 1525, and afterwards at Paris, as "Codex vetus ecclesiae Romanae" (Patrol. lat. 135-8, and lvi. 208-11); a title which belonged to it long before then, and, together with all other authentic collections in the West, it had been supplanted gradually by the fraudulent collection known as that of Isidore Mercator, or Peccator, and first published in the latter half of the 9th century.

2. We may now turn to the code of the Greek church, founded, as has been said, on the collection of John Scholasticus ostensibly, though his was not the earliest work of the kind when it came out. Like Dionysius, he speaks of another, or rather of others, who had anticipated him, even in his plan of arranging the canons, not in their chronological order, but according to their subject-matter; the only difference between him and them being that they had made their collection consist of sixty titles; he of fifty; they had omitted the canons of St. Basil; he had supplied them. In other respects his collection included no more than theirs, nor theirs than his: though he considered his own arrangement more intelligible, and the more so as he had given a list at starting of the councils from which he had drawn, and of the number of canons passed by each. In his own language, for instance, the Apostles had published 85 canons through St. Clement; and there had been ten synods since their time, Nicaea, Ancyra, Neocaesarea, Sardica, Gangra, Antioch, Laodicea, Constantinople, Ephesus, and Chalcedon, whose canons together amounted to 224 (their respective numbers have been anticipated): to which he had ventured to append 68 of St. Basil. His position as Patriarch of Constantinople, doubtless, stamped his collection with authority from the first. But, like Dionysius, he rendered it still more acceptable for another reason, namely, that he supplemented it by a second work called his Nomocanon, from containing in addition the laws of the emperors. Thus the imperial decrees became mixed up with the code of the East, just as the papal decrees with that of the West.

The earlier of his collections received authoritative confirmation, as well as enlargement, in the 7th century, by the second of the Trullan canons, given in a former article. [CONCIL. CONSTANT.] And this code was further augmented by the 102 canons then passed, authoritatively received in the 1st canon of the 2nd Nicene, or 7th Council. This Council added 22 canons of its own; and the two Councils of Constantinople, called the 1st and 2nd under Photius, 17 and 3 more respectively: all which were incorporated by Photius into two works of his own, corresponding to those of his predecessor John, already described; one called his Synagoge Canonum, and the other his Nomocanon (Migne's Patrol. Gr. civ. 441-1218). But there is also a third work, distinct from both, attributed to him by Cardinal Mai, being the identical text of the canons of each of the councils previously mentioned, in their chronological order (exhibited by Beveridge, Synod. vol. i.); followed by the canons of the different fathers, enumerated in the 2nd Trullan canon (Synod. vol. ii.), and by the letter of St. Tarasius to Pope Adrian I. against simoniacal ordinations; on which Balammon, Zannaras, and Aristenus afterwards commented, and called his Synagoge Canonum (Patrol. lb. p. 431). Such accordingly was, and, so far as it goes, is still the code of the Greek Church: the differences between it and that of the Roman Church may be

COFFIN. [BURIAL.]

COLIDEI, = Celi-De = Servi Dei (explained also by such authorities as O'Reilly and Curry, as equivalent to Sponsi Dei, but, according to O'Donovan and Reeves, with less probability): in Scotch records, generally, Keledei, which seems the more accurate spelling: in Jocelyn (V. S. Kenleg.), Calidei; in Girald. Camb. and in the Armagh Registers, Colidei, as if Deicolus or Dei Cultores, or (so Girald. Camb.) Culticolus; and in Hector Boece, and from him in Buchanan, and thence in modern writers, corrupted into Culdei or Culdees: at first, simply an Irish rendering of what was an ordinary Latin name for monks, and so used apparently in older Irish documents: but appropriated in Ireland about the latter part of (at least) the 8th century to a specially ascetic order of monks, established by Maclrusin (ob. A.D. 792) at Tamblacht, now Tallaght, near Dublin, whose Rule still exists (Riagail na Ceileo-nne); and of whom it is also possible that some of their peculiar characteristics were borrowed from those of the canons established by Chrodegang of Metz about a quarter of a century earlier, inasmuch as the later Keledei of both Ireland and Scotland did in many points resemble secular canons. The name reappears in Ireland (elsewhere than at Tallaght) in the 10th and 11th centuries. But by this time, in some instances, as at Clonmacnois, the head of the Celi-De was married, and his office hereditary; although there were still instances to the contrary, as in the island in Loch Monaslacha (co. Tipperary), the "Colidei" of which are distinctly called "coelibes" by the contemporary Giraldus Camb. at the end of the 12th century. At Armagh, also, and at Devenish in Loch Erne, the original "Colidei" are found, after Northmen ravages and at later periods, displaced by, but coexisting with, a regular cathedral chapter and a priory of regular canons respectively; while, in other places, they were merged altogether into the chapter. At Armagh, indeed, the Culdee body lasted until the Reformation, and the name until at least A.D. 1628. In Scotland, the name had a parallel but a more notable history. The order seems to have been introduced into that country shortly after A.D. 800. "Calidei," living a specially ascetic life, but as "singulares clerici," and "in singulis casulis," were traditionally the clergy of St. Kentegern's cathedral of Glasgow (Jocel. in V. S. Kenleg.); and a distinct connection is traceable between St. Kentegern and the Irish Church. But the name Keledei occurs historically, as a name for a clerical body of monks, used in Scotland by writers, contemporary (or nearly so), and in charters, from the 9th century; and it becomes thenceforward the name simply of a particular but numerous class of the older monastic bodies of the Irish type, all however north of the Forth, as distinguished 1, from Columbite Monasteries, and 2, from the special Augustinian, Benedictine, and other orders introduced from the end of the 11th century. And inasmuch as most of those older foundations had become lax in discipline, and often consisted of married men who handed on their Culdeeships to their children,—yet at the same time still commonly clerical, although in some cases (like many Scotch monasteries of that date) held and transmitted by lay abbats,—the name came to signify, not (as at first) special asceticism, but precisely the reverse. Accordingly, A.D. 1124–1153, King David commenced the great change, which finally either superseded the Keledei by superadding to them a superior body of regular canons, as at St. Andrews and Dunkeld, or merged the Keledei themselves into the chapter, as at Brechin, Ross, Dunblane, Dornoch, Lismore (Argyll), and the Isles, or into a body of regular canons in no connection with a bishop's see, as at Abernethy, &c. The middle or end of the 13th century appears to have completed in Scotland the suppression of both name and class. The name Colidei occurs also in England at York as early as A.D. 936, as applied to the then officiating clergy of the Minster, who were displaced apparently (like their Scotch brethren) by the arrival of Norman archbishops, but continued under another name (viz. as the hospital of St. Leonard's) until the dissolution under Henry VIII.; the name Colidei being still employed in their chartulary, which was engrossed in the reign of Henry V. (Dugd. Mon. VI. ii. 607). Lastly, the same name is applied by Giraldus Camb. to certain ascetics in the Isle of Bardsey in Wales in the year 1188. Neither in Ireland nor in Scotland is there the slightest trace of foundation, in any really authoritative document, for any supposed peculiarities of doctrine or of church government, derived by Culdees from some Eastern or other source, and handed down by them; nor for any other connection between them and the Columbite monasteries than that both were of Irish type. The abbey of Hy itself was distinctly not Keledean, although at a very late period (A.D. 1184) a subordinate body of Keledei are found in the island. The details however of the great revolution in the organization of the Scotch Church, which involved as part of itself the transformation of the older monastic arrangements into the new, and (more noticeable still) the transfer of jurisdiction from presbyter abbats to diocesan bishops,—both processes implying in the majority of cases the suppression of Keledean foundations,—belong to a period some centuries later than that to which this article refers. As does also, much more, the history of the strange perversions of the facts of the case by combined ignorance and partisanship, which are hardly, it seems, all exploded everywhere even now.

[This account is abridged from Dr. Reeves's carefully exact monograph On the Culdees, Dublin, 1864; to which is subjoined an Appendix of Evidences, conclusively establishing the writer's main positions. There is a candid account of the subject also in Grub's Hist. of the Ch. of Scotland, vol. i., written however before the publication of Dr. Reeves's exhaustive essay; and a brief, and on the whole competent, summary of the case in ch. x. of E. W. Robertson's Early Scotland, written also under the like disadvantage. Earlier writers, as a rule, are not worth mentioning.] [A. W. H.]

teaching, and more especially in the case of the collects for Sundays and holidays,⁶ because it is, as has been said, in many cases the quintessence of the epistle and gospel for the day. Wheatly adopts this view (ch. iii. sect. xix.) with regard to the communion collect, and Archdeacon Freeman⁷ seems decidedly to incline to it, citing Bona (R. L. II. v. § 3) in its support, and saying that at all events it renders very accurately one great characteristic of the collect; or because¹ (2) "colligit orationes" it sums up the prayers of the assembly; but "the communion collect does not sum up any previous petitions," though it might be said to gather and offer up in one comprehensive prayer all the devotional aspirations of the people. And if this be the true idea of the prayer, it must have got the name not from summing up all that had been said in prayer before, for these collectae were sometimes said before the concluding part of the service,⁸ but for the reason just given, that it collects and presents to God in a compendious form all the spoken and unspoken petitions of the congregation to Him. It is a recommendation of this derivation that it applies equally to all prayers of the collect-form, and does not apply only to the communion-collects and leave the etymology of the others undecided, an objection which may be urged against a former derivation (II. 1).

It may be said that both these latter derivations have an ex post facto air, that they are wanting in historical basis, and are just such as would occur to persons who finding the word set themselves to discover the origin of its use from its form; while the first rests on the fact that in the Vulgate,¹ and by the ancient fathers,² the word collect is used to denote the gathering together of the people into religious assemblies, and that in the sacramentary of Gregory a collect is provided to be said "ad collectam ad S. Adrianum."³ Archdeacon Freeman⁴ infers from this that in Gregory's time the ordinary office as distinguished from the communion was called "collecta," and goes on to say, "it is very conceivable that a prayer which, though also said at communion has this as its characteristic that it was designed to impart to the ordinary service the spirit of the eucharistic gospel, would on that account be called collecta," which seems to be rather going out of the way to account for a prayer being called 'collecta oratio' which was said at a service confessedly called 'collecta.' [COLLECTA.]

Whatever may have been the derivation of the word Collecta, it is applied in rituals especially to the following.

1. The prayers which immediately precede the Epistle and Gospel in the Mass. What was the number of these in ancient times is not absolutely certain. In the Sacramentaries of Gregory and Gelasius one is given in each mass; but St. Columbanus was blamed in a Council of Mâcon for having introduced the custom of using several collects, contrary to the general practice of the church, and was defended by Eustasius, his successor in the abbey of Luxeuil (Acta SS. Bened. sec. ii. p. 120). John, abbat of St. Alban's, is said to have limited the number to seven (Matthew Paris in his Life); and the same rule is laid down by the anonymous author of the Speculum Ecclesiae, by Belet (c. 37), and by Durandus (Rationale, iv. 14). The Micrologus (c. 4) lays down that, for mystical reasons, the number of collects should be either one, three, five, or seven. (Martene, De Antiq. Eccl. Rit. i. 133.)

2. In the Hour-offices. Only one collect seems anciently to have been used in each office; for Walafrid Strabo (De Reb. Eccl. c. 22) says that it was usual, not only at Mass but at other assemblies, for the highest in rank of the clergy present to conclude the office with a short prayer, an expression which seems to exclude the supposition that more than one of this kind was used. The assigning the collect to the person of highest rank accords with the injunction of the fifth canon of the first Council of Barcelona (A.D. 540), according to one reading, "episcopo praesente orationes presbyteri non [al. in ordine] colligant." But the monks of the Thebaid seem to have subjoined a collect to each psalm, or in the longer psalms to have inserted two or three collects at intervals (Cassian, De Nocturn. Orat. ii. cc. 8 and 9). Fructuosus of Braga (Regula, c. 3) also testifies to the same practice in Spain. Caesarius of Arles (Ad Monachos, c. 20) enjoined collects to be intermingled with the lections. The Rule of St. Benedict enjoins only that each office be concluded with the Lord's Prayer and missae, meaning no doubt what are elsewhere called orationes; but the practice mentioned by St. Isidore (Regula, c. 7) of mingling collects with the recitation of the psalms, and also concluding the office with them, was very probably in fact the custom of the Benedictine order, though it does not appear distinctly in the Rule; for St. Benedict would scarcely have departed from so general a practice as that of intermingling collects with the psalms, especially as he was much influenced by Egyptian precedent: and this supposition accounts for the fact that in many ancient MS. Benedictine psalters a collect follows each psalm.

It appears from Cassian's testimony (De Noct. Orat. ii. 9) that in the fifth century there was a difference of practice with regard to the manner of saying collects; for some monks threw themselves on their knees to pray immediately after the ending of each psalm; others said a short prayer before kneeling, and knelt for a short time afterwards in silent adoration. During prayer they stood upright, with expanded hands. Similarly Fructuosus of Braga (Regula, c. 3). The Benedictine practice is, that all kneel from the time that the priest says the Kyrie Eleison to the end of the last collect. The collects were said, in accordance with the principle mentioned above, by the abbat, or the brother who presided in his place (Martene De Antiq. Eccl. Ritibus, iii. 15; iv. 12, ed. Venet. 1773). [E. C. H.] pini, Vet. Mon. i. 231). The same circumstance may be noted in the mosaics of the church of St. Vitalis at Ravenna, and elsewhere.

White, sometimes striped with purple [CLAVUS], was the almost invariable colour of ministerial vestments for all ranks of the ministry in the early ages of Christianity (Marriott, Vestiarium Christ. p. xxii.), as it is still for the alb, the amice, and the surplice.

White, the symbol of purity, was worn by the newly baptized during the eight days which followed their baptism.

It appears also from the evidence both of literature and art that the dead were shrouded in white linen. In a fragment of ancient glass figured by Buonarrotti (Vetri, tav. vii. fig. 1) the grave-clothes of Lazarus are of silver, while the rest of the figures are in gold; and in the Menologium of Basil the bodies of Adauctus (Oct. 4) and Philaret (Dec. 2) are represented as wrapped in white. Prudentius (Cathemerinon, x. 57) and Sulpicius Severus (Vita S. Martini, c. 12) also allude to the white colour of grave-clothes.

(2) Red is the colour of ardent love. Hence the Lord in performing works of mercy is sometimes represented clad in a red tunic or pallium, and also in "sending fire upon earth" by the mission of the apostles (Ciampini, Vet. Mon. i. tabb. lxxiii. lxxxvi. lxxvii.). Arculf (in Bede, Hist. Angl. v. 16) describes the "monument and sepulchre" of the Lord at Jerusalem as being white and reddish (rubicundo).

Angels are sometimes found on ancient monuments represented with red wings, whether as the symbol of love or of flame, according to one of the derivations of the word seraph. This is the case for instance in the vaults of St. Vitalis at Ravenna (Ciampini, Vet. Mon. ii. 65).

(3) Green, the colour of living vegetation, seems to have been adopted as a symbol of life, and hence is employed to denote the full abounding life of the angels. See Dionysius the Areopagite, De Hierarch. Coelest. xv. § 7. Hence, angels and saints are not unfrequently clothed in green, especially St. John the Evangelist. The Virgin Mary is also sometimes clothed in this colour. And the Lord Himself is occasionally represented in a green robe as symbolizing the life which is in Him.

(4) Violet, the mixture of red and black, has been thought to symbolize the union of love and pain in repentance. It symbolizes, at all events, something of sorrow; hence some monuments, as the mosaic of St. Michael at Ravenna (Ciampini, Vet. Mon. ii. p. 63, tav. xvii.) and that of St. Ambrose at Milan (Ferrari, S. Ambrogio, p. 156) represent the Man of Sorrows in a violet robe. The sorrowing mother of the Lord is also sometimes represented in violet, and St. John Baptist the preacher of repentance. Angels also wear violet when they call men to repentance, or share in the sorrows of the Lord.

Abbots of the order of St. Benedict wore violet up to modern times, when they adopted black. In ancient times virgins of recluse life wore violet veils (Jerome, Epist. 22, ad Eustochium).

COLUMBARIUM. This word can only find its place in a Dictionary of Christian Antiquities, in order that opportunity may be given to pronounce a decided opinion on the untenableness of the view propounded by Keyssler, and since revived by Mr. J. H. Parker and others, that this distinctively pagan arrangement, essentially belonging to the practice of burning the dead, which was held by the Christians in such abhorrence ("execrantur rogos et damnant ignium sepulturas," Minuc. Fel.), is ever found within the limits of, or in close connection with a Christian catacomb. The misconception has arisen from the fact that the Christian excavators in carrying forward their subterranean galleries not unfrequently came into contact with the walls of a heathen columbarium. As soon as this unintentional interference with the sanctity of the tomb was discovered, the *fossore*s proceeded to repair their error. The gallery was abruptly closed, and a wall was built at its end to shut it off from the columbarium. Padre Marchi describes his discovery of a gallery in the cemetery of St. Agnese closed in this way with a ruined wall, on the other side of which was a plundered columbarium (Monum. Primit. p. 61). This is probably the true explanation of the fact that a passage has been found connecting a large heathen tomb full of columbaria on the Via Appia, near the Porta San Sebastiano, with a catacomb. (Marchi, Monum. Prim. pp. 61 sq.; Roestell, Beschreib. der Stadt Rom, pp. 389-390; Raoul-Rochette, Tableau des Catacombes, p. 283). [E. V.]

ness. The first mention of the use of a seal-ring occurs, it is believed, in Augustine (Epist.
59; al. 217*).

3. From the use of the letters as admitting clergy or laymen to communion they were known as κοινωνική, and are so described by Cyril of Alexandria (Act. Ephes. p. 282). The corresponding Latin, communicatorias, appears in the Council of Elvira (c. 25), Augustine (Epist. 43;

4. The ἐπιστολὴ εἰρημική appear to be distinguished from the συστατική as commending the bearer for eleemosynary aid. They are to be given to the poor and those who need help, clerics or laymen (C. Chalced. c. 11), especially, according to the Greek canonists (Zonaras ad Can. ii. C. Chalced.), to those who had suffered oppression at the hands of civil magistrates.
The word is used also by the Council of Antioch
(c. 7, 8), already quoted as applied to letters which might be given by presbyters as well as bishops.

5. There were the ἐπιστ. ἀπολυτική, the "letters dismissory" of modern times. The word is of later use than the others, and occurs first in the Council in Trullo (c. 17), in a context which justifies the distinction drawn by Suicer (s. v. ἀπολυτική), that it was used in reference to a permanent settlement of the bearer, the συστατική, when the sojourn in another diocese was only temporary. [E. H. P.]

COMMERCE. It would be difficult to find in either the Old or the New Testament any passage in disparagement of trade, whether combined or not with a handicraft. In the Old Testament, if the calling of Bezaleel and Aholiab puts the highest honour on the skill of the artisan, the ordinary processes of trade are no less sanctified by connecting them with God Himself and His law in such passages as those of Lev. xix. 35-6; Deut. xxv. 13-15; Prov. xi. 1, xvi. 10, 23, xxxi. 24; Micah vi. 11.
Nor is it amiss to observe that the Jewish custom which prevails to this day, of bringing up every boy without exception to a business, trade or handicraft, appears to be an immemorial one, and may serve to explain both the calling by our Lord of fishermen-apostles, His own training as a handicraftsman (Mark vi. 3), and the tent-making of Paul, Aquila, and Priscilla (Acts xviii.
3). No incompatibility, therefore, between the exercise of a trade and the Christian calling, whether as a layman or as a member of the clergy, can be coeval with the Church, and all legislation to this effect must belong to what may be termed the secondary, not the primary, era of its development. It must, moreover, be observed that the places in which the Gospel seems to have preferably taken root were busy commercial cities, such as Antioch, Corinth, Ephesus; and it is a remarkable fact that the age in which Christianity first forced itself on the notice of the Pagan world, and was honoured with imperial persecution, the time of Nero, was also one of great commercial activity, as may be seen from the account, chiefly derived from Pliny, of the new trades and inventions introduced under Nero, contained in the "Anecdota de Nerone" annexed to Naudet's Tacitus, vol. v. p. 181 and fol. (Paris, 1820).

the same emperor, A.D. 361, which however does not seem to have been retained in his Code by Justinian (Cod. Theod. bk. xvi. t. ii. l. 15), exempted clerics from "sordid offices" as well as from the imposition of the collatio, "if by very small trade they acquire to themselves poor food and clothing;" but others, whose names are of the register of merchants, at the time when the collatio takes place, "must acknowledge the duties and payments of merchants." We see thus that trader-clerics were of all degrees, from the humblest traffickers to considerable merchants.

The 43rd Novel "De officinis sive tabernis Constantinopolitanæ urbis," &c., and the 59th, "De debita impensâ in exequiis defunctorum," indicate to us the extent of the trade which was carried on in the Eastern capital on behalf of the Church, and the singular character of a portion of it. In consideration of the cathedral church undertaking what in modern French parlance would be termed the "Pompes Funèbres" of the city, Constantine granted to it 980 ergasteria or workshops, of the various trades ("ex diversis corporibus") of the city, to be held free of all tax; Anastasius added 150 more (Preface to Nov. 59). The total number of these cathedral ergasteria or officinae, as the 43rd novel terms them, seems from the preface to the latter to have practically sunk to 1100 (perhaps by failure of trade, see nov. 59, c. ii., which says that even of the reduced number "plurima ceciderunt"), at which figure it is fixed by both novels, the earlier one being grounded on the complaints of the collegiati—say the guilds of the city—that the number of tax-free establishments was ruining them. But all other officinae of the 14 wards ("regiones") of the city, whether belonging to any church, hospital, monastery, orphan-home, poor-house, or to any other person, were required to bear all public impositions. And in speaking of these officinae the word tavern occurs, not only as above-shown in the title, but in the body of the law (c. i. § 3). Strange therefore as may seem to us the idea of a church or cathedral bakery or pothouse, it is clear that in the 6th century a very considerable amount of trade, including the liquor-traffic, was carried on on behalf of the Church and its charitable establishments in the capital of the Eastern empire.

If we turn from the Roman to the barbarian world, the barbarian codes till the time of Charlemagne scarcely contain an allusion to trade, except, perhaps, in reference to loans, pledges, or debts—see for instance the Wisigothic laws, bk. v. tt. 5, 6. Under the rule of the Ostrogoths in Italy, the Formulary of Cassiodorus indicates that the armourers were still considered as a militia ("militibus et et fabris armorum . . . præfecimus" pt. ii. c. 18, "de armorum factoribus"). Under the Lombards, a law of Notharis (A.D. 638 or 643) refers to the building trade in dealing with accidents among masons, and uses a term (magistri Comacini) which shows that this class of workmen were then drawn mainly from the same locality (the neighbourhood of Como), which mainly furnishes them still to Northern Italy (c. 144, and foll.; and see c. 152, as to accidents among other workmen). Somewhat later again, the growth of trade and industry under the Lombards is indicated by a singular law of Liutprand (bk. iii. c. 4, A.D. 717), enacting that if any man leave his wife for trade or for the exercise of an art, and do not return after three years, his wife may apply to the king for leave to re-marry. Foreign trade is referred to by the Wisigothic code (bk. xi. t. 3) in a law "on traders from beyond the sea," which enacts that if such traders have a matter between themselves, none of the king's household shall presume to hear them, but let them be heard according to their own laws only by their toll-takers ("apud telonarios suos").

The legislation of the Church bears much more on commercial matters than that of the barbarian kingdoms, and we have now to consider its history.

One form of trade, it may be observed, was always forbidden by the church, that of earning a livelihood by usury. [See USURY.] In other respects it was long before trade was deemed by the Church itself incompatible with clerical functions; though the fathers might inveigh against it as a form of worldliness; as when Cyprian in his work De Lapsis, written about A.D. 251, speaks of those who "watch like fowlers for gainful markets." (Comp. Ep. 15.) The growth of some general feeling on the subject is, however, to be traced in the 18th canon of the Council of Eliberis, A.D. 305, by which bishops, priests, and deacons are forbidden to depart from their places for the sake of trade, or to go round the provinces seeking lucrative markets. To obtain their livelihood they may indeed send a son, a freedman, an agent (mercenario), a friend, or anyone else; and if they wish to trade, let them trade within the province—the main object of the canon being clearly to preserve to their flocks the benefits of their ministrations, not to put dishonour on trading itself.

A collection of decrees of very doubtful authority, attributed to the Nicene Council, which will be found in Labbé and Mansi's Councils, vol. ii. p. 1029, and foll. under the title: "Sanctiones et decreta alia ex quatuor regularum ad Constantinum libris excerpta," contains amongst its "statutes for priests" (c. 14) a provision that the priest shall not be a barber, a surgeon, or a worker in iron (ferramentarius), the two former prohibitions turning probably on blood-letting in its most literal form, the latter on the providing instruments for bloodshed. The 4th Council of Carthage, 397, forbids clerics to go to markets, except to buy, under pain of degradation (c. 48), but at the same time enacts that "a cleric, however learned in the word of God, shall seek his livelihood by means of a handicraft, artificio" (c. 51), that "a cleric shall provide for himself food and clothing by a handicraft or by agriculture, without detriment to his office" (c. 52), and that "all clerics who have strength to work should learn both handicrafts (artificiola) and letters" (c. 53); provisions all nearly equivalent and which confirm the opinion that the canons of this and other Carthaginian Councils represent rather the whole collection of rules by which the African church was governed at their respective dates than specific enactments of those dates. They appear, indeed, to indicate that, at all events in this quarter of the church, a distinction was being taken between trade and handicrafts, and that the exercise of the former by

by reason of its distracting the minister his sacred functions, as on account of a sed inherent dishonour attached to it. the distinction is in itself a result of the rising of the church may be inferred from parison with civil legislation. The ultra-d officialism of the later Roman empire, made the sovereign the only source of ir, and excluded the independent trader (one lly rich class excepted), even from the y civil militia, let alone the military x itself, on the one hand—the rude savagery ; barbarian on the other, which looked upon and warlike sports as the only employments y of a man, and almost utterly ignored in ation the very existence of the trader— both, whatever phenomena to the con- may present themselves in Justinian's have reacted profoundly upon the spirit e church. The service of God, which soon ed the title of a militia, must have the siveness of one, whether the term were in the Roman official sense or in the ke barbarian one; whatever was incom- le with the dignity of the functionary rthly sovereign, of the soldier of an earthly must be incompatible also with that of a ter of God, a soldier in His host. At the time, the influence of this distinction had one so far as to exclude the whole realm de from church solicitude, and it is remark- o observe in the canons of French Councils e beginning of the 9th century similar ments against dishonesty in trade to those e Pentateuch. he has taken the ablutions. It is so called, be- cause it was originally appointed to be sung during the communion of the people, and was sung antiphonally after each verse of a psalm, which was continued till the priest gave the signal for the Gloria, when the communion of the people was ended (Ordo Rom. iil. 18). "De- bent omnes communicare interim cum Antiphona cantatur, quae de Communionis nomen mutuavit, cui et Paulinus subiungendus est cum Gloria Patri, si necesse fuerit" (Microf. de Eccl. Obsere. cap. 18). Afterwards the Communio was looked upon more as an act of thanksgiving, to be said after the communion. It varies with the day. That for the Missa in nocte Nat. Dom. is: "In splendoribus sanctorum ex utero ante luciferum genui te."

(3) An anthem in the Mozarabic missal sung by the choir after the communion has taken place. There are only two forms: one used in Lent, the other during the rest of the year. This latter is: "Refecti corpore et sanguine te Laudamus Domine. All: All: All:" [H. J. H.]

COMMUNION, HOLY. The present article does not treat of the whole of what in England is generally called the Communion Office or Service (see LITURGY), but of that portion of it which immediately relates to the distribution and reception of the consecrated elements in the Eucharist.

NAMES.—Κοινωνία, τῶν μυστηρίων κοινωνία (Chrysostom); μυστήριον συνάξεως or κοινωνίας, θεαρχική κοινωνία (Dionysius Areop.); μετάληψις ἁγιασμάτων, εὐχαριστίας, μυστηρίου; ἁγία or μυστική μετάληψις. The verb κοινωνεῖν is used absolutely to describe participation of the Eucharist (Basil, Chrysostom), and also with a substantive descriptive of the sacred feast, as μυστικῆς κοινωνεῖν θυσίας (Philostorgius). So μετέχειν εὐχαριστίας (Conc. Nic. 1. c. 13); and μεταλαμβάνειν, absolutely (Theophylact), or with a substantive, as ἀχράτου θύματος μεταλαβεῖν (Philostorg.), τοῦ θεσποτικῆς σάματος καὶ αἵματος μεταλαμβάνειν (Theodoret).

Communio, communicatio; they who partake of the consecrated elements are said communicare, absolutely (e.g. IV. Conc. Tolet. c. 18). The leading notion implied in the use of these words is expressed by Isidore of Pelusium (Ep. 228) thus: "quia nobis conjunctionem cum Deo conciliat, nosque reguli ipsius consortes ac participes reddit;" by Papias (in Ducange, s. v. Communio), thus: "Communio dicitur spiritualis esca, quia in commune ad vivificandas animas a cunctis percipitur dignis." Other terms are perceptio Corporis et Sanguinis, participatio. The word accipere is used to designate the act of taking the bread or the chalice into the hands; sumere or consumere, the act of eating or drinking the particle or the wine.

The word communicare is also used actively, to denote the act of presenting the consecrated Bread; the deacons following with the cup are said confirmare Sanguine Domini, or confirmare simply: "Episcopi communicant populum; post eos diaconi confirmant;" "subdiaconus regionarius . . . confirmat populum" (Ordo Rom. I. c. 20). The word is used no doubt to signify the completing or perfecting of the act of communion (Micrologus, c. 19).

In the later Apost. Constitutions (viii. 14, § 3), after the Sancta Sanctis, the directions proceed: "And after this let the bishop partake, then the presbyters and the deacons, and subdeacons, and the readers, and the chanters, and the ascetics; and of the women's side, the deaconesses and the virgins and the widows; then the children, then all the people, with reverence and godly fear, without disturbance. And let the bishop minister the oblation (προσφοράν, i. e. the Bread) saying, 'The Body of Christ,' and let him that receiveth say Amen; and let the deacon hold the cup, and say as he administers, 'The Blood of Christ, the Cup of Life,' and let him that drinketh say Amen. And let the 33rd Psalm [34th E.V.] be said while the rest are partaking (ἐν τῷ μεταλαμβάνειν): and when all the men and women have partaken, let the deacons take what remains over and bear it into the sacristy (τὰ παστοφóρια)." Then followed thanksgiving, prayer, benediction, and dismissal.

In the Liturgy of St. James, the Sancta Sanctis is followed by Fraction and Commixtion; then the priest, after saying the prayer before reception, administers to the clergy; the antiphon "O taste and see" is sung; when the deacons take up the patens and the cups to administer to the people, the priest utters an ascription of glory to God: special forms of "Gloria" are also given to accompany the placing of the sacred vessels on the side-table or credence (παρατράπεζον), for taking them up again, and for placing them on the Holy Table; but no formula of administration is given either in the Greek or Syriac form of the liturgy.

In the Liturgy of St. Mark, after the Sancta Sanctis and Fraction, the priest communicates, saying the prayer "According to Thy mercy," or "Like as the hart desireth the water-brooks." And when he administers the Bread to the clergy, he says, "The Holy Body;" on administering the cup, "The precious Blood of our Lord and God and Saviour." Then follow thanksgiving, prayer, and dismissal. The form for the communion of the people was in all probability the same as that for the clergy.

In that of St. Basil, after the Sancta Sanctis stands the rubric, "Then the communion (μεταλήψεως) being completed, and the Holy Mysteries lifted from the Holy Table, the priest prays;" then follow thanksgiving, prayer, and dismissal.

In the much more fully developed Byzantine Liturgy (St. Chrysostom's), the priest elevating the Bread says the Sancta Sanctis, to which the usual response is given, and the choir chants the communion-antiphon of the day or the saint. Then follow Fraction and Commixtion, and the peculiar rite of pouring a few drops of boiling water into the chalice; then "the Priest, taking the Holy Bread, gives it to the deacon; and the deacon, saluting the hand that imparts it to him, takes the Holy Bread, saying, 'Impart (μετάδος) to me, sir, the precious and holy Body of our Lord and God and Saviour Jesus Christ.' And the Priest says, 'To N., sacred deacon (ἐποδιακόνῳ), is imparted the precious and holy and undefiled Body of our Lord and God and Saviour Jesus Christ, for forgiveness of sins and life eternal.' And he passes behind the Holy Table, bowing his head, and prays as the priest does. In like manner the priest, taking one particle of the Holy Bread, says, 'The precious and all-holy Body of our Lord and God and Saviour Jesus Christ is imparted to me, N., priest, for forgiveness of sins and life eternal.' Then, bowing his head low, he prays." Then follow directions for replacing the vessels on the Holy Table. Then the door of the sanctuary (βῆμα), within which the actions previously described have taken place, is opened, and the deacon standing in the doorway elevates the cup. This rubric follows: "Be it known that if there are any who desire to partake, the priest takes the Holy Cup^b from the hands of the deacon and imparts to them, saying: 'The servant of God N. partakes of the precious and holy Body and Blood of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ for forgiveness of his sins and life eternal.'" Then, after a blessing, the priest and deacon return to the Holy Table, and rubrics follow prescribing the various observances with which the sacred vessels are carried to the sacristy.

Of the Western rites, we will speak first of the Roman.

After the Libera nos of the CANON follow the Kiss of Peace and the breaking or FRACTION of the Host, during which the AGNUS DEI was said.

Then, in the ancient form of Papal Mass, a deacon (or, according to the Ordines V. and VI., an acolyth) bore the paten to the Pope's seat, west of the altar; the Pontiff awaited his coming, standing up with folded hands; he bit a portion from the oblate on the paten, and placed the oblate in the chalice held by the archdeacon; from this chalice he partook of the Wine by means of a gold or silver pipe [FISTULA].

When the Pontiff has communicated, the archdeacon draws near the horn of the altar (Ordo Rom. I. c. 20; II. c. 14), and pours a little of the wine from the chalice which had been used in consecration into the cup (scyphum) held by an acolyth; then the bishops approach to receive the communion from the hands of the Pontiff; then the presbyters in like manner (O. R. I. u. s.); according to the Ordo R. II. the presbyters drew near not to the Papal seat but to the altar to communicate. The Ordo V. describes the manner of communicating with more detail: "let the presbyters also drawing near communicate, to whom the bishop gives the Holy Body into their hands, and let them go to the left-hand horn^c of the altar and kiss it, and communicate. In like manner after them let the deacons communicate." The Ordo VI. makes the distinction that subdeacons are to receive the Body into their mouths, while the higher orders receive it into their hands.

distinctly orders all to communicate when consecration was completed, if they would not be cast out of the church. The decree is of course spurious; but it is interesting as indicating what was the law of the Roman Church at the time of the laiderian forgeries (about 830), and also probably that the practice of non-communicating attendance had then begun; for the decree would not have been put forth without a purpose. One class of persons only seems to have been permitted in ancient times to be present at Holy Communion without communicating—the consistentes (συνεστηκότες) or fourth class of penitents, who were permitted to be present at the whole service, but not to make oblation or to communicate. See Conc. Nicæ. c. 11; Ancyra, c. 8; Basil, Ep. Canon. c. 56.

Communion under both kinds.—That in the solemn public administration of the Lord's Supper the laity received under both kinds from the foundation of the Church of Christ to the 12th century is admitted on all hands. (See Mabillon, Acta SS. Bened. Saec. III. praef. c. 75.) The danger of spilling the consecrated wine led to the adoption of a tube, or FISTULA, through which it might be drawn.

When this practice too was found to have its peculiar disadvantages, the custom sprang up in some churches, and continues in the East to this day, of administering to the people the Eucharistic Bread dipped in the consecrated wine, in which case the particle was administered by means of a SPOON, made for that purpose. This practice seems to be alluded to in the first canon of the 3rd Council of Braga (A.D. 675), which condemns those who were accustomed "intinctam eucharistiam populo pro complemento communionis porrigere." In this case, we are not to understand that the administration of the immersed particle was over and above communion proper, for the later portion of the canon distinctly implies that this "intincta eucharistia" was substituted for the evangelical practice of administering separately the bread and the cup. How this practice, which was condemned in the West as schismatical and against apostolic tradition, came to be so widely spread in the East is difficult to say. That in the time of Chrysostom the deacon still ministered the cup to the people may be shown by various passages in his works, which proves that the administration of "eucharistia intincta" had not then begun in the Byzantine Church. Nor is it easy to say when it was introduced. This manner of communicating was widely prevalent in ancient times in the case of sick persons [SICK, COMMUNION OF].

Posture of Reception.—All the testimonies of ancient writers adduced in this article, so far as they determine anything on the point, describe the communicants as receiving standing. As this was the usual posture of prayer and praise on every Lord's Day and during the Easter solemnities, the faithful would naturally communicate standing on such days. Nor are testimonies wanting that the same was true of other days also, though these concern rather the Eastern than the Western Church (Bona, De Reb. Lit. ii. c. 17, § 8; Valesius on Euseb. H. E. vii. 9). In a Pontifical Mass at Rome, the deacon still communicates standing, a relic no doubt of the ancient practice. On other occasions, the celebrant alone communicates standing, the rest, whether clergy or laity, kneeling. Dr. Neale (Eastern Ch. introd. p. 524) mentions a capital at Rheims, probably of the 12th century, which represents a standing communion.

Delivery of the Bread into the Hand.—There is abundant proof, besides that already adduced, that the Eucharistic bread was in ancient times delivered into the hands of communicants. Thus, Ambrose (in Theodoret, Hist. Eccl. v. 17) asks Theodosius, after the massacre of Thessalonica, how he could venture to receive the Lord's Body with hands still dripping from the slaughter of the innocent; and Augustine (c. Litt. Petilian. ii. 23) speaks of a bishop in whose hands his correspondent used to place the Eucharist, and receive it into his own hands from him in turn; and Basil (Ep. 289) says that in the church the priest delivers a portion of the Eucharist into the hand, and the communicant carries it to his mouth with his own hand. Chrysostom (Hom. 20, ad Pop. Antioch. c. 7) speaks of the need of having clean hands, considering what they may bear. The narrative in Sozomen (H. E. viii. 5) of a transaction of Chrysostom's describes a woman after receiving the bread into her hand bowing her head as if to pray (ἐν εὐχαρίστῳ ἀνέκλυσσε), and passing on the particle she had received to her maid-servant.

The 101st canon of the Trullan Council (an. 692) reprehends a practice which had sprung up of providing receptacles of gold or other precious material for the reception of the Eucharist. After insisting on the truth, that man is more precious than fine gold, the canon proceeds: "if any man desires to partake of the immaculate Body . . . let him draw near, disposing his hands in the form of a cross, and so receive the communion of the divine grace;" and priests who gave the Eucharist into such receptacles (δοχεῖα) were to be excommunicated. John of Damascus also (de Fid. Orthod. iv. 14) desires Christians to dispose their hands in the form of a cross to receive the body of the Crucified. His contemporary Bede (Hist. Eccl. iv. 24) describes Caedmon on his deathbed (about 680) as receiving the Eucharist into his hand. As he mentions this without comment, it was no doubt the practice of his own time also.

Before the end of the 6th century women were forbidden to receive the Eucharist on the naked hand, and were compelled to receive it on a napkin called DOMINICALE. See Conc. Antisiod. [AUXERRE], canons 36 and 42. Caesarius of Arles, in a sermon printed as St. Augustine's (Serm. 252, de Tempore), exhorts the women to have their hearts as clean as the napkin which they brought to receive the Body of Christ. The Greek Fathers however say nothing of any such practice, and the censure of the Trullan Council would evidently apply as well to linen as to other materials.

How long the custom of giving the Eucharist into the hands of lay persons continued in the Roman Church cannot be precisely determined. Gregory the Great (Dialogus, iii. c. 3) asserts indeed that Pope Agapetus (535-536) placed the Eucharist in the mouth of a certain dumb and lame person; but from a case so peculiar nothing can be concluded, except that the express men-evening communion. But the necessity of communicating fasting does not appear to be distinctly recognised before the 4th century. Then we find Basil (Hom. ii. De Jejuniis, p. 13) laying it down that no one would venture to celebrate the mysteries otherwise than fasting; and Chrysostom (in 1 Cor. Hom. 27, p. 231) insisting on fasting as a necessary preliminary to worthy communion; and again (Ad pop. Antioch. Serm. 9, p. 103) exhorting even those who were not fasting to come to church, not indeed to communicate but to hear the sermon; and again (Ep. 125, p. 683) complaining that his calumniators accused him of having admitted to communion persons who were not fasting, a charge which he denies with the strongest asseverations. We have already seen that Ambrose recommended the faithful to fast even until evening, when the communion was late. A remarkable passage of Augustine (Ep. 118, c. 6; p. 191, ed. Cologne, 1616) is conclusive as to the practice of his own time. "It is beyond dispute," he says, "that when the disciples first received the Body and Blood of the Lord, they did not receive fasting. Are we therefore to blame the whole Church because every one does receive fasting? No; for it pleased the Holy Spirit that, in honour of so mighty a sacrament, the Body of the Lord should pass the Christian's lips before other food; for it is on that account that that custom is observed throughout the whole world . . . The Lord did not prescribe in what order it should be received, that He might reserve this privilege for the Apostles, through whom He was to regulate the churches; for if He had recommended that it should always be received after other food, I suppose that no one would have deviated from that practice." With respect to his correspondent's question, as to the custom to be followed on the Thursday in Holy Week with regard to morning or evening communion, or both, he admits that the practice of the Church did not condemn communion on that day after the evening meal.

This rule, however, was not quite invariable. In Augustine's lifetime—as appears from the epistle just quoted—the custom prevailed that on the Thursday in Holy Week, the anniversary of the institution, the faithful received Holy Communion in the evening and after eating. So the Codex Canonum Eccl. Afric. (canon 41; = III. Conc. Carth. c. 29) provides, "ut sacramenta altaris non nisi a jejuniis hominibus celebrentur, excepto uno die anniversario quo Coena Domini celebretur." A canon of Laodicea (c. 50) which is sometimes quoted as directed against this custom, simply refers to the habit into which some had fallen of breaking their Lent-fast on the Thursday in the last week, not specially to non-fasting communion; but the Council in Trullo (can. 29), in the year 680, did expressly forbid the celebration of the mysteries even on this Thursday by any but fasting men.

Socrates (Hist. Eccl. v. 22, p. 295) expressly states that the inhabitants of that part of Egypt which borders on Alexandria and of the Thebaid had a celebration of the Eucharist on Saturday, as others had; but that, contrary to the general custom, they communicated after taking their evening meal without stint.

Regulations intended to check the practice of non-fasting communion were made in Gaul in the 6th century. The council of Auxerre (can. 19; Bruns's Can. ii. 239) enjoined that no presbyter, deacon, or subdeacon should venture to take part in the office of the mass, or to stand in the church while mass was said, after taking food or wine. The reason for the latter clause was no doubt that clerics who were present at mass always in those days communicated. The 2nd Council of Mâcon in the year 585 (Conc. Matisconense ii. can. 9; in Bruns's Canones, ii. 251) expressly forbade any presbyter full of food or under the influence of wine (crapulatus vino) to handle the sacrifice or celebrate mass; referring to the African canon already quoted. In Spain decrees on this subject were made by the 1st Council of Braga (can. 16), and the second (can. 10) in the years 563 and 572 respectively (Bruns, ii. 32 and 42). The first of these anathematizes those who, instead of celebrating mass fasting in the church at three in the afternoon of Maundy Thursday, celebrated on that day masses for the dead at nine in the morning without fasting, after the Priscillianist fashion. The second, by occasion of those who consecrated masses for the dead after having taken wine, condemns those who ventured to consecrate after having taken any food whatever. Walafrid Strabo (de Off. Divinis, c. 19), referring to the first of these, rightly infers that if non-fasting communion was not permitted on a day when the practice of the law and a certain degree of precedent might be pleaded, it was not permitted on other days. The abuse censured by the second council probably arose from the late hour at which masses for the dead were held and the presence of the priest at the funeral-feast. The Codex Eccl. Afric. (can. 41 = III. Carth. c. 29) had already provided that services for the dead held in the afternoon should consist of prayers only, without sacrifice, if the clerics who performed the service were found to have taken food. Gratian (under Presbyter, dist. 91, quoted by Bona, R. L. i. c. 21, § 2) refers to a council of Nantes or Agde, which enjoined priests to remain fasting until the hour fixed, in order that they might be able to take part in the funeral-mass.

In two cases only non-fasting communion is expressly permitted. The first is, when the necessity suddenly arises of administering the Viaticum to one in the article of death; in which case it is sanctioned, says Cardinal Bona (R. L. i. 21, 2), by the practice of the whole Church. The second is, when the celebrating priest, from sudden sickness, is unable to finish the office; in which case, if the elements have been consecrated, another priest, even though he be not fasting, may complete it. See the second canon of the 7th Council of Toledo (Bruns's Can. i. 262) of the year 646, which at the same time enjoins most earnestly that neither shall a priest resign the unfinished service nor a non-fasting priest take it up without the most absolute necessity. And to prevent such cases, the 11th Council of Toledo (A.D. 675) ordered (can. 2, p. 315) that wherever it was possible the priest saying mass should be attended by another, fasting, who might take up the service in case of need.

TIME OF COMMUNION.

1. Days.—The well-known passage in the Acts of the Apostles (ii. 46) is commonly held to prove that the "breaking of bread" for Holy Communion took place daily in the primitive Church. In the only case in which a particular day is mentioned in the Acts on which bread was broken solemnly (xx. 7), the day is the Lord's Day, the first day of the week; and it seems probable that St. Paul, when he prescribed the laying by for the poor on the first day of the week, designed to associate almsgiving with the Eucharist. The Bithynian Christians (Pliny, Ep. x. 97) met on a fixed day for worship and communion; the expression "stato die," which determines nothing as to the particular day of the week, shows plainly that communion was not daily (see Mosheim, Institutiones Majores, p. 378 f.). Justin Martyr (Apol. I. c. 67) distinctly mentions Sunday (ἡ λεγομένη ἡλίου ἡμέρα) as the day of Christian Communion; the day on which God made the light and on which Christ rose from the dead. There is, in fact, no reason to doubt that from the first "Lord's Day" to the present time Christians have met on the first day of the week to "break bread" as the Lord commanded.

The days which next appear as dedicated to Holy Communion are the fourth and sixth days of the week, the Dies Stationum [STATIO]. These days appear as days of special observance and administration of Holy Communion in the time of Tertullian (De Oratione, c. 14). Basil (Ep. 289) adds to these days the Sabbath, or seventh day of the week, which has always been a day of special observance in the Eastern Church. "We communicate," he says, "four times in the week, on the Lord's Day, the fourth day, the Preparation Day [i.e. Friday], and the Sabbath." But this was not a universal custom; for Epiphanius (Expositio Fidei, c. 22, p. 1104) speaks as if the celebrations (συνάξεις) of the Wednesday, Friday, and Sunday were alone usual in his time and within his knowledge, which included a large part of the East during the latter portion of the 4th century. The Synod of Laodicea, about A.D. 320 [al. 372], enjoins that bread should not be offered in Lent, except on the Sabbath and on the Lord's Day; the Sabbath being in the East a festival approaching in joyfulness to the Lord's Day. In the West, where the Sabbath was generally a day of humiliation, there is no trace of its being preferred for the celebration of Holy Communion.

When Christianity became the recognised religion of the empire, daily celebration of the Eucharist soon became usual. For the Church of Constantinople this is proved by the testimony of Chrysostom, who (in Ephes. Hom. iii. p. 23) complains of the rarity of communicants at the daily offering. St. Augustine testifies (Ep. 98, c. 9) that in Africa, in his time, Christ was sacrificed (immolari) every day for the people; yet he also proves (Ep. 118 ad Januarium) that this was by no means a universal custom, saying, "in some places no day passes without an offering; in others offering is made on the Sabbath only and the Lord's Day; in others on the Lord's Day only." That the daily sacrifice was observed in the Spanish Church at the end of the 4th century we have the testimony of the 1st Council of Toledo (circ. 398), which enjoins (canon 5) all clerics to be present in church at the time of the daily sacrifice. With regard to the Roman Church, Jerome, writing to Lucinius (Ep. 71) refers to a question which his correspondent had asked, whether the Eucharist were to be received daily, "according to the custom which the Churches of Rome and Spain are said to observe." Although the expression used is not absolutely decisive, Jerome seems to write as if the custom of Rome was in fact the same as that of Spain, where, as we have seen, the daily sacrifice was customary at the time when he wrote. Yet Socrates (Hist. Eccl. v. 22, p. 295) assures us that, at Alexandria and Rome, ancient tradition still forbade to celebrate the joyful feast of the Eucharist on the Sabbath, as was the universal custom elsewhere. Athanasius, it is true, if the treatise in question be his (On the Parable of the Sower, Opp. iv. 45), says that Christians met together on the Sabbath to adore Jesus, the Lord of the Sabbath; but this proves nothing as to the celebration of the Eucharist, and consequently does not invalidate Socrates' testimony. Socrates also (l. c.) mentions as a peculiar custom, that at Alexandria, on Wednesday and Friday, the Scriptures are read and the teachers interpret them, and all is done that pertains to a meeting of the congregation, short of the celebration of the mysteries (πάντα τὰ συνάξεως γίνεται δίχα τῆς τῶν μυστηρίων τελετῆς). The words of Innocent I. (ad Decentium, c. 4), that on the Friday and the Sabbath in the Holy Week no sacraments were to be celebrated, because those two days of the first Holy Week were spent by the Apostles in grief and terror, probably imply that in ordinary weeks the sacraments were celebrated on the Sabbath as on other days; and in the so-called Comes Hieronymi Epistles and Gospels are given for Sabbaths as well as other days (see Quesnel, De Jejuniis Sabbathi Romae celebrato). On the want of proper offices in the ancient Sacramentaries for the Sundays following the Ember-days, for the Thursdays in Lent, and for the Saturday before Palm Sunday, see Krazer, de Liturgiis, pp. 646 ff. Cf. STATIO.

2. Hours.—There can be little doubt that in the apostolic age Holy Communion was at the time of the evening meal (δειπνον, coena), as even Baronius admits (ad ann. 34, c. 61). Indeed, it is almost certain from the nature of the case that in days when Christianity was an illicit religion, the peculiar rite of Christian communion must have been celebrated in such a way as to attract the least possible attention. St. Paul's "breaking of bread" in the Troad (Acts xx. 7, 8) was after nightfall, and the service was not over at midnight. Pliny (Ep. x. 97) says that the Christians were accustomed to meet before dawn. The heathen calumnies mentioned by Justin Martyr (Dial. c. Tryphone, c. 10) show that the meeting of Christians took place after nightfall; and the same custom earned them the epithets of "latebrosa et lucifuga natio," which Minucius Felix (Octavius, c. 8) tells us were bestowed upon them. Origen too (c. Celsum, i. 3, p. 5, Spencer) tells his opponent that it was to avoid the death with which they were threatened that Christians commonly held their meetings in secrecy and darkness. And still in the 3rd century we find Tertullian, Cyprian, and others speaking of "coetus antelucani," "convocationes nocturnae," of "sacrificium matutinum et vespertinum." See, for instance, Tertullian ad Urorem, ii. 4; de Corona Mil. c. 3, in the latter of which passages it seems to be implied, that Christians communicated at the evening meal, as well as in assemblies before dawn. Cyprian (ad Cuestium, Ep. 63, cc. 15, 16) refers to some who in the morning sacrifice used water only in the chalice, lest the odour of wine should betray them to their heathen neighbours; and warns such not to salve their conscience with the reflection that they complied with Christ's command in offering the mixed chalice when they came together for the evening meal (ad coenandum) at which the rite had been originally instituted. This no doubt implies some kind of communion both morning and evening; but that in the evening seems to have been rather a domestic than a public rite; for Cyprian expressly says that at this the whole congregation (plebs) could not be called together, so as to make the rite—what it ought to be—a visible token to all of their brotherhood in Christ. And he goes on to say, that though it was no doubt fitting that Christ should offer at eventide, as foreshadowing the evening of the world and being the antitype of the evening passover-sacrifice (Exod. xii. 6); yet that Christians celebrated in the morning the resurrection of the Lord. In short, he clearly regards the morning as the proper time for public and solemn communion.

When the Church received its freedom, set hours began to be appointed for Holy Communion. The third hour of the day (about nine o'clock), the hour when the Holy Spirit descended on the apostles, was fixed at an early date as the hour of morning sacrifice on Sundays and festivals. The Liber Pontificalis attributes to Pope Telesphorus (127-138) the decree, "ut nullus ante horam tertiam sacrificium offerre praesumeret;" and this statement is repeated by Amalaricus (de Eccl. Off. iii. 42) and others. It is almost needless to say the decree is one of the well-known forgeries. The same regulation is attributed by the spurious Gesta Damasi (see Bona, de Reb. Lit. i. 21, § 5) to Pope Damasus (366-384); but here too no weight can be attached to the authority. More satisfactory testimonies are the following. Sidonius Apollinaris, who died A.D. 489, says (Ep. v. 17) that priests held divine service at the third hour; and Gregory of Tours in the 6th century speaks (Vita Nicetii) of the third as the hour when the people came together to mass; Gregory the Great (in Evang. Hom. 37) speaks of one who came to offer the sacrifice at the third hour; and Theodulph of Orleans (ob. 821) orders (Capitulaire, c. 45) that private masses should not be said on the Lord's Day with so much publicity as to attract the people from the high or public mass, which was canonically celebrated at the third hour. That on ordinary or festival days mass was said at the sixth hour (twelve o'clock) as late as the 12th century we have the testimony of Honorius of Autun (Gemma Animae, i. c. 113); but this practice seems to have been matter of custom rather than of canonical prescription. On fast-days the liturgical hour was the ninth, probably because the ancient Church was unwilling to introduce the joyful eucharistic feast into the early hours of a fast-day, and because on such a day it was not thought too onerous to continue fasting until three o'clock in the afternoon (Martene, de Rit. Antiq. i. p. 108). Epiphanius (Expositio Fidei, c. 22) testifies to the fact that throughout the year on Wednesday and Friday the liturgy was said at the ninth hour; excepting in the fifty days between Easter and Pentecost, and on the Epiphany when it fell on Wednesday or Friday; on these days, as on the Lord's Day, there was no fasting, and the liturgy was said at an early hour in the morning (ad festum).

The Council of Mentz, quoted by Ivo of Chartres (pt. 4, c. 35), desires all men on the Ember-days to come to church at the ninth hour to mass. The same reasons which caused the mass to be deferred at other fasting-seasons applied also to Lent; hence Ambrose, preaching in Lent, begs the faithful to defer eating until after the time of the heavenly banquet; if they had to wait until evening, the time was not so very long; on most days the oblation was at noon (on Psalm 118 [119], Serm. 8, Opp. iv. 656, ed. Basle, 1567); and Theodulph (Capitulaire, c. 39) says that those broke the Lenten fast who ventured to eat as soon as they heard the bell at the ninth hour, an hour at which he seems to imply that the "missarum sollemnia," as well as "vespertina officia," were celebrated.

These prescriptions as to the hours of mass, as well as of the ordinary offices, have long ceased to be observed: in the Roman Church at least mass may be said at any hour from dawn (aurora) to noon. But a trace of the ancient practice is found in the following rubric (xv. § 2) of the Roman missal:—"Missa autem Conventualis et Solemnis sequent ordine dici debet. In Festis duplicibus et semiduplicibus, in Dominicis, et infra Oct., dicta in Choro hora tertia. In Festis simplicibus et in Feriis per annum dicta sexta. In Adventu, Quadragesima, Quatuor Temporibus, etiam infra Octavam Pentecostes, et Vigiliis quae jejunantur, quamvis sint dies sollemnes, Missa de Tempore debet cantari post nonam."

The celebration of Holy Communion in the night-time, once—as we have seen—common in the Church, ceased at an early date, except on certain days of special observance. Of these the principal is that on the night of the Lord's Nativity. A Coptic tradition (mentioned by Bona, R. L. i. 21, 4) ascribes the institution of a nocturnal communion at Christmas and Epiphany to the Nicene Council; the fact may perhaps have been, that when the celebration of the Lord's Nativity was transferred from the sixth of January to the twenty-fifth of December [CHRISTMAS], the nightly communion was continued on both days. In the Gregorian Sacramentary (p. 5) besides the mass for the Vigil of the Nativity, said at the ninth hour, is one In Vigilia Domini in nocte, that is, to be said in the night between Christmas Eve and Christmas Day.

A nightly communion was usual in ancient times on the night of the "Sabbatum Sanctum" or Easter Eve. It is probably to this custom that Tertullian alludes when (ad Uxorem, ii. 4) he says that a heathen husband would not permit a Christian wife to pass the night from home on the Paschal solemnities; Jerome (on St. Matt. xxv.) mentions that it was an apostolic tradition on Easter Eve not to dismiss the congregation before midnight; and Theodore Balsamon (on the Council in Trullo, can. 90) writes that persons of especial piety were accustomed to remain in the churches the whole of that Saturday, to communicate at midnight, and at one o'clock in the morning to begin Matins. The Ordo Romanus Vulgatus also orders that the people should not be dismissed before midnight, and that at dawn of day they should return to the churches; in monasteries it enjoins the bells to be rung as soon as a star was seen in the sky, a litany to be chanted, and then the mass to follow. The same custom is mentioned by Amalarius (de Divin. Off. iv. c. 20; cf. c. 40), who says that all continue fasting until night, when the mass of the Lord's Resurrection is celebrated. Durandus (Rationale, vi. c. 76) says that the ancient rite was observed in some churches at the time when he wrote, in the latter part of the 13th century. In modern times the mass of Easter Eve is said at midday, but the unchanged collects still testify to the fact that it was formerly said at night.

A nocturnal celebration anciently took place also in the night between the Vigil and the day of Pentecost; hence in the prayer Communicantes on that day we have the words, "diem sacratissimam Pentecostes praevenientes" (Gregorii Sacram. p. 97; see Ménard, note 393). The Ordo Romanus provides that at the eighth hour of the eve the vigil service or mass should begin, and should be finished before the end of the ninth hour.

Four times in the year, on the Saturdays of the EMBER weeks, was a nightly mass, or rather one on the morning of the succeeding day, which was reckoned to belong to the Saturday; hence, as the Micrologus (c. 29) observes, the Sundays which follow the Ember-days have no proper offices in the ancient sacramentaries, but are called Dominicae vacantes; for the mass which was celebrated late on the Saturday served for the Sunday also. So the Council of Clermont (A.D. 1095) ordered (can. 24) that the fast, if possible, should be prolonged through the Saturday night, that the mass might be brought as near as possible to the Sunday morning.

In some cases, when we read of missae vespertinae (e.g. Conc. Agath. c. 30; III. Aurel. c. 29), we must bear in mind that the word missa does not in all cases imply the celebration of the mysteries of the altar, but was applied also to the hour-offices. Cf. MASS: MAUNDY THURSDAY: and p. 416.

FREQUENCY OF COMMUNION.

An ancient rule of the Church is expressed in the 21st canon of the Council of Eliberis (about A.D. 305), that if any one dwelling in a town should absent himself on three Sundays from church, he should be for a time suspended from communion. As at that time in a city having a bishop Holy Communion was administered at least every Sunday, and non-communicating attendance was unknown, we infer that weekly communion was the rule of the Church, to fail in which was to be unworthy of its privileges. Theodore of Tarsus, archbishop of Canterbury, testifies (about A.D. 688) that in his time this was still the rule of the East. In the West, signs of a relaxation of this rule appear at a comparatively early period. Thus the Council of Agde [Agathense] in the year 506 laid down the rule (can. 18) that if a layman did not communicate at least at Christmas, Easter, and Whitsuntide, he should no longer be reputed a Catholic. To the same effect are the 14th canon of the Council of Autun (A.D. 670), and the 38th of the Excerpta attributed to Egbert of York (A.D. 740). Bede (Ep. ad Egbert. p. 311, ed. 1722) desires his correspondent to insist strongly on the wholesome practice of daily communion, according to the custom of the churches of Italy, Gaul, Africa, Greece, and the whole East. But this, he says, in consequence of defective teaching, is so far from being the custom of English laymen, that even the more religious among them do not presume to communicate except at Christmas, Epiphany, and Easter; though countless innocent boys and girls, young men and maidens, old men and old women, do not scruple to communicate every Lord's Day, and perhaps on the days of Apostles and Martyrs besides, as Egbert himself had witnessed, in the Roman and Apostolic Church.

The 3rd Council of Tours, in the year 813, laid down (can. 50) a rule nearly identical with that of Agde; that all laymen, not disqualified by heinous sin, should communicate at least three times in the year. The Council of Aix-la-Chapelle had previously (A.D. 788) re-enacted (c. 70) the decree of the Council of Antioch (c. 2) which ordered all who came to church at the time of service but declined reception to be suspended from communion until they should amend; and it was probably the failure of this attempt to revive the primitive practice which led to the much looser rule of Aix-la-Chapelle.

If the Pseudo-Ambrosius (de Sacram. v. 25) is to be trusted, some Christians at least of the East in the 4th century communicated only once a year, and he complains that this practice had extended to his own community, recommending himself the practice of daily communion. [C.]

COMMISTIO or COMMIXTIO. In the Roman missal, after the breaking of the Host [FRACTION], the priest places a particle in the chalice, saying secreto: "Haec commistio et consecratio corporis et sanguinis D. N. J. C. fiat accipientibus nobis in vitam aeternam." And this practice of placing a particle of the Host in the cup appears to be an ancient one, and to be considered as a kind of consecration [CONSECRATION]. It is found in the liturgy of St. James (Neale's Tetralogia, p. 177), where the priest, after breaking the bread, places the portion which he holds in his right hand in the chalice, saying, "The union (ενωσις) of the all-holy Body and precious Blood of our Lord and God and Saviour Jesus Christ."

The 4th Council of Toledo (A.D. 633), canon 18, orders the commixtion (conjunctionem panis et calicis) to take place between the Lord's Prayer and the Benediction. [C.]

tiam of such a slave-concubine belonging to an unbeliever, if she were faithful to the one man, with whom she lived. If Marcia, the concubine, first of Quadratus, and afterwards of Commodus, who is known to have favoured the Christians, had ever been one of them, it must have been by virtue of some such rule. The case of a Christian who had a concubine was somewhat more difficult, and the equity of the Church's judgment was disturbed by considerations of social expediency. If she was a slave he was to get rid of her, apparently without being bound to make any provision for her maintenance. If she were a free woman, he was either to marry or dismiss her (Apost. Const. viii. 32). So, too, at a later date, we find Leo the Great treating this dismissal of a mistress followed by a legal marriage, not as a "duplicatio conjugii," but a "profectus honestatis" (Epist. 92; ad Rustic., c. 5).
In other instances, however, we trace the influence of the wish to look upon every permanent union of man or woman as possessing the character of a marriage in the eyes of God, and therefore in the judgment of the Church. Thus Augustine, speaking of a concubine who promises a life-long fidelity, even should he cast her off, to the man with whom she lived, says that "merito dubitatur utrum ad percipiendum baptismum non debeat admitti" (De Fide et Oper. c. 19).^a The first Council of Toledo went even farther, and while it excluded from communion a married man who kept a concubine, admitted one who, being unmarried, continued faithful to the one woman with whom he thus lived (1 C. Tolet. c. 17).
The special law forbidding a Jew to have a Christian wife or concubine (3 C. Tolet. c. 14), implying, as it does, the legitimacy of the latter relation, where both parties were Christians, shows, in like manner, that it was thought of as ethically, though not legally, on the same level as a conubium.

The use of the word concubina as a term of reproach for the wives of the clergy who were married, was, of course, a logical deduction from the laws which forbade that marriage, but the unsparing use made of it, as by Peter Damiani and Hildebrand, belongs to a somewhat later date than that which comes within the limits of this book. [E. H. P.]

spot. From its subterranean position such an altar was known as crypta (Theophan. p.
362) or desconus. Of these subterranean confessiones we have examples in Rome in the churches of St. Prisca, St. Martino ai Monti, St.

^a It may be questioned, however, which claim of concubines, the illicit or the legalised, are here contemplated.

^b It is interesting to note, in this tenity of judgment, the influence of a tender recollection of one with whom Augustine, before his conversion, had lived in this relation, and who on parting from him made a declaration that she would live with no one else. (Conf. vi. 16.)
She was apparently a Christian ("vovena libi," sc. Duo) and Monica, though she wished her son to marry and settle respectably, does not seem to have condemned the union as sinful, and adopted Adodatus, the issue of the connexion, into her warmest affections.

seek the house of prayer, and after coming inside with sighing and tears to God, at length from their prayer pass to shouting of the Psalms. It appears then a public liturgical confession commenced with office in the days of St. Basil, and we only wonder that this practice was commoner than of other customs known to him.

The Western music office has confession in the form called Confiteor (q. v.) from its words.

1. Confessions of past sins formed also one of preliminary of baptism, as we learn from Quintus de Baptismo, c. 20. See BAPTISM.

2. An instance of a profession of faith, commonly called a confession, is the following:—all versions of the Alexandrine Liturgy, and any other liturgical liturgies there is found, directly before communion, a confession, or recitation of faith by the recipient, that the δ and ω are now really and truly the ϵ and θ of Christ. For instance, in Coptic St. Basil (Kassabek, Lit. Orient. i. the priest, holding the elements, says, "The Body and precious, pure, true Blood of Christ the Son of our God, Amen. This very truth the Body and Blood of Emmanuel God, Amen." Compare the Coptic St. Gregory (Kassabek, i. 26); the Greek St. Basil (i. 83); Gregory (i. 122), and other passages. [C.]

CONFESSOR. [PENITENCE.]

CONFESSOR. (ὁμολογητής.)

One who has confessed Christ by suffering for Him. [MARTYR.] Thus, St. Ambrose (Tractatus, li. p. 63, ed. Basil, 1567) speaks of deaths of confessors.

One who has borne for Christ suffering to death. Pseudo-Cyprian (de Duplici Martyrio, c. 31) says that the Church "martyres sicut omnes qui violenta morte decesserunt, confessor qui constant in cruciatibus ac minis in profanis sunt nomen Domini Jesu." In seneca (Cyprian, Epist. 21, c. 4, ed. 41) speaks of Severinus and all the confessors had passed from Carthage to Rome; and mon (H. E. i. 10) speaks of the number of confessors (ὁμολογητῶν) who, after the cessation of persecution, adorned the churches, as Hosius of Cordova and Paphnutius of Egypt.

The word confessor is used in a more general sense for one who shows the spirit of Christ in ordinary life, "qui pacifica et bona et iustitiam praeceptum Christi loquitur, Christum de constituitur" (Cyprian, Epist. 13, c. 5). Theodore Balsamon (on Om. Apostol. 82, p. 3) says that the Church desires all its orthomembers to be confessors (ὁμολογητάς) of faith. Hence, in later times it came to designate persons of distinguished holiness, who had added to their rest without violence or torture. de-Egbert (Excerptiones, c. 28; a work not earlier than the 9th century) speaks of "sancti enim, quos Confessores nuncupavimus, id est, opti, presbyteri qui in castitate servierunt" (Ducange s. v. Confessor; Suicer s. v. ὁμολογητής).

In the Gregorian Sacramentary, Periclyon iv. Palmas (p. 83, ed. Ménard), we have the wing: "Oremus ut pro omnibus episcopis, presbyteris, diaconibus, subdiaconibus, acolythis, cistis, leutoribus, eucharis, confessoribus, vir-gibus, viduis, et pro omni populo sanctis Deo."

The order of words shows that the confessors were not persons of inferior dignity, and Ménard (at locum) supposes sanctis to be intended who address God in saying His prayer. See the first council of Treves, cc. 4 and 5, where the word "confirmation" seems to be used in a similar sense, the latter canon forbidding a professed religious woman to sing sanctus in her house with a confessor or servant in the absence of bishop or presbyter. (Ménard s. v.) [C.]

CONFIRMATION. The rite now known by this name presents a singular instance of the continued use of a symbolic act in the midst of almost every primitive diversity of practice, belief, and even terminology. The one common element throughout has been the imposition of hands, as the sign of the bestowal of some spiritual gift. In all other respects it will be seen there have been indefinite variations.

The history of the Apostolic Church brings before us two special instances of the ἐπιθεσις τῆς χειρὸς (Acts vii. 12-17, xiii. 5, 6). In both it follows upon baptism, is administered by apostles, as distinguished from presbyters or deacons, and is followed by special supernatural manifestations of spiritual gifts, perhaps by their permanent possession. It was not directly connected with any appointment to any office in the Church, though office might follow upon the exercise of the gift bestowed. It was therefore distinct from the laying on of hands by which such offices were conveyed (Acts vi. 6, xiii. 3), as it was from that which was the medium of a miraculous healing power applied to the diseases of the body (Mark xvi. 18, Acts ix. 12, 17). The act referred to in 1 Tim. iv. 14, and 2 Tim. i. 6, seems to hover between the bestowal of a charisma and the appointment to an office. The position in which the "laying on of hands" meets us in Heb. vi. 2, leaves it open to take it in its most generic, or in either of its specific senses, with, perhaps, a slight balance in favour of connecting it with the act which always, or in some cases, supervened on baptism. The absence of any mention of it in the baptisms recorded in Acts ii. 41, xvi. 15, 33, and elsewhere receives a natural explanation in the fact that there the baptizer was an apostle, and that it was accordingly taken for granted.

Beyond this the N. T. gives us no information. The "unction" (χρίσμα) of 1 John ii. 27, the "anointing" of 2 Cor. i. 21, the "sealing" of 2 Cor. i. 22, Eph. i. 13, iv. 30, can hardly be thought of as referring to a ritual act, though such an act may at a very early period have been brought into use as a symbol of the thought which the words themselves expressed. Even then it remains doubtful whether the "seal" means baptism itself or some rite that followed it. A like uncertainty hangs over the use of the word "seal" in the story quoted by Eusebius (H. E. iii. 23), from Clement of Alexandria, and in the Apostolical Constitutions (ii. c. 14).

When we pass to the age of Tertullian the case is different. A distinct mention is made (1) of anointing, (2) of the laying on of hands, as following so close upon baptism as to seem almost part of the same rite rather than a distinct one, the latter act being accompanied by a special prayer for the gift of the Holy Spirit (Tertull.

CONFITEOR. The form of general confession of sins made in the offices of the Church, so called from its first word. This is prescribed:

(1) At the beginning of the mass when the priest says it standing at the steps of the altar, "profunde inclinatus."

(2) At the administration of the Holy Communion at other times.

(3) At the administration of Extreme Unction.

(4) Previous to the absolution "in articulo mortis."

(5) In the daily office at Compline; and at Prime when the office is not double.

Sacramental confession is also directed to begin with the opening words of the "Confiteor."

It is prefaced by the versicle "Deus in adiutorium," &c., and is said alternately by the priest and congregation, who each respond with a prayer for the forgiveness of the other, called "Misereatur," from its first word; in addition to which the priest pronounces a short formula of absolution, similarly called "Indulgentiam," over the people. This act is sometimes called in rubrics "giving the absolution."

Clear traces of it appear in the Penitential of Egbert of York, A.D. 730, who prescribes a form of words closely resembling the "Confiteor," as introductory to sacramental confession; and the "Benedictio super poenitentem" is only a slightly different version of the "Misereatur." A similar form is given by Chrodegang, bishop of Metz A.D. 742, who describes the order in which Prime was to be said, to the following effect. When the clerks come together to sing Prime in the church, the office itself being completed, let them give their confessions before the 50th [51st] Psalm, saying in turn, "Confiteor Domino et tibi, frater, quod peccavi in cogitatione et in locutione et in opere: propterea precor te, ora pro me." To which the response is given, "Misereatur tibi omnipotens Deus, indulgeat tibi peccata tua, liberet te ab omni malo, conservet te in omni bono, et perducatur ad vitam aeternam;" to which the other answers, Amen. In Micrologus de Eccl. Observ. [probably about 1080] a form still more closely resembling the present is given, and the 3rd Council of Ravenna, A.D. 1314, orders that throughout the province of Ravenna the "Confiteor" shall be said in the form used at the present time. Since the publication of the missal of Pius V. there has been complete uniformity in this respect throughout the Roman obedience. For examples of early forms of confession see Bona, de Reb. Lit.; Martene, de Ant. Eccl. Rit. lib. I. &c. Compare CONFESSION.

The essential idea of consecration is expressed in the following paragraphs:—"Consecratio Ecclesiae est dedicatio ejusdem ad cultum divinum speciali ritu facta à legitimo ministro, ad hoc ut populus fidelis opera religionis in ea rite exercere possit" (Ferraris' Promta Bibliotheca, iii. 157). "When we sanctify or hallow churches, that which we do is to testify that we make them places of public resort, that we invest God Himself with them, that we sever them from common uses" (Hooker, Ecc. P. v. 16). "By the consecration of a church, the ancients always mean the devoting or setting it apart for Divine service" (Bingham, Antiq. viii. 9). Compare BENEDICTION.

It seems almost a necessity to men to have their places of common worship recognized and accustomed. That those places should not only acquire sacredness of association by use, but should previously have imparted to them in some sort a sacredness of object, seems also consonant with natural religion. The former more clearly, and yet the latter also, implicitly, is found in all ages, a feature of all religions, rude and civilized, the same with all classes, of diverse nations, however widely separated; as exemplified in groves, sacred stones, pillars, altars, temples, pagodas. It seems the dictate of natural piety that we should express thanks to God on the first use of anything. Greeks, Romans, Jews, had their consecrations of houses, cities, and walls, not by words only, but with symbolical actions and sacred rites. (See Deut. xx. 5; Psalm xxx. Title, A Psalm and Song at the Dedication of the House of David; Neh. xii. 27; Du Cange, Constantinopolis Christiana, i. 3, "Urbis Encaenia;" Lewis, Historical Essay upon the Consecration of Churches, London 1719, c. iii.)

From the expressions "before the Lord," "the presence of the Lord" (Gen. iv.), it has been reasonably inferred that "the patriarchs had places set apart for the worship of God, consecrated, as it were, to His service." (Blunt's Script. Coine. p. 8.) Something like a form of consecration is indicated in Gen. xxi. 33, xviii. 16, 17, 18, where the Vulgate rendering "titulum" has given rise to the use of the term, as equivalent to 'church,' common in early Christian writers. The consecration of the tabernacle is narrated, Exod. xl., and given with further details in Josephus iii. 9. The dedication of the Temple of Solomon is contained in 1 Kings viii.; which furnishes Hooker (Eccl. Pol. v. 12-16) with several of his arguments for the consecration of Christian churches. The dedication of the second temple by Zerubbabel is told in Ezra vi. 16; the purification and rededication of the same by Judas Maccabaeus, in 1 Macc. iv. 41-44, 54, 56, 57, 59. The dedication of Herod's beautiful temple is narrated by Josephus xv. 14. Less magnificent than these, but still recognized and allowed to possess a sacred character, were certain "high places" in the ante-Babylonish history of the Jews, known in later times as ἁγίαρχαί, and the numerous synagogues in Palestine and elsewhere.

Christianity rose out of Judaism, supplanting only what was peculiar to that system, and inheriting all that was of natural piety. The Divine Founder of Christianity set the example to all His followers in His constant attendance at the acknowledged places of worship, and especially in His going up to Jerusalem at the feast of the Dedication. The apostles used the consecrated temple as long as it was permitted them to do so, and everywhere else they found the synagogues or churches made ready to their hands, needing no new consecration. Traces in the N. T. of a fixed place of worship as a feature of an organized church are presented by Prof. Blunt (Parish Priest, sect. ix. p. 281), who quotes Acts i. 13; St. Luke xxii. 12; St. John xx. 19, 26; Acts ii. 2; Rom. xvi. 3; 1 Cor. xi. 22, xvi. 19.

That the primitive Christians, i.e. before the time of Constantine, not only had churches to worship in, but regarded them as distinct in character from other buildings, has indeed been doubted or denied, but is allowed by even Hospinian (de Origine et Progressu Consecrationum et Dedicationum Templorum, Tiguri, 1603, fol.) and Augusti (Denkwürdigkeiten aus der Christlichen Archäologie, xi. 317, &c.), and has been sufficiently settled in the affirmative by Petrus Cluniacensis, A.D. 1147 (quoted in Hooker, E. P. v. 12, 5), Bona, Tillemont, Mede, Lewis, Chancellor Harington (The Object, Importance, and Antiquity of the Rite of Consecration of Churches, Rivingtons, 1847), and Professor Blunt. We dismiss spurious testimonies and dubious allegations; e.g. the affirmation of Radulphus adduced by Gavanti (Theaur. tom. i. p. iv. tit. xvi.), that "dedication is of apostolic authority;" the Clementines (Ep. ad Jacobum) "Build churches in suitable places, which you ought to consecrate by divine prayers;" the Decretals, quoted from Linus, Cletus, Evaristus, Hyginus, &c. by Gratian and Goar (Euchol. p. 807); the assumption in Duranti and Cardinal Bona, as quoted in Bingham (Antiq. viii. 9, 2); and others given by Martene (Rit. Eccl. Ant. ii. 13). Yet we may collect from the very earliest times a succession of allusions and statements which warrant us in the conclusion that places and buildings, of whatever humble sort they might be, were always recognized and set apart for common worship, the fact of their consecration appearing first, and then the accompaniments and rites of it.

The very titles by which these buildings were known indicated this; e.g. κνιδν, i.e. olkia, Dominica, &c., discussed in Augusti (Denkw. xi. 320, &c.). St. Ambrose, in his letter to his sister Marcellina (Ep. 22), calls the rite of dedication of churches a most ancient and universal custom. St. Gregory Nazianzen in an oration (43) on the consecration of a new church, says, "that it was an old law, and very excellently constituted, to do honour to churches by the feasts of their dedication." And Daniel (Cod. Liturg. i. 355) confirms the conclusion of Binterim (Denkwürd. iv. i. 27) that this ceremony is deeply rooted in the earliest age of the Church. Mede, and others after him, argue this existence of churches from passages in Clemens Romanus (ad Cor. i. 41; see Blunt's Parish Priest, lect. ix.); Ignatius (Ep. ad Magnes. 7); Justin Martyr (Apol. i. 67); Tertullian (De Idolol. 7); Cyprian (de Op. et Elem. 12); Lucian (Philop. p. 1126); and many others. The Coenaculum at Jerusalem, to which, as to a known place, the disciples, after the ascension of the Lord, returned for common prayer, is said to have been adapted and dedicated to Christian service long before the time of Constantine. "The upper room," says Bede (tom. ix. de Locis Sanctis), "was enclosed afterwards with a beautiful church, founded by the holy apostles, because in that place they had received the Holy Ghost." To this, as being already an acknowledged use, St. Cyril of Jerusalem refers (Cat. lect. xvi. 4): "Here, in Jerusalem, in the upper church of the apostles . . . the Holy Ghost came down from heaven. And, in truth, it is most fitting that . . . we should speak concerning the Holy Ghost in the upper church" (cf. Niceph. ii. 3).

"There exist," says Eusebius (Hist. Eccl. viii. 1), "the imperial edicts by which the churches were to be pulled down to the ground." These must have been actual edifices. [CHURCH.] Then came the persecution of Diocletian, when "the houses of prayer were pulled down from the top to the bottom, and their foundations overturned" (ib. viii. 2). "After these things a spectacle earnestly prayed for and much desired by us all appeared, viz. the solemnization of the festival of the dedication of churches throughout every city, and the consecration of the newly-built oratories. . . . Indeed, the ceremonies of the bishops were most entire, the presbyters' performance of service most exact, the rites of the Church decent and majestic. On the one hand was a place for the singers of psalms, and for the rest of the auditors of the expressions sent from God; on the other was a place for those who performed the divine and mystical services. There were also delivered the mystical symbols of our Saviour's passion. And now people of all ages and sexes, men and women, with the utmost vigour of their minds, with joyful hearts and souls, by prayer and thanksgiving, worshipped God, the Author of all good. All the prelates then present made public orations, every one as well as he was able, endeavouring to set forward the praises of those assembled" (ib. x. 3). In x. 5 Eusebius gives the decrees of Licinius and Constantius for restoring the churches to the Christians, as buildings not private, to which there had been an established title. Even the Magdeburg Centuriators, who are wont to disparage the importance of the ceremony of consecration, writing on the 4th century, admit that it had been in existence earlier: "Usitatae omnino magis quam superioribus saeculis templorum fuerunt dedicationes, seu consecrationes, et quidem festivae." The church of Tyre was one of those destroyed in the persecution of Diocletian, and rebuilt at the revival described above. From the panegyric spoken by Eusebius on the occasion to Paulinus, bishop of Tyre, we gather that the earlier church, a very noble one, had been consecrated before at its first erection, and that churches built on old foundations were consecrated again.

We owe to the courtly pages of Eusebius full accounts of the consecration of the churches built by Constantine at Jerusalem, Constantinople, and Antioch. He undertook to build a church over the Holy Sepulchre at Jerusalem (Vit. Const. iii. 25), called the "Martyrium," of which the beauty and several parts are described (ib. iii. 29). When all was ready, A.D. 335, he wrote a letter of invitation to the numerous bishops then assembled in council at Tyre, urging them that they should first compose their internal differences, because concord of priests befitted such a ceremony (Vit. Const. iv. 43; Sozom. Ecl. Hist. i. 26). From all parts of the East, accordingly, eminent bishops assembled, followed by an innumerable company of people out of all the provinces. "But the ministers of God," proceeds Eusebius, "adorned the festival partly with their prayers, and partly with their discourses. For some of them with praises celebrated the benignity of the religious emperor towards the universal Saviour, and in their orations set forth the magnificence of the martyrdom; others entertained their hearers with theological discourses upon the divine dogmata, fitted to the present solemnity; others interpreted the lessons of the divine volumes, and disclosed the mystic meanings. But such as were unable to arrive at these things appeared the Deity with unbloody sacrifices and mystic immolations, humbly offering up their prayers to God. . . . At which place we ourselves also honoured the solemnity with various discourses uttered in public; sometimes making descriptions in writing of the stateliness and magnificence of the royal fabric; at others, explaining the meaning of the prophetic visions in a manner befitting the present symbols and figures. There was the feast of dedication celebrated with the greatest joy imaginable." The discourse by Eusebius (de Laudibus Constantini) is given in full (iv. 45), where it is observed that Constantine's churches were much larger and handsomer than those before. The consecration took place on Sept. 13th, a Saturday.

Theodoret (Ecl. Hist. i. 31) says that many churches of Constantine were dedicated by the assembled bishops at the same time.

To the dedication of the magnificent basilica at Antioch, called Dominicum Aureum, A.D. 341, begun by Constantine and finished by his son Constantius, there came ninety-seven bishops, on the invitation of Eusebius of Nicomedia, who had usurped the see of Constantinople (Soz. ii. 1; Sozom. iii. 5).

A synod of bishops (Soz. ii. 39) assembled at the dedication of St. Sophia in Constantinople, A.D. 360, thirty-four years after the foundation of the church by Constantine. Eudoxius had lately been inaugurated as archbishop. He "made sacred prayers" (Du Cange, Constantinopol. Christ. iii. 2). "It was consecrated with prayers and votive offerings" (Niceph. viii. 6). Clampini (de Aedif. Constantin. pp. 165 qq.) gives a summary of the dedication of his celebrated church from the Alexandrian Chronicle. It is also referred to by the author of the Life of St. Athanasius in Photius (Du Cange, s.v.). As Constantine's church had been destroyed by earthquake, so was this of his son's burnt with fire, A.D. 404, and wholly destroyed in the sedition of A.D. 532.

Further light is thrown on the rite of consecration by a story of Athanasius. In his Apology to the emperor Constantine, A.D. 335, he defends himself from the serious charge of using an undedicated church. He allows the truth of the fact. He said they had certainly kept no day of dedication, which would have been unlawful to keep without orders from the emperor. The building was not yet complete. He grounds his apology on the great concourse of people in Lent, the grievous want of church room elsewhere, the pressure of all to hear

Athanasius, the increased mass of the crowd on Easter Day (when the undedicated church was used), the precedents of the Jews after the captivity, and of buildings so used in Alexandria, Treves, Aquileia, the reasonableness of worshipping in a building already called "the Lord's house" from the very time of laying the foundations (Apol. ad Const. 17-21). "There was no dedication, but only an assembly for the sake of prayer. You, at least, I am sure, as a lover of God, will approve of the people's zeal, and will pardon me for being unwilling to hinder the prayers of so great a multitude." "May you," he adds, "most religious Augustus, live through the course of many years to come, and celebrate the dedication of the church. The place is ready, having been already sanctified by the prayers which have been offered in it, and requires only the presence of your piety." (ib. 24, 25.)

The first dedication of a new church by Justinian is briefly described by Du Cange (Constant. Chr. iii. 5), who says, "The procession started from St. Anastasia, the patriarch Menas sitting in the chariot of the emperor, and the emperor himself going among the common people." The "dedicationis apparatus et celebratio" is given in Codinus (Orig. Constant.), who says that Justinian went in solemn procession from the palace to the Augustaeum (a sort of large forum, or ὑποδαμιον, before the church of St. Sophia), together with the patriarch, to the church built by himself, and broke out into these words: "Glory to God, who has counted me worthy to fulfil so great a work. I have surpassed thee, O Solomon." A series of earthquakes destroyed the dome, altar, ambo, &c., and the same emperor, whose passion for building was the ruling feature of his life, celebrated the second consecration twenty-four years later, of which an account is given by Du Cange (ib. iii. 6) after Theophanes. "Nightly vigils preceded in the church of St. Plato; thence the procession advanced with prayers, the emperor himself being present; the patriarch Eutychius, borne in a chariot, and dressed in apostolical habit, holding the holy gospels in his hands; all the people chanting 'Lift up your heads,' &c. Then came the ὑπαρκοίς and the ἑννομήσις, i.e. that part of the ceremony of the Encaenia, where in the circuit of the building the lights are lighted on the walls, and twelve crosses are anointed with chrism by the bishop. Paul the Silentiary, in his poem on the occasion, adds, "After thou hadst celebrated the festival, as was proper, forthwith the whole people, the senate, and the middle and better classes, demanded an extension of the days of celebration. Thou grantedst it: they flocked in: again they demanded: again thou grantedst it, which things being often repeated, thou celebratedst the festivity magnificently." Probably for seven days.

Of other churches in Constantinople, Du Cange (ib. iv. 5) relates the dedication of the Church of the Apostles. This church, after its demolition, was rebuilt by Justinian. The dedication is described as celebrated by the deposition in it of the relics of Andrew, Luke, and Timothy, which had been in the earlier church. Theophanes says, that the bishop Menas, with the holy relics, sitting in the royal chariot, gilt and studded with gems, carrying upon his knees the three shrines of the holy apostles, in such wise celebrated the dedication. Procopius speaks of the same particulars.

The last-named writer (de Aedif. Justin. i. v.) mentions the sacred buildings at Ephesus, Constantinople, Jerusalem, which Justinian dedicated (ἀνέθηκε).

We gather from Bede (Ecol. Hist. i. 6) that while Diocletian was persecuting in the East, Maximian was doing the same in the West, for ten years, by burning the churches, &c., and that after the cessation of the persecution the Britons renewed the churches which had been razed to the ground, and founded and finished basilicas to the holy martyrs (ib. i. 8). Later on, we read that Gregory instructed Augustine and his companions not to destroy the idol temples, but to destroy the idols in them, and then to prepare holy water, and sprinkle it, to build altars and deposit relics, and to make suitable provision for rendering the day of dedication attractive (ib. i. 30); that Augustine "consecrated a church in the name of the Saviour, our God and Lord Jesus Christ;" and Laurentius "consecrated the church of the blessed apostles Peter and Paul" (ib. i. 33); that the body of Augustine (after a very early custom) was laid near this church, as it was not yet dedicated, but as soon as it was dedicated it was brought in and laid in the north porch (ib. ii. 3); that, on Chad's visit to Northumbria, after being in East Anglia, the son of the king gave him land to build a monastery or church; to purify the spot he craved leave to spend the forty days of Lent (except the Lord's day) in prayer and fasting, as he said it was always the custom he had learned, first to consecrate the locality by prayer and fasting to the Lord. Then he built a monastery, and set it on foot according to the rites of the Lindisfarrians, with whom he was educated (ib. iii. 23); that the Abbot Ceolfrid sent to the king of the Picts, A.D. 710, architects to build for him a stone church after the manner of the Romans, he having promised to dedicate it in honour of the blessed chief of the apostles (ib. v. 21). Bede tells a story of Bishop John of Beverley, how, after having dedicated a church for the Earl Pnch, he sent to his countess, who was bedridden, some of the holy water which he had consecrated for the dedication of the church by one of the brethren, charging him to give her some to taste, and that he should wash her with the same water wherever he learnt her pain was the greatest. The woman recovered (ib. v. 4). A detailed account is given of the consecration of the church of Ripon by St. Wilfred (A.D. 665) in his life. The 47th chapter of the Penitential of Archbishop Theodore, speaking of a building in which heathens had been buried, but now proposed for a church, adds: "If it seems fit for consecration, let the bodies be removed, and it shall be sanctified, if not consecrated before." In the same chapter mention is made of that part of the office of consecration in which it is said, "Locus a Deo iste factus est."

2. Canons and decrees which relate to the consecration of churches.—The 4th canon of the General Council of Chalcedon, A.D. 451 (Bruns's Canones, i. 26), provides that "no one shall anywhere build or establish a monastery, or house of prayer, without the consent of the local bishop." The canons of Felix IV. and Gregory I. (de Consecr. distinct. i. c. 17) are referred to by Gavanti (Theaurus Sacr. Rit. tom. i. p. iv. tit. xvi. p. 529). The 28rd canon of an Irish Council under Patrick, A.D. 450 (Bruns's Can. ii. 303), directs "that a presbyter, though he build a church, shall not offer the oblation in it before he brings his bishop to consecrate it, because this was regular and decent." Of Columbanus, however, though not a bishop, Walafrid Strabo writes (Mart. ii. 13, 6), "He ordered water to be brought, blessed it, sprinkled the temple with it, and while they went round singing, dedicated the church. Then he called on the Name of the Lord, anointed the altar, placed in it the relics of St. Aurelia, vested it, and said mass." The 1st Council of Orange, A.D. 441, can. 10 (Bruns's Canones, ii. 123), forbids a bishop to consecrate a church out of his own diocese, even if it has been built by himself. So the 2nd Council of Arlea (about 451), can. 37. The 3rd Council of Orleans, A.D. 538, can. 15 (Bruns's Can. ii. 196), makes the same provision about altars. The 3rd canon of the 2nd Council of Saragossa, A.D. 592 (Bruns's Can. ii. 65), enacts that "if Arian bishops, who are converted, shall consecrate churches before they have received the benediction, such shall be consecrated anew by a Catholic bishop." The Theodosian Code prescribes how existing buildings should be claimed and dedicated for the service of the Christian religion: "conlocatione venerandi religionis christianae signi expiari praecipimus" (lib. xvi. tit. 10). The same rite was prescribed by Justinian at the beginning of any erection of a church (Novell. cxxxi., quoted by Bingham, Antiq. viii. 9, 5). See more instances in Augusti (Denkw. xi. 355). Avitus, bishop of Vienne in the 6th century, promises his brother Apollinaris to be present at the consecration of a church, and commands the gifts that were designed for the poor at the dedication feast. The 2nd Council of Nice, A.D. 787, can. 7, orders that no bishop should consecrate any church or altar, on pain of deposition, unless relics were placed under it, "ut qui ecclesiasticas traditiones transgressus est." The famous Council of Cealchythe (i.e. Chelsea), presided over by Archbishop Wilfred, A.D. 816, can. 2, decrees, "when a church is built, let it be consecrated by a bishop of its own diocese: let the water be blessed, and sprinkled by himself, and all things fulfilled in order, according to the service book. Then let the Eucharist, which is consecrated by the bishop after the same form, be deposited with the other relics in a chest, and kept in the same church. And if he cannot bring other relics, at least he can do this chief thing, because it is the Body and Blood of our Lord Jesus Christ. And we charge every bishop that he have it painted on the wall of the oratory, or on a table, as also on the altars, to what saints both of them are dedicated." The 141st of the Excerpts of Archbishop Egbert, circ. A.D. 750, provides when a church will need reconsecration. The Council of Worms, A.D. 868, forbids bishops to exact any fee or present for the consecration of a church, and also forbids them to consecrate any church except there be a writing under the hand of the founder confirming the foundation, and signifying

 decree is quoted from Gelasius, A.D. 492 (cf. Ecccl. Hist. li. 8), to the effect that no one consecrate a church without the leave of Apostolical see. Gregory the Great wrote all letters, whence we may gather the form which, as bishop of Rome, he was accustomed use his license to his suffragans for dedication church or chapel, e. g., that "they take good that no dead body were buried in the place" (st. i. 52; v. 22; xii. 10); "if a bishop consecrated an oratory in another diocese, what he done was null and void" (Ejast. xi. 2). He did not have a new church consecrated unless were endowed with sufficient revenue for maintaining divine service and the clergy (see Carp. Can. i. 457-461). Martene allows that Julius and Gregory were both intending to cribe for Italy alone.

Ritual of Consecration.—It was customary, we have seen, to deliver sermons at the time consecration. There is one extant by St. Ambrose, preached at the dedication of a church at by Vitalianus and Majanus, A.D. 380; the sermon is entitled "De Dedicatione Basilicæ," the text in St. Luke, "He loveth our on, and he hath built us a synagogue." Ambrosius, bishop of Bresse in Italy, early in 5th century, has left sermons "De dedicatione basilicæ sanctorum quadraginta martyrum" (Max. Bibl. Patrum, tom. v.; Migne's vol. xx.). St. Augustine's works (tom. v.) contain sermons of the same class, Serm. 256, empore, al. 336-338, and in App. Serm. 229—considered to be those of Caesarius. For other rites and ceremonies we find occasional ones. Thus of the vigil kept the night preceding the dedication, St. Ambrose writes (Ep. to his sister Marcellina and Gregory of ra, de Gloria Confessorum; of the translation deposition of relics, we read in the same Ep. of St. Ambrose, "When I wished to cate the basilica, they began to interrupt me were with one mouth, saying, You should cate the basilica, as in the case of a Roman I answered, I will do so, if I find relics of tyra." The same custom is mentioned by Basil, Epist. 49 (iii. 142), by St. Paulinus, st. ad Severum (Max. Bibl. Patrum, tom. vi. 193, by St. Greg. M. lib. i. c. 10. See in tene. The relics were often not the bodies nselves, but what had been simply in contact with them [BRANDEUM]. The custom was at peculiar to Rome, and was then extended made obligatory by the 2nd Nicene Council. lent forms, given by Martene, prescribe that e Body of the Lord be deposited." On cation, Hooker (E. P. v. 13) and Bingham liq. viii. 3, 8) both quote St. Augustine (de t. Dei, viii. 27; xii. 10; contra Foust. xx. contra Maxim. i.; de Vera Relig. c. 55) au ring how, and with what interest and limi on, the original custom of dedicating churches he Lord only was afterwards extended to r dedication under the name, or as me- als of saints and martyrs, or by the title of ues, especially of wisdom, as was the case in chief cities of the empire. Augustine in ing against Maximinus grounds an argument he deity of the Holy Ghost upon this dila- tion: "that He must be God, because temples were built and dedicated to Him, which it would be sacrilege to do to any other creature." The custom of lighting twelve candles is alluded to in the Pseudo-Augustine, Serm. 338 (al. 3), in Dedic. Ecclesiæ. "This lesson occurs suitably, when the candelabra are blessed, that he who works is as a light placed on a candlestick." The very ancient rite of inscribing either the whole alphabets both Greek and Latin, or some letters of them, or one alphabet, is spoken of by Gregory in his Liber Sacramentorum: "Then let the bishop begin from the left-hand corner at the east, writing on the pavement with his pastoral staff A. B. C., to the right corner of the west; again beginning from the corner at the east he writes A. B. C. and so on to the left corner of the church." Gregory says that some bishops added the Hebrew alphabet. The inscription was called the A. B. C. darium. See more on the custom in Martene (ii. 13, who gives A.D. 980 as the inferior date for it), and in Maskell, Moscow. Rit. i. 173 n.

It is difficult, however, from the few and scattered notices in primitive writers, to construct the probable course of the ritual of consecration in early times. We may say with Bingham, "that the manner and ceremony of doing this was not always exactly one and the same, therefore we are chiefly to regard the substance of the thing, which was the separation of any building from common use to a religious service. Whatever ceremony this was performed with, the first act of initiating and appropriating it to a divine use was its consecration; and therefore, in allusion to this, the first beginning of anything is many times called its dedication. Whether churches had any other ceremony besides this in their dedication for the first three ages is not certain, though it is highly probable they might have a solemn thanksgiving and prayer for a sanctified use of them also, over and besides the usual liturgy of the Church, because this was in use among the Jews" (Antiq. viii. 9, 1). So also Lewis (Historical Essay) remarks upon the difficulty of discovering the use of this rite in its particular parts, because the custom of those early times was obscure, yet "he hopes to shew some remains of the footsteps of this ceremony" (p. 29), and gathers them together (p. 105), as traced in the several instances above given.

Of the various forms printed from MSS., the Ordo Romanus for the building and consecration of a church, &c., said to be of the 8th century, is given in the Max. Bibl. Patrum (tom. xiii. p. 713, &c.). Goar (Euch. Græcorum) gives the customary order in laying the foundation of a church, and the prayer to be said on the occasion, which some call the cross-fixing; and the order for fixing the cross after the church is finished, by the patriarch, under which head there are certain prayers attributed to Callixtus on the dedication of a temple, and a very prolix τῶν καὶ ἀπολυθῆναι τῷ καθιερώσει ναοῦ (p. 606, &c., and p. 846). Martene (Ecccl. Rit. li. 17, p. 244 &c.) has printed eleven forms, of which the oldest are (1) from the Book of Gellone in Italy about A.D. 800, (2) from the pontifical of Egbert, archbishop of York, A.D. 750, (3) from the Anglican pontifical in the monastery of Jumièges, A.D. 800, (4) from the pontifical of St. Dunstan of Canterbury, (5) from a codex of St. Mary's, Rheims, A.D. 900, (6) from a pontifical of the Church of Noyon, A.D. 900. Maskell prints from the Sarum Pontifical the Ordo "De Ecclesiae dedicatione, seu consecratione" (Monumen. Rit. i. 162-203), and has some remarks on the subject in his preliminary dissertation, pp. cclxv.-cclxxv. Daniel (Cod. Liturg. i. 355-384,) prints the rite "Ex Pontificali Romano," with notes of collation from other rituals. He holds that in the most ancient times it was not the mass only that was sufficient at the consecration of new churches (which Binterim had argued), but that it was the mass proper for dedication, together with additions of certain forms of benediction. Both these writers allow that the ritual of present use scarcely reaches the 8th century.

4. Anniversaries of consecrations of churches have their natural origin in the feast of dedication of the temple, attended by our Lord (St. John x. 22, 23) in conformity with 1 Macc. iv. 56-59; St. Gregory Nazian. (Orat. 43, els rhp xupiaxhp init.) speaks of it as an ancient custom "to honour churches by the feasts of their dedication; and that not for once only, but upon the annual return of the day of their consecrations, that good things become not forgotten through lapse of time." It is doubtful who initiated the custom. Some make it date from the consecration of the church of the Holy Sepulchre at Jerusalem, on Sept. 13 [ANASTASIS]. (See Sozom. H. E. i. 26; Niceph. viii. 50.) Felix IV., A.D. 526, put out a decree "that the solemnities of the dedications of churches are to be celebrated every year." Gregory the Great confirmed the practice, and it was adopted by Augustine in Britain, together with the custom of building booths round the church, and holding common festivities (Bede, Ecc. Hist. i. 30). The memory of the dedication of St. Sophia at Constantinople was kept up every Dec. 22 (Du Cange, Const. Chr. iii. 6). Gavanti (ii. 250, &c.), de Communi Dedicationis Ecclesiae, has rules and remarks on this class of festival and its concurrence with others.

The Symbolism of the rite of consecration may be said to appear in the earliest titles given to churches (see above), and in the essential idea of consecration as expressed by Hooker, E. P. v. 12, 13; Bingham, Antiq. viii. 9, 8; Lewis, p. 98. Alcuin, de Coena Domini, says, "Churches are consecrated that the coming of angels into them may be invited, and that men entering into them may be restrained from mean thoughts." St. Thomas Aquin. (Summa, part iii. Quæst. 85, art. 3) says, "A church is consecrated because the Church is the spouse of Christ; and when the octave is celebrated for denoting the glorious resurrection of the Church which is to come." Remigius of Auxerre, in the 10th century, has a Treatise on the mystical signification of the whole rite. Cf. the reference to this and other writers in Maskell (Monum. Rit. i. 162, 3). The same subject is elaborately drawn out by Durandus, Rationale Div. Off.; St. Bruno Astensis, Episc. Signiensium (Max. Bibl. Patr. xx. 1725), of the 12th century, &c.

5. Consecration of Altars.—Bingham (Ant. viii. 9, 10) says that the consecration of altars seems to have begun first of all in the 6th century; he quotes the Council of Agde, A.D. 506, can. 14 (Bruna's Can. ii. 145), as enacting that "altars are to be consecrated not only by the chrism, but with the sacerdotal benediction," and the Council of Epone, A.D. 517, can. 26 (ib. ii. 170), that "none but stone altars are to be consecrated with the unction of the chrism." Gregory of Tours, in the 6th century, in his De Gloria Confessorum, c. xx. (Migne, Patrol. 71, p. 842), describes the dedication of an oratory at Tours, a very beautiful cell, heretofore used as a salt cellar: "The altar was placed in its future position; the night was spent in vigil at the basilica; in the morning they went to the cell and consecrated the altar, then returned to the basilica, and thence took the relics. There were present a very large choir of priests and deacons, and a distinguished body of honourable citizens, with a large assembly of people. On arrival at the door a miracle of splendour took place," which Gregory describes.

LITERATURE.—Besides the several works and special treatises mentioned in the course of this article, reference may be made to Cardinal Bona, de Reb. Liturg. i. 19, 20 (Antwerp 1677, 4to); Fabricius (John), de Templis Christianorum (Helmstadii 1704, fol.); Augusti's List of the Literature of Holy Places (xi. 317). Patrum* (tom. i.) under the head "Ecclesia, 16, De Materiali Ecclesia, seu Templo, ejusque dedicatione," where some dedication sermons and mystical expositions and vindications of the rite of consecration may be found of the 12th and 13th centuries. [H. B.—y.]

6. Summary.—It will be seen in the instances given above that there are two distinct periods in the history of the consecration of churches. In the early ages, certainly as late as the time of Constantine, a church was inaugurated by solemn ceremonial, and dedicated to the service of God with prayer. Then, as churches built over the tombs of martyrs came to be regarded as endowed with peculiar sanctity, the possession of the relics of some saint came to be looked upon as absolutely essential to the sacredness of the building, and the deposition of such relics in or below the altar henceforward formed the central portion of the consecration-rite. All the essentials of such a rite are found in the description of the consecration of an oratory, quoted above from Gregory of Tours. [Compare ALTAR.]

To the second phase belong all the ancient rituals of consecration now extant, whether in East or West. We may take, as a summary of the rites above referred to, the service for the consecration of churches given in Egbert's Pontifical (pp. 26-58, ed. Surtees Soc.), which differs in no essential point from that of the Gregorian sacramentary.

The relics were to be watched the night before in some church already consecrated. In the morning the bishop and clergy came in procession to the church to be consecrated; candles are lighted, the clerks in procession pass round the church outside. The door of the church is opened with appropriate chants and ceremony. Prayer is said in the midst of the church, and the procession, with litany, solemnly approaches the altar with prostration. Then follows the A. B. C. darium (see above). Holy water is ed and sprinkled about the church and the altar; the altar is anointed with oil and chrism; the slab is to be laid on the altar, incense coverings, the fittings (ornaments) of the church, and the vessels to be used in divine service are blessed. Then the relics are brought in solemn procession from the place where they have been deposited. When they come before the altar a curtain is drawn between the clerks and the people; the bishop makes the sign of the cross with chrism inside the CONFESSIO or cavity where the relics are to be placed, and at the four corners of the altar. After the relics have been deposited in the confessio, the slab is laid on the altar and fixed with mortar. The bishop says a prayer. The altar is then covered and decked, the paten and chalice are blessed. Then the clerks then enter the vestry and put on their vestments. Meantime the church is made ready, and the bishop and clergy on their return perform the mass In Dedicatione Ecclesiae.

Forms are also given in the Pontifical (p. 57) for the "Reconciliation" of an altar or holy place where blood has been shed or homicide perpetrated.

For other ceremonies of dedication see FONT, BAPTISTRY.

Inscriptions—Blanchini on the Liber Pontificalis, i. p. 74, ed. Migne quotes the following inscription as proving the consecration of a church at Rome in the 4th century by Damasus:—

T. I. X. N. EGO DAMASI VS VRB ROME EPS AN
C DOMV COSECRAVI
... N. R. Q. S. M. S. S. P. A. S. P. E.

Titulus in Christi nomine. Ego Damasus
Romae Episcopus hanc domum consecravi.
Interpretation of the remaining portion of the inscription is doubtful, but S. P. A. S. P. E. is taken to designate Sanctus Paulus, Sanctus Petrus. On the reverse of the stone is engraved,

[Hic re] QVIESCIT CAPVT
SCI CRESCENTINI M.
ET RELIQUE S. SVPANT.

The Abbe Martigny (Dictionnaire, p. 227) has already remarked, that the epithet sanctus is known to be used in this way so early as the 4th century, and that the inscription is probably of a later date than the time of Pope Damasus. There is, in fact, probably no inscription testifying to the consecration of a church so early a date as the time of St. Ambrose, and we know that a dedication-rite similar to that of later times was coming into use.

Effect of Consecration.—Churches and their contents, once consecrated, were to be reserved exclusively for the offices of religion. Eating and drinking in them was forbidden after the sacrifices had been abolished; and wearing of arms in them was never allowed. In virtue of the 2nd of these rules they speedily became asylums or places of refuge for all threatened with violence: still they could only be used as such for a limited duration in virtue of the first. stant summi Dei templi timentibus," said the law in the Theodosian code, not merely confirming this privilege, but extending it to the various surroundings of a church where meals might be taken and sleeping quarters established for any length of time; by another law, however, it was modified, by excluding public debtors, slaves, and Jews, from benefiting by it in future (lib. ix. tit. 49); and Justinian afterwards excluded malefactors (Novel. 17). Some interesting remarks on these constitutions may be read in a letter of Alcuin (Ep. civ. ed. Migne) to his two disciples, Candidus and Nathaniel: modified indeed by the important letter of Charlemagne which follows it; and in accordance with which the rights of sanctuary are upheld in the Frank capitularies of the 8th century.

Property given to the Church might never be alienated from it, except under special circumstances defined by the canons: much more therefore buildings that had been solemnly consecrated. The canons forbidding alienation are numerous from the 15th Ancyran, A.D. 315 downwards; and the 31st and three following, with the 65th Apostolical, may be still earlier. Justinian has numerous regulations to the same effect in his Code (lib. ii. tit. 2) and 7th Novel. In all these church property seems to be considered inalienable, rather as being in trust for others than upon higher grounds: at all events, none of them actually discuss consecrated sites and buildings as such. Charlemagne was more explicit in one of his capitularies (A.D. 802, c. 34, ed. Migne): "Ut loca quae semel Deo dedicata sunt ut monasteria sint, maneat perpetuo monasteria, nec possint ultra fieri saecularia habitacula." This was generalized subsequently, till it appeared as a maxim in the "Regulae Juris," appended to the 6th book of the Decretals, in these words: "Semel Deo dicatum non est ad usus humanos ulterius transferendum" (No. 51). Even the wood and stones used in building a church were considered to have shared its consecration, and could not afterwards be removed to subserve structures purely secular, though they might be burnt. Events in this respect have long since proved stronger than the Decretals: and there are some remarkable words on record of Jehovah Himself in taking possession of the first building ever dedicated to His service, shewing that His acceptance of it was conditional, and might not, under circumstances which actually took place, be permanent: "Now have I chosen and sanctified this house, that my name may be there for ever. . . . But if ye turn away and forsake my statutes and my commandments which I have set before you . . . this house which I have sanctified for my name will I cast out of my sight, and will make it to be a proverb and a by-word among all nations" (2 Chron. vii. 19, 20). Canonists have forgotten these words altogether in estimating the "effects of consecration." Comp. particularly Lequeux's Manuel, Tract. de Rebus Sacris, l. xci. and cxxvi.-xxxix. A larger work is Gibert's Corp. Jur. Canon. vol. ii. Tract. de Eccl. tit. xv. [E. S. Ft.]

CONSECRATION (Eucharistic). (Consecratio, Sanctificatio, ἀγίασις, ἁγιασμός.) For the distinction between consecration and benediction, see BENEDICTION. The general consideration of the doctrine of Eucharistic consecration belongs to theology, and the question is considered here only in its relation to the liturgy.

1. The principal formulae of consecration are given under CANON OF THE LITURGY. It will be seen in that article that the most noteworthy difference between the forms of consecration used in the Eastern and the Western churches respectively consists in this, that in the Eastern Church the Holy Spirit is invoked, after the recitation of the words of institution, to descend upon the elements, and make them the Body and Blood of Christ [EPICLESIS]; and this invocation is commonly thought to imply, that consecration would be imperfect without it. This seems also to be distinctly implied in the well-known passage of Cyril of Jerusalem (Catech. Mystag. v. c. 7), which speaks of the hallowing and changing influence of the Holy Spirit [CANON OF THE LITURGY, p. 269]. On the other hand, in the Western churches, the invocation of the Holy Spirit at this part of the liturgy is generally wanting, and the whole consecrating virtue is attributed by Western ritualists to the recitation of the words of institution, accompanied by the fitting gestures. In the Mozarabic liturgy, however, the variable prayer which follows the Secreta frequently contains an invocation of the Holy Spirit upon the elements; and such an invocation is almost certainly an ancient rite which the Latin Church has lost, not an innovation of the Orientals. Ample information on the points of difference in this respect between East and West may be found in Bona (de Reb. Lit. ii. c. 13, §§ 4, 5), Renaudot (Lit. Orient. i. 186), Toutée (note on Cyril, Cat. Myst. v. 7), Le Brun (Cérém. de la Messe, tom. iii.), and Neale (Eastern Ch. Introd. pp. 492 ff.).

2. In the Ordo Romanus III. c. 16, the following rubrical directions are given. "After the Pope has communicated of the cup, which is held by the archdeacon, the latter pours a portion of the remaining wine into the larger chalice from which the people is to communicate; for wine not consecrated but mingled with the Lord's Blood is completely sanctified (sanctificatur per omnem modum). The reason of this custom probably was that in a very large congregation it was difficult to consecrate exactly the quantity of wine required. A small quantity was therefore consecrated in the first instance, and amplified according to the number of communicants by pouring in fresh wine. The whole of the wine in the cup was held to be completely consecrated by mingling with that which had been originally consecrated. The same practice is enjoined in the Ceremoniale of St. Benignus at Dijon, in the Cistercian Statutes, in the Statutes of the Abbey of St. Victor at Paris, and in Lyndwood's Constitut. Provinc. See Mabillon (Comm. Prævius in Ord. Rom. pp. lxii. xcii.).

3. The placing a particle of the consecrated bread in the chalice is sometimes called "consecration." In the Missæ Illyricæ (Bona, de Reb. Lit. p. 553) the petition occurs, "Fiat commistio et consecratio corporis et sanguinis D. N. I. C. omnibus accipientibus nobis in vitam æternam;" and the 17th canon of the 1st Council of Orange directs, "Cum capsa et calix offerendus est, et admixtione eucharistiæ consecrandus." Compare COMMISTIO.

4. On certain days it is an ancient custom not CHRIST. ANT.

to consecrate the sacred elements. See PRÆ-SANCTIFIED, LITURGY OF. [C.]

CONSECRATION OF BISHOPS [BISHOP; ORDINATION.]

CONSENT TO MARRIAGE. The marriage-law of all countries turns upon one or other of two principles. Either marriage is viewed as a union between persons, or as the disposal of a property. In the former case, the consent of the parties themselves is the main element in it; in the latter, that of some other person or persons. Still, in legislations founded upon the former principle, the element of consent by others comes in as a salutary check upon rash self-disposal by the young; in those founded upon the latter, the recognition of a right of self-sale in the adult may equally check the too authoritative interference of others.

The Jewish law is in its inception essentially personal. Christ needed but to refer to the first chapter of the Jewish Scriptures in order to bring out the full spirituality of the marriage relation (Matt. xix. 4; Mark x. 6). In Genesis, the woman is at once brought before us as the one "helpmeet" for the man. At the outset of the Adamic history, there is no question of selling or buying, no exercise of any third will between the two. God simply brings the woman to the man, who at once recognises her as bone of his bones, and flesh of his flesh (c. ii. vv. 20, 22, 23). As the history proceeds, however, other elements develop themselves. Slavery makes its appearance, and the slave-owner is exhibited as giving the slave in marriage (Gen. xvi. 3; xxx. 4).

Throughout the patriarchal history (Gen. xxiv., xxix., xxiv.; Ex. ii. 21), under the Law (Ex. xxi. 4, 7, 8; xxii. 17; Deut. xxii. 16), in the time of the Judges (Josh. xv. 16, 17; Judg. i. 12; xv. 1, 2; xxi. 1, 7, 8; Ruth iv. 10), under the Monarchy (1 Sam. xvii. 25; xviii. 19, 21, 27; 2 Sam. xiii. 13; 1 Kings ii. 17), after the Captivity (Nehem. xiii. 25), in our Lord's time (Matt. xxiv. 38; Luke xvii. 27), in the Apostolic Church (1 Cor. vii. 38), the right of the father to give his daughter in marriage, of the king to give one who was under his control, is either assumed or asserted.

It is nevertheless certain, as may be seen in Selden's treatise de Uxoræ Ebraicæ, and as has been stated above under the head BETROTHAL, that among the Jews the power of self-disposal in marriage was singularly wide for either sex, the man being held of full age, and capable of marrying at his will in the last day of his 15th year, the woman in the second half of her 12th, whilst if betrothed under that age by their fathers, girls could repudiate the engagement at ten. Yet, strange to say, the forms used in Jewish practice belong to the material, and not to the spiritual view of marriage. The prominence given to the ARRHA or earnest [see ARRHA], and the necessity for its being given to the woman herself either in money or money's worth, shew clearly that the grand spirituality of marriage, as exhibited in the second chapter of Genesis, had been lost sight of, that it had come to be viewed essentially as an act of wife-buying; and yet the fact that the woman, from earliest puberty, was reckoned as having the sole right of self-sale, preserved an amount of freedom in contract which would otherwise seem to be only to that view of it which the praedicta.

The Roman law exhibits to us a precisely similar development; it starts from the same view to grow more and more into the actual one. Originally the father's potestas, solely to be distinguished from absolute ownership, overshadows all the domestic relations, extending equally to the wife and to the children of both sexes. Eventually, so far as marriage is concerned, the potestas resolves itself simply into a right of consent. And consent is made the very essence of marriage. "Nuptias non sollicitudo, sed consensus facit," are the words of Ulpian (Dig. bk. l. t. xvii. l. 30). The validity of marriages contracted by mere consent was admitted in a constitution of Theodosius Valentinian, A.D. 449, (Code, bk. v. t. xvii.

his consent, moreover, must be at once that of the parties themselves, and of those in whose power they are (Paulus, Dig. bk. xliii. t. ii. l. 1). As to slaves, indeed, unlike the Jewish law, the Roman law never recognised such unions as their marriage, and the unions between men and women slaves, which might be tolerated and even respected by their masters, had of no more legal value than the coupling of domestic animals, although, as may be seen afterwards, they might be recognised by the superintendency of the church. Where, indeed, a master gave away, or allowed another to give away, his slave girl in marriage to a freeman, he constituted a dos upon her, Justinian ruled will be further shown hereafter under the heading CONTRACT) that this should amount to enfranchisement (Code, bk. vii. t. vi. l. 9; Nov. c. 11). But this of itself shows that marriage and slavery were held to be incompatible.

The principle of the freedom of marriage, and resting mainly on the consent of the parties, stands generally recognised in Justinian's Code, and is indeed further carried out. "None," says a constitution of Diocletian and Maximian, "can be compelled either to marry, or to be reconciled after divorce" (Code, t. iv. l. 14; and see l. 12, as to the filii familias).

On the other hand, several enactments of Justinian's Code shew that the law looked rather to the marriage, from the woman's point of view, to the choice of a husband for her, and there held that in the determination of that choice, the counsel or even the judgment of third persons might be called in (Code, bk. v. l. 1, 20).

The influx of the barbarian nations into the empire may be said to have in great measure altered, under other names, those stricter views of paternal authority which had belonged to earlier ages, at least as respects women. In the Edict of Theodoric we find a provision "a father shall not be compelled against his will to give his family in marriage to any" (l. 13). In the Lombard laws the mundium is the Roman potestas, but under a purely binary form, and instead of being confined to the ascending line, seems to have belonged to the nearest male relation. Thus by a law of Charlemagne (638 or 643), if after two years' betrothal the man does not claim his bride, "the father or brother or he who has her mundium" may prosecute the surety till he pays her metes or foliature, after which "they may give her to another husband, being a freeman" (c. 178). A widow indeed has power, if she choose, to go to another husband, being a freeman (c. 183). And the woman's consent, whether girl or widow, has always great weight in the eyes of the law. Thus it takes account of the cases of a man marrying a girl or widow betrothed to another, "yet with her consent" (c. 190), and in like manner of his ravishing either with her consent—the term apparently meaning here, carrying away without marriage (c. 191). Where indeed a slave married a freewoman with her consent, her parents might kill her, or sell her out of the province (c. 222). The laws of Luitprand, A.D. 717, enact penalties against those who betroth to themselves, or marry, girls under twelve, but a father or brother may give or betroth his daughter or sister at any age (bk. ii. c. 8). And it seems to be admitted that a girl of twelve may "go to a husband" without the will of her parents (bk. vi. c. 61, and see c. 60; A.D. 724). The mundium, it may be observed, appears also in the law of the Alamanni, latter half of 8th century.

Under the law of the Saxons, a man who wished to marry had to give 300 solidi to the girl's parents (t. iv. l. 1), but if he did so against the parent's will, she consenting, twice that amount (l. 2). If he wished to marry a widow, he must offer the price of her purchase to her guardian (apparently a Latinized expression for the mundicall, or mundicall, holder of the mundium), her relatives consenting thereto (t. vii. l. 3). If her guardian refused the money, he must turn to her next of kin, and by their consent he might have her, but he must have 300 solidi ready to give to the guardian (l. 4). Here a power of consent in the kinsmen generally, over and above the specific powers of the holder of the mundium, is clearly admitted.

The Burgundian law (originally of the beginning of the 6th century) recognizes also some freedom of choice in the woman, especially if a widow. Where a girl of her own accord has sought a man, he has to pay only three times the "price of marriage" (nuptiale pretium) instead of six times, which he would have to pay if he had carried her off against her will (t. xii. cc. 1, 3; see also t. cxc.). A widow wishing to remarry within the year of her husband's death, is said to have "free power" to do so (t. xlii. c. 2; law of A.D. 517). But in a later law, a power of consent in parents seems to be indicated (t. lli.).

The Visigothic law, which has always been held to bear peculiar marks of clerical inspiration, is especially restrictive of the woman's self disposal. A law of Receswinth, allowing for the first time intermarriage between Goths and Romans, enacts that a freeman may marry a freewoman with the solemn consent of the ascendants ("prosapiae"), and the permission of the court (bk. iii. t. i. c. 1). If a man has betrothed to himself a girl "with the will of her father or the other near relatives to whom by law this power is given," the girl may not marry another against the will of her rela-er's consent has been the sole condition of it for the slave's marriage; Basil himself related his authority over the slave to that father. Now the existence of a parental right is recognized in the slave himself to his own offspring, and the slave-parent's it is placed on a level with that of the free.

Towards the end of the 6th century, again (581), a canon (10) of the 1st Council of Nicaea expressly enacts that if two slaves intermarry with their master's consent, after the achievement of either the marriage is not valid, though the other be not redeemable; in advance of anything to be found in the laws of American slavery in modern times. In the Carolingian era, the marriage of a slave with the master's consent obtains civil as well as ecclesiastical validity. A capitulary added to the Lombard laws enacts "That the marriages of slaves be not dissolved, if they have different masters, . . . but so nevertheless the marriage itself be legal, and by the will of their masters" (c. 129). The 30th canon of the 2nd Council of Châlons, A.D. 813, is pre-emptive to the same effect.

On the whole it may be said that, except so far as it relates to the marriage of slaves, the rule of the Church in respect of the consents necessary for the validity of marriage became hardly settled during the period which occupies us. The necessity for the free consent of the parties themselves was never entirely lost sight of; but in different regions, and under the pressure of different feelings in certain races, the authority of the father over a daughter was almost acknowledged as absolute; whilst elsewhere a claim of the family at large to interfere was at least partly admitted. Towards the end of the 12th century, indeed, in two instances the priest or the bishop himself was made a consenting party. In the first instance however is marriage when actually contracted (except as between slaves) treated as voidable for want of the consent of the father or person. As to consents to betrothal, see at word. See also generally CONTRACT OF MARRIAGE. [J. M. L.]

CONSIGNATORIUM. To bless by the use of the sign of the cross, as in confirmation, is called consignare; hence the word consignatorium is occasionally used to designate the place set apart for that rite. John the Deacon of Naples (Episc. Neap.) says that Bishop John († 816) erected a beautiful building, called consignatorium oblatorum, so arranged that the candidates for baptism should pass in on one side, be baptized by the bishop who sat in the midst, then pass out by the other side. This arrangement was probably somewhat peculiar; but see also Alcuin at least (De Dio. Off. c. 19), being the ceremonies of Easter-Eve, says the newly baptized were confirmed in the baptismal font. (Ducange's Glossary, s. v. 'Consignatorium'.) [C.]

CONSTANTINOPLE, COUNCILS OF.

(1) A.D. 336 (Mansi, ii. 1167-70) held by the Eusebians under Eusebius of Nicomedia, at which St. Athanasius was exiled to Treves, Marcellus of Ancyra, with several other bishops deposed, and Arius ordered to be received into communion by the Alexandrine Church. According to Rufinus (Hist. i. 12), it was convened by order of the emperor, viz., Constantine the Great, and according to Eusebius the historian (cont. Marcel. i. 4), it was exclusively gathered together from the upper provinces of Asia Minor, from Thrace, and the parts beyond it; in other words, the neighbourhood of the capital. It seems to have met in February, and not separated till the end of July, so that its proceedings spread over nearly six months.

(2) A.D. 339, or according to Pagi, 340, by order of the Emperor Constantius, to depose Paul, the newly elected bishop there, whose orthodoxy displeased him, and translate Eusebius, his favourite, from Nicomedia to the imperial see (Mansi, ii. 1275).

(3) A.D. 380 (Mansi, iii. 325-36), composed of deputies from the council of Seleucia, just over, with some bishops summoned from Bithynia, to meet them, about fifty in all (Soc. ii. 41 and seq.). Most of the former were partisans of the metropolitan of Caesarea, whose name was Acacius, and Semi-Arians. A creed was published by them, being the 9th, says Socrates, that had come out since that of Nicaea. It was, in fact, what had been rehearsed at Rimini, with the further declaration that neither substance nor hypostasis were permissible terms in speaking of God. The Son was pronounced to be like the Father according to the Scriptures, and Aetius, who maintained the contrary opinion, was condemned. A synodical epistle to George, bishop of Alexandria, whose presbyter he was, conveyed the sentence passed upon him and his followers. Several bishops were deposed at the same time; among whom were Macedonius, bishop of Constantinople, Eleusius of Cyzicum, Basilus of Ancyra, and last, but not least, St. Cyril of Jerusalem—all for various causes. Ten bishops, who declined subscribing to these depositions, were to consider themselves deposed till they subscribed. Ulphilas, bishop of the Goths, who had hitherto professed the Nicene faith, was one of those present, and joined in their creed. Eudoxius managed to slip from Antioch into the vacancy created by the deposition of Macedonius. On the other hand, Eustathius of Sebaste was not allowed even a hearing, as having been previously deposed at the synod of Caesarea, in Asia Minor, under his own father, Eulalius.

(4) The 2nd general, met in May, A.D. 381, to re-assemble the following year, for reasons explained by the bishops in their synodical letter of that date (Mansi, iii. 583, note). Owing to this circumstance, and to the fact that its acts have been lost, its proceedings are not easy to unravel. Socrates begins his account of it by saying that the Emperor Theodosius convened a council of bishops of the same faith as himself, in order that the faith settled at Nicaea might prevail, and a bishop be appointed to the see of Constantinople (v. 8). That the bishops met at his bidding is testified by themselves in their short address to him subsequently, to confirm what they had decreed (Mansi, ib. 557), to say nothing of other proofs, for which see Beveridge (Synod. ii. 89). Whether they re-assembled at his bidding we are not told. Of their number there has never been any dispute, this council having in fact gone by the name of that of "the 150 (pv) fathers" ever since. There were 36 bishops of the Macedonian party likewise invited, but they quitted Constantinople in a body when they found that it was the faith of the Nicene fathers to which they would be called upon to subscribe. Of those present, Timothy, bishop of Alexandria, St. Meletius of Antioch, who presided at first, St. Cyril of Jerusalem, Ascholius, bishop of Thessalonica, St. Amphilochius of Iconium, with the two Gregories of Nazianzum and Nyssa, were the most considerable, Nectarius and Flavian being added to their number before they separated. Dionysius Exiguus (Mansi, iii. 568-72) has preserved the names of all who subscribed. Seven canons and a creed would appear at first sight to have been submitted to the emperor by the assembled fathers for confirmation at the close of their labours. John Scholasticus, however, the Greek collector of canons in the 6th century, contemporary with Dionysius Exiguus, reckons only six (ap. Justell. Bibl. Jur. Canon. ii. 502). Dionysius himself only three; but then he has appended the 4th to the 2nd. The creed follows in his version as in the Greek. Isidore Mercator makes six canons out of his three, and numbers the creed as a 7th. Another Latin version given in Mansi makes five canons out of his three, and omits the creed. The Arabic paraphrase (ib.) makes four in all, without the creed; but, in addition to his three, setting down as a fourth canon 6 of the Greek version. Whether any canons have been lost seems to admit of some doubt. Socrates, as is well known, speaks of the establishment of patriarchs as one of the things done by this council: and the Arabic paraphrase, under a separate heading, "concerning the order of the prelates, and their rank and place," explains this as follows: "Honour besides, and the primacy, was granted in this council to the bishop of Rome, and he was made first, the bishop of Constantinople second, the bishop of Alexandria third, the bishop of Antioch fourth, and the bishop of Jerusalem fifth"—which is the more remarkable as neither it nor Socrates omit the canon ordaining special prerogatives for new Rome. As Beveridge well remarks, it is one difficulty connected with these canons (Synod. ii. 98), that in all probability they were not all passed at the same council. This, and a good deal more bearing upon the history of the council, will come out as we examine them. Canon 1 confirms the doctrine of the 318 Nicene Fathers, condemning in particular the errors of the Eunomians or Anomaeans—in other words, the extreme Arians—the Eudoxians or Arians pure, and the Semi-Arians or Pneumatomachi—fighters against the Holy Spirit—with the followers of Sabellius, Marcellus, Photinus, and Apollinaris. Of these the Semi-Arians engaged most attention by far here, from the further error into which they had fallen of late respecting the Divinity of the Holy Ghost. All, in short, that was ruled by this council on doctrine was directed against them exclusively. But, as such, they were more properly termed Macedonians than Semi-Arians, from Macedonius, bishop of Constantinople, deposed at the synod held there A.D. 360, for various crimes, and afterwards founder of the sect called "Pneumatomachi." For obvious reasons they are not designated here from the name of their founder. What their errors were we shall see presently. Canon 2 confines each bishop to his own diocese, in particular the bishop of Alexandria is restricted to Egypt, the bishops of the East to the East alone, the privileges of the Church of Antioch, in conformity with the Nicene canons, being maintained: the bishops of Asia, that is, Asia Minor, to the South-West, Pontus and Thrace, similarly to their respective limits. By the word "diocese" is meant, as Beveridge shows (p. 93), a tract embracing several provinces. The events which had led to this enactment require some notice. Immediately on the death of Valens (Clinton's Fasti R. A.D. 379, col. 4), St. Gregory Nazianzen appeared at Constantinople, whither he was invited by the orthodox party refusing obedience to Demophilus, the Arian bishop in possession. He was consecrated by St. Meletius of Antioch, who thus went out of his diocese to ordain him. Peter, bishop of Alexandria—then reckoned the second see in the world after Rome—not to be outdone, nominated Maximus the cynic, as he was called from his philosophical antecedents, to the post, and deputed three bishops from Egypt to carry out his consecration on the spot. Maximus had previously seemed to take part with Gregory, and Theodosius rejected him, when he appeared as his rival (Clinton, ib. and Vales. ad Soz. vii. 9). This conflict of the two sees, however, terminated in the resignation of Gregory, soon after the meeting of the council, though he was declared bishop there, and all that related to Maximus annulled in a special canon—the 4th.

Most probably, the 3rd canon, ordaining that in future the see of Constantinople should take honorary precedence (τὰ πρεσβεία τῆς τιμῆς) next after Rome, was intended to prevent the bishops of Antioch and Alexandria from ever attempting to take such liberties with it again.

Another event had occurred meanwhile (Clinton, ib. col. 4), which may be supposed to account for the salvo to the privileges of the Church of Antioch, expressed in the 2nd canon. St. Meletius of Antioch had died "during the session between May and July." The funeral oration pronounced over him by St. Gregory of Nyssa is still extant, but it contains no historical allusions. There had been a compact entered into between his party and that of St. Paulinus at Antioch two years before—where they were rival bishops—that both parties, whenever either of the bishops died, should unite under the survivor of them. In spite of this understanding, Flavian, who had been one of the chief promoters of it among the supporters of St. Meletius, was unanimously appointed bishop in his stead by the council (Cave, Hist. Lit. i. 277 and 364). This act not merely re-opened the schism at Antioch, but produced heart-burnings elsewhere, the Western and Egyptian bishops pronouncing strongly than ever in favour of St. Paulinus, the disapprobation shown for Flavian by St. Gregory, tending to alienate numbers of his own side from him amongst the Easterns. It was, in fact, one of the principal causes of his retirement. The appointment of his successor, Nestorius, at the instance of the emperor, was probably the last act of the council of this year—a strong act it was, as Nestorius had to be tried before he could be consecrated (Soz. vii.).

Dionysius Exiguus, as has been said, ends the canons of this council with the 4th. As Beveridge, too, remarks (ib. p. 98), traces of a series commence with the 5th. It runs as follows:—"Concerning the tome of the Westerns, too, have received those who professed in belief, at Antioch, in one Godhead of the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost." What was this tome of the Westerns? Beveridge considers it have been the synodical epistle received from Pope Damasus by the Easterns at their second meeting, A.D. 382, to which they wrote their answer in reply. De Marca, Cave, and others prefer to consider it a synodical letter of Pope Damasus, addressed to the synod of Antioch A.D. 345 or 9. Baronius, another of his to St. Paulinus of Antioch some years before. May it not be that the first tome of the kind was the one sent by St. Athanasius in the name of his synod at Alexandria, A.D. 362, to the Church of Antioch, which he calls "a tome" himself, to which St. Paulinus is expressly said to have subscribed, and in which the indivisibility of the Holy Ghost from the substance both of the Father and the Son is as distinctly set forth as ever was afterwards (Mansi, iii. 353-4). Though Eusebius of Vercelli, to whom it was presented, and by whom it was in due time subscribed, it would find its way into the West and become, as the rallying point of the orthodox, and bond of union, under existing circumstances, between the sees of Alexandria, Antioch, and Rome, whose acceptance of its doctrine can scarcely become known to each other before Macarius, the ex-patriarch of Constantinople, commenced assailing the Divinity of the third person of the Godhead. On this, it would immediately give rise to, and be the foundation of, a series of "tomes" or epistles of the same kind between them, in which Constantinople, being in Arian hands, would take no part, nor Alexandria much, owing to the banishment of its orthodox prelate, and, from A.D. 373 to 378, under Valens. St. Meletius had also been driven from Antioch earlier; but then we are told expressly by Meletius (vi. 7), his orthodox rival, St. Paulinus, allowed to remain; and this would account for the correspondence that went on between them and Pope Damasus uninterruptedly while Meletius was away, and of which the prominent topic was the Divinity of the Holy Ghost. As Mansi points out (iii. 463-8), the synods of Antioch and Rome are confusedly given about the same time. There are traces of a synod of Antioch, as well as of another at Rome, A.D. 372; the acts of both have not hitherto been distinguished from those of two later synods at Antioch, A.D. 377, and at Antioch, the year or two following, under St. Meletius, on the return of the exiles. And one thing may well be thought to have been agreed upon at the first of these synods of Antioch, and possibly Rome too, which was afterwards confirmed in the 2nd, and is evidently referred to by the Constantinopolitan fathers in their synodical letter, namely, the creed in its enlarged form. And for this reason—St. Epiphanius, bishop of Salamis in Cyprus, was another of the orthodox bishops who was not disturbed in his see; and his see, whether subject to Antioch or not, then, must have brought him into frequent communication with it, even if he had not been a personal friend of St. Paulinus, or was not present at the synod held there A.D. 372. Now, in c. 119 of his work called Anacrotus, of which he fixes the date himself in the next c., viz., A.D. 373, what was rehearsed afterwards at the council of Chalcedon as the creed of the 150 fathers, that is, of this council of Constantinople, is set down word for word, so far as its new clauses are concerned, and called that of Nicaea by him. Admit this form to have been agreed upon at the synod of Antioch, in conjunction, or not, with that of Rome, A.D. 372, and his own use of it the year following, as the authorised creed of the Church, is explained at once, nor is there any reason why St. Gregory Nyssen, if he composed it at all—as stated by Nicephorus alone (xii. 13)—should not have composed it there. But Valens coming to Antioch in April (Clinton, A.D. 372, col. 2), to persecute the orthodox, the probability would be that this synod was hastily broken up, and remained in abeyance till A.D. 378 or 9, when its proceedings were resumed under St. Meletius, and confirmed by 163 bishops, and with its proceedings this creed. All at the same time then and there subscribed to the Western tome or letter of Pope Damasus. Hence, both the language of the 5th Constantinopolitan canon above mentioned, and of the fathers who framed it, in their synodical letter, where they say that "this, their faith, which they had professed there summarily, might be learnt more fully by their Western brethren, on their being as good as to refer to 'the tome' that emanated from the synod of Antioch, and that set forth by the oecumenical council of Constantinople the year before, in which documents they had professed their faith at greater length." Now, what they had set forth themselves was their adherence to the Nicene faith and reprobation of the heresies enumerated in their first canon; what they had received from Antioch and accepted must have been the creed which has since gone by their name, but was certainly not their composition; and whatever else was confirmed there, A.D. 378, including the Western tome. Which of the letters of Pope Damasus is here specified comes out as plainly. His letter to St. Paulinus was written A.D. 372, when there was nobody left at Antioch but St. Paulinus to write to. The letter addressed in his own name and that of the 93 bishops with him, "to the Catholic bishops of the East," was "the tome" received by the synod at Antioch A.D. 378-9 (Mansi, ib. p. 459-62); to which they replied the same year (ib. p. 511-15). Both letters being on the same subject—as were the synods of 372 and 378-9—it was easy to confuse them. Amphilochius, bishop of Iconium, held a synod and wrote on the same subject about the same time (ib. p. 503-8).

We are now in a position to deal with the synodical letter of the reassembled council of Constantinople A.D. 382, and their proceedings generally. Finding there were still ecclesiastical matters of urgent importance to be settled, most of the bishops who had met at Constantinople A.D. 381, returned thither, as Theodoret relates, the following summer (Mansi ad Baron. A.D. 382, n. 3). One of their number, indeed, Ascholius, bishop of Thessalonica, and SS. Epiphanius and Jerome with him, had gone meanwhile to Rome. Being at Constantinople, they received a synodical letter from the West, inviting them to Rome, where a large gathering was in contemplation. This letter having been lost, we can only guess at its contents from what they say in reply to it, coupled with their 5th canon, which was evidently framed in consequence. The affairs of the East being in imminent peril and confusion, they beg to be excused going away so far from their sees. They had come to Constantinople on account of what had been written by the West after the synod of Aquileia the year before to the Emperor Theodosius—evidently the letter in which the consecrations of Flavian and Nectarius are mentioned disapprovingly (Mansi, ib. p. 631-2)—but had made no preparations for going further from home. The most they could do would be to send deputies into the West. Cyriacus, Eusebius, and Priscian are named, to explain their proceedings, which they then epitomise, commencing with what has been anticipated above about their faith, and ending with the statement that Nectarius and Flavian had been appointed canonically to their respective sees, while St. Cyril was recognised by them as bishop of Jerusalem for the same reason. Thus this letter explains the framing of their 5th canon, and attests its date. The same date is assigned by Beveridge to canon 6, restricting the manner of instituting proceedings against bishops, and reprobating appeals to the secular power. But canon 7, prescribing the distinctions to be observed in admitting heretics into communion, is shown by him not to belong to this council at all. It is almost identical with the 95th Trullan canon (Bev. ad l.). Of the creed, little more need be added to what has been said. It was in existence A.D. 373, having been probably framed at Antioch, in conformity with the synodical letter of St. Athanasius, A.D. 372, where it was doubtless confirmed A.D. 378-9, and received more probably by the 5th canon of this council A.D. 382, than promulgated separately by the council of the year preceding. Possibly this may have been the creed called by Cassian (De Incarn. vi. 3 and 6) as late as A.D. 430, "peculiarly the creed of the city and Church of Antioch." From the portion of it given by him it is as likely to have been this, as that of A.D. 363 (for which see Soc. iii. 25), or any other between them. That there is a family likeness between it and the creed of the Church of Jerusalem commented on by St. Cyril will be seen on comparing them (Heurtley's De Fide et S. p. 9-13). On this hypothesis alone we can understand why no notice should have been taken of it at the council of Ephesus, A.D. 431, and in the African code, namely, because it had originated with a provincial, and only been as yet received by a general council. It was promulgated as identical with that of Nicaea for the first time by the fathers of the 4th council.

No more remains but to observe that the dogmatic professions of the council of 381 were confirmed by Theodosius in a constitution dated July 30 of the same year, and addressed to Antonius, proconsul of Asia, by which the churches are ordered to be handed over to the bishops in communion with Nectarius and others who composed it, the Eunomians, Arians, and Antians having been deprived of their churches by a constitution issued ten days earlier (Cod. Theod. xvi. tit. 1, l. 3, and tit. 5, l. 8). And it was received by Pope Damasus, and has been regarded in the West ever since, so far, as oecumenical. Its first four canons, in the same way, have been always admitted into Western collections. But what passed at the supplemental council of 382 never seems to have been confirmed or received equally. It was in declining to come to this last council that St. Gregory Nazianzen said, in his epistle to Procopius (cxxx. ed. Migne), "that he had come to the resolution of avoiding every meeting of bishops, for that he had never seen any synod and well, or assuage rather than aggravate disorders." His celebrated oration (ib. xlii.), known as his "farewell" to the council of 381, is inspired by a very different spirit.

Lastly, there was a third meeting of bishops held at Constantinople, by command of Theodosius, A.D. 383, under Nectarius, to devise remedies for the confusion created by so many sees passing out of the hands of the heterodox into those of the orthodox party (Soc. v. 10). The Arian, Eunomian, and Macedonian bishops were required to attend there with confessions of their faith, which the emperor, after examining carefully, rejected in favour of Nicaea. The Novatians alone, receiving this, were placed by him upon equal terms with the orthodox. Of the heterodox professions, that of Eunomius is extant, and not without interest. It may be seen in Cave (Hist. Lit. i. 210). It is said to have been on this occasion that Amphilocheus, bishop of Iconium, on entering the palace, made the usual obeisance to Theodosius, but took no notice of Arcadius, his son, standing at his side. When the emperor reproved him for this, "You see, sire," said the bishop, "how impatient you are that your own son should be slighted; much more will God punish those who refuse due honour to his only begotten Son" (Theod. v. 16).

(6) A.D. 394—reckoning that of 383 as the 5th. Among those present were Nectarius of Constantinople, Theophilus of Alexandria, Flavian of Antioch, &c. What called them together, in all probability, was the dedication of a new church in honour of SS. Peter and Paul: which done, they sat in judgment on a controversy between two rival bishops of Bostra, Bagadius, and Agapius; against the former of whom it was pleaded that he had been deposed by two bishops, since dead. The council decreed that, in future, not even three, much less two, bishops should have the power of deposing another, but that, in conformity with the apostolic canons (and this express reference to them in such an assemblage is most noteworthy), it should be held to belong to a larger synod, and the bishops of the province (Mansi, iii. 851-4).

(7) A.D. 399, of 22 bishops under St. Chrysostom, to enquire into seven capital charges brought against Antoninus, bishop of Ephesus.

lied before the witnesses could be examined. St. Chrysostom, at the request of the clergy, went over thither, and, at the 70 bishops, appointed Heraclides a deacon, and deposed 6 bishops that had been ally ordained by him. Their proceedings were interesting, and contain a reference to one of the African Church (Mansi, iii. 18).

Strictly speaking, this last was a synod.

A.D. 404, to sit in judgment on St. Chrysostom who had been recalled from exile by the emperor and retaken possession of his see, from which he had been deposed by "the Synod of the Theophilus of Alexandria was not present on the occasion, having had to fly Constantinople on the return of his rival. Still he was represented; and St. Chrysostom had by this time provoked another enemy (Clinton, A.D. 404) in the Empress Eudoxia, whose statue he denounced from the games and revels and to be held round it in offensive proximity to his church. At this synod he seems to have been present (vi. 18) when the question of his deposition was argued. Thirty-six bishops had condemned him: but sixty-five more, he rejoined, had, by communicating with him, voted in his favour (Vales. ad l.). It is implied in these words, as some seem to suppose, that a synod was actually sitting at Constantinople now, any more than during the reign of the Oak, the deputies from which he was surrounded, but not synodically, by bishops, in his own palace. The 4th or 5th session of the Council of Antioch was by his opponents: his defence was that he was framed by the Arians (Reading, ib.). Led by his opponents, indeed, it was only worded from what either the 4th or 5th are now; so that possibly there may have been an Arian version of these canons, which his objection held good. The emperor, however, decided against him, and his exile was sent to Comana, on the Black Sea, says Sozomenus—to Cuculus, in Armenia, say others, where he died.

A.D. 426, on the last day of February, Basil was consecrated bishop there, in the place of Atticus. Afterwards, the errors of Eutyches, or Eutychites, were condemned, at the instance of the Bishops of Iconium and Sidon, and from the 7th action of the Council of Constantinople. A severe sentence was passed on Eutyches with holding them after this denunciation (Mansi, iv. 541-2).

A.D. 428, on the death of Sisinnius, when the ill-known Nestorius was consecrated bishop (Mansi, iv. 543-4).

A.D. 431, October 25, four months after he had been deposed, to consecrate Maximus in his place (Mansi, v. 1045). This done, he presided, and joined in a synodical decree closing that of the Council of Ephesus, the first six canons, as they are called, to the bishops of ancient Epirus, whom attempts were made to detach from orthodoxy (ib. 1045). Letters were written likewise by him to the emperor to Pope Celestine, St. Cyril, other bishops, to acquaint them with his proceedings, at which all expressed themselves well (ib. 257-82). Another synod appears to have been held by him the year following, for restoring peace between his own Church and that of Antioch (ib. 1049-50).

(12) A.D. 443, probably (Mansi, vi. 463-6, comp. Cave, i. 479) to consider the case of Athanasius, bishop of Perrhe, on the Euphrates, afterwards deposed at Antioch under Domnus. Here he seems to have got letters in his favour from Proclus (comp. Conc. Hierap. A.D. 445).

(13) A.D. 448, November 8, under Flavian, to enquire into a dispute between Florentius, metropolitan of Sardis, and two of his suffragans: but while sitting, it was called upon by Eusebius, bishop of Dorylaeum, one of its members, and who had, as a layman, denounced Nestorius, to summon Eutyches, archimandrite of a convent of three hundred monks, and as resolute an opponent of Nestorius as himself, on a charge that he felt obliged to press against him. The charge was that he recognised but one nature in Christ. Messengers were despatched to invite Eutyches to peruse what Eusebius had alleged against him. Meanwhile, two letters of St. Cyril—his second to Nestorius, recited and approved at the Council of Ephesus, and his letter to John of Antioch, on their reconciliation—were read out, and pronounced orthodox by all. A reply was brought subsequently from Eutyches, that he refused to quit his monastery. A 2nd and 3rd citation followed in succession. Then he promised attendance within a week. While waiting for him, the council listened to some minutes of a conversation between him and the two presbyters charged with his 2nd citation, when they said he expressly denied two natures in Christ. At last he appeared, made profession of his faith, and was condemned—thirty-two bishops and twenty-three archimandrites subscribing to his deposition from the priesthood and monastic dignity. Proceedings occupied altogether seven sessions—the last of which was held November 22. Its acts were recited in a subsequent council of the year following at Constantinople; at Ephesus, also, the year following, under Dioscorus; and again, in the 1st session of the Council of Chalcedon, where they may be read still (Mansi, vi. 495-6, and then 649-754).

(14) A.D. 449, April 8, of thirty bishops under Thalassius, archbishop of Caesarea in Cappadocia, held by order of the emperor, to re-consider the sentence passed on Eutyches by the council under Flavian, on a representation from the former that its acts had been falsified. This, however, was proved untrue. Another session was held April 27, on a second petition from Eutyches, to have the statement of Magnus—the official or silentary, who had accompanied him to the council under Flavian—taken down, which was done. This officer declared to having seen the instrument containing his deposition, before the session was held at which it was resolved on. The acts of this council are likewise preserved in the first session of that of Chalcedon (Mansi, vi. 503-4, and then 753-828).

(15) A.D. 450, at which Anatholius was ordained bishop; and then, some months afterwards, at the head of his suffragans and clergy, made profession of his faith and subscribed to the celebrated letter of St. Leo to his predecessor Flavian, in the presence of four legates from Rome, charged to obtain proofs of his orthodoxy (Mansi, vi. 509-14, with ep. lix. of St. Leo, ib. 83-5).

(16) A.D. 457, under Anatolius by order of the Emperor Leo, whom he had just crowned, to take cognisance of the petitions that had arrived from Alexandria for and against Timothy Aelurus, who, on the murder of St. Proterius, had been installed bishop there by the opponents of the Council of Chalcedon, and to consider what could be done to restore peace. The council anathematized Aelurus and his party (Mansi, vii. 521-2 & 869-70).

(17) A.D. 459, under Gennadius. Eighty-one bishops subscribed to its synodical letter still extant, in which the 2nd canon of the Council of Chalcedon is cited with approval against some simoniacal ordinations recently brought to light in Galatia (Mansi, vii. 911-20).

(18) A.D. 478, under Acacius, in which Peter, Bishop of Antioch, surnamed the Fuller, Paul of Ephesus, and John of Apamea, were condemned: and a letter addressed to Simplicius, bishop of Rome, to acquaint him with, and request him to concur in, their condemnation (Mansi, vii. 1017-22, comp. Vales. Observ. in Enag. l. 2). A letter was addressed at the same time by Acacius to Peter the Fuller himself, rebuking him for having introduced the clause "Who was crucified for us" into the Trisagion or hymn to the Trinity. Hitherto this letter has been printed as if it had issued from a synod five years later, when in fact there was no such synod (Mansi, ib. 1119-24).

(19) A.D. 492, under Euphemius: in favour of the Council of Chalcedon; but as he declined removing the name of his predecessor Acacius from the sacred diptychs, he was not recognised as bishop by popes Felix and Gelasius, to whom he transmitted its acts, though his orthodoxy was allowed (Mansi, vii. 1175-80).

(20) A.D. 496, by order of the Emperor Anastasius I., in which the Henoticon of Zeno was confirmed, Euphemius, bishop of Constantinople deposed; and Macedonius, the second of that name who had presided there, substituted for him (Mansi, viii. 186-7).

(21) A.D. 498, by order of the emperor Anastasius I., in which Flavian, the second bishop of Antioch of that name, and Philoxenus of Hierapolis, took the lead: condemning the Council of Chalcedon and all who opposed the Monophysite doctrine, or would not accept the interpolated clause "Who was crucified for us" in the Trisagion. But it seems probable that this council took place a year later; and that another had met a year earlier, under Macedonius, less hostile to the Council of Chalcedon than this, and of which this was the reaction (Mansi, viii. 197-200).

(22) A.D. 518, July 20, by order of the emperor Justin, at which the names of the Councils of Nicaea, Constantinople, Ephesus, and Chalcedon: of St. Leo of Rome, with Euphemius and Macedonius of Constantinople, were restored in the sacred diptychs: and Severus and all other opponents of the 4th council anathematized. Its synodical letter signed by forty bishops and addressed to the Constantinopolitan bishop, John II., praying his assent to its acts, is preserved in the 5th action of the council under Mennas, A.D. 536, as are his letters informing the Eastern bishops of what had been done there. Count Gratus was despatched to Rome by the emperor with letters from himself and the patriarch to pope Hormisdas, hoping that peace might under these circumstances be restored between them. The answers of Hormisdas, his instructions to the legates despatched by him to Constantinople, their accounts of their reception there, the profession signed by the patriarch, and subsequent correspondence between him and the pope, may all be read amongst the epistles of the latter (Mansi, viii. 435-65). The Easterns had to anathematize Acacius of Constantinople by name, and to erase his, and the names of all others, Euphemius and Macedonius included, who had not erased his previously, from the sacred diptychs, before the pope would readmit them to his communion (Ib. 573-8).

(23) A.D. 531, under Epiphanius, who was then patriarch, to enquire into the consecration of Stephen, Metropolitan of Larissa, within the diocese of Thrace, which, contrary to the 28th canon of Chalcedon, had been made without consulting him. Stephen, having been deposed by him on these grounds, appealed to Rome; but the acts of the synod held there to consider his appeal are defective, so that it is not known with what success (Mansi, viii. 739-40).

(24) A.D. 536. According to some, three synods were held there this year: 1. in which pope Agapetus presided and deposed Anthimus, patriarch of Constantinople: but this, as Mansi shews (viii. 871-2), the emperor Justinian had already done, besides confirming the election of Mennas in his stead, at the instance of the clergy and people of the city. Agapetus, who had come thither on a mission from Theodatus, king of the Goths, having previously refused his communion, had unquestionably procured his ejection: and he afterwards consecrated Mennas, as Theophilus of Alexandria had St. John Chrysostom, at the request of the emperor. 2. in which a number of Eastern bishops met to draw up a petition to the pope requesting him to call upon Anthimus, subsequently to his deposition but previously to his going back to Trebizond from which he had been translated, for a retratation of his denial of two natures in Christ: but this can hardly be called a council; and the death of the pope stopped any definitive action on his part (Ib.). 3. under Mennas, after the death of the pope, consisting of five actions, the first of which took place, May 2, in a church dedicated to St. Mary near the great church, Mennas presiding, and having on his right, among others, five Italian bishops, who had come to Constantinople from the late pope, and remained there with him on his arrival. The first thing brought before the council was a petition from various monastic bodies in Constantinople, Antioch, Jerusalem, and Mount Sinai to the emperor, begging that the sentence, stayed only by the death of the pope, against Anthimus, might be carried out; a general account of what had passed between them and the pope followed, their petition to him was produced by the Italian bishops present and recited; after it another petition to him from some Eastern bishops on the same subject; and his own letter to Peter, bishop of Jerusalem in reply. Desirous of following out his decision, the council sent deputies to acquaint Anthimus with its proceedings, and bid him appear there within three days. The second and third actions passed in sending him similar summonses, but all his hiding-places having been searched repeatedly without finding him, his condemnation and deposition was at length decreed in the fourth action by the council and its president, and signed by seventy-two bishops or their representatives, and two deacons of the Roman Church. At the fifth and last action a number of documents were recited. 1. A petition of the bishop of Apamea and other Syrian bishops to the emperor against Anthimus, Severus, and others of the Monophysite party. 2. Another petition to him from some monks of Palestine and Syria to the same effect. 3. A similar petition from the same monks to this council. 4. Two letters of pope Hormisdas, one dated A.D. 518, and relating to the Constantinopolitan synod of that year; the other addressed to Epiphanius, patriarch of Constantinople three years later, requesting him to act, and directing him how to act, in his stead in receiving converts from the Monophysites. 5. A petition from the clergy and monks of Antioch to the patriarch John and synod of Constantinople, A.D. 518, against Severus. 6. An address of the same synod to the patriarch John. 7. A petition of the monastic bodies in Constantinople to the same synod, with a narrative of the acclamations amidst which its decisions had been carried out by John. 8. His letters to the patriarch of Jerusalem and bishop of Tyre thereon, and their replies to him, with another narrative showing how rapturously the church of Tyre had received them. 9. A similar letter from the bishops of Syria secunda to the same patriarch of Constantinople, with a narrative of proceedings against Peter, bishop of Apamea, for his Monophysite sayings: and a petition presented to them by the monks of his diocese against him and Severus. All which having been read, an anathema was passed upon him, Severus and Zoaras, one of their followers, by the council now sitting—this is inexcusably left by Mansi (viii. 1137–8) with its corrupt heading uncorrected, ascribing it to a former synod—and then by Mennas, its president; according to the order observed in the 4th action in passing sentence upon Anthimus. Eighty-eight bishops or their representatives, and two deacons of the Roman church as before, subscribed on this occasion. A constitution of the emperor addressed to Mennas confirmed their sentence (Mansi, viii. 869–1162).

(25) A.D. 538, says Valesius, 541 Cave, 543 Mansi, under Mennas by order of the emperor Justinian, in support of his edict against the errors of Origen, denounced to him in a petition from four monks of Jerusalem, placed in his hands, says Liberatus (Brev. 23) by Pelagius, a Roman envoy, whom he had sent thither on a different errand, with the express object of injuring Theodore, bishop of Caesarea, in Cappadocia, surnamed Ascidas, who defended Origen. His edict, which is in the form of a book against Origen and addressed to Mennas, is given at length by Mansi (ix. 487–588). It was communicated to the other patriarchs and to pope Vigilius. The council backed it by 15 anathemas against Origen and his errors, usually placed at the end of the acts of the 5th general council (Mansi, ib. 395–400) with which this council came to be subsequently confused, in consequence, says Cave, of their respective acts having formed one volume (Mansi, ib. 121–4; and also 703–8).

(26) A.D. 546, according to Garnier (Diss. ad Liberat. c. iv.) under Mennas to assent to the 1st edict, now lost, of the emperor Justinian against the three chapters the year before. Both Cave and Mansi pass over this council, and substitute for it another, supposed to have been held by pope Vigilius the year following, after his arrival in February (Clinton, A.D. 547, col. 4), at which it was decided to refer passing sentence upon the three chapters to the meeting of the general council about to take place (Mansi, ix. 125–8).

(27) A.D. 553, the 5th general, held by order of the Emperor Justinian, and composed of 165 bishops, with Eutychius, patriarch of Constantinople, for their president: Pope Vigilius being on the spot all the time, but declining to attend; indeed, he was not even represented there. As far back as his election, A.D. 537, according to Victor of Tunis, he had been secretly pledged to the Empress Theodora, who favoured the Monophysite party, to assent to the condemnation of the three chapters (Garn. ad Lib. Breviar. c. 22); and this step, according to Liberatus (ib. c. 24), had been pressed upon the emperor all the more warmly since then, in consequence of the condemnation of the Origenists in a council under Mennas the year following. Theodore, bishop of Caesarea, a devoted Origenist and friend of the empress, pointed it out in fact as a means of bringing back a large section of the Monophysites to the church. Their opposition to the 4th general council, he averred, lay in the countenance supposed to be given by it to these writings—1. The works of Theodore, bishop of Mopsuestia; 2. The letter of Ibas, bishop of Edessa, to Maris; and 3, what Theodoret, bishop of Cyrus, had published against St. Cyril: the third, however, he forbore to name; all held to be tainted with Nestorianism. By condemning them, he seems to have calculated the authority of the council that had treated their authors at least so favourably, would be undermined. Justinian, acting on his advice, had already condemned them twice, A.D. 545 and 551 (Gieseler, i. 325; Cunningham's Tr., no date is assigned to the two pieces given in Mansi, ix. 537–82, and 589–646); and the first time had been followed by Vigilius, whose "Judicatum," published at Constantinople, A.D. 548, is quoted in part by the emperor in his address to this council (Mansi, ix. 178–86, and again, 582–8) on its assembling. But Vigilius had, A.D. 547, declared against coming to any decision on the subject till it had been discussed in a general council; and to this he went back on ascertaining what indignation his "Judicatum" had caused in Africa and in the West, and excommunicated Mennas and Theodore for having gone further (Mansi, ib. 58–61). Accordingly, the emperor decided on summoning this council to examine and pronounce upon them; and Eutychius, the Constantinopolitan patriarch, addressed a letter to Vigilius, which was read out at its first session, May 5, requesting him to come and preside over its deliberations. Vigilius assented to thier joint examination by himself and the council, but was silent about his attendance. Three patriarchs and a number of bishops accosted him personally with no better success. At the 2nd session, or collation, a second interview with him was reported, in which he definitively declined attending; and even on a message from the emperor he would not undertake to do more than examine the chapters by himself, and transmit his opinion on them, not to the council, but to him. This probably was contained in his Constitutum (Mansi, ib. p. 61 and seq.); the date assigned to which indicates that it came out between the 5th and 6th collations. Some bishops of Africa and Illyria excused themselves equally to the deputation sent to invite their attendance. At the 3rd collation the fathers commenced the real business for which they had been convened with a preface well worth remembering for its soundness and moderation. They pledged themselves to the exact doctrine and discipline laid down in the four general councils, each and all, preceding their own; one and the same confession of faith had sufficed for them in spite of all the heresies they had met to condemn, and should suffice now. All things in harmony with it should be received; and all things at variance with it rejected. Having thus pledged themselves to the 4th council among the rest, the fathers proceeded to the examination of the three chapters in their 4th collation. This was on May 12: extracts having accordingly been read out from various works of Theodore, both he and they were judged worthy of condemnation. The next day, or the 5th collation, passages for or against Theodore, for St. Cyril and others, were produced and weighed; and authorities, particularly St. Augustine, cited in favour of condemning heretics although dead. Enquiry having been made when the name of Theodore ceased to be commemorated in the sacred diptychs of his church, it was discovered that the name of St. Cyril had long been substituted there for his. At the close of the sitting, extracts from the writings of Theodoret against St. Cyril were recited; on which the fathers remarked that the 4th council had acted wisely in not receiving him till he had anathematised Nestorius. Six days intervened before the 6th collation took place, May 19. During this interval Vigilius issued his "Constitutum," dated May 14, in the form of a synodical letter addressed to the emperor (Mansi, ix. 61-106), answering and condemning a number of the positions of Theodore, but pleading for Theodoret and Ibas, as having been acquitted by the 4th council. However, the council at its 6th collation found the letter of Ibas in question contrary to the Chalcedonian definition, and anathematised it accordingly, the principal speaker against it being Theodore, bishop of Cappadocia; but its author escaped. At the 7th collation, May 26 or 30, for the reading is doubtful, a communication was read from the emperor in deprecation of the "Constitutum" addressed to him by the Pope, May 14, and on which there had been a good many messages between them in vain since. First, no less than six documents were recited proving Vigilius to have expressly condemned the three chapters as many times: 1, a letter from him to the emperor; 2, to the empress, in both which the words "nam operationem" were declared at the 6th council by the legates of Agatho to have been a later insertion of the Monothelite party (Baluz. ap. Mansi, ix. 163-72); 3, to his deacons, Rusticus and Sebastian, condemning them for the false stories they had spread about him; 4, to the bishop of Kiev, in Russia; 5, to the bishop of Arles; and 6, a deposition signed by Theodore, bishop of Caesarea, and a lay dignitary, to the effect that Vigilius had sworn to the emperor in their presence to do all he could for the condemnation of the three chapters, and never say a word in their favour. Next, an enquiry, by order of the emperor, respecting a picture or statue of Theodoret said to have been carried about at Cyrus in procession, was reported. And, lastly, the imperial mandate, which ordained that the name of Vigilius should be removed from the sacred diptychs for his tergiversations on the subject of the three chapters, "Non enim patiebamur, nec ab eo, nec ab alio quocunque," says the emperor, "inviolatam communionem suscipere, qui non istam impietatem condemnat . . . ne eo modo inveniamur Nestorii et Theodori impietati communicantes" (Mansi, ib. 366-7). Unity with the apostolic see would not, he adds, be thereby dissolved, inasmuch as neither Vigilius nor any other individual could, by his own change for the worse, mar the peace of the Church. To all which the council agreed. Finally, reviewing at its 8th collation, June 2, in a singularly well-written compendium all that it had done previously, and vindicating the course about to be pursued, it formally condemned the three chapters, and with them the author of the first of them—Theodore—promulgating its definitive sentence in 14 anathemas, almost identical with those of the emperor (Mansi, ib. 557-64), and in which the heresies and heresiarchs thus condemned are specified: Origen among the number in the eleventh, though not in the corresponding one of the emperor. He had been previously condemned in the council under Mennas, A.D. 538, as we have seen. Of these anathemas the Greek version is still extant: of almost every other record of its proceedings the Latin version alone remains. Vigilius, after taking some time to consider, announced his assent to them in two formal documents: the first a decretal epistle, dated Dec. 8 of the same year, and addressed to the Constantinopolitan patriarch (Mansi, ib. 413-32, with the notes of De Marca), in which, as he says, after the manner of St. Augustine, he retracts all that he had ever written differently; and the second, another Constitutum of great length, dated Feb. 23 of the year following (Clinton, A.D. 554, c. 4), but without any heading or subscription in its present form (Mansi, ib. 457-88). He died on his way home, and Pelagius, the Roman envoy who had been instrumental in condemning Origen, had thus, on becoming pope, to vindicate the condemnation of the three chapters by this council in the West, where they had been defended all but unanimously, and were upheld obstinately by more than three parts of Italy still. The 2nd Pelagius, twenty-five years later, in his third letter to the bishops of Istria, said to have been written by St. Gregory the Great, then his deacon (Mansi, ib. 433-54, and see Migne's ed.), apologised as follows for the conduct of his predecessors and his own therein. Referring to the occasion on which St. Peter was reproved by St. Paul (Gal. ii. 11), he asks, "Nunquid Petro apostolorum principi sibi dissimilia docenti, debuit ad haec verba responderi?" "Haec quae dicis, audire non possumus, quia aliud ante praedicasti? Si igitur in triumphum capitulum egotio, aliud cum veritas quaereretur, aliud utem inventa veritate, dictum est: cur mutatio sententiae huic sedi in crimine obijcitur, quae cunctis ecclesiis humiliter in ejus auctore veneratur? Non enim mutatio sententiae, sed inconstancia sensus in culpa est." St. Gregory, when open, settled the matter by affirming that he operated the 5th council equally with the four preceding (Mansi, ib. 454). No canons seem to have been passed in it; but though two elaborate dissertations have been written on it (Garnier, Liberat. and H. de Noris, Op. P. II.), many points connected with it are still doubtful; and the documents published by Mansi (ix. 151-651) belonging to it, greatly need re-arranging.

(80) A.D. 565, at which the emperor Justinian endeavoured to get the errors of Julian of Hilaranassus, a well-known Monophysite, who maintained the incorruptibility of the Body of Christ antecedently to his resurrection, approved, by punishing those who opposed them (Mansi, ix. 65-8).

(81) A.D. 587, at which a foul charge brought against Gregory, patriarch of Antioch, by a banker of his diocese, was examined. He was honourably acquitted and his accuser punished (Evang. vi. 7). Mansi thinks this must have been the synod summoned as a general one by the Constantinopolitan patriarch John, in virtue of his assumed title of oecumenical patriarch, and for which he was so severely taken to task by pope Pelagius II.—but for this no direct proof is adduced either by him or Pagi (ix. 971-4). It is supplied, however, in a letter of St. Gregory the Great to that patriarch (ib. 1217-18), and a further notice of his some time later, when Cyriacus was patriarch, whose plan of holding another synod for the same purpose he would seem to have anticipated (ib. x. 159). Mansi (ib. p. 81-2) conceives this synod to have been held A.D. 598.

(82) A.D. 626, under Sergius, to consider the question raised by Paul, a Monophysite of Phasis, a Lazian, and Cyrus, its metropolitan—afterwards translated to Alexandria—before the emperor Heraclius, whether one or two wills and operations were to be ascribed to Christ. Sergius, on the authority of a discourse ascribed by him to his well-known predecessor Menas, and other testimonies which he obtains from naming, renounced in favour of one operation and one will; thereby founding the heresy called Monothelism (Mansi, x. 585-8). Clinton (il. 171) doubts whether the question did not originate with Athanasius, patriarch of the Jacobites in Syria, on his promotion to the see of Antioch by Heraclius four years later. The discourse which Sergius ascribed to Menas was proved a forgery at the 6th council at its third session.

(83) A.D. 638, under Sergius, and continued—unless there were two distinct councils this year—under Pyrrhus, his successor, at which the Ekthesis or exposition of faith by the emperor Heraclius, favourable to Monothelism, was confirmed (Mansi, x. 673-4). Parts of its acts, with the ekthesis in full, were recited in the third sitting of the Lateran under Martin I. A.D. 648 (ib. 891-1004).

(84) A.D. 665, by order of the emperor Constant II., at which St. Maximus, the great opponent of the Monothelites, was condemned (Mansi, i. 73-4).

(85) A.D. 686, under Peter, patriarch of Constantinople, and attended by Macedonius of Antioch and the vicar of the patriarch of Alexandria, at which St. Maximus was condemned a second time with his disciples (Mansi, xi. 73-8).

(86) The 6th general, held in the banqueting hall of the palace, called Trullus from its domed roof (Du Fresne, Constant. Christ. ii. 4, § 19-20), and lasting from November 7, A.D. 680, to September 16 of the ensuing year.

It was convened by the emperor Constantine Pogonatus, as stated in his epistle to Pope Donus, in consequence of a request made to him by the patriarchs of Constantinople to permit their removing from the sacred diptychs the name of Pope Vitalian, lately deceased, while they were for retaining that of Honorius (Mansi, xi. 199-200). In short, they wished to commemorate none of the popes after Honorius till some disputes that had arisen between their own see and his had been settled, and some newly-coined words explained. The allusion is probably to the μία θεωσπουή ἐνίπυσια attributed to Christ by the Monothelite patriarch and synod of Alexandria, A.D. 633 (ib. 565), when Honorius was pope. Donus dying before this letter could reach Rome, it was complied with at once by his successor Agatho, who sent three bishops, on behalf of his synod, and two presbyters, and one deacon named John—who subsequently became pope as John V., in his own name—to Constantinople, "to bring about the union of the holy Churches of East," as it is said in his life (ib. 165). On hearing from the "oecumenical pope," as he styles him, to that effect, the Emperor issued his summons to George, patriarch of Constantinople—whom he styles oecumenical patriarch—and through him to the patriarch of Antioch, to get ready to come to the council with their respective bishops and metropolitans (ib. 201). Mansuetus, metropolitan of Milan, who had formed part of the Roman synod under Agatho, sent a synodical letter and profession of faith on behalf of his own synod (ib. 203-8), and Theodore, bishop or archbishop of Ravenna, who had formed part of the same synod, a presbyter, to represent him personally. The number of bishops actually present, according to Cave, was 289, though the extant subscriptions are under 180. Thirteen officers of the court were there likewise by command of the emperor, who attended in person, and were ranged round him—on his left were the representatives of the pope and his synod, of the archbishop of Ravenna, and of the patriarch of Jerusalem, then Basil, bishop of Gortyna, in Crete, and the remaining bishops "subject to Rome"—his right being occupied by the patriarchs of Constantinople and Antioch, a presbyter representing the patriarch of Alexandria, the bishop of Ephesus, and "the remaining bishops subject to Constantinople." The business of the council was concluded in 18 actions or sessions, as follows:—

1. The legates of Agatho having complained of the novel teaching of four patriarchs of Constantinople—Sergius, Paul, Pyrrhus, and Peter—of Cyrus, of Alexandria, and Theodore, bishop of Pharan, that had for 46 years or more troubled the whole Church, in attributing one will and operation to the Incarnate Word. Marcarius, patriarch of Antioch, and two suffragans of the see of Constantinople favourable to this dogma, briefly replied that they had put out no new terms but only believed and taught what they had received from general councils and from the holy fathers on the point in question, particularly the patriarchs of Constantinople and Alexandria, named by their opponents, and Honorius, formerly pope of elder Rome. Whereupon the chartophylax, or keeper of the archives of the great Church, was ordered by the emperor to fetch the books of the oecumenical councils from the library of the patriarch. As nothing was said of the acts of the 1st and 2nd councils on this occasion, we must infer they had been lost previously. The chartophylax was told to produce what he had got; and immediately two volumes of the acts of the 3rd council were recited by Stephen, a presbyter of Antioch in waiting on Macarius, who forthwith contended that some of St. Cyril's expressions made for him.

2. Two volumes of the acts of the 4th council were read, when the legates of Agatho pointed out that two operations were attributed to Christ by St. Leo.

3. Two volumes of the acts of the 5th council were read, when the legates protested that two letters of Pope Vigilius, contained in the second volume, had been interpolated, and that a discourse attributed in the first to Mennas, patriarch of Constantinople, was spurious. This last having been proved on the spot from internal evidence, its recital was stopped, the emperor directing further enquiry to be made respecting the letters of the pope.

4. Two letters from Agatho were recited—one to the emperor, in his own name, the other to the council, in his own name and that of a synod of 125 bishops, with Wilfrid, bishop of York, among them, for Britain, assembled under him at Rome, previously to the departure of his legates. The burden of both is the same, namely, that what had been defined as of faith by the five general councils preceding, it was the summit of his ambition to keep inviolate—without change, diminution, or addition, either in word or thought (Mansi, ib. 235). Mr. Renouf, indeed, in his second pamphlet on "Pope Honorius" (p. 46-7), has pointed out several passages in the Latin version of these letters on the prerogatives of the Church of Rome, which are not found in the Greek. Either, therefore, they have been interpolated in the one, or suppressed in the other. The decree of the Council of Florence supplies a parallel of the same kind. But that Agatho wrote these letters in Greek, and that the Latin version of the entire acts of this council that we have cannot possibly be the one made by order of the next pope, soon after the council dispersed, are two points which Mr. R. seems to have assumed without proving.

5. Two papers were exhibited by Macarius, and recited: of which the first was headed "Testimonies from the holy Fathers confirmatory of there being one will in Christ, which is also that of the Father and the Holy Ghost."

6. A third paper from Macarius, to the same effect as the other two, having been read, the sealing of all three was commanded by the emperor, and entrusted to his own officials and those belonging to the sees of Rome and Constantinople. On the legates affirming that the quotations contained in them had not been fairly made, authentic copies of the works cited were ordered to be brought from the patriarchal library to compare with them.

7. A paper headed "Testimonies from the holy Fathers demonstrating two wills and operations in Christ," was produced by the legates, and read. Appended to it were passages from the writings of heretics, in which but one will and operation was taught. This paper was ordered to be sealed, like those of Macarius, by the emperor.

8. The passages adduced by Agatho from the Fathers, and by his synod, in favour of two wills and operations, having been examined and confirmed, were pronounced conclusive by all present except Macarius; and the petition to have the name of Vitalian erased from the diptychs was withdrawn by George, the existing patriarch of Constantinople, amid great applause. Macarius being then called upon to make his profession, proved himself a Monothelite; and was convicted of having quoted unfairly from the Fathers in his papers to support his views.

9. Examination of the papers of Macarius having been completed, he and his presbyter Stephen were formally deposed as heretics by the council.

10. The paper exhibited by the legates was taken in hand: and after a most interesting comparison, passage by passage, between it and the authentic works in the patriarchal library, was declared thoroughly correct in its citations: a profession of faith was received from the bishop of Nicomedia and some others, in which Monothelism was abjured.

11. A long and remarkable profession of faith, contained in a synodical letter of Sophronius, late patriarch of Jerusalem, and the first to oppose Monothelism, was recited: and after it, at the request of the legates, some more writings of Macarius, since come to hand, that proved full of heresy.

12. Several more documents belonging to Macarius having been received from the emperor through one of his officers, which he professed not to have read himself, some were looked through and pronounced irrelevant, but three letters were recited at length: one from Sergius patriarch of Constantinople to Cyrus, then bishop of Phasis; another from him to Pope Honorius; the third being the answer of Honorius to him. Again the patriarchal archives were searched, and the two first of these letters compared with the authentic copies of them found there; while the original letter of Honorius in Latin having been brought from thence was compared by John bishop of Porto, the only delegate from the Roman synod then present, with the copy just read, and the genuineness of all three placed beyond doubt. A suggestion brought from the emperor that Macarius should be restored in the event of his recanting, was peremptorily declined by the council.

13. Both the letters of Sergius before mentioned and that of Honorius to him were declared heterodox; and he and his successors, Pyrrhus, Peter, and Paul, Cyrus of Alexandria, and Theodore, bishop of Pharan—on all of whom Agatho had passed sentence previously—with Honorius, whom Agatho had passed over, were definitively cast out of the Church—the only sentence of the kind ever decreed against any pope. The letter of Sophronius, on the other hand, was pronounced orthodox. Finally, search having been made for all other works of the same kind in the archives, all that could be found were brought out and recited. The list included two letters from Cyrus to Sergius, the latest of them having been written from Alexandria, with a copy of the terms of agreement come to between him and the Theodosians, a Monophysite sect, enclosed in it; works by Theodore, bishop of Pharan, Pyrrhus, Paul, and Peter, patriarchs of Constantinople; a second letter of Honorius to Sergius; and a dogmatic letter of Pyrrhus to Pope John IV., discovered in a volume of dogmatic letters by the Chartophylax, George. All these were pronounced heretical, and burnt as such. Letters of Thomas, John, and Constantine, patriarchs of Constantinople, were read likewise, but their orthodoxy was allowed.

14. Returning to the letters of Pope Vigilius that had been called in question, it was ascertained by curious enquiry that each of the volumes of the 5th council had been tampered with: in one case by inserting the paper attributed to Mennas, in the other by interpolating the letters of Vigilius, in support of heresy. The council ordered both falsifications to be cancelled, besides anathematizing them and their authors. A sermon of St. Athanasius was produced by the bishops of Cyprus, in which the doctrine of two wills in Christ was clearly laid down. At this sitting Theophanes, the new patriarch of Antioch, is first named among those present.

15. Polychronius, a presbyter, undertaking to raise a dead man to life in support of his heretical views, and failing, was condemned as an impostor, and deposed.

16. Constantine, another presbyter, affecting to have devised some formula calculated to reconcile Monothelism with orthodoxy, was proved in agreement with Macarius, and similarly condemned. In conclusion, all who had been condemned were anathematized, one after the other by name, amidst cheers for the orthodox.

17. The previous acts of the council were read over; and its definition of faith published for the first time.

18. The definition having been once more published, was signed by all present; and received the assent of the emperor on the spot amid the usual acclamations and reprobations. It consisted of three parts.—I. An introduction proclaiming entire agreement on the part of the council with the five previous councils, and acceptance of the two creeds promulgated by them as one. II. Recital of the two creeds of Nicaea and Constantinople in their pristine forms. III. Its own definition, enumerating all previously condemned for Monothelism once more by name; and mentioning with approbation the declaration of pope Agatho and his synod against them, and in favour of the true doctrine, which it proceeded to unfold in course: then reiterating the decree passed by previous councils against the framers and upholders of a faith or creed other than the two forms already specified; and including finally in the same condemnation the inventors and disseminators of any novel terms subversive of its own rulings.

Proceedings terminated in a remarkable address to the emperor on behalf of all present, which was read out, showing that the doctrine of the Trinity had been defined by the two first councils; and that of the Incarnation in the four next, of which this was the last: and a still more remarkable request was appended to it,—that he would forward the definition signed by himself to the five patriarchal sees of Rome, Constantinople, Alexandria, Antioch, and Jerusalem; which we are told expressly was done (Mansi, ib. 681-4). In conclusion, a letter was despatched to the pope in the name of the council, informing him that he would receive a copy of its acts through his legates, and begging that he would confirm them in his reply. The emperor on his part exhorted all to receive them in a special edict; and as he had promised, addressed a letter in his own name to the Roman synod, dated Dec. 23, A.D. 681—Agatho dying, according to Cave, Dec. 1—and another to Leo II., soon after his accession, the year following, bespeaking their acceptance. This the new pope granted without hesitation in the fullest manner, even to the condemnation of Honorius as having betrayed the faith; all which he repeated to the bishops of Spain in sending them a Latin translation of the acts of this council (Mansi, ib. 1049-53). Solely from hence the genuineness of both epistles has been denied (comp. Mr. Renouf's Pope Honorius; Professor Botalla's reply to it; and Mr. R.'s rejoinder), and even the integrity of the acts of the council themselves in their present state was once questioned (Pagi ad Baron., A.D. 681, n. 9-12). Two versions of them are given by Mansi (xi. 189-922); in both the arrangement of the concluding documents is chronologically defective. It is admitted on all hands that no canons were pas. ed. Several anecdotes of this council found their way into the West. Bede tells us, for instance (De Temp. Rat. A.D. 688), that such was the honour accorded there to the legates of Agatho that one of them, the bishop of Porto, celebrated the Eucharist in Latin on Low-Sunday, in the church of St. Sophia, before the emperor and patriarch. Cardinal Humbert asserts it was then explained to the emperor that unleavened bread was enjoined by the Latin rite (ap. Canis. Thes. p. 318). But the two striking incidents of this council were: 1. The arrangement of the "bishops subject to Rome," and those "subject to Constantinople" on opposite sides; and, 2. The anathemas passed on pope and patriarch alike. Coming events are said to cast their shadows before them.

(35) A.D. 691, as Pagi shows (ad Baron. A.D. 692 n. 3-7) from the emended reading of the date given in its 3rd canon and rightly interpreted, in or not earlier than September. The fathers composing it, in their address to the emperor Justinian II. or Rhinotmetus, as he was afterwards surnamed from what befel him, say that they had met at his bidding to pass some canons that had long been needed, owing to the omission of the 5th and 6th councils, contrary to the precedent of the four first to pass any, whence this council has been commonly styled the quini-sex, or a supplement to both. It is indeed best known as the Trullan, from the hall of the palace in which it was held, although the 6th council had met there no less. The number of bishops subscribing to its canons was 213, of whom 43 had been present at the 6th council (Mansi xi. 927); and at their head, instead of after them as at the 6th council, the emperor, who signs however differently from the rest, as accepting and assenting to merely what had been defined by them. A blank is left immediately after his name for that of the pope, showing clearly that the pope was not represented there; and blanks are subsequently left for the bishops of Thessalonica, Heraclea, Sardinia, Ravenna, and Corinth, who might, had they been present, have been supposed acting for him: Basil, indeed, bishop of Gortyna in Crete, is set down as subscribing on behalf of the whole synod of the Roman church; but then he is similarly set down among the subscriptions to the 6th council, not having been one of the three deputies sent thither from Rome (ib. pp. 642 and 70), and afterwards in the letter addressed to Agatho by the council, only signing for himself and his own synod (ib. p. 690). Hence there seems little ground for supposing him to have represented Rome there in any sense, though Pagi and others are willing to believe he may have been acting as apocrisarius at the time of the council (ad Baron. ib. n. 9-13). Certainly, Anastasius, in his life of Sergius I., who was then Pope, says that the legates of the apostolic see were present, and deluded into subscribing; but there is nothing else in the subscriptions to confirm this; and of the acts nothing further has been preserved. Great controversy prevails as to the extent to which this council has been received in the West: Oecumenical it has never been accounted there, in spite of its own claim to be so: and when its 102 canons were sent in six tomes to Sergius, himself a native of Antioch, for subscription, he said he would die sooner than assent to the erroneous innovations which they contained. John VII., the next pope but one, was requested by the emperor to confirm all that he could, and reject the rest; but he sent back the tomes untouched—Lupus (Diss. de Syn. Trull., op. Tom. iii. 168-73), whom Pagi (A.D. 710, n. 2) follows is of opinion that Constantine was the first pope to confirm any of them: but this is inferred solely from the honourable reception given to him at Constantinople by Justinian, which may have been dictated by other motives. What Adrian I. says in his epistle to St. Tarasius, read out at the 7th council, is explicit enough: "I too receive the same six holy councils with all the rules constitutionally and divinely promulgated by them; among which is contained" what turns out to be the 82nd of these canons, for he quotes it at full length. And the first canon of the 7th council confirmed by him is substantially to the same effect.

But the exact truth is probably told by Anastasius, the librarian, in the preface to his translation of the acts of the 7th council dedicated to John VIII., whom he credits with having accepted all the apostolical canons under the same reserve. "At the 7th council," he says, "the principal see so far admits the rules said by the Greeks to have been framed at the 6th council, as to reject in the same breath whichever of them should prove to be opposed to former canons, or the decrees of its own holy pontiffs, or to good manners." All of them, indeed, he contends had been unknown to the Latins entirely till then, never having been translated: neither were they to be found even in the archives of the other patriarchal sees, where Greek was spoken, none of whose occupants had been present to concur or assist in their promulgation, although the Greeks attributed their promulgation to those fathers who formed the 6th council, a statement for which he avers they were unable to bring any decisive proof. This shows how little he liked these canons himself: nor can it be denied that some of them were dictated by a spirit hostile to the West. The 3rd and 13th, for instance, deliberately propose to alter what had been the law and practice of the Roman church for upwards of 300 years respecting those who became presbyters, deacons, or sub-deacons, as married men: and make the rule substituted for it in each case binding upon all. The 55th on the authority of one of the apostolical canons not received by Rome, interdicts the custom of fasting on Saturdays which had prevailed in the Roman church from time immemorial. And the 56th lays down a rule to be kept by all churches in observing the Lenten fast. Canons 32, 33, and 99 are specially levelled against the Armenians. Of the rest, canon 1 confirms the doctrine of the 6th general council preceding, and insists in the strongest terms upon its unalterableness. Canon 2 renews all the canons confirmed by them, with the Sardican and African in addition, besides the canons of SS. Dionysius and Peter of Alexandria; of St. Gregory Thaumaturgus, St. Athanasius, St. Basil, and St. Gregory Nyssen; the canonical answers of Timothy with the canons of Theophilus, bishop of Alexandria and two canonical letters of St. Cyril: the canon of Scripture by St. Gregory Nazianzen, and another by St. Amphilochius, bishop of Iconium in Lycaonia, with a circular of Gennadius, patriarch of Constantinople, against simoniacal ordinations. In conclusion, it receives all the apostolical canons, eighty-five in number, though at that time but fifty were received in the Roman church, as we learn from Anastasius, but rejects the apostolical constitutions as having been interpolated, and containing many spurious things. By this canon accordingly the code of the Eastern church was authoritatively settled, apart of course from the 102 canons now added to it, which were formally received themselves, as we have seen, by the 2nd Council of Nicaea, and reckoned ever afterwards as the canons of the 6th council. As such they are quoted by Photius in his Synagoga canonum, and his Nomocanon (Migne's Pat. Gr. civ. 431-1218), and continue to be quoted still (Orthodox and Non-Jurors, by Rev. G. Williams, p. 74). Their general character is thoroughly Oriental, but without disparagement to their practical value (Mansi, xi. 921-1024, and xii. 47-56; Bever. II. 126-64).

(36) A.D. 712, in the short-lived reign of Philipppicus or Bardanes, and under the Monothelite patriarch of his appointment, John VI.; at which the 6th council was repudiated and condemned. The copy of its acts belonging to the palace was likewise burnt by his order, as we learn from the deacon who transcribed them; and the picture of it that hung there, removed. On the death of the tyrant indeed John addressed a letter to Pope Constantine to apologise for what had been done; but its tone is not assuring. He testifies, however, to the authentic tomes of the 6th council being safe still in his archives (Mansi, xii. 187-208); and Pagi can see some excuse for his conduct (ad Baron. A.D. 712, n. 2-6).

(37) A.D. 715, Aug. 11, at which the translation of St. Germanus from the see of Cyricus to that of Constantinople was authorised. He had been a party to the Monothelite synod under John three years before; but immediately after his translation he held a synod—most probably this one continued—in which he condemned Monothelism (Mansi, xii. 255-8).

(38) A.D. 730, or rather a meeting in the imperial palace, at which the Emperor Leo III., better known as the Isaurian, called upon St. Germanus the aged patriarch to declare for the demolition of images, which he had just ordered himself in a second edict against them. The patriarch replied by resigning his pall (Mansi, xii. 269-70, and Pagi, ad Baron., A.D. 730, n. 1-4).

(39) A.D. 754, from Feb. 10 to Aug. 8, held by order of the Emperor Constantine Copronymus, and styling itself Oecumenical, or the 7th council, though its claim to both titles has since been set aside in favour of the second council of Nicaea, in which its decrees were reversed. Unfortunately, there is no record of its acts extant, but what is to be found in the 6th session of that council, where they were cited only to be condemned. As many as 338 bishops attended it, but the chief see represented there was that of Ephesus. Their proceedings are given in six tomes, as follows: 1. They deduce the origin of all creature-worship from the devil, to abolish which God sent His Son in the flesh; 2. Christianity being established, the devil, they say, was undone to bring about a combination between it and idolatry; but the emperors had opposed themselves to his designs. Already six councils had met, and the present one following in their steps declared all pictorial representations unlawful and subversive of the faith which they professed; 3. Two natures being united in Christ, no one picture or statue could represent Christ as He is, besides His only proper representation in the Eucharistic sacrifice of His own institution; 4. There was no prayer in use for consecrating images, nor were representations of the saints to be tolerated any more than of Christ, for Holy Scripture was distinctly against both; 5. The fathers, beginning with St. Epiphanius, having been cited at some length to the same purpose, the council decreed unanimously that all likenesses of whatever colour and material were to be taken away, and utterly disused in Christian churches; 6. All clergy setting up or exhibiting reverence to images in church or at home were to be deposed; monks and laymen anathematised. Vessels and vestments belonging to the sanctuary were never to be turned to any purpose in connexion with them. A series of anathemas was directed against all who upheld them in any sense, or contravened the decrees of this council. St. Germanus, the late patriarch of Constantinople, George of Cyprus, and St. John of Damascus, or Mansur, as he was called by the Saracens, were specially denounced as image-worshippers. The usual acclamations to the emperor followed. Before the council separated, Constantine the new patriarch was presented to it and approved. It was then sitting in the church of St. Mary, ad Blachernas, within the city; its earlier sittings had been held in a palace of the emperor, called Hieracon, on the opposite shore (Mansi, xii. 575-8, and xiii. 203-356; Cave, i. 646-7). CONSTANTINOPLE. (1) The birth (γενεθλια) of Constantinople is placed by the Cal. Byzant. on May 11. The dedication (εγχευια) is said to have been performed by the Holy Fathers of the 1st Council of Nicaea in the year 325.

CONTAKION (Κοντάκιον). A short ode or hymn which occurs in the Greek offices. The name has been variously derived. The explanation most generally received is that it signifies a short hymn, from the word κοντός, little; because it contains in a short space the praises of some saint or festival (Goar, not. 31 in off. Laud.). It has also been derived from κοντός, a dart or javelin; so that Contakion would mean an ejaculatory prayer, or a short pointed hymn after the model of an antiphon. Some, again, have considered the word to be a corruption of Canticum. Romaninus, a deacon of Emesa, who flourished about 500 A.D., is said to be the author of Contakia. They frequently occur in the canons and other parts of the office, and vary with the day. [CANON OF ODES.] In the list of the officials of the church of Constantinople we have ὁ ἀρχὴν τῶν κοντακίων, named among the offices appropriate to priests (τὰ ἀρχαία τοῖς ἱερεῦσι προσήκουσα).

The word "Contakion" is also used of the volume containing the liturgies of St. Basil, St. Chrysostom, and of the praesentified alone, in distinction to the complete missal. In this sense the word is usually derived from κοντός, a dart, i.e. the wooden roll round which the MS. was rolled, "κοντάξ est parvus contus . . . Inde et κοντάκιον, Scapus chartarum, vel volumen ad instar baculi" (Salmas. Exerc. Pñn.). Goar, however, prefers the derivation from κοδίκιον, "quasi brevis codex." In the ordination of a priest, after the ceremonies of ordination are completed, the newly-ordained priest is directed to take his place among the other priests, ἑστητέον τὸ κοντάκιον (i.e. his book of the liturgy). [H. J. H.]

CONTRA VOTUM. A formula frequent in epitaphs, expressing the regret of survivors at a loss suffered against their wishes and prayers. It is of pagan origin, and does not appear to have been adopted by Christians before the 5th century. The earliest example of the formula given by De Rossi is of the commencement of that century, and runs as follows: "PARENTIS POSUERUNT TETVLVM CONTRA VOTVM ET DOLO SVQ." It is not confined, as has sometimes been supposed, to epitaphs placed by parents for their children; husbands use it of wives and wives of husbands, brothers and sisters of each other; and in fact it is very generally used to express the longing felt by the survivor for the departed. It is most common in Northern Italy. (Martigny, Dict. des Antiq. Chret. 175.) [C.]

pression may be considered in two different senses, according as it refers to the agreement for marriage in the abstract, or, according to later continental usage, to its written evidence answering to our marriage settlement. We shall consider it separately under these two heads.

1. The law of the church on the subject of the contract of marriage is, as on many other points, compounded of the Jewish and Roman laws, under the influence of New Testament teaching. It is derived mainly, in its general features, from the latter system of legislation, especially in regard to the marriage of the laity; from the former mainly in regard to that of the clergy.

The validity of the marriage contract generally depends, it may be said, on two points, (1) the inherent capacity of the parties to enter into the contract; (2) the limitations which may be placed upon the exercise of that capacity.

1. Strictly speaking, the inherent capacity of the parties for marriage turns only upon three points, (a) sufficient age; (b) sufficient reason; (c) sufficient freedom of will. On the first point, it may be observed that the old Roman, like the old Jewish law, attached the capacity for marriage by age to the physical fact of puberty (Inst. bk. I. t. x. § 1); and the same principle is practically followed in all systems of legislation which take notice of age at all in this matter, although it is generally found convenient in the long run to fix an age of legal puberty, without reference to the specific fact. Thus already in the Digest it is provided that the marriage contract is only valid on the part of the wife when she has completed her 12th year, even though she be already married and living with her husband (bk. xxiii. t. ii. l. 4). And Justinian himself in his Institutes professes to have fixed, on grounds of decency, the age of puberty for the male at 14 (bk. i. t. xxii.); both which periods have very generally been adopted in modern legislation.

Strange as it may seem, the earlier Roman legislation seems to have even fixed an age beyond which a woman could not marry, since we find Justinian in the Code abolishing all prohibitions of the Lex Julia vel Papia against marriages between men and women above or below 60 and 50 (Code, bk. v. t. iv. l. 27; and see bk. vi. t. lviii. l. 12). Nothing of this kind is to be found in later systems of legislation, although disparity of age in marriage, as we shall presently see, has sometimes been sought to be suppressed.

It may here be observed that physical incapacity in persons of full age has never been held to produce actual inability to enter into the marriage contract, but simply to render the marriage voidable when the fact is ascertained (see Code, bk. v. t. xvii. l. 10; Nov. 22, c. 6; Nov. 117, c. 12). Nor is the fact one of importance in reference to the marriage relation, except where divorce is put under restrictions (see Dig. bk. xxiv. t. i. ll. 60, 61, 62).

(b.) As respects the second point: Defect of reason, it may be said, in reference to the marriage contract, acts inversely to defect of age. Thus, under the Roman law, followed generally by modern legislation, madness was fatal to the validity of the contract, but did not dissolve it when afterwards supervening (Dig. bk. xxxii. t. ii. l. 16, § 2; and see Jul. Paul. Recept. Sent. bk.

ii. t. xix. § 4). (c.) The freedom of will of the parties, on the other hand, can only be testified by their consent to the marriage [as to which see CONSENT]; but it may also be indirectly secured by limitations of a protective character placed on the exercise of the capacity to contract marriage, which will be considered presently. It may be sufficient here to observe that according to the jurists of the Digest a man might marry a woman by letters or by proxy if she were brought to his house, but this privilege did not belong to the woman (bk. xxiii. t. ii. l. 5; and see Jul. Paul. Recept. Sent. bk. ii. t. xix. § 5).

There was, moreover, one large class of persons in whom there was held to be no freedom of will, and, consequently, no capacity to contract marriage. It is important to insist on this point, since Gibbon in the second chapter of his great work speaks of the Romans as having "in their numerous families, and particularly in their country estates . . . encouraged the marriage of their slaves." A falser statement was probably never put forth by a historian, unless for marriage we read, in plain English, breeding. Marriage is simply impossible where the persons of slaves of both sexes are subject, absolutely without limit, to the lusts, natural or unnatural, of a master (see, for instance, Horace, Sat. i. 2, 116). The slave, his master's thing, can have no will but his master's; in respect of the civil law properly so-called, i. e. the law made for citizens, he does not exist; (Ulpian, Dig. bk. i. t. xvii. l. 32), or as the same jurist in his grand language elsewhere expresses it, his condition is almost equivalent to death itself (ibid. l. 209). Thus, according to the logic of the Roman law, connections between slaves obtain not so much as a mention by either the jurists of the Digest, or the Emperors in the constitutions of the Code. Connections between slaves and serfs, i. e. the so-called adscriptitii glebae, are indeed mentioned (Code, bk. xi. t. xlvii. c. 21), but without the name of marriage, and only to determine the condition of the offspring, which is fixed by that of the mother. Rustici, a class of peasants who seem to have been of higher status than the adscriptitii, could contract marriage inter se, and the 157th Novel is directed against the landowners of Mesopotamia and Osrhoene, who sought to forbid their peasants to marry out of their own estates, and if they did so, were in the habit of breaking up their marriages and families.

Wherever, therefore, we find slaves' marriages mentioned, we must seek another origin for the recognition of them than in the Roman law. That origin seems unquestionably to be in the Jewish law. Although only "Hebrew" servants are mentioned in the passage of Exodus on this subject (c. xxi. vv. 3, 4, 5, 6), it is clear that the Pentateuch recognized the marriage of persons in a servile condition. And with the sweeping away by the Christian dispensation of all distinction between Jew and Gentile it is but natural to suppose that the right of marriage would be extended from the Hebrew slave to the whole slave class. Such right, indeed, was not absolute, as will have been observed, but flowed from the master's will, and was subject to his rights. The master gave a wife to his slave; the wife and her children remained his, even when the slave himself obtained his freedom.

CONTRACT OF MARRIAGE

Barbarian Codes do not materially vary the Roman as respects the marriage contract so far as respects the conditions of age and season. It is clear, however, that, in Italy, fully under the Lombards, and under the others of Spain, habits of early marriage prevailed which had to be checked by law. A law of King Liutprand, A.D. 724, enacts that shall only be marriageable at the expiration of the 12th year (bk. vi. c. 59). An earlier law of the same king, A.D. 717, has been already referred to under the head BETROTHAL (bk. ii. c. 1).

Although 18 was fixed as the age of marriage for male infants, yet they might before the age contract either betrothal or marriage, and full power of settling property (bk. vi. c. 724). A Lombard capitulary of Charlemagne's (A.D. 779) prohibits generally the marriage of a boy or girl under the age of puberty, where there is disparity of age, but allows them to marry when of equal age and consenting (c. 145). The same prohibition is contained in the Capitulary of Tassinio (Pertz), A.D. 801, also added to Lombard law.

Visigothic law seems less equal towards sexes. A law of King Chindaswinth (bk. iii. c. 1) forbids on the one hand women of full age marrying males under age, but on the other that girls under age are only to marry males of full age. It is not however clear whether the age referred to is that of puberty or of legal majority.

As respects the marriage of slaves, we find a law on the subject among those collected by Charlemagne (No. 44). They appear clearly to have been recognized both by the state and the church in the reign of Charlemagne, as will be further shewn.

If we turn now to what we may term the legal conditions of the capacity for marriage, or words to the limitations placed upon the exercise of that capacity, we find these to have been very various. Some are purely or mainly religious; the leading one of this class, that of consanguinity which the law of most nations has held to be a bar to the validity of the nuptial contract, will be found referred to under the heads of COUSINS-GERMAN, SISTER-IN-LAW. Another—singular, because exactly opposite to its feelings on the subject have prevailed in different countries—is to be found in the prohibition by the later Roman law of marriages between ravishers and their victims, under severe penalties, both for the parties themselves, and for parents who consented to it (Justinian, Cod. t. xiii. § 1, Nov. 143, 150).

A directly contrary rule prevailed under Theodoric in the Ostrogothic kingdom. The 59th chapter of his Edict compels the ravisher of a free woman, if of suitable fortune and noble as well as single, to marry her, and to restore her with 1-5th of his property. The later law does not seem to provide expressly in this case; but the "Lex Romana" of the 6th century, which the population in Italy must have followed in its departure from the legislation of the Visigoths, where, after enacting death as the penalty of rape, it provides that if no accusation be brought for five years, "the marriage will be valid and its issue legitimate" (c. t. xviii.). Death was also the punishment of rape among the Franks; but Marculf's formulae show that marriages between ravisher and ravished were allowed (bk. ii. c. 16). A Lombard capitulary of Charlemagne's, however, A.D. 779, forbids a ravished bride to marry her ravisher, even if her betrothed refuses to take her back (c. 124). The law of the Alamans (t. li) is to the same effect. The Saxon law on the contrary (t. x.) requires the ravisher to "buy" the woman for 300 solidi.

It seems doubtful whether a canon of the Council of Elberis in 305, bearing that "virgins who have not kept their virginity, if they have married and kept as husbands their violators," are to be admitted to communion after a year without penance, applies really to what we should term violation, or to seduction only. But at any rate the Visigothic law is severest of all the barbaric codes against marriages between ravishers and ravished. Whilst enacting that the ravisher with all his property is to be handed over as a slave to the woman to whom he has done violence, and to receive 200 lashes publicly, it imposes the penalty of death on both if they intermarry, unless they should flee to the altar, when they are to be separated and given to the parents of the woman (bk. iii. t. iii. ll. 1, 2). Closely allied to these enactments is one of the Burgundian law, forbidding marriages between widows and their paramours (t. xlv.). It may perhaps be inferred from the above that the tendency of the barbarian races had originally been to favour such marriages, but that the influence of the opposite Roman feeling, kept up no doubt traditionally by the clergy, generally prevailed in the long run in the barbarian codes.

There were indeed certain moral enormities which in some legislations were made a bar to all subsequent marriage. By the Visigothic law, a freeman guilty of rape on a married woman, after receiving a hundred lashes, was to become a slave to his victim, and never to marry again (bk. ii. t. iv. l. 14). But it is the Carolingian capitularies which apply most largely this kind of prohibition. By a capitulary of King Pepin at Vermerie, A.D. 753, if a man committed adultery with his step-daughter, with his step-mother, or with his wife's sister or cousin, neither could ever marry again (cc. 2, 10, 11, 12); nor a wife who had been dismissed by her husband for conspiring against his life (c. 5). The Capitulary of Compiègne, A.D. 757, extends the prohibition to a brother committing adultery with his sister-in-law, a father seducing his son's betrothed, and to their respective paramours (cc. 11, 13); to a man living in adultery with a mother and daughter, or with two sisters, but to the women, in such case, only if they were aware of the incestuous connexion (cc. 17, 18). A capitulary of the 7th book of the general collection forbids also a woman who has had connexion with two brothers ever to marry again (c. 381; and see bk. v. c. 168).

Another limitation on the marriage contract, which must be considered rather of a political nature, and which prevails more or less still in the military code of almost every modern nation, was that on the marriage of soldiers. Under the early Roman polity, marriage was absolutely forbidden to soldiers; but the Emperor Claudius allowed them the jus connubii, and it seems certain that there were married soldiers under Galba and Domitian (Mur. Thes. Inscr. i. p. 306; Gori, Inscr. Antiq. iii. p. 144). Severus seems however to have been the first to allow soldiers to live with their wives (Herod. iii. 229). The Phillips, on the other hand, seem to have restricted the jus connubii for soldiers to a first marriage (Mur. Thes. Inscr. i. 362). Under Justinian's Code, the marriage of soldiers and other persons in the militia, from the caligatus miles to the protector, was made free without solemnities of any sort, so long as the wife was free-born (Constitution of Theodosius and Valentinian, Code, bk. v. t. iv. l. 21). There having been no regular armies among the barbarian races, nothing answering to the prohibition is to be found in their codes.

We pass now to those restrictions on marriage which must be considered to be mainly of a protective character, and intended to secure the real freedom, as well as the wisdom of choice. To these, in the highest view of the subject, belong those which turn upon the consent of parents [see CONSENT]; although indeed this restriction seems generally to have had its historic origin in a much lower sphere of feeling,—that of the social dependence and slavery or quasi-slavery of children to their parents. Next come the interdictions placed by the Roman law on the marriage of guardians or curators, or their issue, with their female wards. This occupies a large space in the Corpus Juris; see Dig. bk. xxiii. t. ii. l. 59, 60, 62, 64, 66, 67; Code, bk. v. t. vi.

Lastly come the interdictions on the marriage of officials within their jurisdictions, which, as Papinian remarks, are analogous in principle to those on the marriage of guardians with their wards (Dig. bk. xxiii. t. ii. l. 63). No official could marry (though he might betroth to himself) a wife born or domiciled within the province in which he held office, unless he had been betrothed to her before; and if he betrothed a woman, she could, after his giving up office, terminate the engagement, on returning the earnest-money; but he could give his daughters in marriage within the province (l. 39). The marriage of an official contracted against this interdiction seems to have been considered by Papinian absolutely void (l. 63).

Under the Code, a well-known constitution of Gratian, Valentinian, and Theodosius, A.D. 380, known by its title as "Si rector Provinciae" (referred to supra under ARRHAE), whilst depriving of all binding force betrothals between persons holding authority in any province, their kinsmen and dependents, and women of the province, allows the marriage nevertheless to be afterwards carried out with the consent of the betrothed women (bk. v. t. ii.). And a previous constitution of Gordian had provided that if the marriage were contracted against the law with the woman's consent, and after her husband laid down his office she remained of the same mind, the marriage became legal, and the issue legitimate (t. iv. l. 6). By another constitution, known as "Si quicumque praeditus potestate," a fine of 10 lbs. of gold was enacted against officials who should seek to coerce women into marriages, even though these should not be carried out (law of Gratian, Valentinian, and Theodosius, A.D. 380; ib. t. vii.).

We do not find anything answering to these provisions in the Barbarian Codes, but only in the work called the Lex Romana supposed to have represented the personal law of the Romans under the Lombard kings. Here, in barbarous Latin, some of the provisions of the Code are reproduced, whilst others are widely departed from. For instance, in place of the protective provisions against the marriage of guardians with their wards, we have coarser ones providing against the seduction of wards by their guardians, under penalty of exile and confiscation (bk. ix. t. v.).

Another class of restrictions on marriage may be termed social ones, as depending chiefly on disparity of social condition. The most prominent disparity of condition in the whole ancient world, as it remains still in much of the modern world, was that between freeman and slave. According to the Roman law, there could be absolutely no marriage between the two, but only what was termed a contubernium (Jul. Paul. Recept. Sent. bk. ii. t. 19, § 3). Yet the sense of human equality was so strong, that a senatus-consultum had to be issued under the Emperor Claudius against the marriage of freewomen with slaves; reducing the former to slavery itself, if the act were done without the knowledge of the master, —to the condition of freedwomen if with his consent (Tacitus, Ann. bk. xii. c. 53; A.D. 53). Although this law does not appear in the Corpus Juris—perhaps because it might seem indirectly to recognize slaves' marriages—it is clear that neither under the Digest nor under the Code could there be any marriage between free and slave. "With slave-girls there can be no connubium," says a constitution of Constantine (bk. v. t. v. l. 3); "for from this contubernium slaves are born." It affords indeed a strange picture of the more than servile condition of the Roman municipal functionaries, even at this period of the Empire, that the avowed object of the constitution which opens with this enunciation of a principle, is to prevent decurions, through the passions of slave girls, finding a refuge in the bosom of the most powerful families. The secret marriage of a decurion with a slave was to be punished by sending the woman to the mines, the decurion himself to exile on some island, whilst his property passed, as if he were dead, to his family, or in default of such to the city of which he was a curial; local officials who were privy to the offence, or left it unpunished, were in like manner to be sent to the mines. If it took place in the country, by permission of the girl's master, the estate where it occurred, with all slaves and live and dead stock, was to be confiscated; if in a city the master forfeited the half of all his goods. That decurions, however, were not the only persons likely to marry slaves is evident from a constitution of Valentinian and Marcian, A.D. 428 (ib. l. 7), which enumerates "the slave-girl, the daughter of a slave-girl," first amongst those persons whom senators may not marry.

If any man married a slave, believing her to be free, the marriage was void ab initio (22nd Nov. c. 10). But if a master married his slave-girl to a freeman, or constituted a dos upon her, which was considered to be the privilege of the free, a constitution of Justinian's enacted that this should not only enfranchise her, but confer on her the rights of Roman citizenship (Code, bk. vii. t. vi. l. 9). In the 22nd Novel (c. 11) the same emperor went further still and enacted,

CONTRACT OF MARRIAGE

When a master either himself gave away his girl in marriage, whether with or without instruments, or knowingly allowed another to do so, as a freewoman, to a man ignorant of her condition, this should amount to an enfranchisement, and the marriage should be valid; and again (c. 12), a fortiori, that if a man had long deserted either a male or female in a state of bodily weakness (lanquens), and owned no care to preserve his rights over them, as derelicts, resuming possession of themselves, were no longer to be troubled by him, at the marriages of such as free men or women would be lawful. Finally, the 78th Novel declared that where a man had had children by a slave-girl, and constituted a dowry upon her (which had the effect of marriage), this of itself had the effect of manumitting the issue born in wedlock, and rendering them liberi, and no longer in filia, to the father (c. 4).

Very analogous to the condition of the slave was that of the adscriptus glebas. The marriage of a freeman with an adscripta does not seem to have been void, but the children followed their mother's condition. On the other hand, the marriage of a freewoman with an adscriptus was declared to be absolutely void; were to be separated, and the man punished (bk. xi. t. xlvii. l. 24; 22nd Nov. c. 17; see 54th Nov. profrone). Nor do we find the mitigations of the law in favour of an adscriptus as of a slave (supra). As respects the higher class, that of the rustici, we find that marriages between them and free persons to have been recognized, the issue of such marriages was divided in point of condition, the third, fifth child, &c., following that of the father ("quod impar est, habebit venter," 1st Novel).

The Barbarian Codes deal more frequently with the subject of these marriages, and in some of them we trace distinctly the threefold condition of freeman, serf or villain, and slave, the second being more and more superior to the third. Intermarriage of man or woman belonging to either of the first two classes involves, under Lombard laws (A.D. 638) of Rotharis (c. 218), and Liutprand (A.D. 721) (bk. iv. c. 6), penalties of greater or less severity. In the Lex Romana, used to represent the personal law of the Italian population in Italy in Lombard times, we find a provision, that if a freewoman marries her slave, she shall be put to death and the slave be kept alive (bk. ix. t. vi.).

Similar provisions are found in the Alamannic Code (A.D. 750) (c. 2, and foll.), in the Bavarian (Append. de popul. leg. c. 9) and the Frisian (iii.), while the Visigothic is yet more cruelly exact, condemning all such unions, according to varying circumstances, to the penalties of loss of freedom, scourging, death by burning (iii. t. ii. c. 2).

Finally, a law of King Goba is addressed to those who seem to have been a peculiar form of semi-serf in the service of the Church. Its title is, "that those who are enfranchised, retaining service to the Church, should not dare approach the lineage of free persons." It enacts that a church-absolute freed may marry a freewoman; if still bound to the obsequium, he is to receive three stripes and be separated from his wife; otherwise both are to be in slavery with their issue, the property of the freewoman going to her heirs. And the same rule is enacted as to such women marrying freemen (bk. iv. c. 7).

Notwithstanding the harshness of many of the above enactments, it must be inferred from them that marriages between free and slaves were increasing in frequency. Indirectly, moreover, those which provide that a freewoman choosing to remain with her slave-husband becomes a slave herself, seem to imply, like the senatus-consultum under Claudius before quoted, which was not admitted into the Code, a recognition of marriages between slaves, since the mere living with a slave would not (except under the Visigothic law) affect the condition of the freewoman. There is moreover evidence that, even in the latter class of cases, custom was often milder than the law. Marculf's Formulae, which are considered to have been put together about A.D. 660, contain a "charta de agnatione, si servus ingenuum trahit," by which a mistress grants the freedom of a freewoman's children by her slave (f. 29; and see Appendix, f. 18). The ultimate relaxations of the law itself under the Carolingians will be best treated of in connexion with the ecclesiastical history of the subject.

Vast as was the gap between free and slave in the ancient world, that between the free-born and the freed was still considerable,—especially as between male slaves enfranchised and their former mistresses, or the female relatives of a former master. According to the jurist Paul, a freedman aspiring to marriage with his patrona, or the wife or daughter of his patronus, was, according to the dignity of the person, to be punished either by being sent to the mines, or put upon public works (Jul. Paul. Recept. Sentent. bk. ii. t. xix. § 6); unless indeed the condition of the patronus was so low as to make such a marriage suitable for her (Dig. bk. xliii. t. ii. l. 13). On the other hand, the Lex Papia allowed all freeborn males, except senators and their children (in which case the marriage was void), to marry freedwomen (§. l. 23), from which class seem however to have been excepted those of brothel-keepers, probably as presumably being prostitutes themselves (Ulpian's Fragments, t. xii. § 27). The marriage of a master with his freedwoman was by no means looked upon in the same light as that of a mistress with her freedman; and the patronus was restrained from marrying his freedwoman without her will (§. l. 28).

The social restrictions on marriage were, in this as in other respects, relaxed by the later emperors. The marriage to a freedwoman of a man who afterwards became a senator was declared by Justinian to remain valid, as well as that of a private person's daughter to a freedman, when her father was raised to the senate (Code, bk. v. t. iv. l. 28). He removed the disability to marriage which seems to have been considered to exist between a man and a girl whom he had brought up (alumnus) and enfranchised (l. 26). And by the 78th Novel he allowed persons "of whatever dignity" to marry freedwomen, provided "nuptial documents" were drawn up (c. 3).

There were moreover certain conditions of life which were assimilated by their ignominy to the servile one. A free-born man could not marry a procuress, a woman taken in adultery, one condemned by public judgment, or a stage-player; nor, according to Mauricianus, one condemned by the senate (Ulpian's Fragments, t. xiii.). A senator was subject to the same restrictions (Dig. bk. xxiii. t. ii. l. 44, § 8; and see l. 43, §§ 10, 12); the Lex Julia et Papia imposing, moreover, a special prohibition on the marriage of either senators or their issue with stage-players or the children of such (l. 44). Under Valentinian and Marcian, A.D. 454, the "low and abject" women who were forbidden to marry senators were declared to be slaves and their daughters, freedwomen and their daughters, players and their daughters, tavern-keepers and their daughters, the daughters of lenones and gladiators, and women who had publicly kept shops (Code, bk. v. t. v. l. 7). If indeed a senator's daughter should prostitute herself, go on the stage, or be condemned by public judgment, her dignity being lost, she might marry a freedman with impunity (Dig. bk. xxiii. t. ii. l. 47).

Thanks, no doubt, to Theodora's influence, much greater indulgence was shewn under Justinian to actresses. Such women, if they had left their calling and led a respectable life, were enabled to intermarry with persons of any rank, and their children were relieved from disabilities (bk. v. t. iv. l. 27, § 1). By another constitution (l. 29), women who had been forced to mount the stage, or who wished to abandon it, were rendered capable of marrying persons of the highest rank, without the imperial permission.

The jurists of the Digest had however gone beyond all specific restrictions on marriage. Modestinus had laid down that "in marriages one should not only consider what is lawful, but what is honourable." And generally there seems to have grown up a feeling against unequal marriages, such as is indicated in a before-quoted constitution of Valentinian and Marcian (Code, bk. v. t. v. l. 7; A.D. 454), which provides that "a woman is not to be deemed vile or abject who, although poor, is of free descent;" and declares lawful the marriage of such persons, however poor, with senators or persons of the highest rank. And as it seemed to have been inferred, from a constitution of Theodosius and Valentinian, A.D. 418, which abolished the necessity for all formalities between persons of equal condition (Code, bk. v. t. iv. l. 22), that without dotal instruments such marriages between persons of unequal condition were not valid, Justinian abolished all restrictions on unequal marriages, provided the wife were free and of free descent, and there was no suspicion of incest or aught nefarious (l. 23, § 7).

We do not find much in the barbarian codes on this branch of the subject. The Roman law against the intermarriage of freedmen or their issue with the posterity of their patrons reappears in the Visigothic code (bk. v. t. vii. c. 17), the penalty being reenslavement. Among the Visigoths there seems to have been an old law forbidding the intermarriage of Goths and Romans, which was repealed by Rueswinth (Lex Visig. bk. iii. t. i.), who allowed any freeman to marry any freewoman, "with the solemn consent of her family, and the permission of the court." The same law must have prevailed in Italy under the Lombards, though we miss it from the Lombard code, since the Lex Romana forbids intermarriage between Romans and Barbarians under pain of death (bk. iii. t. xiv.). This restriction is however one rather of a political nature.

Lastly, certain restrictions on the marriage contract are of a religious character, and will be best referred to when we consider the rules of the Church itself upon the subject, which we shall now proceed to do.

That marriage generally was a civil contract, subject to the laws of the state, seems to have been the received doctrine of the early Church; whilst at the same time it claimed also power to regulate it in the spirit of the Gospel, as is shewn, for instance, in the strictness of our Lord and His apostles against divorce, although freely allowed both by the Jewish and the Roman law. Hence Pagan betrothals and marriages were, as Selden observes, held valid by the Christians (Uxor Ebraica, bk. ii. c. 24). The validity of non-Christian marriages seems to be implied in such passages as 1 Cor. vii. 12-16, referring to the cases of a convert husband and an unconverted wife, a convert wife and an unconverted husband; in the latter of which cases at least the form of marriage must be supposed to have been one unsanctified by the Church; whilst both would seem to include the hypothesis of a conversion of either party after such a marriage. It must moreover be observed that, with one exception, the forms of marriage in use in the Roman world were purely civil ones. The only religious marriage was that by confarreatio, which remarkably enough was indissoluble, except perhaps by disfarreatio, a practice of which the reality is doubted. But it is clear from Tacitus (Ann. bk. iv. c. 16) that by the time of Tiberius, i.e. the beginning of the Christian era, the use of the ceremony had become very rare. When therefore the author of the Epistle to the Hebrews wrote that "marriage is honourable in all" (c. xiii. 4), and his Epistle was admitted as authoritative in the Gentile as well as the Jewish churches, the inference is that the honour he speaks of was felt to rest as well on the ordinary civil contract of the Gentile as on any form in use among the Jews. Again, the Apostolical Constitutions (with an exception as to the clergy to be hereafter noticed) speak simply of "lawful" and "unlawful" marriage. Thus, in a sort of summary of the faith contained in the 6th book (c. 11), it is said: "Every union which is against the law we abhor as iniquitous and unholy." Again: "Marriage should be lawful; for such a marriage is blameless" (ib. c. 14); the expression "lawful connexion" (νόμιμος μίξις) occurring repeatedly in later constitutions (bk. vi. cc. 27, 29). The only consideration which may cast a doubt upon the application of the idea of "law" in such passages as the above, as referring to the municipal law, arises from the circumstance, to be presently adverted to, that the same expressions are used in reference to unions which were not recognized by the Roman law. But the most valuable testimony to the feeling of the early Church on this subject as late as the 2nd and 3rd centuries, is supplied by Tertullian (A.D. 150-226), a writer whose Christian zeal ran always in the direction of ultra-strictness. In his treatise on Idolatry, distinguishing between those solemnities which a

Christian man may lawfully attend and those which he may not, he enumerates marriage among such as are free from "any breath of idolatry," "pure by themselves." "The conjugal union," he says, does not flow "from the worship of any idol." "God no more forbids the solemnizing of marriages than the giving of a name" (c. 16).

As a rule, then, the Church has followed the municipal law in reference to the validity of the contract of marriage, and has thus not had occasion to dwell much in its legislation on the legal incidents of the contract. The validity of heathen marriage is implied in the judgments and decisions of various popes and councils (some perhaps antedated) as to pre-baptismal marriages, which, in spite of one or two weighty authorities to the contrary, were held binding, and on the express ground that the issue of such marriages were lawful (liberi). See the 2nd letter of Pope Innocent I., A.D. 402-17, to Victorinus, c. 6; his 22nd letter, to the Macedonian bishops, c. 2; the 3rd Council of Rome, A.D. 531; and the letters of Leo to Anastasius and to the bishops of Illyricum. The alleged decree of Pope Fabian, A.D. 238-52, in Gratian, embodying the Roman law on the effect of madness on marriage, is a purely superfluous forgery. Egbert, archbishop of York, indeed, in the Excerptions attributed to him, seems to place the age of puberty somewhat later than the Roman law, since he says that a girl of 14 has power over her own body, a boy of 15 over his (bk. ii, c. 27). A canon of the Council of Friuli, A.D. 791 (c. 9), contains the like prohibition as a previous capitulary before referred to against marriages with children.

It has already been observed, under the head "CONSENT," that on one point indeed a marked divergence is to be traced between the practice of the Church and the Roman law. Slave-marriages are recognized, at least in the later portions of the Apostolical Constitutions. And masters who refused to sanction them were to be excommunicated (viii. 23). A free man, on the other hand, is to dismiss, not to marry, a slave-concubine with whom he may have lived. (Ibid.)

Consistent with the Apostolical Constitutions, the first canonical epistle of St. Basil (A.D. 328-379), to Amphilochius, bishop of Iconium, treats slave-marriages as adulterous when contracted without the master's will, but as "firm" when contracted with his consent; assimilating them to the marriages of minors, and using the same word (κρίσις) to express the authority both of the father and of the master. A work of doubtful character, which claims authorship from the Nicene fathers, the Sanctiones et decreta alia, which in the collection of councils by Labbé and Mansi will be found appended to the canons of the Council of Nicea (vol. ii. p. 1029, and foll.), but which are evidently of much later date, declares that "marriage with slaves, male or female, is not allowed to Christians, unless after emancipation; which being done, let them contract by the law of marriage and freely, a dos being assigned, according to the constitution of the country which they inhabit" (bk. i. c. 4). One of the alleged canons of the Nicene council from the Arabic, on the other hand, implies the practice of intermarriage with slaves even amongst the clergy, in condemning as bigamous those priests or deacons who having dismissed their wives, or even without dismissing them, marry others, whether free or slave (can. 66, or 71 of the Eululianian version). But these canons are also evidently of much later date than that ascribed to them, though very likely representing the practice of the Arabian church. If we mention here two alleged decrees of Pope Julius I. A.D. 338-52, the one against separating slaves once married, the other allowing a master to marry his enfranchised slave-girl (Gratian, cc. 4, 10), it is only on account of their professed date.

There are indeed not wanting indications of a narrower spirit among the leaders of the Church. A letter of Pope Leo the Great (167), A.D. 458 or 9, addressed to Rusticus, bishop of Narbonne, seems to imply the nullity of slaves' marriages, and reproduces, on Old-Testament grounds, the strictest views of the Roman law against unequal marriage. "Every woman united to a man is not a wife, since neither is every son his father's heir. The bonds of marriage are lawful between the free and between equals; the Lord establishing this long before the commencement of the Roman law existed. Therefore a wife is one thing, a concubine another; as also a bondmaid is one thing, a freewoman another" (quoting Gen. xxi. 10). [CONCUBINÆ.] Suspicion is indeed cast upon this text by its use of the word ingenuus, free-born, as simply synonymous with liber, free, a mistake which never occurs in the Code or Novels, though nearly a century later in date, and (though it may be said that a pope was not bound to be strictly accurate in his law-language) it is not impossible that it may be a forgery of the Carolingian era, invented to support a capitulary to the same effect, to be presently noticed.

The 24th canon of the 4th Council of Orleans, A.D. 541, enacts that slaves fleeing to the precincts ("septa") of churches in order to marry are not to be allowed, nor are clerics to defend such unions, but they are to be returned to their masters and separated, unless their parents and masters will let them marry;—a remarkable enactment, as shewing a recognition of parental authority in a slave.

Another canon of the same Council, forbidding marriages between Jews and Christian slave-girls, seems to imply the intrinsic validity of marriages between free and slave (c. 31). Another is remarkable as repeating, with the severer penalty of excommunication, the enactments of the Roman law against the marriage of officials within their provinces (c. 22).

A case in which a slave-marriage is recognised occurs in a letter of Pope Pelagius (A.D. 555-66) to the sub-deacon Melleus. (Labbé and Mansi's Councils, vol. ix. p. 737.)

On the other hand, Gregory the Great implies the invalidity of a marriage between slave and free in a letter to Fortunatus, bishop of Naples (bk. vi. ep. 1), in favour of a woman whom her husband had dismissed as being of servile condition; but who, being now proved free, was without delay to be received back by him. The same pope however in another letter—to Montana and Thomas, slaves whom he enfranchised with the privileges of Roman citizenship—implies the practice of slave-marriages, since he speaks of the "betrothal gifts" (sponsalia) which the priest Gaudiosus had given in writing (conscripterat) to "thy mother" (bk. v. ep. 12).

The 1st Council of Mâcon, A.D. 581, declares indissoluble the intermarriage of two slaves with their master's consent, after the enfranchisement of either (c. 10). The 30th canon of the English council held under Archbishop Theodore of Canterbury, towards the end of the 7th century, bears that "the free (or free-born) must marry with the free." Pope Stephen (A.D. 754) in his replies to various consultations at Bienn, follows Leo as to the dismissal of the ancillas and marrying a free woman. It seems difficult to ascribe a specific origin to a prescription found among some "excerpta de libris Romanorum et Francorum," appended to a collection of fresh canons, probably of the beginning of the 8th century, which bears that "if any one chooses to have his slave-girl in marriage, and has power over his property, if afterwards he would sell her, he cannot do so; he is himself to be condemned, and the woman handed over to the priest" (c. 60). Perhaps however we have only here a far-off echo of Exod. xxi. 8, or Deut. xxi. 14.

The subject indeed both of slave-marriages and of intermarriage between slave and free seems to have been greatly considered under the Carolingians; and both the civil and ecclesiastical law (which indeed at this period blend almost undistinguishably together) settle down into the recognition of such marriages and intermarriages as binding under certain conditions. As respects the former, King Pepin's capitulary of Vermerie, A.D. 753, enacts that if a slave husband and wife have been separated by sale, "they are to be exhorted so to remain, if we cannot reunite them" (c. 19); a text at least strongly tending to the indissolubility of such unions. A more singular one provides that if a slave have his slave-girl for concubine, he may dismiss her and accept "his compeer, his master's slave-girl (comparem suam ancillam domini sui accipere); but it is better that he keep his own slave-girl" (c. 7). In both texts we see already visibly the hand of the Church endeavouring to restrain the abuses of slavery. It is moreover enacted that if a cartellarius—apparently a slave freed by charter—on receiving his freedom dismisses his slave partner to take another woman, he must leave the latter (c. 20). Fifty years later, the validity of slave marriages is again implied in some "Capitula misso cuidam data" of the year 803, published by Pertz, and to be presently referred to. And ten years later still, a capitulary added in some Codices to the Lombard law (c. 5), as well as the 30th canon of the 2nd Council of Châlons (both of A.D. 813), enact the indissolubleness of slaves' marriages, even when belonging to different masters, provided their marriage be legal, and by the will of their masters. Lastly, to the Carolingian period should also perhaps be referred the two alleged decrees in Gratian of Pope Julius I. (supra). It is almost needless to dwell on the momentous influence of the change of view indicated by the above enactments on the condition of the slave. Evidently, from the moment a slave could lawfully marry, he was no longer a thing, but a person. It might almost be said that from this period slavery properly so called exists no longer within the Carolingian world—serfdom, or a condition of dependence, it might be absolute, of one man on another, has replaced it.

As respects inter-marriages between slave and free, King Pepin's capitulary of Vermerie, of A.D. 753, enacts that where a free-man knowingly marries a slave-girl, he shall always after live with her (c. 13). The king does not even treat such marriages as absolutely void, when contracted in ignorance, allowing the free person to leave his or her slave-partner and marry another only if such slave cannot be redeemed (c. 6). The contemporary Council of Vermerie recognized the validity of marriage between a freewoman and a slave, when contracted knowingly on her part, on the ground that there should be one law to the man and to the woman, and that "we have all one Father in the heavens." The capitulary of Compiègne, 757, enacts that if a freewoman marries a slave, knowing him to be such, he shall have her whilst he lives (c. 8). On the other hand, "if a Frankish man has taken a woman and hopes that she is free," and afterwards finds that she is not, he may dismiss her and take another; and so of a woman (c. 5, otherwise 7).

The validity of such unions is also implied in an enactment, placing marriage with a free-man, a slave, or a cleric, on exactly the same footing (c. 4). Similarly, a Bavarian council at Dilgelfind, 772, enacted that where a slave married a woman of noble birth who was ignorant of his condition, she should leave him and be free (c. 10). The same rule was enacted in the case of a freeborn Bavarian woman marrying a serf of the Church ("de popularibus legibus," c. 9).

Among the specially religious restrictions which were sought to be placed on the marriage contract in the early ages of the Church, the one which would first claim our attention is that on the marriage of Christians with Gentiles, or eventually also with Jews and heretics. This however will not be specially treated of here. The next is that connected with the monkish profession, which must be distinguished from the early vow of virginity in the female sex, and from the institution of the Church-virgins. The vow of virginity, which for many centuries now has been considered an essential prerequisite of the monastic profession, was not so by any means in the early heroic days of monachism. St. Basil in the 4th century, after dwelling upon the profession of virginity by women, says expressly: "As to professions of men, we know nothing of them, except that if any have joined themselves to the monastic order, they appear, without word spoken, to have thereby adopted celibacy" (2nd Can. Ep. c. 19). In the 5th century however, Pope Leo the Great treats the marriage of monks as a punishable offence, but not apparently as void in itself. Writing to Rusticus, bishop of Narbonne, about A.D. 458 or 459, he places on the same footing the entering by monks into the militia (a term probably equivalent at this time to the service of the state, whether military or civil) and their marriage. Those who, leaving the monastic profession, turn to the militia or to marriage, are to purge themselves by the satisfaction of public penance; for although the militia may be innocent and marriage honourable, to have abandoned the better choice is a transgression (Ep. 167, c. 14). The contemporary Council of Chalcedon, A.D. 451, in like manner excommunicated alike the monk and the virgin devoted to God who enter into marriage, but allows the local bishop to shew indulgence (c. 16). And the ecclesiastical validity of a monk's marriage at the beginning of the 8th century is implied in the 21st canon of the 2nd Council of Orleans, A.D. 511, which enacts that a monk who marries shall be incapable of holding any ecclesiastical office. Later still in the East (A.D. 535), the 8th Novel only forbids marriage to monks who have received the clerical ordination, reducing them to the rank of private persons (c. 8). In the West, however, the 2nd Council of Tours, A.D. 567, not only distinctly prohibited the marriage of monks under penalty of excommunication, but invoked the aid of "the judge" to separate them from their wives, under penalty of excommunication for himself if he refused it (c. 15); an evident attempt to enforce by spiritual terrors what the state still refused to erect into law.

This is indeed the period when monks, at first mere laymen, were beginning to be viewed, in the West at least, as partaking of the clerical character. The Council of Arles in 554 had decreed that monasteries both of men and women should be subjected to episcopal jurisdiction. So far as this view prevailed (for we must not forget that the monks themselves long struggled against it), the prohibition of the marriage of monks will have been considered as implied in that of the marriage of clerics generally, though such marriages are sometimes specifically referred to. Towards the end of the century, the 6th General Council, the 3rd of Constantinople, in Trullo, A.D. 682, enacted that a monk who should marry was to be punished as a fornicator (c. 44). In the West, in the first part of the 8th century, Gregory the 2nd, A.D. 714-750, in his letter to Bishop Boniface, going further than any of his predecessors, would not allow those who as children have been shut up by their parents in monasteries after puberty to leave such monasteries and marry (Ep. 13, c. 7). The marriage of monks was again condemned by Pope Zacharias, A.D. 741-51, in his 7th letter, addressed to Pepin as mayor of the palace (c. 26). About the same period the canons "de remediis peccatorum" of Egbert, archbishop of York, place the monk on the same footing as to marriage with the priest or deacon; requiring one of such who takes a wife to be "deposed" in consentibus populi, i. e. apparently, with the full knowledge of the people (c. 7). It may be added that the Council of Constantinople in 814 in like manner excommunicated a monk who should marry, and required him against his will to be clothed in the monastic robe and shut up in the monastery (c. 35). All such prohibitions indeed bear witness to the existence of the practices which they denounce; and indeed a letter of Pope Hadrian II. (A.D. 772-93) to Charlemagne contains a complaint against the marriage of monks—apparently in Lombardy—and asks the emperor to punish them.

It is somewhat difficult for a long time to distinguish in reference to this subject, so far as women are concerned, the woman under vow of virginity or celibacy (as to whom see DEVOTA), and the nun (see heading NUN). In France, a general constitution of King Clothar I. A.D. 560, forbids (c. 8) all persons to marry "sanctimonialis." Another of King Clothar II., A.D. 614, forbids any even "by our precept" to marry religious girls and widows, or nuns who have vowed themselves to God, as well those who dwell in their own houses as those who are placed in monasteries. That such marriages however occurred in Italy still, is apparent from a letter of Pope Gregory I. the Great (A.D. 590-603) to Bishop Januarius (bk. iii. ep. 24). Distinguishing between "veiled virgins" and nuns, he says that as respects women who have gone from monasteries to lay life and married, "Those who have exceeded against such women" (i. e. their husbands), "and are now suspended from communion, if penitent, may be readmitted." It is difficult in many instances to define how far the meaning of the terms "sacrae" or "sacratæ virgines" is to be extended or restricted. By the 8th century, indeed, the church-virgin and the private devotea seem for all practical purposes to have merged in the nun. Indeed the Excerpta of Egbert, archbishop of York, treat a private vow of celibacy by man or woman as "foolish and impossible," and its breach by marriage as only to be punished by three winters' fasting (bk. ii. c. 19). The 1st Council of Rome in 721, "against illicit marriages," expressly anathematizes one who marries "menacham quam Dei ancillam appellamus" (c. 3). The before-quoted Excerpta of Egbert contain the like anathema, using the expression "monialem, quæ Dei sponsa vocatur" (bk. ii. c. 18); the parties are to be separated, and condemned to perpetual penance. Among the "answers" of Pope Stephen II. from Bierry to "various consultations" (A.D. 754) is one, that it is "not lawful for a virgin who has consecrated herself to God, likewise for a monk, to marry:" either is to be excommunicated; but the bishop "may shew humanity and mercy" (c. 7). The Synod of Metz, in 753, includes marriages with a woman consecrated to God among licetæ (c. 1); as does also the Council of Calchuyth (i. e. Chelsea), A.D. 787, using the term "sanctimonialis" (c. 15). See also similar prohibitions against the marriage of nuns by the Bavarian Council of Diagelfind, A.D. 772 (c. 4); and by the Council of Friuli, A.D. 791 (c. 11), which requires girls and widows who have vowed virginity or continence, and have been "emancipated to God," if afterwards they marry, to be subjected "by secular judgment to fit bodily chastisement" before undergoing their spiritual punishment.

The prohibition against the marriage of monks and religious women by degrees found its way into the civil law of several of the barbarian kingdoms besides France. Among the laws of King Liutprand of Lombardy, A.D. 721, or later, we find one of this kind as to women, in which their position when they have assumed the religious habit is assimilated to that of girls betrothed under the civil law, whose marriage entails a penalty of 500 solidi (bk. v. c. 1). In the Wisigothic code, a law of Recarede inflicts "on incestuous marriages and adulteries, or on sacred virgins and widows and penitents, defiled with lay vesture or marriage" the penalties of exile, separation, and forfeiture of property (bk. iii. t. v. c. 2).

By the time of the Carlovingians, the civil and ecclesiastical law almost wholly coalesce. King Pepin's capitulary of Soissons in 744 forbids marriage with holy women together with incestuous marriages and bigamy (c. 9). In the 6th book of the Capitularies we find one (c. 411) almost in the same terms with the law of Recarede above quoted, declaring that marriage with a virgin devoted to God, a person under the religious habit, or professing the continence of widowhood, is not a true marriage, and requiring the parties to be separated by either the priest or the judge, without even any accusation being lodged with him, the penalty being still perpetual exile. (Comp. also Capit. 414, 424, bk. vii. c. 338.) In the East, on the contrary, about the end of the 8th century, it is noted as one of the features of Constantine Copronymus' tyranny, that he compelled monks to marry.

We shall now deal, though we do not propose to do so at full length in this place, with the contract of marriage as respects the clergy properly so called. It need hardly be observed that, so far as such contract might be recognized as valid, all the restraints upon it in the case of laymen would apply also to clerics. Sometimes indeed these had to be specifically enacted. Thus the Council of Chalcedon, A.D. 451, provided that no cleric should take a heretic, Jew, or pagan, to wife, unless he should promise to convert her, under pain of canonical punishment (c. 14). But the Church had also restraints of its own in the latter instance. We have said that, as respects the clergy, the practice of the Church in respect to marriage was mainly founded on the Jewish law. The marriage of priests was by the Pentateuch surrounded with peculiar restrictions. The priest was not to marry a harlot or "profane" woman, or one divorced, or a widow, but a virgin only (Lev. xxi. 7, 13, 14). [According to Selden, indeed, the prohibition to take a widow or person who had lost her virginity only applied to the high-priest; but he was also held debarred from marriage with proselytes or freedwomen; Uxor Hebraica, bk. i. c. 7.] The Pastoral Epistles, in requiring bishops or deacons to be "husbands of one wife" (1 Tim. iii. 2, 12; Tit. i. 6), instead of being considered as substituting a new rule for existing Jewish prescriptions, seem only to have been viewed as adding to these a further one against DIGAMY. What will have to be said on this latter head need not here be anticipated. As a rule, however, we may say that wherever it is laid down that the bishop or deacon shall be the husband of one wife, it is also provided that such wife shall answer to the Levitical prescriptions. E.g. The Apostolical Constitutions, bk. ii. c. 2, require the bishop not only to be the husband of one woman once married, but to have, or to have had, a "respectable (σεμνή) and faithful wife;" in the 6th bk. c. 17 (a later constitution), both requires all the clergy to be monogamists, and forbids them all to marry either a harlot (the term seems rather too strong as a translation of the Greek traipa, albeit rendered meretrix in the Latin versions), a slave, a widow, or a divorced woman, "as the law also saith;" although the Pentateuch does not forbid the priest's marriage with a slave, and the restriction is one evidently borrowed from the Roman law. Lastly, the Apostolical Canons exclude from admission to the clergy those who have married "a widow, or divorced person, or harlot, or slave, or one of those on the stage" (c. 14, otherwise reckoned 17 or 18); this last restriction being also adopted from the Roman law, as has been shewn already.

In respect of the marriage of the clergy indeed, the restraint which occupies most space in the church legislation of the period which occupies us is that on digamous or quasi-digamous marriages, which will be considered under the head of DIGAMY. Meanwhile however there was growing up a feeling against all marriage of the clergy whilst in orders, tending to their absolute celibacy, the history of which has been treated of under that head. [See CELIBACY.] The notices which occur of other restraints upon clerical marriages are comparatively few and unimportant.

The "Sanctions and Decrees" attributed to the Nicene fathers—which, though extant in Latin, seem evidently to embody Greek practice, though no doubt of a much later date than the one ascribed to them—require, with something of a plethora of words, the priest not to be one who has married a slave-girl, an adulteress or immodest woman (c. 14). The Council of Tarragona, A.D. 516, requires readers and ostiaris who wish to marry or live with adulterous women either to withdraw or to be held excluded from the clergy (c. 9). A letter of Gregory the Great (A.D. 590–603) to John, bishop of Palermo, implies the invalidity of a deacon's marriage with a woman who did not come to him a virgin (bk. xi. ep. 62). An alleged canon of the same Pope forbids the ordination, amongst others, of one who had married a harlot (c. 4). Yet the 4th Council of Toledo, A.D. 633, seems to imply that such marriages might be legalized by episcopal permission, since it excommunicates those clerks who, "without consulting their bishop, have married a widow, a divorced woman, or a harlot" (c. 44). And an "allocation of the priests to the people on unlawful marriages," appended to the records of the Council of Leptines in 743, provides that a future priest is not to marry a divorced woman, harlot, or widow.

To pass now from the ecclesiastical to the civil law, it must be observed that by the time of Justinian the Roman law professes only to follow the "sacred canons" as respects the marriage of the clergy, and gives force of law to the prohibitions contained in them. The children of clerics by women "to whom they cannot be united according to sacerdotal censures" are declared incapable of inheriting or receiving donations from their fathers (Code, bk. i. 7, iii. l. 45; A.D. 530). The 6th novel requires the bishop to be either a chaste unmarried man, or the husband of a woman who came to him a virgin, "not a widow, nor divorced, nor a concubine" (the last term apparently corresponding to the traipa of the Apost. Constitutions, and indicating a milder interpretation than that of the Latin translators); but requires the bishop not to live with his wife, and without inquiring into the position of those who have been already long married, forbids in future the episcopal ordination of married men. Taken in conjunction with this enactment, the 123rd novel may be considered as finally establishing as a rule of civil law that principle of episcopal celibacy, which still obtains in the Greek church. The same rules are substantially applied to the rest of the clergy (c. v.). The 123rd Novel forbids the ordaining of a bishop who either does not live chastely, or has not had a "wife, his only and first, neither a widow, nor divorced from her husband, nor otherwise forbidden by the laws or the sacred canons" (c. i.). Other clerics may be ordained having a legitimate wife of the same description (c. xiii.). And the reader contracting a second marriage, or marrying any other than such a wife as above described, was not to rise to any higher office (c. xiv.). It hardly appears, however, that up to this period the contract of marriage itself was made void if entered into against the prohibitions of the law; unless the declaring their children bastards (spurii) may be taken to imply this (Code, bk. i. 7; iii. l. 45). Among the barbarian codes, the only one which appears to prohibit clerical marriage is that of the Visigoths, drawn up under clerical influence. A law of Recaredo forbids the marriage or adultery of a priest, deacon, or sub-deacon, with a "widow vowed to God, a penitent, or any secular virgin or woman," under pain of separation and punishment according to the canon, the woman to receive 100 lashes (bk. ii. 7; iv. c. 18). Nor is it amiss to remark that in spite of various attempts by councils to enforce the absolute celibacy of the clergy, the validity of clerical marriage is recognised by the civil law under Charlemagne himself. In a capitulary, "De regulis clericorum" (bk. vii. c. 652), it is enacted that clerics "should also endeavour to preserve perpetually the chastity of an unpolluted body, or certainly to be united in the bond of a single marriage."

II. We have now to say a few words on the subject of the contract of marriage in the sense in which the expression is still used in France ("contrat de mariage" = marriage settlement), of the written evidence of the contract itself as between the parties.

The marriage contract among the Romans was habitually certified in writing on waxen tablets, termed nuptiales tabulae, which, however, might also be used after marriage; e. g., on the birth of a child. The tabulae were signed both by the parties and by witnesses (Tac. Ann. bk. xi. c. 27; Juv. Sat. ii. v. 118; ix. vv. 75, 76), and the breaking of them was held to be at least a symbol of the dissolution of marriage, if it had not the actual effect of dissolving it; see Tacitus as to the bigamous marriage between Messalina and Silius (Ann. bk. xi. c. 30; and Juv. u. s.). Under the Code however, by a constitution of the Emperor Probus, the drawing up of such tabulae was enacted not to be necessary to establish the validity of the marriage, or the father's potestas over his offspring (bk. v. t. iv. l. 9). They were perhaps not necessarily, though usually, identical with the "dotal tablets" (tabulae dotalae), "dotal instruments" (instrumenta dotalia), or "dotal documents" (documenta dotalia), specifically so-called (the expressions nuptialia instrumenta, dotalia instrumenta, seem to be used quite synonymously in the 70th Novel), but must have been comprised with them at least under the general terms instrumenta or documenta; as to which it is provided, by a constitution of Diocletian and Maximian (Code, bk. v. 7; iv. l. 13), that where there is no marriage, "instruments" made to prove marriage are invalid, but that where there are none, a marriage lawfully contracted is not void; nor could the want of signature to such by the father invalidate his consent (ib. l. 2; law of Severus and Antonine). Nuptial instruments were by Justinian made necessary in the case of the marriage of acencios or stage-players (l. 29). Under the 74th novel, indeed, all persons exercising honourable offices, businesses and professions, short of the highest functions in the state, were required, if they wished to marry without nuptial instruments, to appear in some "house of prayer and declare their intentions before the defensor Ecclesiae," who in the presence of three or four of the clerks of the church was to draw up an attestation of the marriage, with names and dates, and this was then to be subscribed by the parties, the defensor Ecclesiae and the three others, or as many more as the parties wished, and if not required by them, to be laid up, so signed, by the defensor in the archives of the church, i. e. where the holy vases were kept; and without this the parties were not held to have come together nuptiali affectu. But this was only necessary where there was no document fixing a dos or ante-nuptial donation; nor was it required as to agriculturists, persons of mean condition, or common soldiers. It will be obvious that we have in the above the original of our marriage certificates. (See further DOWRY, MARRIAGE.) [J. M. L.]

CONVERSI. One of the many designations of monks. Just as, through a popular feeling of reverence for asceticism, the word "religio" came in the 3rd and 4th centuries to mean not Christianity but the life monastic, so "conversi," though applied also to those who embraced Christianity, or who took upon themselves any especial obligations, as of celibacy or of ordination (Du Cange, s. v.), was ordinarily restricted to monks (Bened. Reg. c. 1; Fructuosi Reg. c. 13; Greg. M. Dial. ii. 18; Salv. Ecll. Cathol. iv.; Isidore De Conuersis. cf. Bened. Anian. Conc. Reg. iii.). But the "conversi" were properly those who became monks as adults, not those who were trained in a monastery from their tender years (Conc. Aurel. i. c. 2). About the 11th century, according to Mabillon, "conversi" came to mean the lay brothers, the "oblats" or "donati," the "frères convers," who from piety or for gain, or, probably, most often from mixed motives, attached themselves to monasteries, as "associates" (to use a modern phrase) and attended to the business of the monastery outside its wall. (Mab. Ann. iii. 8; Martens ad S. Bened. Reg. c. 3; Mab. Act. SS. O. S. B. Saec. III. l. 21). The "Conversi Barbatii" are classed with monks rather than with the laity (Petr. Ven. Statut. 24). [I. G. S.] COPE. (Cappa or Caps; Fr. Châpe.) From being used as an out-door dress for defence against rain, the cope was also called Piviale, whence It. Piviale; and from the cowl or hood with which it was furnished it was known as Cuculla. Such, probably, was the "cuculla villosa" spoken of by St. Benedict in his Regula (Migne, Patrol. lxxvi. 777). "Vestimenta fratribus secundum locorum qualitatem . . . dentur. Mediocribus locis sufficere credimus monachis per singulos cucullam et tunicam; cucullam in hieme villosam, in aestate puram aut vetustam, et scapulare propter opera . . . Sufficit monacho duas tunicas et duas cucullas habere, propter noctes et propter lavare ipsas res." So Smaragdus (†820) says expressly in his Commentary on the Regula of St. Benedict, apud Migne, Patrol. cii. "Cucullam dicit ille quod nos modo dicimus cappam." And to the same effect Theodemarus, writing from Italy to Charlemagne, and speaking of the dress worn by the monks of Monte Cassino (Ducange, in voc. Capa): "Illud indumentum, quod a Gallis monachis cuculla dicitur, nos capam vocamus." Like other garments originally designed for practical use rather than for ornament, the copes worn on occasions of state or by the higher clergy received greater enrichments from time to time, whether in regard of the materials or of accessory ornaments, particularly the "morse," or clasp by which they were fastened in front. From what we know to have been the shape of the cope in all later times we may infer that in the earlier period, up to 800 A.D., with which we are here primarily concerned, the cappa was shaped like a modern cloak, open in front, and attached only at the neck. For full details concerning the later copes of ecclesiastical use, see Bock, Lit. Gew. ii. 287; Rock, Church of our Fathers, ii. 23; Marriott, Vestiarium Christianum, p. 224; Pugin, Glossary, in voc. [W. B. M.]

COPIATAE. The name given by Constantine in the Theodosian Code, to certain Church officers whose business it was to take care of funerals and provide for the decent interment of the dead. The etymology of the name is doubtful—Gothofred derives it from κωρᾶν to rest—others from κωρῆς, mourning: more generally, it is referred to κόπος, labour: whence they have sometimes been called laborantes. Another name for them is FOSSARII, or grave-diggers—and in Justinian's novels, they are mentioned as lecticarii—as carrying the corpse or bier at funerals. They are reckoned in the Theodosian Code among the inferior clerical orders, e.g. lib. 13. tit. 1. de Lustrali Collat. Leg. 1, "Clericos excipi tantum, qui Copiatæ appellantur," &c.

The foundation of this Order is attributed to Constantine, before whose time the care of interring the dead was only a charitable office, for which every Christian made himself responsible as occasion required. The order of Copiatæ, as first constituted by the emperor for this service in the city of Constantinople amounted to 1100 men, and from this example they probably took their rise in other populous cities. In Constantinople, however, they formed a collegium, with certain privileges and exemptions, which may not have been extended to the order in the less important Churches.

The office of the Copiatæ was to take the whole care of funerals upon themselves, and to see that all persons had a decent and honourable interment. Especially they were obliged to perform this last office to the poorer sort, without charge to their relations. At Constantinople certain lands were set apart for their maintenance; but in other Churches it is more probable that they were supported partly out of the common funds of the Church, and partly by their own labour and traffic, which for their encouragement were generally exempted from paying custom or tribute (Bingham, B. iii. c. 8; Riddle; Martigny). CORN, ALLOWANCE OF. This particular provision for the maintenance of the clergy deserves a special notice, from its connection with the early stages of the recognition of Christianity by the empire. Constantine, in his zeal for his new creed, ordered the magistrates of each province to supply an annual allowance of corn (ἐρῶν αὐτορρέα), not only to the clergy, but to the widows and virgins of the Church (Theodoret, i. 11). When Julian succeeded, he transferred the grant to the ministers of the heathen cultus which he revived (Sozom. v. 5; Philostorg. vii. 4). Jovian restored it, but on the lower scale of one-third of the amount fixed under Constantine. The payment continued, and was declared permanent by Justinian (Cod. i. tit. ii. de SS. Eccles.). [E. CORN, EARS OF. Corn is not so often used in early Christian art as might be supposed. [LOAVES.] The thoughts of early iconographers seem to have gone always to the Bread of Life with sacramental allusion, as Bottari, tav. clxiii. vol. iii. et alibi. In Bottari, vol. i. tav. xlviii., the corn and reaper are represented in a compartment of a vault in the cemetery of Pontianus. Again, in vol. ii. tav. lv., the harvest corn is opposed to the vine and cornucopia of fruit (Callixtine catacomb).

The more evidently religious use of the ears of corn is in various representations of the Fall of Man. On the sarcophagus of Junius Bassus (supp. A.D. 358), Bottari, vol. i. tav. xv. 9, Adam and Eve are carved; the former bearing the corn, in token of his labour on the earth, and the latter a lamb, indicating woman's work, spinning. The connection of this with Jack Cade's proverbial line, "When Adam dived and Eve span," seems probable. See again vol. ii. tav. lxxxix. Martigny gives a copy (s. v. "Dieu,") of a bas-relief in Bottari, vol. iii. tav. xxxvii., from the cemetery of St. Agnes, where two human forms, apparently both male, are standing before a sitting figure, whom Martigny supposes to represent the First Person of the Trinity. It may represent the offering of Cain and Abel; at all events the corn-ears and lamb are either being received or presented by the standing figures. See also Bottari, tav. lxxxiv. lxxxvii. lxxxix. As these figures are of no more than mature (sometimes of youthful) appearance, the Second Person may be supposed to be intended by them.

CORONA. [TONSURE.]

CORONA LUCIS. A lamp or chandelier. In the early ages of Christianity it was by no means unusual for sovereigns and other royal personages, following an instinct of natural piety of which we have examples in pre-Christian times (cf. Pliny, Hist. Nat. xvi. c. 4) to dedicate their crowns to the use of the Church. The gifts thus devoted were known as Donaria, and were suspended by chains attached to their upper rim, above an altar or shrine, or in some conspicuous part of the church. Other chains were attached to the lower rim, supporting a lamp, from which usually depended a jewelled cross. The crowned cross thus suspended above the altar was felt to be an appropriate symbol of the triumphs of Christianity, and its use became almost universal. We have several allusions to it in the writings of St. Paulinus of Nola in the fifth century, e.g.

"Crucem corona lucida cingit globus."

Ep. 32 ad Severum.

"Parva corona subest varis circumdata gemmis,

Haec quoque crux Domini tanquam diademate cincta Emicat."

Nat. xl. v. 619 sq.

"In cruce consortiam socia compage coronam."

Ib. v. 692.

Beda (de Locis Sanctis, cap. 2) in his description of Calvary, specifies a large silver cross hanging above the Holy Grave, with a brass circlet and lamps "aenea rota cum lampadibus" attached to it. In this manner the crowns of Theodelinda, queen of the Lombards, and of her second husband Agilulf, at the beginning of the 7th century, were dedicated to St. John the Baptist in the cathedral of Monza, as stated in the inscription borne by the latter before its destruction, and there is little reasonable doubt that the celebrated iron crown of Lombardy, preserved in the same cathedral, was at one time employed for the same purpose (Frisi, Memor. della Chiesa Monzese, Dissert. II. p. 67; Pacciandi, de Cult. Joann. Bapt. Dissert. vi. cap. 10, p. 286). At a much earlier period, according to Constantine Porphyrogenitus and Nicetas, Constantine the Great had dedicated his crown to the service of the Church. In the time of these writers, a crown of remarkable beauty "prae caeteris et operis elegantia, et lapillorum pretio conspicua" (Ducange, Constantinop. Christ. iii. § 43), hanging with others above the Holy Table, was pointed out as having been offered to God by the first Christian emperor.* With one of these votive crowns, the lamp and chains being removed, in the time of Const. Porphy., the new emperor of the East received his inauguration (Ducange, Constant. Christ. u. s.). According to the not very trustworthy catalogue preserved in Anastasius (S. Silvest. xxiv. § 36) the Lateran basilica and that of St. Peter's were also enriched by Constantine with large chandeliers of pure gold. Clovis also, at the suggestion of St. Remigius early in the 6th century, sent to St. Peter's "coronam auream cum gemmis, quae Regnum appellari solet" (Hincmar, Vit. S. Remig.; Anastas. S. Hormisd. liv. § 85). The very remarkable series of crowns discovered near Toledo (see below, CROWNS) were, as the inscriptions borne by some of them testify, a solemn offering to some Spanish church, at the hands of the king and queen and royal family. No lamps were attached to them when they were discovered, but these appendages, as encumbrances of small value, may have been removed when the regalia were buried to conceal them from the Saracen spoiler.

This custom for sovereigns to dedicate their actual crowns to the Church's use led to the construction of imitative crowns, formed for votive purposes alone. Of this usage we find repeated notices in the Liber Pontificalis, which bears the name of Anastasius Bibliothecarius; as well as in ancient chronicles and documents. They are usually described as having been suspended over the altar, and very frequently mention is made of jewelled crosses appended to them. Small votive crowns of this nature are seen suspended over the altar in several ancient representations. One compartment of the celebrated pallotto of the church of Sant' Ambrogio of Milan, which depicts the trance of St. Ambrose in which he celebrated mass at Tours, represents one such jewelled crown hanging over the altar at which the saint is officiating (Ferrario, Memorie di Sant' Ambrogio). A bas-relief, now in the S. transept of Monza cathedral, representing a coronation, exhibits several crowns suspended over the altar. Another bas-relief in the tympanum of the west portal of the same cathedral, on which are carved the various gifts of Theodelinda to the church, shews us four crowns, three suspended, and the fourth being the celebrated iron crown. Macer in his Hieroglossicon refers to a similar representation in the church of San Clemente at Rome, to the left of the entrance.

Among the mosaic decorations of Sant' Apollinare Nuovo at Ravenna, we find above the upper tier of windows a succession of pictures of the couches of apses, in each of which a crown appears hanging by chains over the altar. These suspended crowns are exactly similar to those held by the female saints as votive offerings in the mosaic frieze below.

Mosaic, St. Apollinare Nuovo, Ravenna.

The convenience of the form of these donative crowns for the suspension of lamps doubtless gave rise to the custom of constructing large chandeliers after the same model. In these penile luminaries the shape and character of the royal circle was preserved, but frequently in much larger proportions. Notices of the presentation of light-bearing circles of this nature occur repeatedly in Anastasius and other ancient authorities. Besides the more ordinary name of corona, the primary royal origin of these luminaries was indicated by the designation regnum, which is of constant occurrence (cf. Anastas. Leo III. xviii. § 393, "fecit regnum aureum cum gemmis pretiosissimis;" Leo IV. cv. § 540, "fecit . . . regnum ex auro purissimo anum pendens super altare majus, cum catenulis similiter aureis, sculptilem habens in medio crucem auream habentem gemmas quatuordecim, ex quibus quinque in eadem cruce fixas, et alias quas ibidem pendent novem").

Many of these coronae mentioned by Anastasius are described as having been adorned with dolphins (Anastas. S. Silvester xxiv. § 36, "coronae quatuor cum delphinis;" ib. § 38, "coronam auream cum delphinis quinquaginta;" § 43; St. Zachar. xciii. § 219; St. Adrian. xcvi. § 348; St. Leo. iv. cv. § 531). Others were decorated with diminutive towers, and (as we see in the relief in the transept of Monza) with fleurs-de-lis (Greg. M. Ep. lib. i. ep. 66, "Coronae cum delphinis duo, et de alius coronis lilios;" Anastas. St. Hilary. xlviii. § 70, "turrem argenteam cum delphinis.") Leo, cardinal of Ostia, in his Chronicon Cassinense thus describes a corona executed for that lover of art the abbot Desiderius: "He had a pharus made, that is a silver crown weighing 100 lbs. and 20 spans in circumference. On it were 12 towers, and 36 lamps hung from it." Bells were also sometimes suspended from the lower rim.

Other names by which these chandeliers were known in early writers are Pharus, Pharocanthia, rus, Spanoclystium = πανουκλειστόν, Gabbatha, and Rota.

The name Pharus, though sometimes, as we have seen, used for a corona, was more properly a standing candelabrum supporting lamps or candles, which from their number of spreading branches were, according to Ducange, sometimes called arbores, trees. Pliny, Hist. Nat. lib. xxiv. c. 3, speaks of "lychnuchi—arborum modo mala ferentium lucentes," and Paulus Silentarius (Descript. S. Soph. part 2) thus describes candelabra in that basilica—

αἰνὰ γὰρ ἡ πανούκλειστον ἀποῖα
δένδρεά τις καλέσεται.

The most magnificent example of an ancient corona, though long after our date, is that still to be seen suspended in the cathedral at Aix-la-Chapelle, over the crypt in which the body of Charlemagne was deposited. This corona was the offering of the emperor Frederick Barbarossa, by whom the tomb was opened in 1165. A very valuable treatise on this corona, embracing full details of the form, arrangements, and history of coronae generally, has been published by Dr. Fr. Bock (Der Kronleuchter Kaisers Friedr. Barbarossa zu Aachen, Leipzig, Weigel, 1864). The Mélanges d'Archéologie of Cahier and Martin, Par. 1853, vol. iii. may be referred to, article Couronne de lumière, for representations of suspensory crowns from MSS. and painted glass. CORONATI DIES. [FESTIVAL.]

CORONATI QUATUOR (LEGEND AND FESTIVAL OF). The above title is given to four martyrs, Severus, Severianus, Carpophorus, and Victorinus, who suffered martyrdom at Rome in the reign of Diocletian. The tradition respecting them is to the effect that they refused to sacrifice to idols, and were then at the command of the emperor beaten to death before the statue of Aesculapius with scourges loaded with lead (ictibus plumbatarum). The bodies having lain where they died for five days, were then deposited by pious Christians in a sandpit on the Via Laticana, three miles from the city, near the bodies of five who had suffered martyrdom on the same day two years before, Claudius, Nicestratus, Symphonianus, Castorius, and Simplicius. See, e.g. the Martyrology of Ado, November 8 (Patrol. cxxiii. 392), who gives the legend more fully than others.

It is stated by Anastasius Bibliothecarius (Vitas Pontificum, Honorius: Patrol. cxxviii. 699) that Pope Honorius I^b (ob. 838 A.D.) built a church in Rome in their honour ("eodem tempore fecit ecclesiam beatorum martyrum iv. Cor., quam et dedicavit et donum obtulit"). To this church the remains of the martyrs were subsequently transferred by Pope Leo IV. (ob. 855 A.D.), who had been its officiating priest (op. cit. Leo IV., ib. 1305), and who, finding it in a very ruinous condition on his accession to the pontificate, restored it with much splendour, and bestowed upon it many gifts (ib. 1315). This church was situated on the ridge of the Coelian hill, between the Coliseum and the Lateran; and on its site the present church of the Santi Quattro Incoronati was built by Pope Paschal II.

^a In the case of this name considerable diversity of spelling exists:—Symphonianus, Greg. Sacr.; Symphonianus. Cd. Rhem.; Symphonianus, Cdd. Raloldi and Rodradi; Sympronius, Mart. Hieron.; Sympronianus, Ursardus; and Symphonienus, Ado.

^b Before this time, however, the Coronati Quatuor had given their name to one of the tituli of the city of Rome; for in the subscriptions to sundry decrees of Gregory the Great the last signature is "Fortunatus [presbyter tituli] SS. IV. Cor." (Gregorii Decreta: Patrol. lxxvii. 1339, formerly Epp. lib. iv., Indict. 13, c. 44.) See also Ducange, Glossarium, s. v. titulum.

As to the appointment of the festival of these martyrs on November 8, which is said to be due to Pope Melchisedech (ob. 314 A.D.), a curious difficulty has arisen. Thus in the notice of the festival in the editions of the Gregorian Sacramentary (for the words would appear to be wanting in MS. authority), the remark is made that it being found impossible to ascertain the natal day of the four martyrs ("quorum dies natalis per incuriam neglectus minime reperiri poterat"), it was appointed that in their church the natal day of the five other saints, near to whose bodies theirs had been buried, should be celebrated, that both might have their memory recorded together (Patrol. lxxviii. 147).

Others, however, make this forgetfulness to be of the names of the martyrs. Thus the Martyrologium Romanum, after speaking of Claudius, &c., proceeds: "Et ipso die iv. Coronatorum Severi, Severiani, Carpophori, Victorini, quorum festivitatem statuit Melchisedech papa sub nominibus quinque martyrum celebrari, quia nomina eorum non reperiebantur, sed intercurrentibus annis cuidam sancto viro revelata sunt" (Patrol. cxlii. 173). See also the Martyrology of Usuardus (ib. cxiv. 689).

If however the institution of the festival be rightly assigned to Melchisedech, who was pontiff during the reign of Diocletian, it is strange how this ignorance could have existed, seeing that many Christians must have been living who had known them personally. In Alcuin (De Div. Off. 31; Patrol. ci. 2230) this strange idea assumes still another form, in that the forgetfulness now includes both the day and the names: ("quorum nomina et dies natalis per incuriam neglectus." The look of the Latin however points strongly to the conclusion that the words nomina &c. are a later addition).

No trace however of this forgetfulness is to be found in the Martyrologium Hieronymi, where the notice is merely "vi. Id. Nov. Romae natalis Sanctorum Simplicii . . . et Sanctorum Quatuor Coronatorum Severi . . ." (Patrol. xxx. 481).

A difficulty of another sort is that Anastasius Bibliothecarius (l. c.) seems to distinguish the Coronati Quatuor from Severus, &c.; for after describing how Leo IV. restored their church at Rome, he adds "et ad laudem Dei eorum sacratissima corpora cum Claudio . . . , necnon Severo . . . quatuor fratribus collocavit." Doubtless however the last words are spurious. It will be observed also that Anastasius speaks of the Coronati as brothers, the only ancient authority, so far as we have observed, who does so.

Another curious point is that, in the Martyrology of Notker for July 7, the five saints, whom we have seen associated with the Coronati Quatuor, seem to be commemorated on that day:

"Romae, passio beatorum martyrum Nicostrati primicerii, Claudii commentariensis, Castorii sive Castuli, Victorini, Symphoriani vel sicut in libro Sacramentorum continetur Semproniani; quorum natalem sexta die Iduum Novembris eatenus nos celebrari credidimus, donec venerabilis pater Ado alios et alios pro eis nobis honorandos insinaret: de quibus in suo loco vita comite commodius disseretur" (Patrol. cxxi. 1115). We cannot tell however how this last promise was redeemed, for the Martyrology of Notker is wanting after Oct. 28. The Martyrology of Usuardus also connects with July 7 the names of the five above-mentioned saints (Patrol. cxiv. 233, where see the note).

In the Martyrology of Rabanus Maurus all notice for Nov. 7 and 8 is wanting. In that of Wandelbert (Patrol. cxi. 617), Nov. 8 is thus marked:—

"Senas ornantes idus merito atque cruce,
Claudi Castori Simplicii Symphoriane,
Et Nicostrate pari fulgida luce coronae;"

(cf. Semproniane), where it will be seen that there is no allusion to the Coronati themselves, unless indeed there be an implied reference in the last word of the third line.

In the Martyrology of Bede the Coronati are mentioned, but under the names of the five saints; thus, "vi. Id. Nov. natale iv. Coronatorum, Cl., N., Symphoriani, Castoris, Simplicii" (Patrol. xciv. 1097).

We find the festival marked in the Leonine Calendar, "v. (vel vi.) Id. Nov. natale SS. iv. Coronatorum" (ib. lxxiv. 880); and the former day (Nov. 7) in the calendar of Burchardus (ib. 879) as "Clementis, Semproniani, Claudii, Nicostrati, in comitatum." We find the names again varied in the Gelasian Sacramentary (ib. 1179), which cites four of the names of the five saints: "In natal. SS. iv. Coronatorum, Costiani, Claudii, Castori, Semproniani."

We have already referred to the presence of this festival in the Gregorian Sacramentary; see also the Antiphony (Patrol. lxxviii. 707). The collect in the Sacramentary runs thus: "Praesta quaesumus omnipotens Deus ut qui gloriosos martyres Claudium, Nicostratum . . . , fortes in sua confessione cognovimus, pios apud te in nostra intercessione sentiamus;" where it will be noticed that only the names of the five saints, and not of the Coronati, are given.

The Mozarabic Missal mentions the festival (Patrol. lxxxv. 898); but has no special office for it, employing for this day as well as for others a missa plurimorum martyrum. This would appear to point to the fact of the festival being a late addition to the Missal.

It may be added that several ancient calendars mark Nov. 8 as the festival of the four Coronati; but except the first, which is English, they are all Italian (Patrol. lxvii. 624, lxxx. 420, ci. 826, cxxviii. 1188, 1192, 1202, 1208, &c.). Doubtless therefore the festival is to be viewed as essentially one of the Italian church, and as one which never gained any special notoriety beyond the bounds of that church. There are Acta of the Coronati Quatuor, not apparently of any special value, which were published in Mombricitus' Sanctuarium, vol. i. ff. 162, sqq.

In addition to authorities cited in this article, special reference should be made to Ménard's notes to the Gregorian Sacramentary (in loc.). [R. S.]

CORONATION. The Coronation of kings and emperors, the most august ceremony of Christian national life, affords a striking example of the manner in which Christianity breathed a new spirit into already existing ceremonies, and elevated them to a higher and purer atmosphere. Under her inspiration a new life animated the old form: heathen accessories gradually dropt off; fresh and appropriate observances were developed; and the whole ceremonial assumed a character in harmony with the changed faith of those who were its subjects.

It has been remarked by Dean Stanley (Memorials of West. Abbey, p. 42) that the rite of coronation, as it appears in the later part of the period to which our investigation is limited, represents two opposite aspects of European monarchy. It was (1) a symbol of the ancient usage of the choice of the leaders by popular election, and of the emperor by the Imperial Guard, derived from the practice of the Gaulish and Teutonic nations, and (2) a solemn consecration of the new sovereign to his office by union with holy oil, and the placing of a crown or diadem on his head by one of the chief ministers of religion, after the example of the ancient Jewish Church.

These two parts of the ceremonial, though united in the same ritual, have a different origin, and it will be convenient to treat them separately.

(1) Among the Teutonic and Gothic tribes the custom prevailed of elevating the chief or king on whom the popular election had fallen on a large shield or buckler, borne by the leading men of the tribe. Standing on this he was exposed to the view of the soldiers and people, who by their acclamations testified their joy at his accession, and accepted him as their sovereign and head. The "chairing," or carrying round through the assembled crowd, "gyratio," usually three times repeated, followed. Tacitus describes this ceremonial in the case of Brinnio, chief of the Batavian tribe of Canninefates "impositus scuto, more gentis, et sustinentium humeris vibratus, dux deligitur" (Hist. iv. 15). The German soldiers of the Imperial Guard introduced this custom to the Romans, and we find the later emperors inaugurated in this manner. Thus Gordian the younger A.D. 238 was "lifted up" as emperor by the Praetorian Guards: "retractans, elevatus est et imperatorem se appellari permisit" (Capitolinus in Gordian; Herodian, lib. viii. c. 21). Julian, when before the death of Constantius the enthusiasm of his troops forced him at Paris unwillingly to assume the imperial dignity (April A.D. 360), submitted to the same ceremonial, "impositus scuto pedestri et sublatius eminens Augustus renuntiatur" (Amm. Marcell. lib. xx. c. 4); ἐπὶ τυγὸς ἀσπίδος μετέσπον ἄνακτες ἀρτίων τε βασιλῶν ἀβροχρόπα (Zosimus, lib. iii. 9. 4). Valentinian was desired to name a colleague A.D. 364, κατ' αὐτὴν τὴν ἀναγορεύσειν ἐπὶ τῆς ἀσπίδος (Philostorg. viii. 8), to which Nicephorus significantly adds, ὡς ἔθος. The poet Claudian, writing of the inauguration of the young Honorius as Augustus A.D. 393, refers to the same custom—

"Sed mox cum solita miles te voce levasset."

So completely was this custom identified with the inauguration of a sovereign that the verb ἐπάλειψ came into use as the regular term for the recognition of a new emperor. Thus we find Euseb. Epitome temp. of Marcian A.D. 450, αὐτῷ τῷ ἔτει ἐπὶ τῇ Μαρκιανῶς ἀναγορεύσει, and of Maximus A.D. 455 (cf. Suidas sub voce ἐπάλειψ). Zonaras, writing of Hypatius set up by a sedition as a rival to Justinian, says ἐπὶ ἀσπίδος μετέσπον ἄνακτες ἀναγορεύοντες βασιλέα (Zonar. xiv. 6). It took its place as a recognised portion of the ritual of a coronation in the Eastern Empire; e.g. the coronation of Justin the younger in St. Sophia's as described by Corippus, de Laudibus Justinii Augusti Minoris (lib. ii. 137-178). A shield was held up by four young men. On this the emperor stood erect, like the letter I, with which his name and that of his two immediate predecessors commenced.

"Quatuor ingentem clypeo sublimis orbem
Attollunt lecti juvenes, manibusque levatus, Ipse ministrorum supra stetit, ut sua rectus
Littera, quae signo stabili non flectitur unquam
Nominibus sacrata, tribus."

We also find it in the elaborate rituals drawn up by Joannes Cantacuzenus (c. 1330; Hist. i. c. 41, printed by Martene ii. 204; and Habertus Pontific. Graec. p. 604 sq.) and Georgius Codinus, Curio-paletes (d. 1460; de Officio et Officialibus Aulae Constant. c. 17). The only change is that the emperor no longer stands on the slippery surface of the buckler, but adopts the much securer position of sitting, "sessitans." The risk of a dangerous and indecorous fall during the ceremony of "gyratio," is proved by the example of Gunbald, king of Burgundy (A.D. 500), who on his third circuit "cum tertio gyrarent" fell, and was with difficulty held up by the people (Grego. Turonens. Hist. lib. vii. c. 10). According to George Codinus, who may be taken as a probable evidence of the ritual prevailing several centuries before his time in the unchanging East, this "levatio" took place outside the Church of St. Sophia, into which the new emperor was borne to receive the sacred rites of unction and crowning at the hands of the patriarch. It was the rule that the shield should be supported in front by the emperor (when the choice of a successor was made in his lifetime), the father of the newly created monarch if alive, and the patriarch, the other highest dignitaries of the State supporting it behind.

The origin of this custom being Teutonic, it was naturally continued by the sovereigns of the Frankish race. The long-haired Pharamond was thus inaugurated A.D. 420: "levaverunt super se regem crinitum" (Gesta Regum Francorum apud Dom. Bouquet, ii. 543). Clovis received his recognition as king by the same token, "cli-peo impositum super se Regem constituunt" A.D. 509 (Gregor. Turon. lib. ii. c. 40). Sigebert, son of Clotaire I. A.D. 575, when "more gentis, impositus clipeo rex constitutus" (Adonis Chronicon; Gregor. Tur. Hist. Fr. iv. c. 52), was stabbed by the assassins of Queen Fredegonde. A century later, A.D. 744, we read of Hildebrand, grandson of Luitprand king of the Lombards, "in regem levaverunt" (Paulus Diaconus, vi. 55), of Pippin (A.D. 751 "rex elevatus est" Annal. Guelferb.). And to close the series, Otto "sublimatus est" at Milan A.D. 961. [Cf. Grimm, Rechtsalterthümer, p. 234.]

The ceremonial is depicted in an illumination of the 10th century engraved by Montfaucon Monumens, tom. I. p. xvi.* representing the proclamation of David as king. He stands on a round shield, borne aloft by four young men.

From a passage in Constant. Porphy. (de Adm. Imper. c. 38) this custom appears to have prevailed among the Turks. It is not found in the early Spanish annals, but it was certainly in use in the kingdom of Arragon at a later period (Ambros. Morales, lib. xlii. c. 11), and traces of it are found in that of Castile, in Legibus Partitarum, leg. xl. tit. xxii. part. iii. There is no evidence of its ever having been adopted in England.

Among the Frankish and Lombard nations an additional ceremony was the delivery of a spear to the newly-made monarch. We find this in the case of Hildebrand A.D. 744 (Paul. Diac. vi. 55); Childeric A.D. 458 (Chiffetius in Anastas. cvii. p. 96); Childebert II. A.D. 585 (Greg. Turon. vii. 33; Aimoinus, li. 69). Martene (de Rit. li. 212) writes of the Frankish kings "tradita in manum hasta pro sceptro, excelsio in solio honorifice imponunt."

(2) The second aspect in which a coronation was viewed was the religious one. As soon as the Bible became known, the practice of the Jewish nation to consecrate their kings to their high office by the hands of the chief minister of religion became an authority from which there was no appeal. Of the two ceremonies specially characterizing the Jewish rite, unction and the imposition of a crown, the former alone was strange to the Western nations. From a very early period, as we shall see, the crown or diadem was known as the symbol of royalty. The only change was that of the person by whose hands it was placed on the monarch's head. Uction appears to have been entirely unknown as a part of the ritual, and to have come into use with the conversion of the emperors to the Christian faith.

crown or diadem. For the sake of clearness, while referring to dictionaries of classical antiquities for fuller details, it may be desirable to remind our readers that the crown, corona, στέφανος, was a head circlet, wreath, or garland of leaves, flowers, twigs, grass, &c., and, as luxury increased, of the precious metals, chiefly gold; while the diadem, διάδημα, "taenia" or "fascia" (Q. Curtius, li. 3), as its name implies, was originally nothing more than a linen band or silken ribbon, tied round the temples, with the loose ends hanging down behind. This ribbon Eastern magnificence afterwards adorned with pearls and precious stones. The nature of the diadem may be illustrated from some historical facts. Thus Alexander took off his diadem to bind up the wound of Lysimachus (Justin, lib. xv. c. 3). Pompey's enemies made it a charge against him that he had bound up an ulcer on his leg with a white cloth like a diadem, it mattering not on what part of the body the royal insignia was placed Diadem, from Champol.

(Amm. Marcell. xvii.). Monima, the wife of Mithridates, attempted to hang herself with her diadem (Plutarch, Lucullus, c. 18).

Though the words corona and diadema have not unfrequently been used interchangeably, the distinction between them is very precise.^b "However" (writes Selden, Titles of Honour, c. 8, § 2), "these names have been from ancient times confounded, yet the diadem strictly was a very different thing from what a crown now is or was; and it was no other then than only a fillet of silk, linen, or some such thing. Nor appears it that any other kind of crown was used for a royal ensign, except only in some kingdoms of Asia, but this kind of fillet, until the beginning of Christianity in the Roman empire." The "diadema," not the "corona" was the emblem and sign of royalty. It is styled by Lucian βασιλευς γράμμα (Pisc. 35; cf. Xenoph. Cyrop. viii. 3, 13); and νεπεριδίας διάδημα is of frequent use to indicate the assumption of royal dignity (Polyb. v. 57. 4; Josephus, Ant. xii. 10. 1); as in Latin "diadema" is identified by Tacitus with the "insigne regium" (Annal. xv. 29). The diadem was of Eastern origin, and was introduced to the Romans through their Oriental campaigns and intercourse with Asiatic nations. When first seen at Rome it caused great offence. Though they submitted to the reality of sovereign power, their susceptible minds could not endure its outward symbols. The golden "corona" had raised no alarm. Caligula and Domitian wore it at the public games without objection, and it appears on their coins. Augustus, Claudius, Trajan, and many others are represented with rayed or "stellate" crowns, imitating the majesty of the sun. Julius Caesar, rightly interpreting public opinion, refused the tempting offer of a diadem at Antony's hands, though half-veiled in a laurel wreath (διάδημα στέφανος δόξης περιστελεγμένον) and had it laid up in the Capitol (Plutarch, J. Cæsar 61; Sueton. l. § 79). Caligula when about to assume the diadem was warned by friendly counsellors of the danger of thus exceeding "principum et regum fastigium" (Sueton. iv. c. 22). Titus provoked suspicion of affecting the throne of the East by wearing the diadem, though according to the established ritual, when consecrating the Apis ox at Memphis (Sueton. xl. c. 5). The effe-minate Elagabalus advanced a step further and wore it in private, "diademate gemmato usus est domi" (Lampridius); and Aurelian, who had been familiar with its use in his Eastern campaign, and the attire of his captive Zenobia (Trebell. Poll. c. xxix.), first ventured to present himself to the public gaze with his temples adorned with this badge of sovereignty, and his person glittering with magnificent attire A.D. 270: "Iste prius apud Romanos diadema capiti innexuit, gemmisque et aurata omni veste, quod adhuc fere incognitum Romanis moribus visebatur, usus est" (Aurel. Vict. Epitom. c. xxxv.). The diadem once introduced was never dropped, and became a recognized mark of imperial dignity; but it seems to have been chiefly worn on state occasions. Constantine was the first to adopt it as a portion of his ordinary attire—"caput exornans perpetuo diademate" (Aurel. Vict. Epit. cxli.), and his successors continued the usage. As soon as the emperors had become Christian, it naturally followed that their inauguration to sovereignty should be accompanied by sacred rites, and receive the blessing of the chief minister of religion, who speedily became also the recognized agent in setting apart the sovereign to his regal office by the ceremonies of the imposition of the crown, and at a later period, of unction, borrowed from the rites of the Jewish Church. Originally the crown was put on by those who had the power of giving it. The Imperial Guard who chose the emperor crowned him. When Julian had been suddenly chosen by his troops as their emperor at Paris (April A.D. 360), and had been raised on the shield by the soldiers, it was they who forcibly put the token of power on his unwilling head: ἐπιθέσαν σὺν βίᾳ τὸ διὰ δῆμα τῇ κεφαλῇ (Zosim. Hist. iii. 9. 4). The circumstances of this coronation deserve mention from their picturesqueness. There being no real diadem at hand, the troops demanded that he should use his wife's head-ribbon. Julian refused, deeming a woman's ornament unworthy of the imperial dignity. Still more peremptorily did he reject the horse's headband they then proposed. At last one of his standard-bearers took off the gold torque from his neck, and with that Julian was crowned (Amm. Marcell. xx. 4). This mean crown "vilis corona" was laid aside at Vienne for a more ambitious diadem, glittering with jewels—"ambitioso diademate utebatur lapidum fulgore distincto" (Amm. Marcell. xxi. 1; Zonaras, xiii. 10). His successor Jovian was also proclaimed king, crowned and vested in the royal robe by the army who chose him A.D. 363, τὴν ἀλουργίδα ἐνδύς καὶ τὸ διὰ δῆμα περιθέμενος (Zosim. iii. 30; Theodoret, iv. 1; Theophan. p. 36); and Valentinian A.D. 364, "principali habitu circumdatus et coronatus, Augustusque nuncupatus" (Amm. Marcell. xxvi. 2). When Valentinian associated his son Gratian with him in the empire, he invested him with the purple and crown (Amm. Marcell. xxvii. 7). In none of these cases is there any reference to a bishop or minister of religion as performing the ceremony of coronation; nor can we say with any certainty when this custom arose. The first hint at such a custom that we meet with is in the dream of Theodosius before his admission to a share of the imperial dignity, c. 379 (?), in which he saw Meletius, bishop of Antioch, putting on him a crown and the royal robe (Theodoret, H. E. v. 6).

CHRIST. ANT.

It has been erroneously asserted by Martene (de Ritibus, ii. 201-237, ed. Bassano 1788) and Ménard (Notes to the Sacramentary of St. Gregory, p. 397 sq.), and repeated by Catalani and many subsequent writers, including Maskell, that Theodosius II. (A.D. 439) is the first whom we know to have been crowned by a bishop. Theophanes (p. 59) informs us that Theodosius the younger sent crowns, στεφάνους βασιλικούς, to Valentinian II. at Rome, c. 383, but nothing is anywhere said of his own coronation. The passage quoted by Martene from Theodorus Lector, (lib. ii. c. 65,) speaks of the coronation, not of Theodosius II. but of Leo I., A.D. 457, by Anatolius the patriarch: στεφθεὶς ὑπὸ τοῦ αὐτοῦ πατριάρχου. In this case the new emperor, a rude Thracian soldier, had been a military tribune and chief steward of the household of Aspar, the Arian patrician, by whose influence he was raised to the throne. It is not improbable that episcopal benediction might be regarded as a valuable support to a feeble title, and that Leo felt a special satisfaction in having the imperial crown imposed on his brows by the head of the Byzantine hierarchy. But previous allusions to coronation at the hands of a bishop would lead us to question the accuracy of Gibbon's assertion (chap. xxxvi.) that "this appears to be the first origin of a ceremony which all the Christian princes of the world have since adopted," and it would certainly be very unsafe to assert that it was the first time that this ceremony was performed by episcopal hands. The next recorded instance of episcopal coronation is that of Justin I. This emperor was crowned twice: first by John II., patriarch of Constantinople, A.D. 518 (Theophan. Chronograph. p. 162; cf. the patriarch's letter to Pope Hormisdas, apud Baronii Annal. anno 519, no. ix.: "Ideo coronam (aliter cornu) gratiae super eum coelitus declinavit, ut affluenter in sacrum ejus caput misericordia funderetur: omni annuntiationis ejus tempore cum magna voce Deum omnium principem glorificaverunt quoniam talem verticem meis manibus tali corona decoravit"); and secondly, "pietatis ergo," by Pope John II. on his visit to Constantinople, A.D. 525 (Anastas. Bibliothec. p. 95, ed. Blanchini, Rom. 1718; Aimionus, lib. ii. c. 1). His successor Justinian received the diadem primarily from his uncle's hands (Zonaras lib. xiv. c. 5), in compliance with a practice subsequently prevailing in the Eastern empire, by which the symbol of royalty was originally bestowed by the emperor himself on those whom he wished to succeed him; the ceremony being probably repeated by the bishop or patriarch. Thus Verina crowned her brother Basiliscus, A.D. 474. Tiberius II. his wife Anastasia, A.D. 578 (Theophanes, Chron.). But the sanction of religion had become essential to the recognition of a new sovereign by his subjects, and Justinian was inaugurated by the imposition of the hands of the patriarch Epiphanius (Cyril. Scythopol. Vita S. Sabae Archimandritae). From this time coronation at the hands of the patriarch was an established rule. Justin II., A.D. 565, was crowned by John Scholasticus; Tiberius II. by Eutychius, Sept. 26, 578, ten days before Justin's death and by his order. His successor Maurice and his wife were crowned by John the Faster, A.D. 582, on the day of their marriage (Theophyl. Simocatta, lib. i. c. 10), and their son Theodosius, hen four years old (Theophan. p. 179). Heraclius, with his wife Eudocia, was crowned by regina, Oct. 7, 610, and in the third year of a reign his son Heraclius and his daughter Euphrosinia were also crowned. It is unnecessary to go to later examples. In the time of Justinian's successor Justin II. the ceremonial of coronation seems to have received the form and religious action it maintained, on the whole, till the fall of the empire. The ritual is elaborately described by Corippus. The ceremony took place at break of day. After his elevation on the field (see above), the emperor was carried into the palace, where he received the patriarch's benediction, and the imperial diadem was imposed on his hands. He was then recognized as emperor by acclamation first of the "patres" and then of the "clientes." Wearing his diadem he took his seat on the throne, and after making the sign of the cross he made an harangue to his assembled subjects:—

"Postquam cuncta videt ritu perfecta priorum, Pontificum summus plenaeque aetate venustus, Adstantem benedixit eum, caelique potentem
Exorans domitium sacro diademate iussit Augustum cingere caput, summoque coronam Imponebat apici. Felicitate accipe" dixit.
Corippus de Laud. Justin. II. 8, v. 179 sq.

[With the addition of the important ceremony of unction, and a considerable elaboration of ritual, the coronation office, as given by Joannes Antiochenus, afterwards emperor (c. 1330), and a century later, by Georgius Codinus (d. 1453), corresponds with that described by Corippus in its essential particulars.

Of the Occidental use we know little or nothing. We may reasonably suppose that there was no essential difference between it and the Eastern ritual. But the Western empire had passed before the earliest record of any religious ceremony accompanying the rite in the East, and when it revived in the person of the emperor Charles the Great, coronation at the hands of a bishop had long been a recognized custom among the Frankish nations. Martene (ii. 212) acknowledges that the coronation of Pippin, the father of Charles, is the earliest example he can discover. Pippin was crowned twice—first by Boniface, archbishop of Ments, papal legate, at Soissons, A.D. 752; secondly, together with his sons Charles and Carloman and his wife Bertha, by Pope Stephen at St. Denis, Sunday, July 28, 754 (Pagius, Brev. Gesta Rom. Pont.). Charles the Great was also crowned episcopally more than once. In addition to his boyish coronation he was solemnly crowned in St. Peter's at Rome by Pope Leo. This coronation took place at Christmas Day, A.D. 800. It forms one of the great epochs in history, as by this the Frankish king was recognized by the Vicar of Christ as the representative of the emperors of Rome and inheritor of their rights and privileges.

The ceremony is thus described by Const. Manasses in Chron. Synops.:—

ἐνταῦθα ἀναβήμενοι Κέρουλλον ὁ Δάου ἀναγορεύει ἀνάτορα τῆς παλαιστοῦς Ῥώμης καὶ στέφει αὐρατώσειν ὡς οἱ Ῥωμαῖοι νόμοι.

It has been repeatedly asserted that, previous to his coronation at Rome, Charles had been crowned with the so-called iron crown at Monza: but the fact is not recorded in any early authorities, and it is probably a story of later growth.

His infant son Pippin was crowned king of Italy by Adrian I. on Easter Day, 801, the day after his birth.*

One of the very earliest instances on record of a royal coronation by an ecclesiastic in Western Europe is that of Aidan, king of Scotland, by St. Columba in Iona, A.D. 574.⁴ It may perhaps be reasonably questioned whether this picturesque narrative is to be received as historical. But it is accepted by some of the latest and best authorities (e.g. Montalembert and Burton); and the kernel of the story is probably authentic. According to the tale, an angel was sent to command Columba to consecrate Aidan. He reminded the saint that "he had in his hands the crystal-covered book of the Ordination of Kings;" which, be it remarked, presupposes the existence of such a ceremony. St. Columba hesitated, preferring for sovereign Aidan's brother Iogen. The angelic messenger appeared again and again, becoming more and more peremptory, until on the third visit he struck the refractory saint with a scourge, leaving a wound which remained on his side all the rest of his life. On this Columba consented, and Aidan was made king by him on the celebrated Stone of Destiny, taken afterwards from Iona to Dunstaffnage, and thence to Scone, whence it was transferred by Edward I., as a symbol of conquest, to Westminster. The words of Adamnan are simply, "in regem ordinavit imponensque manum super caput ejus ordinans benedixit." No mention is made either of the crown or unction (Adamnanus, de S. Columb. Scoto Confessore, t. iii. c. 5; Montalembert, Monks of the West; T. Hill Burton, Hist. of Scotland, i. 319). Almost contemporaneous with this are the records of the same rite in Spain. Leovigild, king of the Visigoths, A.D. 572, according to Isidore, Hist. Gothorum, vii. 124, was the first of those sovereigns to assume the crown, sceptre, and royal robe: "Nam ante eum et habitus et consessus communis ut genti ita et regibus erat." Of Recared also, Leovigild's successor, A.D. 586, we read, "regno est coronatus" (ib.).

(b) Another essential portion of the coronation of a Christian monarch was unction at the hands of a bishop or other chief minister. This rite clothed the person of the king with inviolable sanctity. It was considered to partake of the nature of a sacrament (August. adv. Petilium, lib. ii. c. 112), and to be indelible; to convey spiritual jurisdiction, as the delivery of the crown conferred temporal power; and it gave the chief significance to the formula "Rex Dei gratia" which according to Selden (Titles of Honour, p. 92) could not from its sacred character, be applied to any other lay person. Thus Gregory the Great writes, "quia ipsa unctio sacramentum est, is qui promovetur foris ungitur si intus virtute sacramenti roboretur" (Expos. lib. i. Regum, c. x.). "Rex unctus non mera persona laica sed mixta" (Lyndwood, lib. iii. tit. 2). Anointing, it is well known, was the chief and divinely appointed ceremony by which the kings among the chosen people of God were inaugurated to their office. As early as the time of the Judges the idea was familiar; for in Jotham's parable the trees propose to anoint a king over them. This shews that it must have been in use among other nations with whom the Jewish people had intercourse, and that St. Augustine goes too far in asserting that it was a rite peculiar to the people of God, and was never adopted by heathen nations. "Nec in aliquo alibi ungebantur reges et sacerdotes nisi in illo regno ubi Christus prophetabatur et ungebatur et unde venturus erat Christi nomen. Nusquam alibi omnino in nulla gente, in nullo regno" (Enarrat. in Ps. xlv. § 10).

* The notion, once so widely received, that the Western emperors were crowned in three different places, with crowns of three different materials—gold at Rome denoting excellence, silver at Aix-la-Chapelle denoting purity, and iron at Monza or Milan denoting strength—is a mere myth of an editor of the Pacificale Romanum, deservedly ridiculed by Aeneas Sylvius (Pope Julius II.), Hist. Aust. lib. iv., and refuted by Muratori, de Cor. Ferr. p. 2.

The earliest authentic instances of the ceremony of unction forming an essential element in Christian coronations appear in the annals of the Spanish kingdoms. The rite is mentioned in the Acts of the 6th Council of Toledo, A.D. 636. Wamba on his coronation (A.D. 673) was anointed by Quirigo, archbishop of Toledo: "Deinde curvatis genibus oleum benedictionis per sacri Quirici pontificis manus verti ejus infunditur" (Julius Toletanus, § 4; cf. Rodericus Santius, quoted by Selden, Titles of Honour, p. 155). But the rite was evidently anterior to this. The language used evidences that the unction was an established custom, and that it took place at Toledo. Wamba's is simply the first unction on record. This is confirmed by the Acts of the 12th Council of Toledo, which state of Hervigius, Wamba's successor, A.D. 680, that he "regnandi per sacrosanctam unctionem suscepit potestatem" (Labbe, Conc. vi. 1225, canon i.).

Passing by the language of Gildas (de Excid. Brit. § 21), "ungebantur reges et non per Deum, &c." as more oratorical than historical, and the uncertain reference to unction in Ina's designation of himself, "by God's grace, king of the West Saxons," in the opening sentence of his laws A.D. 690, we come down to the form of coronation contained in the Pontificale of Egbert, archbishop of York A.D. 732-767, of which Mr. Maskell says, "it is probably not only the most ancient English use, but the most ancient extant in the world" (Monum. Rit. iii. 74-81). The ritual, together with other ceremonies, expressly includes the anointing of the king's head with oil. "Benedictio super regem noviter electum. Hic verget oleum cum cornu super caput ipsius cum antiphona 'uxerunt Salomonem' et Psalmo 'Domine in virtute tua.' Unus ex pontificibus dicat orationem et alii unguant."

The 12th canon of the Council of Cealcyth A.D. 787, "de ordinatione et honore regum," contains a valuable incidental mention of unction as an essential element of the kingly office, in the words, "Nec Christus Domini esse valet nec rex totius regni qui ex legitimo non fuerit conubio generatus." Of Egerth, son of Offa, who was crowned at this council as his father's colleague, the language of the Anglo-Saxon Chronicle, in which this is the earliest coronation mentioned, "hallowed to king" (to cyninge gchalgod) can only be interpreted of unction, and so William of Malmesbury has understood it, "in regem inunctum." Eardwulf, king of Northumberland, is recorded to have been consecrated (gebletsod) and elevated to his throne (to his cine-stole ahofen) by Archbishop Eanbald and three bishops (Anglo-Sax. Chron. A.D. 795). And finally of Alfred, the same chronicle says, A.D. 854, that when Pope Leo IV. heard of the death of Ethelwulf he consecrated him king (bletsode Alured to cinge). The rhyming Chronicle of Robert of Gloucester, quoted by Selden (Titles of Honour, p. 150), in describing this coronation uses the remarkable phrase "he oiled (olede) him to be king:—

"Erst he adde at Rome ybe, and vor is gret wisdom
The pope Leon him blesede, tho he thunder come,
And the king is crowne of this lond, y in this lond yat is:
And olede him to be king, ere he were king ywis.
And he was king of Engeland, of all that there come
That verst thus yeled was of the Pope of Rome.
And suthe other after him of the erche-bishop echon,
So that biore him thur king was ther non."

From England the custom of unction seems to have passed into France, where Pippin's anointing by Boniface, archbishop of Mentz, at Soissons A.D. 752, is acknowledged by Martene (de Rit. Eccl. ii. 212; cf. Selden, u.s. p. 113) to have been the first regal unction the testimony for which is worthy of credit.* According to Chifletius, p. 30 (apud Maskell u.s.), the rite was more than once repeated: "Pippinus omnium Franciae regum primus, imitatus Judaeorum reges, ut se sacra unctione venerabiliorem augustioremque faceret, semel atque iterum ungi voluit." This second unction is probably that mentioned by Baronius, July 28, A.D. 754, when Pippin received anointing from Stephen II. together with his sons Charles and Carlomann.

The custom of unction was firmly established in the West by the close of the 8th century. When Charles the Great was crowned in Rome by Leo I. he was anointed with oil from head to foot:—

καὶ μὴν ἄλλα χρησόμενοι καὶ νόμοις Ἰουδαίων, ἐκ κεφαλῆς μέχρι ποδῶν ἐλαίῳ τοῦτον χρίει.
Const. Manass. in Chron. Synops.

The East followed the West in the adoption of unction. It has been carried back to the time of Justin and Justinian, i.e. to the middle of the 6th century (Onuphrius, de Comit. Imperator. c. 2); but Goar (Eucholog. p. 928) affirms that "the emperors of the East were not anointed before that Charles the Great was crowned in the West" (cf. Selden, u.s. p. 146).

In the earliest ritual anointing on the head alone sufficed. That of the whole person, adopted in the case of Charles the Great, was quite exceptional. The unction is thus limited in the Pontificale of Egbert. In the Greek ritual, given by Codinus, the head was anointed in the shape of the cross (σταυροειδῶς). The mediæval English rite is peculiar in anointing the head, breast, and arms, denoting glory, sanctity, and strength. The kings of France were anointed in nine places—the head, breast, between the shoulders, the shoulders themselves, the arms, and the hands. But this was a later development of the rite. The head alone was anointed in three places, the right ear, the forehead round to the left ear, and the crown of the head, when Charles the Bald was crowned by Hincmar, A.D. 809 (Hincmar, Opera, i. 745).

(c) The delivery of the sceptre and staff, which appears in the English ritual of the Pontificale of Egbert, is evidently derived from the custom prevailing among the Lombards, Franks, and other early nations, to which we have already referred, of delivering a spear to the newly elected sovereign.

(d) The profession of faith, which in later times formed part of the ritual of an imperial coronation, preceding the episcopal benediction, is not mentioned in the more ancient authorities. The instances given by Martene (de Ritibus) in proof of its early date are quite inconclusive. Jovian's declaration of Christian faith on his election as emperor by the soldiers of his army, was evidently entirely voluntary (Theodoret, H. E. iv. 1). The demand made of Anastasius (A.D. 491) by the patriarch of Constantinople, Euphemius, that as the price of the episcopal sanction to his election to the imperial dignity, he would sign a document declaring his adhesion to the orthodox faith, was quite exceptional (Evagr. H. E. iii. 32; Theod. Lect. iii.), while the profession of orthodoxy required by Cyriac of Phocas A.D. 602, and unhesitatingly given by that base and sanguinary usurper to purchase the patriarch's recognition, can scarcely be pressed into a precedent. In the Gothic kingdom of Spain an oath that he would defend the Catholic faith, and preserve the realm from the contamination of Jewish unbelievers, was very early exacted of the sovereign. Such a pledge is declared essential in the Acts of the 6th Council of Toledo, A.D. 636 (act iii. Labbe, Concil. v. p. 1743), and in the later councils held at the same place. It is expressly declared of Wamba A.D. 673 that before the ceremony of unction and after the assumption of the royal attire, "regio jam cultu conspicuus ante altare divinum consistens ex more fidem populis reddidit" (Jul. Tolet. § 4). The oath of King Egica is given in the Acts of the 15th Council of Toledo A.D. 688. No such oath or profession of faith appears in the form of coronation in the Pontificale of Egbert. We are unable to state when it was introduced into the ritual of the Eastern empire. But according to Georgius Codinus (cap. xvii. §§ 1-7), the newly recognized emperor had to give a written profession of faith before his coronation, to be publicly read in St. Sophia's.

(e) Leontius (Vita Sancti Joan. Alex. Episc. c. 17) mentions a remarkable custom prevailing in the coronations of the Eastern empire in the 6th century as an admonition of the transitoriness of all earthly greatness. After his coronation the architects of the imperial monuments approached the emperor and presented specimens of four or five marbles of different colours, with the inquiry which he would choose for the construction of his own monument. The analogous ceremony described by Peter Damianus (Litt. lib. i. 17), though belonging to a later period, may be mentioned here. The emperor having taken his seat on his throne, with his diadem on his head and his sceptre in his hand, and his nobles standing around, was approached by a man carrying a box full of dead men's bones and dust in one hand, and in the other a wisp of flax which—as in the papal enthronization—was lighted and burnt before his eyes.

(f) This article may be fittingly closed by an epitome of the ritual prescribed in the Pontificale of Egbert, A.D. 732-767, already repeatedly referred to as the earliest extant form of coronation.

The title of this coronation service is "Missa pro regibus in die Benedictionis ejus." It commences with the Antiphon "Justus es Domine, &c." (Ps. cxix. 137), and the Psalm "Beati immaculati" (Ps. cxix. 1). Then succeeds a Lesson from Leviticus, "Haec dicit Dominus" (Lev. xxvi. 8-9); the gradual, "Salvum fac, &c." and the verse, "Auribus percipe" and "Alleluia," the Psalm "Magnus Dominus" (Ps. xlviii.), or "Domine in virtute" (Ps. xxi.), and a sequence from St. Matthew, "In illo tempore" (Matt. xxii. 15). Then follows the "Benedi. io super regem noviter electum," and three collects, "Te invocamus Domine sancte," "Deus qui populis tuis" (both of which are found in the Liber Regalis), and "In diebus ejus oriatur omnibus aequitas." The unction follows, according to the form already given. After the collect, "Deus electorum fortitudo," succeeds the delivery of the sceptre. The rubric is, "Hic omnes pontifices cum principibus dant ei sceptrum in manu." Fifteen Preces follow. After this there is the delivery of the staff ("Hic datur ei baculum in manu sua"), with the prayer, "Omnipotens det tibi Deus de rore coeli," &c., and imposition of the crown (the rubric is, "Hic omnes pontifices sumunt galenum et ponant super caput ipsius"), with the prayer, "Benedic Domine fortitudinem regis principis, &c." This is succeeded by the recognition of the people, and the kiss. The rubric runs, "Et dicat omnis populus tribus vicibus cum episcopis et presbyteris Vivat rex N. in sempiternum. Tunc confirmabitur cum benedictione omnis populus" (Leofric Missal, "omni populo in solio regni") "et osculandum principem in sempiternum dicit. Amen, Amen, Amen." The seventh "oratio" is said over the king, and the mass follows, with appropriate Offertory, Preface, &c. The whole terminates with the three royal precepts, to preserve the peace of the Church, to restrain all rapacity and injustice, and to maintain justice and mercy in all judicial proceedings.

CORPORAL (Corporale, Palla Corporalis, Palla Dominica). The cloth on which the elements are consecrated in the Eucharist.

It is probable from the nature of the case that from the most ancient times the table on which the Lord's Supper was celebrated was covered with a cloth. [See ALTAR-CLOTH.] In process of time, the cloth which ordinarily covered the table was itself covered, when the sacred elements were to be consecrated, by another cloth called a Corporal. The Liber Pontificalis (p. 105, ed. Muratori) asserts that Pope Sylvester († 335) decreed that the sacrifice of the altar should be consecrated not on silk or on any kind of dyed cloth, but only on pure white linen, as the Lord's Body was buried in linen. The decrees of popes of that age lie, as is well known, under a good deal of suspicion; but at a somewhat later date Isidore of Pelusium (Epist. i. 123) lays down precisely the same rule as that attributed to Sylvester. Germanus of Paris (Expositio Brevis, p. 93, Migne) also lays down that the corporal must be of linen, for the same reason as that alleged by the preceding authorities, and adds that it should be woven throughout, like the seamless coat of the Lord. Regino (De Discip. Eccl. c. 118) quotes a council of Rheims to the following effect. The corporal on which the immolation is made must be of the finest and purest linen, without admixture of any other material whatever. It must not remain on the altar except in time of mass, but must either be placed in the sacramentary or shut up with the chalice and paten in a place kept delicately clean. When it is washed, it must first be rinsed in the church itself, and in a vessel kept for the purpose by a priest, deacon, or subdeacon.

The corporal appears anciently to have covered the whole surface of the altar. Hence, according to the Ordo Romanus II. c. 9, it required the services of two deacons to spread and refold it. So the Ordo Rom. I. c. 11. It was necessary, in fact, that it should be sufficiently large to admit of the bread for a great number of communicants being placed upon it, and to allow a portion to be turned up so as to cover the elements. But when, about the 11th century, it ceased to be usual for the people to communicate, and the bread came to be made in the wafer form, the corporal was made smaller, and a separate cloth or covering was placed over the chalice (Innocent III. De Myst. Missae, ii. 56). This was often stiffened with rich material. Many churches, however, especially those of the Carthusians, retained the more ancient use of the corporal even in modern times, as we are informed by De Mauleon in his Iter Liturg. pp. 57, 60, 200, 268. (Krazer, De Liturgiis, pp. 175 ff.)

CORPORAL PUNISHMENT. Corporal punishment in almost every form was evidently allowed by the lex talionis of the Pentateuch: "Eye for eye, tooth for tooth, hand for hand, foot for foot, burning for burning, wound for wound, stripe for stripe" (Exod. xxi. 24, 25). It was also allowed to be used by the master upon his slave to an almost unlimited extent; if indeed he smote his servant or his maid with a rod, and they died under his hand, he was to be punished, but not if they "continued a day or two" (ib. 20, 21); the slave, however, obtaining his freedom if his master blinded him of an eye, or knocked a tooth out (vv. 26, 27). The judicial bastinado (i. e. for a freeman) was not to exceed 40 stripes, lest "thy brother should seem vile unto thee" (Deut. xxv. 3). That the use of personal chastisement remained prevalent, is evident from the whole of the Old Testament, and especially from the Book of Proverbs; though it is somewhat difficult to see by whose hand the "rod" or "stripes" which Solomon so zealously eulogises as the due reward of fools could well be applied. Not less zealously, it is well known, does he inculcate the use of them for the instruction of children.

It seems hardly necessary to point out how much milder is the tone of the New Testament in these respects. Fathers were not to "provoke their children to wrath" (Eph. vi. 4, and see Col. iii. 21); masters were to "forbear threatening" with their slaves (Eph. vi. 9). At the same time the judicial use of corporal punishment is frequently mentioned, and only indirectly censured when in violation of an established privilege. By the old Roman law indeed a citizen could only be beaten with a vine-branch, not with rods (fustes) or with the scourge (flagellum), which privilege was extended by Caius Gracchus to the Latins; hence St. Paul's twice-recorded protest (Acts xvi. 37; xxii. 25) against being "beaten" or "scourged," being "a Roman." It is certain however that in the Roman army a terrible punishment existed, called festuarius, beginning with a stroke of the centurion's vine-branch (the symbol of his authority), and seldom ending but with death. And as the status of the freeman became gradually lowered, it is clear that the use of the rod became more prevalent, till we find the jurists of the period extending from Severus to the Gordians, such as Callistratus and Macer (end of the 2nd to nearly middle of the 3rd century), speaking of the fustes as the punishment of the free, in cases where the slave would be flogged with the flagellum, or terming the application of the former a mere "admonition," but that of the latter a castigation (Dig. bk. xlviii. t. xix. ll. 10, 7).

A constitution of Severus and Antonine forbade the chastising with the fustes either decemvirs or their sons (Code, bk. ii. tit. xii. l. 5. A.D. 199); The ignominy, however, arose from the sentence, if for an offence deserving by law such punishment, not from the mere act; e. g. if inflicted by way of torture, before sentence, it did not dishonour (Dig. bk. iii. t. ii. l. 22; Code, bk. ii. t. xii. l. 14; law of Gordian, A.D. 239); though the torturing of decemvirs under any circumstances was eventually forbidden (bk. x. t. xxxi. l. 33; Const. of Gratian, Valentinian, and Theodosius, A.D. 381). But a man was infamous after being whipped and told by the praeco, "Thou hast calumniated" (bk. ii. l. 16, A.D. 241). An extract from the jurist Callistratus in the Digest (bk. i. t. ii. l. 12) brings out in a striking way the conflict between the old civic pride of Rome and the debasement of municipal government during her decay. Traders, he says, though liable to be flogged by the aediles, are not to be set aside as vile. They are not forbidden to solicit the decurionate or other honours in the city of their birthplace. But it does not seem to him honourable to admit to the decurion order persons who have been subject to such chastisement, especially in those cities which have an abundance of honourable men, for it is the paucity of those who should fulfil municipal offices which necessarily invites such persons, if wealthy, to municipal honours. And the 45th Novel, whilst subjecting Jews, Samaritans, and heretics, to all the charges of the decurionate, deprived them of its privileges, "as that of not being scourged."

It will thus be seen that during the five centuries which separate Justinian from St. Paul, the idea of corporal punishment under its most usual forms as a social degradation subsisted, yet the liability to it had been greatly extended. The equality before the law which might have been reached through the extension of Roman citizenship itself had been by no means attained, but the character of that citizenship itself had become debased, and the exemption from corporal punishment which still fluttered, like a last rag of the toga, on the shoulders of the civic officers, had been already blown off for some. There were decurions who had been flogged, and decurions who could be flogged. Such exemption was indeed growing to be a privilege attached to the mere possession of wealth. Thus delation if proved false, or where the delator did not persevere, should he be of mean fortune, which he did not care to lose, was to be punished with the sharpest flogging (gravisimis verberibus, Code, bk. x. t. xi. l. 7; law of Gratian, Valentinian and Theodosius, end of 4th century).

Among the offences which entailed corporal punishment, besides the one last mentioned, may be named false witness (Code, bk. iv. t. xx. l. 13, constitution of Zeno, end of 5th century). The use of it multiplied indeed as the character of the people became lowered, and the Novels are comparatively full of it. The 8th enacts flogging and torture against the taking of money by judges (c. 8); the 123rd punishes with "bodily torments" those persons, especially stage-players and harlots, who should assume the monastic dress, or imitate or make a mock of Church usages (c. 44); the 134th enacts corporal punishment against those who detained debtors' children as responsible for their father's debt (c. 7), or who abetted illegal divorces (c. 11), and requires the adulterous wife to be scourged to the quick—so we must probably understand the words "competentibus vulneribus subactam" (c. 10; and see c. 12). On the other hand, a husband chastising his wife with either the fustes or flagellum, otherwise than for conduct for which he might lawfully divorce her, was by the 117th Novel made liable to pay to her, during coverture, the amount of 1-3rd of the ante-nuptial gift (c. 14). The last chapter of the 134th Novel indeed (De poenarum omnium moderatione, c. 13) professes to inculcate moderation in punishment, and enacts that from henceforth there shall be no other penal mutilation than the cutting off of one hand, and that thieves shall only be flogged. Already under Constantine it had been enacted (Code, bk. ix. t. xlvii. l. 17, A.D. 315) that branding should not be in the face, as figuring "the heavenly beauty,"—a law in which the influence of Christian feeling upon the first Christian emperor is strikingly displayed.

Passing from the legislation of the East to that of the West, we find on the whole a very similar course of things. Among the ancient Germans, according to the account of Tacitus, corporal punishment was rare. He notes as a singularity that in war none but the priest was allowed to punish, bind, or even strike (ne verberare quidem) a soldier (De Mor. Germ. c. vii.). A husband might indeed flog his adulterous wife naked through the streets (c. xix.); but otherwise even slaves were rarely beaten (c. xiv.).

In the barbaric codes, corporal punishment is in like manner primarily a social degradation. We find it inflicted on a slave, as an alternative for compensation. Under the Salic law, a slave stealing to the value of 2 denarii was to receive 120 blows (ictus) or to pay three solidi (Pactus vulgus. antiq. t. xiii.), the solidus being equivalent to 40 denarii. The same punishment was inflicted on a slave committing adultery with a slave-girl (rape indeed seems meant) where she did not die of it (t. xxix.). Where a slave was accused of theft, corporal punishment was applied by way of torture. Stretched on a bench (super scamnum tensus) as the really older but so-called recentior text has it, he received 120 blows (ictus, or as the other text has it, 121 colaphos). If he confessed under torture, as already mentioned under the head "Mutilation of the Body," the penalty was castration if a male, but for a woman 240 strokes with a scourge, or 6 solidi. A Constitution of King Childebert (middle of 6th century), contained in Labbé and Mansi's Concilia, enacts in certain cases of sacrilege that a "servile person" shall receive 100 lashes. Under the Burgundian law (in force from the beginning of the 6th until at least 813, when it was still recognised) bodily punishment without the option of composition was enacted for the slave, where the freeman might compound. Thus for the theft of a hog, sheep, goat, or of bees, the slave received 300 strokes with the rod, and fustigation is in the like manner enacted for other offences by slaves (t. v. &c.). A Lombard law of A.D. 724 (bk. vi. c. 88) has a singular enactment, punishing with shaving and whipping those women whom their husbands send out upon men of small courage (super homines qui minorem habebant virtutem), a text which gives a high idea of the vigour of Lombard women.

The Wisigothic laws exhibit to us before any others the breaking down of the previous freeman's privilege (analogous to that of the Roman citizen) of exemption from corporal punishment. The corrupt or unjust judge, if unable to make due restitution and amends was to receive 50 strokes with the scourge publicly (publice extensus, Bk. ii. c. 20). The use (or abuse) of corporal punishment is indeed most conspicuous in this code. If a free woman married or committed adultery with her own slave or freedman, the punishment was death, after the public flagellation of both (bk. iii. t. ii. l. 2). If she committed adultery with another's slave, each was to receive 100 lashes (l. 3). A ravisher being a freeman, besides being handed over as a slave to the ravished, was to receive 200 lashes in the sight of all (bk. iii. t. iii. l. 1). The brother who forced a sister to marry against her will was to receive 50 lashes (ibid. l. 4). The slave ravishing a freewoman received 300 lashes, with decalvation, i.e. according to the meaning of the word at this period, scalping; 200 and decalvation for ravishing a slave-woman. Accessories to rape, if free, 50 lashes, if slaves, 100 (ll. 8-12). So again for the various grades of adultery. A freeman committing adultery with a goodly (idonea) slave-girl in her master's house was to receive 100 strokes without infamy (apparently inflicted in private, and with a stick only),—if with an inferior one, 50 only; a slave receiving for the like offence 150 lashes, and the punishment increasing if violence were used (t. iv. ll. 14-16). By a law of Recared (d. 17), public flogging was also made the punishment for prostitution, with some remarkable provisions; thus when practised by a freewoman with the knowledge or for the benefit of her parents, each was to receive 100 lashes; and when by a slave for her master's benefit, he was to receive the same number of lashes as were to be given to her, and 50 in any case where after being flogged and "decalvated" she returned to the streets. And 100 lashes awaited the woman, religious or secular, who either married or committed adultery with a priest (l. 18, also of Recared). By a law of Chindasuinth (t. vi. l. 2) a husband remarrying after divorce was to receive 200 lashes publicly, with decalvation. Another law of the same king (bk. iv. t. v.) enacted 50 lashes against a child striking a parent or in various other ways misbehaving against him. Flogging, with or without decalvation is again the punishment for consulting a soothsayer on the health of a man (bk. vi. t. ii. l. 1),—that of sorcerers, storm-raisers, invokers of and sacrificers to demons and those who consult them (l. 3); of judges or others who consult diviners or apply themselves to auguries (l. 5); of slave-women and slaves causing abortion (t. iii. ll. 1, 5, 6); generally for wounds and personal injuries by slaves, and to some extent by freemen (t. iv.); for thefts, either of goods or slaves (bk. vii. t. ii. l. iii.), with again the remarkable provisions that if a master stole with his slave, or the slave by his master's order, the master was to receive 100 lashes (besides compounding), the slave to be exempt from punishment (t. ii. l. 5, t. iii. l. 5); for certain forgeries (t. v. l. 2); for gathering a crowd to commit murder (bk. viii. t. i. l. 3); for violently shutting up a person within his house (l. 4); for soliciting others to rob or robbing on the line of march, the offence in the two latter cases being however for freemen alternative with composition (ll. 6, 9, 10, 11); for setting fire to woods (t. ii. l. 2); in the case of persons of inferior condition, for destroying crops (t. iii. l. 6), sending animals into crops or vines (l. 10); also for breaking mills or dams and leaving them unrepaired for 30 days (l. 30), &c. &c. Nowhere however is the abuse of corporal punishment more terrible than in the case of offences against religion. Blasphemers of the Trinity, Jews withdrawing themselves, their children or servants from baptism, celebrating the Passover, observing the Sabbath or other festivals of their creed, working on the Lord's day and on Christian feast days, making distinctions of meats, marrying within the 6th degree, reading Jewish books against the faith, &c., were to receive 100 lashes with decalvation, and with or without exile and slavery (bk. xii. t. iii. ll. 2, 8, 11). For marrying without priestly benediction, or in anywise exceeding the law as to dowry, the Jewish husband, his wife and her parents, were to receive 100 lashes, or compound with 100 solidi. A law of Recared confirming the Council of Toledo punished with 50 blows (without infamy) any person who disobeyed the enactments of the Council and had no money to lose (t. i. l. 3).

In the ferocity of punishment under this Code, we must not however lose sight of the fact already pointed out elsewhere in these pages [BODY, MUTILATION OF THE], that the enactment of any fixed punishment constitutes an enormous step in advance on the mere composition of the earlier barbaric Codes, whilst in various of the enactments, such as those exempting slaves from punishment where they only act as the tools of their masters, we find a striving towards a higher and more discriminating standard of justice than that which measures other contemporary legislation, which equally bears testimony to the influence of the clergy on Wisigothic legislation—an influence, indeed, of which we see the darker side in the atrocious laws against the Jews.

Amongst our Anglo-Saxon forefathers, corporal punishment seems in general to have been confined to slaves, as an alternative for compensation, wherewith the slave "redeemed" or "paid the price of his skin," as it is expressed; e.g. for sacrificing to devils (laws of Wihtræd, Kent, A.D. 691-725), for working on Sundays (laws of Ina, A.D. 688-728, iii.). In certain cases of theft the accuser himself was allowed to flog the culprit (xxviii.). A foreigner or stranger wandering out of the way through the woods, who neither shouted nor blew the horn, was to be deemed a thief, and to be flogged or redeem himself (xviii.).

Capital punishment is again prominent in the Capitularies. The first Capitulary of Carloman, A.D. 742 (c. 6), imposes two years' imprisonment on a fornicating priest, after he has been scourged to the quick (flagellatus et scorticatus). The Capitulary of Metz, 755, following a synod held at the same place, enacts that for incest a slave or freedman shall be beaten with many stripes, as also any "minor" cleric guilty of the like offence. The same enactment, confined to the case of marrying a cousin, and in slightly different language, occurs elsewhere in the general collection. A savage one on conspiracies (A.D. 805, c. 10) is added to the Salic law, enacting that where conspiracies have been made with an oath—the principals suffering death—the accessories are to flog each other and cut each other's noses off; even if no mischief shall have been done, to shave and flog each other. For conspiracies, without an oath, the slave only was to be flogged, the freeman clearing himself by oath or compounding. The same law occurs in the General Capitularies (bk. iii. 9). Another law of the 7th book (c. 123) enacts public flagellation and decalvation for the slave marrying within the 7th degree of consanguinity, and the 4th Addition embodies much of the rigorous Wisigothic Code as towards the Jews, who are to be decalvated and receive 100 lashes publicly if they marry within the prohibited degrees (c. 2). And the Wisigothic provision against marrying without priestly benedictions, or exceeding in anywise the laws as to dowry, is by this extended to Jews as well as Christians.

There remains only to shew corporal punishment as either the subject or as forming part of the discipline of the church itself. Here, indeed, we find at first a much higher standard than that of the civil law. Among the persons whose offerings the Apostolic Constitutions require to be rejected are such as "use their slaves wickedly, with stripes, or hunger, or hard service" (bk. iv. c. 8). Soon however a harsher law must have prevailed. The Council of Elberis, A.D. 305, enacted (c. 5) that if a mistress, inflamed by jealousy, should so flog her handmaid that she should die within three days, she is only to be admitted to communion after seven years' penance (unless in case of dangerous illness) if the act were done wilfully, or after five if death were not intended—a provision which speaks volumes indeed of the bitterness of Spanish slavery at this period, but which nevertheless shews the church taking cognizance of the slave-owner's excesses, and endeavouring to moderate them by its discipline, at least in the case of women. On the other hand, the right of personal chastisement was often arrogated by the clergy themselves, since the Apostolic Canons enact that a bishop, priest, or deacon, striking the faithful who have sinned, or the unfaithful who have done wrong, seeking thereby to make himself feared, is to be deposed (c. 19, otherwise 26 or 28), and Augustine clearly testifies to the fact of corporal punishment being judicially inflicted by bishops, in that painful letter of his to the Prefect Marcellus, in which, whilst exhorting him not to be too severe in punishing the Donatists, he praises him at the same time for having drawn out the confession of crimes so great by whipping with rods (virgarum verberibus), inasmuch as this "mode of coercion is wont to be applied by the masters of liberal arts, by parents themselves, and often even by bishops in their judgments" (Ep. 133, otherwise 159).

Corporal punishment seems moreover to have formed from an early period, if not from the first, a part of the monastic discipline. The rule of St. Pachomius, translated into Latin by Jerome (art. 87), imposes the penalty of thirty-nine lashes, to be inflicted before the gates of the monastery (besides fasting), after three warnings, on a monk who persists in the "most evil custom" of talking, as well as for theft (art. 121). The same punishment may also be implied in the term "corripere" used in other articles, as "corripientur juxta ordinem," "corripientur ordine monasterii," &c. But the word might also apply to mere verbal correction, since by art. 37 children who could not be brought to think of God's judgment "et correpti verbo non emendaverint," are to be flogged till they receive instruction and fear. In the 4th book of Cassian's work, 'De coenobiorum institutis' (end of 4th or beginning of 5th century), flogging is placed on the same line with expulsion as a punishment for the graver offences against monastic discipline (some of which indeed may appear to us very slight), as "open reproaches, manifest acts of contempt, swelling words of contradiction, a free and unrestrained gait, familiarity with women, anger, fightings, rivalries, quarrels, the presumption to do some special work, the contagion of money loving, the affecting and possessing of things superfluous, which other brethren have not, extraordinary and furtive refectations, and the like" (c. 16). In the rule of St. Benedict (A.D. 528) corporal punishment seems implied in the "major emendatio." And "if a brother for any the slightest cause is corrected (corripitur) in any way by the abbot or any prior, or if he lightly feel that the mind of any prior is wrought or moved against him, however moderately, without delay let him lie prostrate on the earth at his feet, doing satisfaction until that emotion be healed. But if any scorn to do this, let him be either subjected to corporal punishment, or if contumacious, expelled from the monastery" (c. 71). Here, it will be seen, corporal punishment is viewed as a lighter penalty than expulsion.

We need not dwell on a supposed Canon of the above-referred to Council of Elberis, to be found in Gratian and others (ex cap. ix.), allowing bishops and their ministers to scourge coloni with rods for their crimes. But in the letters of Gregory I. the Great, 590–603, the right of inflicting, or at least ordering personal chastisement is evidently assumed to belong to the clergy. In a letter to Pantaleo the Notary (bk. ii. Pt. ii. Ep. 40), on the subject of a deacon's daughter who had been seduced by a bishop's nephew, he required either that the offender should marry her, executing the due nuptial instruments, or be "corporally chastised" and put to penance in a monastery, and the Pope renews this injunction in a letter (42) to the uncle, Bishop Felix, himself. Bishop Andreas of Tarentum, who had had a woman on the roll of the church (de matriculis) cruelly whipped with rods, against the order of the priesthood, so that she died after eight months, was nevertheless only punished by this really great Pope with two months' suspension from saying mass (ep. 44, 45). Sometimes, indeed, corporal punishment was inflicted actually in the church, as we see in another letter of the same Pope to the Bishop of Constantinople, complaining that an Isaurian monk and priest had been thus beaten with rods, "a new and unheard of mode of preaching" (ep. 52). But the same Gregory deemed it fitting that slaves, guilty of idolatry or following sorcerers, should be chastised with stripes and tortures for their amendment (bk. vi. pt. ii. ep. 67, to Januarius, Bishop of Calari). Elsewhere the flogging of penitent thieves seems to be implied (bk. xii. ep. 31, c. iv.).

Towards the end of the same century, the 16th Council of Toledo, A.D. 683, enacted that 100 lashes and shameful decalectio should be the punishment of unnatural offences. With this and a few other exceptions, however, the enactments of the church as to corporal punishment chiefly refer to clerics or monks. The Council of Vannes in 485 had indeed already enacted that a cleric proved to have been drunk should either be kept thirty days out of communion, or subjected to corporal punishment (c. 13). The 1st Council of Orleans in 511 had enacted that if the relict of a priest or deacon were to marry again, she and her husband were after "castigation" to be separated, or excommunicated if they persisted in living together (c. 3). Towards the end of the 7th century, the Council of Autun (about 670), enacted that any monk who went against its decrees should either be beaten with rods, or suspended for three years from communion (c. 15). In the next century, Gregory III. (731–41), in his Excerpt from the Fathers and the Canons, assigns stripes as the punishment for thefts of holy things, and inserts the Canon of the Council of Eliberis as to the penance of a mistress flogging her slave girl to death (cc. 2, 3). The Synod of Metz, 753, in a canon already quoted in part above as a capitulary, enacted that a slave or freedman without money, committing incest with a consecrated woman, a gossip, a cousin, was to be beaten with many stripes, and that clerics committing the like offence, if minor ones, were to be beaten or imprisoned (c. i.). We might, indeed, refer the reader under this head to all that is said above as to the Capitularies, the civil and ecclesiastical legislation of this period being almost absolutely undistinguishable.

The practice of the church on this subject was therefore in the main accordant with civil legislation, which it seems nevertheless to have humanised to some degree in favour of the slave. On the other hand, the mischiefs of clerical influence show fearfully in the enactments of the Wisigothic law against the Jews and others, and in the Carolingian legislation on the subject of marriage within the prohibited degrees.

COUNCIL [Concilium, as early as Tertull. De Jejun. xiii., De Pudic. x., and ἄνωδος (= "assembly," in LXX., and in the translation of Symmachus), in Apost. Canons, xxvi. al. xxxvii. (and again in Euseb. H. E. v. 23, &c.), but the latter term still used also at the same period for any Christian assembly, e.g. Apost. Constit. v. 20: in late mediæval times, Lyndwood (Provinc. II. tit. vii. p. 115) appropriates "council" to provincial, and "synod" to diocesan assemblies—"episcopi in suis diocesisibus faciunt synodos, metropolitani vero concilia":—Conciliabulum appropriated to the "conventicula hæreticorum," as early as Conc. Carth. IV. c. 70, A.D. 398, and so also Ψευδο-σύνδος, and Ψευδο-σύλλογος, in the Theodos. Code:] = an assembly of either a part or (as far as possible) the whole of the Christian Church, for either elective, judicial, or legislative purposes, or else to elicit the testimony of the collective Church upon emergent doctrinal questions,—suggested by Apostolic precedent, and by obvious reason, and grounding itself also (as time went on) upon the promise of our Lord to be present where any are gathered together in His name (e.g. Conc. Chalced., Epist. ad Leon., A.D. 451; Conc. Constantin. Act. xvii. A.D. 681; Conc. Tolet. III. A.D. 527; Facund. Herm., Def. Trium Capitul. c. vii.; &c.), and upon His injunction to "tell the Church."

Such councils are usually classified somewhat as follows—in an order which also tallies with the chronological order in which each class came to exist:—

1. A council of a single "parochia," or (in the modern sense) diocese, consisting of the bishop and presbyters, but with the deacons and people assisting; which will be here called DIOCESAN (called also Episcopal, and in later [Frank] times, Civile = of one city or see). Of such synods there is no distinct mention until the 3rd century, but it is obvious that, either in a formal or an informal way, they must have been part of the ordinary organization of the Church, at a time when each diocese consisted of the Christians of a single city in which bishop and clergy dwelt, with a few country congregations only, gradually growing up,—i. e. from the very beginning; and that they would be recognized in canons, only when the extent of dioceses, and other like causes, rendered canons on the subject necessary.

2. A council of the bishops of several dioceses, i. e. a PROVINCIAL Council, held (when metropolitan organization came to exist) under the metropolitan of the province, viz. from about the latter half of the 2nd century, and from that time considered a "perfect" (τελεία) synod of the kind, only if the metropolitan were present (ἢ συμπρέσβυτι καὶ ὁ τῆς μητροπόλεως, Conc. Antioch. A.D. 341, can. 18, and, much later, Conc. Bracar. II. A.D. 572, can. 9). And such councils were (with the diocesan synods) the essential framework, as it were, and bond of union and of good government in the Church; and became part of its ordinary machinery early in the 2nd century, and probably from the very beginning, but are first mentioned, of the East, by Firmilianus of Caesarea in Cappadocia (Epist. 75 ad Cyprian. earlier half of 3rd century), when they regularly and of necessity ("necessario") recurred in Asia once a year, for purposes of discipline, and of the West, by St. Cyprian, at the same period. The "Councils of the Churches," however, are mentioned by Tertullian (De Pudic. x.) as if in his time an ordinary church tribunal, which determined among other things against the canonicity of the Shepherd of Hermas.

3. A council of the bishops of a patriarchate, or primacy, or exarchate, i. e. of a diocese in the ancient sense of the term; as, e.g. a council τῆς Ἀνατολικῆς διοικήσεως ordained Flavian of Antioch, Conc. Constant., ap. Theodor. H. E. v. 9; called (as by St. Augustin, De Bapt. c. Donat. i. 7, ii. 3) "REGIONAL," or national, or again PLENARIUM, and UNIVERSALE (e.g. Conc. Tolet. III. A.D. 527, c. 18), and in Africa in the 4th century UNIVERSALE ANNIVERSARIUM (e.g. in Conc. Carth. III. c. 7); and by Pope Symmachus, speaking of a Roman Council of the kind, GENERALE. And under this head may be reckoned also:—i. The early councils, assembled incidentally and upon emergencies, and consisting of as many bishops of neighbouring provinces gathered together as circumstances allowed, such as those which Tertullian mentions: "Aguntur praecepta per Graecias illas certis in locis concilia ex universis ecclesiis," &c., De Jejun. xiii. (implying that hitherto there had been no councils of the kind in the West); or again, the councils in Asia Minor and at Anchialus, against the Montanists, in the middle of the 2nd century (Hefele), mentioned by Eusebius, H. E. v. 16; or the various councils respecting Easter in both East and West in the latter part of the same century (Euseb. H. E. v. 24); which are the earliest councils upon record. ii. The councils of the Eastern rich by itself, or of the Western Church by itself, as in the 4th century. And both these were extraordinary, and for particular agencies. iii. The regular annual primate councils (see Conc. Constantin. A.D. 381, can. 3), e.g. of Antioch, or more remarkably, of Carthage: the latter of which, acc. to Conc. Carthag. III. A.D. 398, cans. 2, 7, 41, 43, was composed of three bishops as legates from each province, except that of Tripoli, which to send only one, as having few bishops, admitting the principle of representation or pressure of circumstances; while subsequent councils permitted a "vicar" instead of bishop in person in case of absolute necessity (see Conc. Carthag. IV. can. 21), and enacted a division of the bishops into "duo vel tres turmae," i.e. "turma" to attend in turn (Conc. Carthag. V. 10); and, lastly, altered the "yearly" meeting into one only "quoties exegerit causa communis" (Conc. Milevit. II. A.D. 416, can. 9, . Can. Afric. xcv.). Like councils were (less regularly) held at Rome in the 5th century, as when three delegates from the Sicilian bishops were directed by Pope Leo the Great (Epist. iv. 1) to attend the autumnal synod of the two to be annually held at Rome. And occasionally where also, as in Spain and in Gaul. National councils, in later times (8th century onwards), in France, in Saxon England, and above all Spain, belong, where they were purely ecclesiastical, to the same class.

A council of (as far as possible) the bishops of the whole Church, OECUMENICAL (first so called in Euseb. V. Constantin. iii. 8, and again in c. Constantin. A.D. 381), not intentionally limited to specially the Roman world, but including all Christians everywhere, although at that period the Christian Church was nearly limited in the narrower meaning:—"totius orbis."

Aug. De Bapt. c. Donat. i. 7), "ex toto orbe" (lp. Sev. ii.), "plenarium universae ecclesiae."

Aug. Epist. 162), "plenarium ex universo orbe romano," as distinguished from (not only provincial) but "regionum concilia" (ld. Bapt. c. Donat. ii. 3). So Tertullian (as above) speaks of "representatio totius Christiani mundi." And Augustine (De Bapt. c. Donat. 53) distinguishes "regionale" from "plenarium concilium," and rests the certainty of the error on the "universalis ecclesiae consensio."

And this was regarded as an extraordinary remedy for an extraordinary emergency, to be resorted to as seldom as possible; and even when necessary, yet an evil for the time, as throwing everything into disturbance,—as bad as a tempest in the ocean. St. Hilar. De Synodis. And as it was first possible, so does it appear to have been first thought of, in the time of Constantine the Great.

So these must be added, as matter of history, though all more or less abnormal:—

i. The Σύνοδοι Ἐνδημούσαι, at Constantinople, in the 4th century, and again at the various places where the Roman emperors dwelt, as at Constantinople, and in one case (under Maximus) at Treves, again the Concilia Palatina under the Carolingian emperors, held "in regum palatium," consisting in each case of the bishops who happened to be at court.

ii. The mixed national councils of the European kingdoms, after the conversion of the

Franks, Saxons, Spaniards, &c.; Placita, Witenagemots, &c.

The so-called Council of the Apostles (in Acts xv.) is a distinct precedent, in principle, for Church councils; as sanctioning the decision of emergent controversies and matters of discipline by common consultation of the whole Church under the guidance and leadership of the "apostles and elders,"= the bishops and presbyters. It is "the apostles and elders" who come together to consider the matter (Acts xv. 6). Yet πάντες ὅλοι are present (ib. 12), but as listening. It is "the apostles and elders, with the whole Church," who make the decree (ib. 22). And the best MSS. make that decree run in the name of "the apostles and elders" only, although the reading is no doubt uncertain (ib. 23, reading of ἀπόστολοι καὶ οἱ πρεσβύτεροι ἀδελφοί). The formal deliberation and the decree, then, emanate from the apostles and the elders, but the whole Church, i.e. the laity also, are consulted. In the same way, in other cases, we find, e.g. the "prophets and teachers" at Antioch sending St. Paul and Barnabas on their mission; yet St. Paul and Barnabas report (ἀναγγελλάν) to an "assembly of the Church" of Antioch what "God had done with them" (Acts xiii. 1, xiv. 27); St. Paul however at a later time reporting privately, for obvious reasons, to James and the elders (ib. xxi. 18). And the same two were formally sent to the council at Jerusalem by the Church of Antioch (προπεμφθέντες ἐκ τῆς ἐκκλησίας), which plainly had also appointed them (ἔρασαν, Acts xv. 2, 3). In 1 Cor. v. 4, the Church of Corinth is represented as "gathered together" to exercise discipline. That St. James presided at Jerusalem naturally followed from his office of Bishop of Jerusalem. Strictly speaking, the assembly over which he presided was an assembly of the Church of Jerusalem only, to receive a deputation from the Church of Antioch. And it differed from the Church councils also in the actual presence in it of apostles. But this difference only strengthens the case as a precedent for mutual deliberation on the part of the Church collectively: ἄλλοις ἡμῶν γενομένης δημοθυμαδόν (Acts xv. 25). Other assemblies in apostolical times, mentioned in the Acts—viz. Acts i. 15, to appoint an apostle in the place of Judas; vi. 2, to establish the diaconate; ix. 27, to receive St. Paul—have been misnamed Apostolic Councils, by an obvious straining of the term.

It will be convenient to speak, successively, of—

A. The ORDER of holding Ecclesiastical Councils;

B. The CONSTITUENT MEMBERS of Ecclesiastical Councils;

C. The AUTHORITY assigned to such Councils. And, lastly, to add a few words respecting

D. IRREGULAR and abnormal assemblies akin to Councils.

A. Under the head of the ORDER of holding a council, we have to consider,—

1. By whom councils were summoned.

Diocesan and Provincial Councils were summoned respectively by the bishop of the diocese and by the metropolitan of the province (see authorities in Bingham), and this after the time of Constantine, as well as before it. A council of two or more provinces together would naturally be summoned by the senior metropolitan; the earlier councils of neighbouring bishops, prior to the organization of the metropolitan system, by the leading bishops of the locality, as, e.g. that at Antioch, which condemned Paul of Samosata; those of a patriarchate or primacy, as e.g. of Africa, by the patriarch or primate. The συνεδοὶ ἐκκλησιαστικαὶ of Constantinople were summoned by the Patriarch of Constantinople; the Concilia Palatina by the Frank kings and emperors; the national councils of the European kingdoms, which were as much civil as ecclesiastical, by the respective kings. And in these last-named cases the royal permission or command to hold them is frequently mentioned. Oecumenical Councils, consisting in the first instance almost wholly of bishops of the Roman empire, were summoned by the Roman emperors until the 9th century (see Socrates, lib. v. Prooem.), although, naturally, upon consultation with the chief bishops of the Church herself. After that period, those that have been so called have been summoned by the popes in the Western Church. The great Council of Nice was summoned by Constantine (by τυραννικὰ ὑπαγύματα [Euseb., V. Constant. iii. 6, and cf. Socrat. i. 9, Theodoret, i. 9], which purport to be given in a Syriac version in B. H. Cowper's Analecta Nicaena, pp. 21-29), but "ex sententia sacerdotum" (Rufin, H. E. i. 1); and chiefly, as is plain, by the accounts of Eusebius, Socrates, and Sozomen, upon the advice of Hosius, bishop of Cordova. Later documents, of no value in such a point, viz. the Liber Damasi and the Conc. Constantin. A.D. 680, put forward Pope Sylvester as the adviser. The Council of Constantinople, A.D. 381, was summoned by the Emperor Theodosius (Labbe, iv. 1123, 1124); that of Ephesus, A.D. 431, κατὰ τὴν ὑπαγύμα, ἢ ἐκ θεωριῶντος, of Theodosius II. and Valentinian III. (Act. in Mansi, iv. 1111); Pope Damasus concurring in the former, but Eastern patriarchs (Meletius of Antioch, Gregory, and his successor Nectarius, of Constantinople) really "assembling" it (even according to the Conc. Constantin. of A.D. 680, and see Vales. ad Theodoret. H. E. v. 9); while Pope Celestine similarly concurred in the latter, but (as is evident by his own letters) did not summon it (Acts of the Council and Letters in Mansi, iv. 1226, 1283, 1291). The case of the Council of Chalcedon, A.D. 451, so far differs from its predecessors, that the pope, Leo the Great, suggested and requested it (desiring, however, to have it in Italy), yet subsequently, and when too late, desired its postponement (Leo M. Epist. 44, 54-58, 69, 73, 78, 89-95). The application was originally made to Theodosius II. and Valentinian III., but the council was actually summoned by Marcian, "ex decreto piissimorum Imperatorum Valentiniani et Marciani," in the words of the council itself (Labbe, iv. 77), or in those of Leo, "ex praecepto Christianorum principum et consensu Apostolicæ Sedis" (Leon. M. Epist. 114), and again, in Marcian's words to Leo (inter Leon. Epist. 73), "te auctore." The 2nd Council of Constantinople, A.D. 553, was convoked by Justinian (Labbe, v. 4) after consultation with Pope Vigilius and with Mennas patriarch of Constantinople. But Vigilius after a time put himself in direct antagonism with the council, and upon May 26, 553 was actually struck out of the diptychs by it; although, after its termination, he retracted, and in the end of A.D. 553, and by a Constitutum of February 23, A.D. 554, accepted its decrees. The 3rd Council of Constantinople, A.D. 680, was convoked by the "piissima jussio" of the Emperor Constantine Pogonatus (Labbe, vi. 608, 631). Pope Agatho only sending legates when requested, and with them his own exposition of the faith, and a profession of his readiness to pay "promptam obedientiam" to the emperor. The 5th of Constantinople, A.D. 754 (in Cave's reckoning, the 8th oecumenical), which condemned images, was summoned by Constantine Copronymus and Leo (Labbe, vii. 397). The 2nd of Nice, A.D. 787, was convoked by the Empress Irene and her son Constantine (Labbe, vii. 661), at the request of Tarasius, patriarch of Constantinople, with the acquiescence of Pope Adrian I.; the latter, however, speaking afterwards of the council (in his letter to Charlemagne) as summoned "secundum nostram ordinationem." And, lastly, the Emperor Basil, the Macedonian, called together the 4th of Constantinople, A.D. 869 (not acknowledged, however, by the Eastern Church, which puts in its place that of A.D. 879), after an embassy, sent to Pope Nicholas I., but received and answered by his successor Adrian II. (Labbe, viii. 1313). The Council of Sardica, intended to be oecumenical, was summoned by the Emperors Constantius and Constans (Socr. ii. 20; Sozom. iii. 2; St. Athanas. Hist. Arian. § 36). And the numberless smaller councils about Arianism were likewise summoned by the emperors. See the summary of the whole case in Andrewes (Right and Power of calling Assemblies, Sermons, v. 160-165, and Tortura Torti, pp. 193, 422, sq.). The case of the 1st Council of Arles, A.D. 314, is a peculiar one. It was not a regular council of any portion of the Church, but rather a selected ecclesiastical tribunal, of which the members were specially chosen and summoned by the Emperor Constantine, and mainly from Gaul (Euseb. H. E. x. 5; Optat. Hist. Donat. p. 181, Dupin), intended to be oecumenical (the Emperor "assembling there a large number of bishops from different and almost innumerable parts of the empire," Euseb. ib.), and actually called "plenarium," and "universæ ecclesiæ," by St. Augustine, but not so really, as neither including all bishops nor any Eastern bishops. And its object was to revise the decision of a tribunal of fewer bishops held at Rome under the Pope Melchior in the previous year, with which the Donatists were not content. It was simply an instance, therefore, of that which afterwards became a rule, viz. of the Emperor's assigning episcopal judges to decide an ecclesiastical case. Much like it is the summoning of the Roman councils about Pope Symmachus, two centuries later, by King Theodoric.

The regular title for the bishop's or metropolitan's letters of summons was Synodice or Tractoriae (St. Aug. Epist. 217 ad Victorin.); for the Emperor's like letters, Sacrae.

From the summons, we go on to—

II. The time when, and the occasions upon which, councils were summoned. Speaking first of those councils which recurred, or were meant to recur, regularly, we find the chief stress of the canons to be directed to provincial councils, as being no doubt more difficult to enforce, and also in the interest of justice, such councils being the court of appeal from the decisions of individual bishops. In the time of Firmilian and of Cyprian, as said above, these were habitually held once a year; Firmilian's words being apparently determined to mean provincial, not diocesan, councils, by the mention of "seniores et praepositi," "presbyters and bishops" (in the plural). The great Council of Nice (can. 5) increased them to twice in the year, once before Lent, once in autumn. And so also the Apostolic Canon 37, specifying, however, the 4th week after Easter and the 12th of "Τρεπερηταιος, i.e. October. And twice a year, accordingly, became thenceforward the rule of what ought to be, although in actual fact, and by repeated concessions of councils, finally relaxed into once. So Conc. Antioch, A.D. 341, can. 20 (slightly varying the days), Conc. Chalced. A.D. 451, can. 19; and for Africa, Conc. Carthag. III. A.D. 397, can. 2, and V. can. 7 (fixing October 21), and Cod. Can. Afric. c. 18; for Spain, Conc. Tolet. III. A.D. 589, can. 18, IV. A.D. 633, can. 3 (fixing May 20), XI. A.D. 675, can. 15, XVII. A.D. 742, can. 1; Emerit. A.D. 666, can. 7; for France, Conc. Regiens. A.D. 439, can. 8 (twice a year), Arausic. I. A.D. 441, can. 89, Aurel. II. A.D. 533, can. 2, Altiissiod. A.D. 578, can. 7; and for England, Conc. Calchyth. A.D. 787, can. 3 (the title of which, however, seems to refer it to diocesan councils), and before it, Conc. Her-utf. A.D. 673, can. 7, ordering a synod twice in the year, but in the next sentence limiting the number to once, viz. upon August 1, at Clovesho, on the ground of unavoidable hindrances. Once a year became, indeed, the recognized practice (but as an uncanonical concession to necessity), and is admitted by Gratian (Dist. xviii. c. 16, 189, 2 c.), and in England by Lyndwood (Provinc. lib. i. tit. 14); as it had been allowed much earlier by the council in Trullo, can. 8, and by Conc. Nicaen. II. can. 6. And similarly, Gregory the Great, enjoining once a year in Sicily (Epist. i. 1), and in Gaul (ib. ix. 106), adds in the latter case that it ought to be twice; and enjoins twice in Sardinia (ib. iv. 9), possibly as being an island of no great extent; while in yet another case (ib. v. 54) he orders such synods whenever needed. Leo the Great, likewise, A.D. 446, commands synods twice a year at Thessalonica (Epist. xiv.), but A.D. 447, only once a year at Rome, yet with the addition that it ought to be twice (ib. xvi.). See also Avitus Vienn. (Epist. 80—"It ought to be twice in a year, would that it were once in two years!") and Pope Hormisdas (Epist. 25—"If not two, at least one"). Finally, Pipin, A.D. 755 (in Conc. Vern. pref. cans. 2, 4), renewed the injunction of two a year, naming for them March 1 and October 1, but the second of them to be attended only by the metropolitans and certain selected clergy. Yet, a century after, the Conc. Tull. A.D. 859, can. 7, is again compelled to supplicate that they might be held once in the year.

Diocesan synods are assumed, in the 11th century (Modus tenendi Synodos, in Wilk. Conc. iv. 784), to be also held twice a year. And Herardus of Tours (Capit. c. 91) similarly commands them to be held twice, and each time not to last more than 15 days. But here, also, earlier rules speak of once, Conc. Liptin. A.D. 743, c. 1 (attributed also to Conc. Tolet. XVII. can. 1), Succession. A.D. 744, c. 2, St. Boniface (Epist. 105), Capit. Car. M. VII. 108; of which authorities, however, the last is busied not so much with a synod as with ordering the clergy to give account of their acts and receive instructions, and bids them go "per turnas et per hebdomadas" to the bishop (ib. vi. 163). It was the office of such synods, among other things, to promulgate to the diocese the decrees of the provincial synods; and accordingly we find a provision, in Conc. Tolet. XVI. A.D. 693, can. 7 (and cf. also Conc. of Clovesho, A.D. 747 can. 25, and the nearly contemporary German Council under St. Boniface, can. 6, in Hadan and Stubbs, iii. 371, 377), that a diocesan synod should be held within six months after the provincial one. We find also abbats and presbyters summoned to an annual synod, sometimes together, sometimes separately (Conc. Oecum. A.D. 598, c. 1, for Spain; Altiissiod. A.D. 578, can. 7, for Gaul). Diocesan synods were at that time commonly summoned about Lent. In earlier times still, e.g. that of St. Cyprian, such councils would seem to have been held whenever needed.

The primatial or patriarchal synods were intended to be annual, and that of Africa was commonly called Universale Anniversarium. But the usual difficulty of procuring attendance was at once testified, and in attempt remedied, by the provisions for representation mentioned already. Pope Hilary (Epist. 3) also orders such synods once a year in Gaul. And Leo the Great summons the Sicilian bishops to attend by representation at one of two such synods annually in Rome (Epist. iv.). But circumstances must have speedily rendered such regular synods impossible. The Council of Agde, A.D. 506, can. 71, seems to renew the annual rule. But the 2nd of Mâcon, A.D. 585, can. 20, made it triennial ("post trietericum tempus omnes convenient") for Gaul. And this is the Tridentine rule in later times. The Concilia Palatina were at first occasional, as the kings or emperors summoned them. Pipin, as above said, A.D. 755, called some council of the kind twice in the year; but the actual practice remained irregular. And Conc. Tull. A.D. 859, can. 7, asking for a provincial council once a year, asked also for a palatine council once in every two years. Hincmar, however, speaks of twice a year as customary ("consuetudo tunc temporis erat," speaking of "Placita," Opp. II. 211, sq.).

All these kinds of councils were parts of the ordinary constitution of the Church, even the Palatine councils being mixed up with ecclesiastical matters. And those of them that were proper Church councils were needed at regular times; as required (according to Conc. Carth. III. can. 2), "propter causas ecclesiasticas, quae ad perniciem plebium saepe veterascunt," although their functions were not restricted to cases of discipline only. Other kinds of councils were only occasional remedies for special emergencies, and were held therefore when needed. Of the six grounds usually enumerated (e.g. by Hefele) for holding oecumenical councils, setting aside all those that belong to mediæval times, as, e.g. the deciding between rival popes, &c., there remains, for earlier times, only one, which is both historically the ground upon which the great oecumenical councils were actually summoned, and that assigned by the Apostolical canon (37) for councils at all—Ἀνακρίνωμεν ἀλλήλοις

III. The place in which councils were held, when purely church councils, was commonly the church or some building attached to the church; e.g. the Secretarium or Διακονικὸν attached often to large churches (Liberat. Brevar. xiii.), in which kind of building the 3rd to the 6th Councils of Carthage were held, and others also (Du Cange in v. Secretarium); or the baptistery or Φωτιστήριον, wherein the Council of Chalcedon, for instance, A.D. 451, met (Labbe. Conc. iv. 235, and see Suicer in v. Φωτιστήριον); or the church itself, as in the Council of Toledo IV. A.D. 633; or again in much later times (as A.D. 879 and 1165, at Constantinople), the galleries or Κατηχούμενα of the church (Bingh. VIII. v. 7). The great Council of Nice met, according to Eusebius (V. Constant. iii. 7) in an οἶκος εὐκέρης, or as he words it elsewhere (ib. 10), ἐν τῷ μεσαιτῇ οἷκῳ τῶν βασιλείων. Theodoret (i. 7) and Sozomen (i. 19) determine this to mean a royal palace. Valesius, on the contrary (ad loc. Euseb.), argues that it must mean a church. The words of e.g. Sozomen appear really to show, that the bishops met during their first sessions in a church, but that when the day of decision arrived, and Constantine in person intended to be present, then they removed to his palace; which was οἶκος μέγιστος, and where the bishops sat on seats along the wall, and the emperor on a throne in the middle. The next four Oecumenical Councils were certainly held in a church or in a building attached to a church, respectively at Constantinople, Ephesus, Chalcedon, and again Constantinople (Jo. Damasc. De Sac. Imag. tract. iii., St. Cyril. Alex. ad Theodos. in Act. Conc. Ephes., Evagr. H. E. ii. 3, &c.). The Council of Constantinople, A.D. 680, and the supplemental Trullan Council of A.D. 692, were held in the secretarium of the Imperial palace, called Trullus. The Council of Constantinople against images, A.D. 754, was held, first in the Imperial palace of Hiera on the shore opposite Byzantium, and then in a church in Constantinople itself. Palatine councils and mixed national councils were commonly and naturally held in royal palaces. In Ciampini (Vet. Mon. I. tab. xxxvii.) is figured a mosaic of the 5th century, indicating a council, and with a synestus and the open Gospels thereon in the middle, from the Baptistery at Ravenna.

Diocesan and provincial councils were held naturally and ordinarily in the cathedral and metropolitan cities respectively. Why Clovesho was selected for the provincial councils of Saxon England, it is impossible to say, in the absence of any certainty as to where Clovesho was. Possibly it was a central spot, which Canterbury was not. The outgoing council sometimes named the place for that which was to come next; as e.g. Conc. Tolet. IV. A.D. 633, can. 4, enacts that it shall do. So also the place for the first of Pipin's two annual councils was fixed by himself, but that first council determined the locality of the second. Conc. Arausica. I. A.D. 441, can. 29, forbids any council to be dissolved "sine alterius conventus denuntiatione." Conc. Emerit. A.D. 666, c. 7, and Conc. Tolet. iv. A.D. 633, can. 3, leave it to the metropolitan to determine the place, which was the usual rule. The palace where king or emperor happened to be, commonly decided the locality of the Concilia Palatina, as e.g. Clichy, Braine, Aix-la-Chapelle, &c. The localities of the Oecumenical Councils were determined by the circumstances of the case, and the convenience of the emperors. Nicaea, e.g. was close to the emperor's palace at Nicomedia. Ephesus was a convenient seaport, with great facilities of access on account of its trading importance, and accessible by land through the great road by Iconium to the Euphrates (see Howson and Conybeare's St. Paul, vol. ii., pp. 80, sq. 8vo. edit.). Chalcedon was close to Constantinople, yet apart from it. And Sardica again was chosen, in A.D. 347, as a place most convenient for East and West to meet in.

IV. Provision at the public expense, was also made, both for the conveyance of the bishops to the place of meeting, and for their entertainment during the sessions, at any rate during the period of the councils against the Arians. The former was ordered by Constantine in the cases of the Councils of Arles I. and Nice (Euseb. H. E. x. 5, and V. Constant. iv. 6-9, &c.); and is bitterly complained of, somewhat later, by Ammianus Marcellinus (Hist. xxi. fin.), as interfering with the public system of conveyance to the detriment of public business and convenience; while pope Liberius endeavoured to obtain a council from the emperor by (among other motives) offering that the bishops would waive the privilege and travel at their own expense (Sozom. iv. 11). Of the latter we read at the Council of Ariminum, A.D. 359, where only three of the British bishops accepted it, the others, with the bishops of Gaul and Aquitaine, declining it as interfering with their independence (Sulp. Ser. ii. 55).

V. The ceremonial of a council is described in respect to a provincial council, by an order of Conc. Tolet. IV. A.D. 633, can. 4, quoted and abridged, but not quite accurately, by Hefele (I. 65, Engl. Tr.), thus:—"Before sunset on the day appointed, all those who are in the church must come out; and all the doors must be shut, except the one by which the bishops enter; and at this door all the ostiarii will station themselves. The bishops will then come, and take their places according to the times of their ordination. When they have taken their places, the elected priests, and after them the deacons, ['probabiles, quos ordo poposcerit interesse,] will come in their turn to take their places. The priests sit behind the bishops, the deacons [stand] in front, and all are arranged in the form of a circle. Last of all, those laity are introduced, whom the Council by their election have judged worthy of the favour. The notaries, who are necessary, are also introduced. [And the doors are barred.] All keep silence. When the arch-deacon says, Orate, all prostrate themselves upon the ground. After several moments, one of the oldest bishops rises and recites a prayer in a loud voice, during which all the rest remain upon their knees. The prayer having been recited, all answer, Amen; and they rise when the arch-deacon says, Erigite vos. While all keep silent, a deacon, clad in a white alb, brings into the midst the book of the canons, and reads the rules for the holding of councils. When this is ended, the metropolitan gives an address, and calls on those present to bring forward their complaints. If a priest, a deacon, or a layman, has any comto make, he makes it known to the arch-bishop of the metropolitan church; and the arch-bishop, in his turn, will bring it to the knowledge of the council. No bishop is to withdraw without the rest; and no one is to pronounce the council dissolved, before all the business is ended." The synod concluded with a ceremony similar to that of the opening; the metropolitan then presided at the time of celebrating Easter (ib. can. 14). That of the meeting of the next synod, synods being annual by can. 3.

Probably councils elsewhere followed a like order to those of Spain. The deacons, however, at all times, did not sit but stood (Conc. Const. in procem., Conc. Tolet. I., Bracar. II., and early Roman Councils in Bingh. ii. xix. and St. Cyprian's African Councils), unless appeared as representing their respective provinces.

"Modus tenendi Synodos in Anglia" (11th cent. MSS. Cleop. C. viii. fol. 35, printed in ins. Concilia v. 784-786), supplies a like though later account of a diocesan synod. It commands such synods twice annually, suspending contumacious absentees for a month, it proceeds to order the church to be cleared of all people, and the doors closed, except one at which the ostiarium are to be stationed. Then, at our to be fixed by the bishop or his vicar, a solemn procession with crosses and litany, having been placed in the middle of the church with relics lying upon it, and a "plena," i.e. either a complete missal or a copy of the gospels, and a stole, being raised placed thereon, the presbyters are to their seats according to the times of their ordination: then the deacons are to be admitted, only those who are "probables," or "quos poposcerit interesse;" then chosen laity; then the bishop, or at least his vicar. Forms of prayer are then given, with benedictions and as, for three days, which is assumed to be the right limit of the duration of the synod.

From at least the Council of Ephesus, A.D. 431 (St. Cyril Alex. ad Theodos. in Acti. Conc. s. 1), an open copy of the Gospels was customarily placed in the midst on a throne covered with rich stuffs; a precedent followed by other councils, e.g. by that of Hatfield under Abp. dome, A.D. 680 ("prepositis sacrosanctis reliquiis"), down even to that of Basle (see also mosaic in Ciampini already referred to, Suicer in v. Εὐαγγέλιον). St. Cyprian treats a council as "considentibus Dei sacramentibus et altari posito" (Epist. xlv.). In the 8th century, an image of Our Lord is mentioned as placed in the midst, by Theodorus ita; and about the same time images of saints likewise, by Gregory II. (A.D. 715-731, t. II. ad Leon. Isaur.). And in similar cases, or later, we find also relics so placed, as the Modus tenendi Synodos, above quoted, prescribes also the language of Gregory the Great (l. II. 1288) in the 6th century, speaking of a Roman provincial synod as assembled "in sanctissimo beati Petri corpore," Conc. t. xi. A.D. 675, can. 1, prohibited talking or singing or disorder of any kind in a council. The order of the Paintine Councils is given by hard, the Abbot of Corbey, and will be read to below (under D).

I. The President of an ecclesiastical council was of course, in provincial councils, the metropolitan (such a council, as we have seen, was not "perfect" without him, and his presence became ordinarily necessary to the due consecration of a bishop [BISHOP]); in diocesan councils, the bishop or (in later times) at least his vicar; in primatial or patriarchal, the primate or patriarch; the chief bishop present, at those councils which were made up from neighbouring provinces (e.g. Vitalis of Antioch, at Ancyra); the patriarch of Constantinople, in his ἐκκλησιαστικὰ; kings or emperors in the mixed national synods of later date. At Arles, in A.D. 314, Marcellus Bishop of Arles signs the synodical letter first, and therefore probably presided in the synod itself; and this probably by appointment of the emperor, just as Melchisedes had presided in the previous year over the abortive tribunal assembled at Rome. In the Oecumenical synods, down to A.D. 869, the emperor, either in person or by a representative, exercised a kind of external presidency—πρόεδρος is all that Leo the Great allows, in his synodical letter to the Council of Chalcedon, A.D. 451—in occupying the seat of honour when present, and in regulating and enforcing external order and the like. But the presidents or πρόεδροι, who are distinguished from the emperor and from his representative, and who conducted the real ecclesiastical business of the council, were either the principal bishops or patriarchs, or the legates of the patriarchs. At Nice, after opening the proceedings in person, seated in the place of honour, Constantine, who expressly disclaimed for himself the interfering with doctrine, and called himself bishop only τὸν ἐν τῇ ἐκκλησίᾳ, but the bishops themselves, τὸν αἰσῶν, παρεβέβησαν τὸν λόγον τοῖς τῇ συνόδῳ προέδροις (Euseb. V. Constant. v. 13). And these πρόεδροι, although not expressly named, may be gathered from the list of chief members of the council (Euseb. V. Constant. iii. 7, Sozom. i. 13, Sozom. i. 17, Theodoret, H. E. ii. 15), to have been, first and above all, Hosius of Corduba,—employed by the emperor to manage the previous abortive council at Alexandria [Sozom. i. 18], present also at Elvira previously, and subsequently president at Sardica; see St. Athanas. Apol. de Fuga; and that Hosius gave advice to the emperor in the Donatist question also, c. A. D. 318, St. Aug. c. Parmenion. i. 8, ix. 43), Alexander of Alexandria (styled κύριος in the council, by the Conc. Nicæna, itself), Eustathius of Antioch (alleged by Theodoret to have addressed the opening speech to the emperor, which however Sozomen, and the title of c. 11 of Euseb. V. Constant. iii., attribute to Eusebius himself, and Theodore of Mopsuestia to Alexander), Macarius of Jerusalem, and Vitus and Vincentius the presbyter-legates of the absent Bishop of Rome. Such authorities also as John of Antioch and Nicephorus (v. Tillemont, Mem. Eccles. vi. 272), speak of Eustathius as presiding. That Hosius presided as legate of the pope (so Gelas. Cyzic., ab. A.D. 476, is commonly said to affirm, but he really says that Hosius "occupied the place of the Bishop of Rome at the council, with Vitus and Vincentius" [ἐνέχεον τὸν τόπον τοῦ τῇ μεγίστῃ Πάμῃ Ἐπισκόπου Ἀλεξανδρείας ἐν πρεσβυτέρῳ Πάμῃ Βίτῳ καὶ Βικεντίῳ (Labbe, il. 156)], which is not quite the same thing), is distinctly contradicted by the language of Eusebius,

Socrates, and Sozomen. At Constantinople, A.D. 381, the successive presidents were Meletius of Antioch (no higher patriarch being at first present), and on his death, Gregory of Nazianzum until his resignation, and then Nectarius, patriarchs of Constantinople. At Ephesus, A.D. 431, Candidianus, "comes sacrorum domesticorum," was the commissioner of the Emperor Theodosius; but every one, "unless he was a bishop," was strictly forbidden by the emperor to intermeddle τοῖς ἐκκλησιαστικαῖς ἀσέμναις: and Cyril of Alexandria, at first alone, afterwards with the Pope's legates, presided ecclesiastically, Candidian indeed favouring the Nestorians. In A.D. 451, at Chalcedon, the limits of imperial interference were less exactly kept. Paschasius, bishop of Libybaeum, the pope's legate, is repeatedly said to have presided, and signs first, and as "synodo praesidens." But Marcian, in person, presided over the sixth session, proposed the questions, and conducted the business. And his commissioners, generally, "had the place of honour in the midst before the altar-rails, are first named in the minutes, took the votes, arranged the order of the business, and closed the sessions" (Hefele, from the Acts). At Constantinople, A.D. 553, neither Justinian nor Pope Vigilius took a personal part, the latter expressly refusing to join in it; and the actual president was Eutychius of Constantinople. In A.D. 680, Constantine Pogonatus interfered even more than Marcian in 451; and he is moreover expressly called the president. But the papal legates sign first, and Constantine only at the end of the episcopal signatures, and with the phrase, "Legimus et consentimus." At Nice, in A.D. 787, Tarasius of Constantinople really conducted the business of the council, but the papal legates sign before him; and the Empress Irene and her son were present as honorary presidents in the eighth and last session, but signed finally after the signatures of the bishops. Lastly, in A.D. 869, the papal legates with the Patriarch of Constantinople and the representatives of the other patriarchs, were practically the presidents, but the legates alone are expressly so called; while in the sixth and following sessions the Emperor Basil and his two sons acted as presidents and are so called, although refusing to sign except after the legates and patriarchs above mentioned. Of other synods, Hosius presided at Sardica, A.D. 347 (St. Athanas. Hist. Arian., Sozom., ii. 12, Theodoret, H. E. ii. 15, and the Acts themselves), the two presbyter-legates of Pope Julius signing after him, and then the Bishop of Sardica itself. At the Latrocinium of Ephesus, A.D. 449, the Emperor Theodosius gave the presidency to Dioscorus of Alexandria, after refusing it to the papal legates. It should be added, that objection was taken to the emperor's even sending a commissioner to the Council of Tyre, A.D. 335 (St. Athanas. Apolog. c. Arian. n. viii.); and that the Council of Constantinople, A.D. 869, ruled that the emperor not only need not but ought not to intervene in provincial synods, &c., but only in such as were oecumenical. But kings were present continually even in provincial synods in the West; as e.g. at Toledo IV. and V., A.D. 633 and 636, at the legatine councils in England, A.D. 787, in Gaul continually, and at Frankfort A.D. 794. And the king's commissaries were at the councils of Toledo VIII. and IX., A.D. 633, 655. The remonstrance of Pope Julius to the Eastern bishops respecting the Council of Antioch, A.D. 341—ὅτι μὴ δεῖ παρὰ γνώμην τοῦ Ἐπισκόπου Ρώμης κανονίζειν τὰς ἐκκλησίας (Socr. ii. 13, Sozom. iii. 9)—might obviously have been made by any of the patriarchs, the church not being truly represented if any chief bishop were passed over; and reads rather like a claim, which its maker felt it necessary to press, there being no doubt about the like right of the older and Eastern patriarchs. The second Council of Nice, A.D. 787, requires all the patriarchs (or their legates) for a really oecumenical council (Labbe. vii. 396).

VII. The order of Precedence, and of Signatures, in a council, which commonly went together, followed ordinarily, in respect to Bishops, the rule of priority of consecration (as e.g. in Africa, Cod. Can. Afric. 86, Conc. Milev. cans. 13, 14; in Italy and Gaul, Greg. M. Epist. vii. 112 [to Syagrius, Bishop of Autun], and so also in Spain, Conc. Bracar. I. A.D. 563, can. 6, and Conc. Tolet. IV. A.D. 633, c. 4, and [as may be seen in the signatures to charters] in England—see Counc. of Hertford, A.D. 673, can. 8; and Conc. Londin. A.D. 1075, in Wilk. i. 363). Here and there, however, custom gave precedence to a particular see, as in England latterly to London, Durham, Winchester. And in an oecumenical council, or indeed wherever present, the bishops of the chief sees, who in due time became patriarchs, took precedence of all others; the order being fixed by the council in Trullo, A.D. 692, as 1. Rome, 2. Constantinople, 3. Alexandria, 4. Antioch, 5. Jerusalem; the preceding general councils of Constantinople (can. 3) and Chalcedon (can. 28), having raised Constantinople from a subordinate place to have "equal honours" with Rome, but to count as second (so also Justinian, Novel. cxxi. c. 2). Ephesus and Caesarea, as patriarchates in a secondary sense, followed the chief patriarchs; as e.g. in the 4th and 6th oecumenical councils. Chorepiscopi, so long as that office existed as an episcopal office, either in east or west—and again the titular and monastic bishops of the 6th and following centuries (mainly in north-western Europe)—counted in a council as bishops. If priests or deacons were present as vicars or legates of their respective bishops, they signed, in the East, in the order in which their own bishop would have signed, had he been present; in the West, usually after all the bishops present. In the 1st council of Arles, however, the priests and deacons, whom each bishop had been desired to bring with him, signed immediately after their own bishop; and the Pope's legates signed after several of the bishops. In France and England, and in the case of the archimandrites in Eastern councils, the abbots, although laymen, signed between the bishops and priests (if any signatures occur of the last named). In Spain, as laymen, they signed at first after the priests, but afterwards (becoming probably in many instances priests themselves) they signed, as elsewhere, after the bishops and before the priests. Of lay signatures, the emperor in the great oecumenical councils signed after all the bishops, except in A.D. 869, when the emperor and his sons signed after the great patriarchs but before all the other bishops. Imperial commissioners also took precedence, in the council itself, immediately after the patriarchs or their representatives, but did not sign the acts at all. In the mixed European synods, lay signatures also occur. In England we have in order—king, archbishop, bishops, dukes, abbats, nobles, presbyters, munistri; sometimes abbesses also; but, of course, in mixed synods or rather witenagemots only; and all this, not in the same order always, for sometimes not only presbyters but deacons sign before the nobles, and abbats follow the presbyters. At Clovesho, A.D. 803, the bishop, abbats, and presbyters of each diocese, sign together, and in one case (that of Canterbury) an archdeacon also. The list of those present at the 1st Council of Arles, A.D. 314, as has been said, follows a like order. At Nice the signatures, so far as they are preserved, are of name and see simply. At the Council of Ephesus, A.D. 431, and thenceforward, the custom began of adding "gratia Christi," or "Dei miseratione," or "in Christi nomine," and also of adding to the name such epithets as minimus, peccator, indignus, humilis, &c. The sees are omitted commonly, but not always, in Anglo-Saxon, in Frank, and in Spanish councils. The chief exceptions in England are the Councils of Calceyth, A.D. 787, and Clovesho, A.D. 803, where the sees are certainly given. They occur, however, more often in France. But as the lists are commonly copies, the scribes are as likely as not to have added the sees in some instances, although this is clearly not the case in many. The addition of "definiens (spiras) subscript," belonged to bishops as such, and very often occurs, as e.g. Conc. Chalced. A.D. 451, from the 5th century; "consentiens subscript," or "consensi et subscript," or "subscript" simply, being the form for others as well as bishops. The Saxon "pompositus" varied the form in endless ways, as may be seen in Kemble's Codex Diplomaticus. "Pronuntians cum sancta synodo," also occurs in the Council of Ephesus, A.D. 431.

VIII. The votes were taken no doubt by heads, from the beginning. The plan of voting by nations, the vote of each nation being determined by the majority of individual votes within the nation itself, was a device as late as the Council of Constantine, intended to prevent the swamping of the council by Italian bishops, and was abandoned again after the Council of Basle. The distinction between vota decisa and vota consultativa, the former alone counting in the formal decisions of the council, is of modern date also, so far as the terms are concerned; but the presence at councils of individuals, and of classes of persons, for consultation but without a vote, is of very early origin (see below under B), and indeed may be most probably said to date from Apostolic times.

IX. Lastly, councils were confirmed, in the case of the Oecumenical Councils, and so as to give their decrees the force of law, by the emperors; although, in foro conscientie, St. Athanasius's dictum holds good, — πότε γὰρ ἐν τοῦ αἰῶνος ἀκούσθη τοιαῦτα. πότε πλὴν ἐκκλησίας κατὰ βασιλέως λόγος τὸ κύριον; (Hist. Arian. ad Monach. § 52, Opp. i. 376). The decrees of the Nicene Council were enforced as laws of the empire by Constantine (Euseb. V. Constant. iii. 17-19; Soer. i. 9; Gelas. Cyzic. ii. 36, in Mansi, ii. 919). Subscription to its creed was enforced on pain of exile (Soer. i. 9; Rufin. H. E. i. 5). That of Constantinople, in A.D. 381, requested and obtained the legal confirmation of Theodosius the Great (July 30, A.D. 381, Cod. Theod. xvi. l. 3). Theodosius II., after much hesitation, confirmed the principal decision of the Council of Ephesus, A.D. 431 (Hefele), by exiling Nestorius and ordering Nestorian writings to be burnt (Mansi, v. 255, 413, 920). Marcian's edicts are extant of February 7, March 13, July 6 and 28, A.D. 452, which confirm the decrees of the Council of Chalcedon of A.D. 451. The next four councils (in the Latin reckoning) of A.D. 553, 680, 787, 869, were either signed, or (as in the 6th and 8th) also enforced by an edict, by the emperors who respectively summoned them. Councils also were commonly held in the various provinces to accept the decrees of a General Council. And in this way the sanction of the bishops of Rome was given after some delay to the second council of Constantinople, A.D. 381. Nothing is said of the pope in relation to the great Council of Nice, except by documents of a date and nature such as to make them worthless (Hefele makes the best of them, but his own statements are the best refutation of his conclusion). Leo the Great refused to assent to the decree of Chalcedon respecting the patriarch of Constantinople, while accepting the rest. And both that council (ap. Leon. M. Epist. lxxxv.) and Marcian (ib. Epist. cx.) recognize in terms the necessity of obtaining the pope's confirmation; although with special reference to the canon affecting the dignity of the see of Rome. Yet, in A.D. 553, Justinian compelled the submission of pope Vigilius to the Council of Constantinople. And the canons of the Trullan Council, in A.D. 682, were in like manner forced by the emperor upon pope Sergius. The General Councils, so called, of A.D. 680, 787, and 869, sought and received the papal confirmation. For the legal authority attached at various periods to the canons of either oecumenical or provincial councils, see CANON LAW. The "Canones Patrum," i.e., probably the collection of Dionysius Exiguus, were brought forward by Theodore, and certain canons selected from them accepted as specially needed for the English Church, at the Council of Hertford, A.D. 673 (Haddan and Stubbs, iii. 119). Charlemagne, in his Capitularies, dealt with ecclesiastical laws as well as civil, but consulted pope Adrian, and obtained a sort of enlarged Codex Canonum from him, A.D. 774; as Pipin had done before him, A.D. 747, with pope Zacharias. But the royal authority gave legal force to these laws—"a vestra auctoritate firmentur" (Conc. Mogunt. A.D. 813, in Praef.; and so repeatedly); as indeed had been the case with Frank and Burgundian kings, &c., before Pipin also.

The Council of Calceyth, A.D. 816, can. 9, enacts that a copy of decrees of councils should be taken by each bishop, with date and names of archbishop and bishops present; and that another copy should be given to any one affected by the decree.

B. Such being (so to say) the externals of a council, the next question relates to its CONSTITUENT MEMBERS.

I. To speak first of provincial councils, there can be no question that bishops were essentially their members. The Apostolic Canon (37) speaks of σύνδοι τῶν Ἐπισκόπων; the 5th canon of Nice, of πάντων τῶν Ἐπισκόπων τῆς ἑπαρχίας, &c.; and similarly Conc. Antioch. A.D. 341, can. 20, and the 29th canon of Chalcedon, which describes also such σύνδοι τῶν Ἐπισκόπων as κατανομιζόμενοι; and the earliest known synods of the kind (the earliest indeed of any kind), those of Hierapolis and Anchialus against Montanism, and those held by Polycrates about Easter, respectively in the middle and towards the end of the 2nd century, consisted of bishops, without mentioning (yet certainly without in terms excluding) any one else (Libellus Synodicus, and Euseb. v. 16, 24). See also St. Cyprian (Epist. 73), St. Hilary (De Syn. Proem.), St. Ambrose (Epist. 32, "audiant [presbyteri] cum populo"), St. Jerome (Apol. c. Ruffin. lib. II.), &c. &c. Moreover, from early times bishops but no others were compelled to attend such synods, under penalties (suspension for a year) for absence, or even for coming late; and the being present in them was a recognized and allowed cause of non-residence in their dioceses: e.g. Conc. Laodic. c. A.D. 365, can. 40; Chalced. A.D. 451, can. 19; Agath. A.D. 506, can. 35; Vasena. ii. A.D. 529, Pref.; Tarracon. A.D. 516, can. 6; Aurel. ii. A.D. 533, can. 1; Arvern. i. A.D. 535, can. 1; Turon. ii. A.D. 567, can. 1; Emenit. A.D. 666, can. 7; Tolet. xi. A.D. 675, can. 15: see also Leo M. Epist. vi. A.D. 444; and Greg. M. Epist. V. 54 (allowing presbyters or deacons as representatives, if unavoidable). In the 3rd century, however, as in Apostolic times (Acts xv.), it becomes evident that presbyters also took part in such councils ("seniores et praepositi," Firmilian, as before quoted, speaking for Asia; St. Cyprian repeatedly for Africa; Euseb. H.E. vii. 28, of the Council of Antioch that condemned Paul of Samosata in A.D. 264 or 265, for Syria; and the case of Origen, again, at the Arabian synods respecting Beryllus; &c.). In the Council of Elvira (A.D. 305, Hefele) twenty-six or twenty-four presbyters "sat with" the bishops. In that of Arles I., A.D. 314, each bishop was directed to bring two presbyters with him, and some brought deacons also. A series of Roman councils (A.D. 461, 487, 499, 502, 715, 721) contained also presbyters, "sitting with" the bishops, and in two cases "subscribing" with them (Bingh. II. xix. 12); and others might be added, as e.g. under Gregory the Great (Opp. II. 1288). "Gregorius Papa coram sanctissimo beati Petri corpore, cum episcopis omnibus ac Romanae Ecclesiae presbyteris residentibus, adstantibus diaconis et cuncto clero." So again at Carthage, A.D. 387, 389, 401; at Toledo, A.D. 400; at Constantinople, A.D. 443; at Braga, II. A.D. 572; and the order of holding a council given above from Conc. Tolet. iv. A.D. 633, as well as the later English "ordo," also above mentioned, expressly provide for the presence of presbyters. They are present also at Calchyth, A.D. 787, and Clovesho, A.D. 803. And later still, presbyters subscribe at Lyons, A.D. 830. At the oecumenical councils of Ephesus and Chalcedon they were present, but did not subscribe. Three, however, subscribe in their own names at Constantinople, A.D. 381 (Labbe. ii. 957). But then it must be added, 1. That individual presbyters (and deacons) were sometimes specially invited to speak at such councils on account of their personal eminence and talents: as, e.g. Malchion, the priest of Antioch, in the council that condemned Paul of Samosata (Euseb. II. E. vii. 29); and Origen at the Arabian synods that condemned Beryllus; and Barsumas the Archimandrite at the Latrocinium of Ephesus, invited by the emperor Theodosius II.; and St. Athanasius the deacon at Nice; and Wilfrid, still a presbyter, at Whitby. 2. That priests as well as deacons, καὶ πάντας τοὺς ἡδικοῦσθαι νομιζοντας, i.e., laymen also, are bid to be present at such synods in order to bring forward complaints and obtain justice (Conc. Antioch. A.D. 341, can. 20, and so also in the "ordo" above quoted from Conc. Tolet. of A.D. 633). 3. That St. Cyprian, for instance, speaks of bishops only as the members of the synod, and this where presbyters had been present (Hefele), and of presbyters as "compresbyteri qui nobis assidebant;" while bishops only voted in the African council of A.D. 256. 4. That in Conc. Constantin., A.D. 448, while the bishops signed with the formula ὁπίσθεν ἐκτέτακται, the archimandrites omit the ὁπίσθεν in their signatures. 5. That, having regard to the judicial functions of such councils, it seems impossible to suppose that any beside bishops could have been appointed judges of bishops. On the whole, then—setting aside the well known practice whereby priests (or deacons) signed and voted with the bishops as representatives or vicars of their own (absent) bishops, and reserving also the case of abbats—it would seem that bishops were the proper, ordinary, and essential members of a provincial council; but that the presbyters as a body were consulted, as of right, down to certainly the 3rd century, and not only continued to be present, but were admitted to subscribe in several instances in later centuries; but that it must remain doubtful whether they ever actually voted in a division, and that the apparent inference from the evidence is rather against than for their having done so. The presence of the metropolitan in a provincial synod, as above said, was necessary to render it a "perfect" synod. On the other hand, the metropolitan could not act, except of course in the exercise of his ordinary functions, apart from his provincial synod. Chorepiscopi, during the 4th century in the east, and during the 9th in the west, in France, and the monastic and titular bishops of north-western Europe from the 6th century onwards, were treated as bishops. But besides presbyters, deacons and laymen likewise took part in such synods. The usual phrase, both in St. Cyprian and in the Roman councils under Symmachus &c. just mentioned, is, "adstantibus diaconis, cum stantium plebe" (=with the laity who had not lapsed, but were in full communion); and in those Roman councils deacons subscribe, and in the same form with the bishops and presbyters; and St. Cyprian repeatedly states that he did nothing as bishop without consulting all his clergy and laity too; and the order of a council, drawn up at Toledo, A.D. 633, specifying "invited deacons" and "chosen laymen," shows that these were not supposed to come merely to bring forward complaints, but to join in consultation. "Consistentibus presbyteris, adstantibus diaconis cum universo clero," is the common phrase respecting councils of 5th century onwards, but without mention of laity as a rule. There were laymen, however, at Toledo, A.D. 653, as there had been at Tarragona, A.D. 516, and at the 2nd council of Orange, A.D. 529; and at this last named council the lay members also signed, although using the vaguer form, which, however, the bishops also used at the same council, of "consentibus subscripsi." And lay signatures occur in other instances also, as at the council of Calchyth, A.D. 787. The "seniores plebis" also, who occur in Africa in the time of e.g. Optatus (see Bingham, II. xix. 19), may be mentioned in the same connection. On the other hand, the archbishop of Lyons (Conc. Epion. A.D. 817), "permits" the presence of laity, but it is, "ut quae a solis pontificibus ordinanda sunt, et populus possit agnoscere." At Lyons itself, however, A.D. 830, we find not only presbyters, but deacons, laymen, and a chorepiscopus. The signatures of emperors indeed, or of their commissioners, to oecumenical synods; the presence of notaries at synods, who however had doubtless no votes; the part taken by kings in mixed national synods; the attendance of invited experts (so to say) as assessors, but without votes, as of doctors of theology and of canon law in later times, or of such individuals as Origen and the others above mentioned, or, again, of the "magistri ecclesiae, qui canonica patrum statuta et diligenter et noscent," at the council of Hertford, A.D. 670 (Baed. H. E. iv. 5, and cf. also Conc. Tarracon. A.D. 516, c. 13, &c.),—are obviously exceptional cases, which need no explanation. But the language in which the subject in general is mentioned, coupled with Apostolic precedent, establishes two things,—one, that deacons and laity had a right from the beginning to a certain status in councils; the other, that they occupied a distinctly lower status there than the bishops and presbyters did;—and that while there is distinct proof of both classes having been consulted and their opinions taken (so to say) en masse, no proof at all exists that the laity, and no sufficient proof that the deacons, ever voted individually in actual divisions. The fair inference from the evidence, as regards the general question, seems to be, that, as in the election of bishops, and in synods held for that purpose, so in provincial synods likewise, the consent of all orders in the Church—bishops, priests, deacons, and laity—was at the first held needful, although the bishops alone as a rule discussed and voted; that, as the Church increased in numbers, the presence of all, or nearly all, became impossible as well as mischievous; while no scheme of representation was devised to meet the difficulty, except partially in Africa (as already mentioned) in the case of bishops; and that, consequently, the presence of classes of members who did not take an active part in the actual council naturally and gradually ceased, and the bishops (or their vicars) came to constitute provincial councils alone, even presbyters no longer appearing there. It is to be added, that bishops were then in some fairly real sense the representatives of the diocese, which had indeed elected them bishops; and that (again in accordance with Apostolic precedent) they are found sometimes giving account to their dioceses of what they had done in councils, as, e.g., Eusebius after the council of Nice at Caesarea (cf. Schaff's Hist. of Christ. Ch. i. 339). Late medieval English provincial councils, i.e., convocations, which, it need hardly be said, include presbyters, are the result of an abortive political scheme, dating from Edward I., for taxing the clergy; the proper episcopal synod gradually merging into the convention of clergy then devised (see a good account of this in Blunt's Theol. Dictionary, art. Convocations). But in Anglo-Saxon England, as in France and Spain, the purely episcopal synod was (at any rate at first) kept distinct from the Witenagemot or the Placitum, even when held at the same place and time (see Thomassin, II. iii. c. 47, § 1; and below, under D). The councils of Hertford and of Hatfield under Theodore were of bishops only, as actual members with votes. It is not until A.D. 787, that we find laity also in purely ecclesiastical councils in England.

The case of abbats still remains. And here we find, in the East, archimandrites, being presbyters, present and signing at the council of Constantinople, A.D. 448. In the West, it is mentioned as a singular honour, that St. Benedict, being a layman, was invited by St. Gregory the Great to a seat in a Roman council. But from the 6th century onwards in Spain, and a little later in France, abbats formed a regular portion of the councils, signing in the former country at first after, and at a later time before, the priests. They sign, also, in France. In England they occur repeatedly, and sometimes abbesses also (although Hilda at Whitby is a merely exceptional case, proving nothing), but it is either in diocesan or in mixed synods [ABBAT, ABBESSES], until A.D. 787, at the legatine councils of Calchyth and in Northumbria, which are signed by abbats and lay nobles as well as bishops. So also at Clovesho A.D. 803, bishops, abbats, presbyters, deacons, sign in that order, but by dioceses (Haddan and Stubbs, iii. 546, 547). A.D. 1075, Lanfranc (called by a blunder Dunstan in Hefele, i. 23, Eng. tr.) puts them on an equality with bishops in the privilege of addressing synods; as was done also at the same time and place with the archdeacons. In later times they sat and voted, just as the bishops did, and are ruled to have this right by e.g. the councils of Basle and Trent.

II. The constituent members of a diocesan council, were the Bishop and Presbyters, the latter being bound by canon to attend such councils, just as the bishops were bound to attend the Provincial Synod; but deacons and laity originally had the right to be present and to be consulted, although their actual right to a formal and individual vote is questionable at all times, and, if it ever existed, was certainly lost very early. In later centuries, in Europe, abbats also were summoned with the presbyters. The assembly of the presbyters was indeed the bishop's standing council [BISHOP, PRIEST] from the beginning: see e.g. Pius I. Epist. II.; Constit. Apostol. II. 28; S. Ignatius passim; S. Cyprian repeatedly ("Placuit contra presbyterium, ut . . . consensu omnium statueretur," Epist. 46 al. 49: "Cum statuerem . . . nihil sine consilio vestro [viz. of the clergy], et sine consensu plebis, mea privata sententia gerere," Epist. 6, al. 14, &c., &c.); and so at Ephesus at Alexandria in the condemnation of Origen and of Arius, at Rome in that of Novatian (Bingham, II. xix. 8); and Pope Siricius in condemning Jovinian (Id. ib. 11); and for later times, Conc. Oecum. A.D. 588, can. 1; Liptin. A.D. 743 (Labbe, vi. 1544), Swess. A.D. 744, can. 4; Vern. A.D. 755, can. 8; Arelat. vi. A.D. 813, can. 4; Capit. Theodulph. c. 4; Laus of Northumbrian Priests, 44; Eadgar's Canons, 3-8. Abbots were also summoned, and a journey to the synod was an allowable canon of absence from their monasteries [ABBAT]. Theodore enacts that no bishop shall compel them to come (Penitent. II. ii. 3). In the Llandaff synods (Lib. Landav., and extracts in Hadden and Stubbs, vol. i.), the bishop, the three great abbots of the diocese, and the presbyters (in one case, "electi"), the deacons, and all the clerici, form the synod. But Spanish and Frank councils, above quoted, require the attendance of abbats. Laity and deacons were obviously present and were consulted as a body both in St. Cyprian's time and later. Bishop Sage, who argues most strongly for the negative, is plainly arguing against facts. But there is always a distinction drawn, even by St. Cyprian, between the consilium of the clergy and the consensus of the plebs (see Moberly's Bampton Lectures, pp. 119, 305). The gradual changes, no doubt, which are found in respect to the people's interest in the election of Bishops [BISHOPS], affected also their position in councils called for other than elective purposes.

III. Of Oecumenical Councils, as of provincial ones, bishops were clearly the proper and essential members; yet here too presbyters and even deacons were sometimes present. At Nice, in A.D. 325, presbyters and deacons were present, and in great numbers; and one deacon certainly, St. Athanasius, spoke: but there is no trace or probability of their having voted. At Constantinople, A.D. 381, three presbyters occur among the signatures, signing to all appearance in their own names, and intermixed with the bishops of the province from which they came. But there are many other signatures in the list of presbyters signing as representatives of bishops. And since the list as it stands is the work of a copyist, it is quite as likely as not that these three also represented bishops, but that the few words at the end of each name indicating the fact have been accidentally omitted. At Constantinople, in A.D. 448, presbyter-archimandrites sign exactly as if they had also voted; and this council, although itself not oecumenical, is embodied in that of Chalcedon, A.D. 451. At Chalcedon itself one presbyter is noted to have spoken; and at the 2nd of Nice, A.D. 787, one presbyter signs, apparently in his own name (Bingh. II. xix. 13, from Habert). But exceptions of this kind seem rather to prove the rule, viz. that bishops, and bishops only, each as representing his own church, were the members of Oecumenical Councils.

C. THE AUTHORITY assigned to Oecumenical Councils was hardly made the subject of formal and systematic treatment, until the end of the great period of councils, viz. of the 4th century. It was then limited in three ways. i. Their decrees were not unalterable, in matters of discipline, by a further council; and required external obedience but nothing more, as being those of the highest church tribunal. ii. Their office, doctrinally, was not to enlarge the faith, but simply to testify in express and distinct terms to that which had been held implicitly before. "Quid unquam aliud conciliorum decretis enisa est [Ecclesia], nisi ut quod antea simpliciter credebatur, hoc idem postea diligentius crederetur;"

and again, "nisi ut quod prius a majoribus sola traditione susceperat, hoc deinde posteris etiam per scripturas chirographum consignaret . . . non novum fidei sensum novae appellationis proprietate signando" (Vincent. Lirin. Communil. c. xxiii.); and this, so as to be a "sedula et cantâ depositorum apud se dogmatum custos," without any the least change in them, of any kind whatsoever, whether of diminution or addition (Id. ib.). iii. They were not held to be formally infallible, but to possess an authority proportioned to their universality, to be capable of being amended by subsequent councils upon better information, and to be subordinate to Scripture. Of that which is certainly written in the Bible, says St. Augustin, speaking of a doctrinal question, "omnino dubitari et disceptari non possit utrum verum vel utrum rectum sit," but councils may set aside Episcopal dicta [St. Cyprian is the bishop specially intended], and national or provincial councils must "plenariorum conciliorum auctoritati, quae sunt ex universo orbe Christiano, sine ullis ambagibus cedere: ipsaeque plenaria saepe priora posterioribus emendari, cum aliquo experimento rerum aperitur quod clausum erat, et cognoscitur quod latebat" (St. Aug. De Bapt. c. Donat. II. 3, § 4). And again, in Epist. 54, the same St. Augustin, setting canonical Scripture first, places next in order universal customs, "non scripta sed tradita," which must be assumed to have been enacted "vel ab ipsis Apostolis, vel plenariis conciliis, quorum est in Ecclesia saluberrima auctoritas," instancing the observance of Good Friday, Easter Day, Ascension Day, Pentecost; and then, below these, mere national and local customs. Again, in arguing against Maximin the Arian, St. Augustin confines the decision to Scripture testimonies, bidding his opponent waive the Council of Ariminum, as he himself waives the "prejudication" of that of Nice. So again, St. Gregory the Great, saying repeatedly that he "quatuor Concilia suscipere et venerari sicut sancti Evangelii quatuor libros," and that "quintum quoque Concilium" (the last held up to his time) "pariter veneror" (Epist. i. 25; and see also, iii. 10, iv. 38, v. 51, 54), proceeds to allege as his ground for doing so, that they were "universali constituta consensu." St. Augustin indeed seems to consider the decision of a "plenary council" to be final, in a matter of discipline, because it is the highest attainable—"ultimum iudicium Ecclesiae" (Epist. 43, Ad Glor. et Eleus.); and refers the Donatists to such a council, as the remedy which "adhuc restabat," to revise, and if needful reverse, the sentence already delivered by the bishops at Rome under the pope. The well-known passage in St. Greg. Naz. (Epist. ad Procop. iv.), denouncing synods of bishops as doing more harm than good, through ambition and lust of contention, is simply an argument from the abuse of a thing against its use; yet proves certainly, that a council per se and a priori was not held to be infallible. On the other hand, besides the general phrase commonly prefixed to councils, "Sancto Spiritu suggerente," and the like, we find Socrates (i. 9) declaring that the Nicene fathers ὁδοῦσας ἀπορχήσαι τῆς ἀληθείας ἐδύνατο, because they were enlightened ὅπῃ τοῦ Θεοῦ καὶ τῆς χάριτος τοῦ Ἁγίου Πνεύματος; and St. Cyril (De Trin. I.) calling their decrees a Divine oracle (and so bers, as e.g. Isid. Pelus. v. 86, θεόθεν ἀμνημονεύοντα); and St. Ambrose, declaring that "neither sword nor the sword could separate him from the Nicene Council" (Epist. xxi.); and Leo the Great declaring repeatedly, that the faith of the East and Chalcedon is a first principle, from which neither himself nor any one else may derive (Epist. cv. cxiv. &c. A.D. 452, 453). While Justinian, who ordered all bishops to subscribe to the faith of the first four councils, is down in his Novels (cxvii.), that τῶν σεσημειωμένων ἁγίων συνόδων (viz. the four) τὰ γράμματα καθάπερ τὰς θείας Γραφῶν δεχόμεθα, ἡ τοῦτ' ἀνέκδοτος ὡς νόμους φυλάττομεν. The council of Chalcedon again speaks of the Nicene decrees as unalterable. And Leo the Great speaks of the faith of Chalcedon itself as an irrefragabilis consensus. And St. Ambrose, the decrees of general councils as "hereditary laws which no rashness may break" (De Fide 7, 15). In short, while no one asserts that such councils were formally incapable of erring, a entire current of church teaching assumed that they had not erred; and that it would be the right of presumption and of folly in any part of the church or any individual Christian to straddle them; while both Vincent of Lerins, and possibly Augustine, would allow to a succeeding council power only to build doctrinally upon a foundation already laid by its accepted predecessors. The Provincial Councils "began," by nullifying the question; the General Council terminated "the discussion, by sealing as it were it formally expressing the decision which had been added to its proper and natural close; and this, the assumption that such decision was accepted "universali Ecclesiae consensione" ("In tholico regionali concilio coepta, plenario terminata," and so "universali Ecclesiae consensione roborata," St. Aug. De Bapt. c. Donat. vii.). And St. Vincent of Lerins, in requiring nothing "vere proprieque Catholicum," that bique, semper, ab omnibus, creditum est" (Commonit. c. 2), obviously rests the certainty of ecclesial decisions upon the acceptance, implicitly explicitly, of the whole church of all times (cf. Hammond on Heresy, sect. vi. § 9, sq.); but refuses to allow that any question so decided is to be re-opened.

The relative authority of the pope and of a general council, did not emerge into a formal question until long after our period; although Augustine's language about Pope Melchior, and about the dicta of St. Cyprian, sufficiently shows what at any rate his decision would have been, had it been possible that the question could have been raised at that time.

Whether Provincial Councils could entertain questions of doctrine, is also a question not formally put until very late times indeed. That they also in point of fact in earlier times, may be seen a list of instances in Palmer, On the Church, . xiii. 1 § 2. And upon St. Augustine's view once quoted, it was their proper office to ventilate such questions, and as it were ripen them for the final determination of the Oecumenical council. Their authority, of course, like that of diocesan synods, was in proportion to their numbers and character, and to their subsequent acceptance by the Church at large.

The Church, speaking generally, has accepted solemnly the first six Oecumenical Councils,—of Nice, A.D. 321; Constantinople, A.D. 381; Ephesus, A.D. 431; Chalcedon, A.D. 451; Constantinople, A.D. 553; Constantinople again, A.D. 680. Where the first four are spoken of especially, it is, commonly, either in order to parallel them with the four Gospels (as e.g. St. Gregory the Great, who adds that he equally venerates the 5th, the last then held), or because the Fathers or others who speak of them lived before the 5th was held (e.g. Theodosius Coenobiarcha, in Baron. in an. 511, no. 33, from St. Cyril and Suidas,—"Si quis quatuor sanctas synodos non tanti esse existimat quanti quatuor evangelia, sit anathema"), or, lastly, because the 5th and 6th are taken to be as it were supplementary to the 3rd and 4th. So Conc. Lateran. A.D. 649, cans. 18, 19, accepts the five councils already then held, as being all there were. The Greek and Roman Churches accept a 7th, viz. the Council of Nice in favour of images, A.D. 787 (rejected by the Western Council at Frankfurt, A.D. 794, and by the English Church of the same date;—see Haddan and Stubbs, III. 468, 481); the Greek Church, however, fluctuating considerably in the point, accepting it A.D. 842, when the Κωνσταντῖνος Ὁρθόδοξος was appointed to celebrate the seven Oecumenical Councils, yet still hesitating in A.D. 863, but finally recognizing it in A.D. 879 (see Palmer, On the Church, P. IV. c. x. § 4). Pope Adrian accepted it. The previous Iconoclast Council of Constantinople, A.D. 754, is called the 8th Oecumenical by Cave, who counts the Trullan or Quinisext Council of A.D. 682 as the 7th. An 8th Oecumenical, viz. of A.D. 869, at Constantinople, which deposed Photius, is accepted as the next by Roman Theologians. That of A.D. 879, which restored him, is called the 8th by most of those of the East (Cave). The subsequent Western (so called) Oecumenical Councils do not fall within the scope of the present work. It is to be observed, however, that even in the 8th century, popes still spoke of the six General Councils, as e.g. Nicholas I., A.D. 859, and A.D. 863 or 866; Adrian I., A.D. 871 (see Palmer as above). The English Church accepted the first five, and also the canons of the Lateran Council of A.D. 649, respecting the Monothelites, which likewise accepted the five; and declared her own orthodoxy about Monothelitism with a view to the 8th General Council of A.D. 680, then impending, at the Council of Hatfield, A.D. 680 (Haddan and Stubbs III. 141, sq.). And Wilfrid had similarly professed orthodoxy in reference to Monothelite views at Rome itself in the same year, on behalf of English, Scots, and Picts (ib. 140). The legatine Councils of Calceyth and in Northumbria, A.D. 787, accepted the six General Councils (can. i. ib. 448). The canons of Aelfric, A.D. 957, accept the first four, as "the four books of Christ," and as having extinguished heresy, but add that "many synods had been held since, but these were the chief" (can. 33, Wilk. I. 254). The seventh General Council so called, of A.D. 787, was, as above said, not accepted by the English Church.

As a judicial body, the Provincial Council was at first the ultimate tribunal. An appeal from it to a larger council gradually became recognized; as at Conc. Antioch. A.D. 341. The appeal to the Patriarch of Constantinople, or to the Patriarch of Rome, was of later date still [APPEAL]. Conc. Avern. I. A.D. 535, can. 1, enacts, that in such councils no bishop shall presume to introduce any business, until all causes are determined which pertain "ad emendationem vite, ad severitatem regule, ad animae remedia."

For the office of diocesan and provincial synods in the election of bishops, see BISHOPS.

D. OF IRREGULAR councils, a few words must be said. And first of—

I. The συνδοὶ ἐκδημοῦσαι, as e.g. that of Constantinople A.D. 536 under Mennas, which is expressly so called, and at which also a letter was read from a similar meeting—παρὰ τῶν ἐκδημοῦντων Ἐπισκόπων—sc. from the bishops of the Patriarchates of Antioch and Jerusalem, who happened at the time to be at Constantinople. Justinian, although passing a law against bishops coming to Constantinople without the emperor's command or leave (De Episc. et Cleric. lib. i. leg. 42), yet frequently consulted and employed such synods. Bishops only, however, constituted them, and the Constantinopolitan patriarchs summoned them. II. The Frank Concilia Palatina, on the contrary, consisted of both bishops and nobles, under the presidency of king or emperor; as did also the Witenagemots on the English side of the channel. Yet the "synod" of bishops is distinguished, as a separate assembly for purely ecclesiastical matters, from the "placitum" or "conventus," as e.g. at Conc. Leptin. A.D. 743, the latter of the two consisting of bishops, nobles, presbyters, and abbats. So also in Spain: where e.g. Conc. Tolet. iv. A.D. 633 can. 75, which was a national Spanish Council, especially characterizes its decree, even about the succession to the throne, as "pontificale decretum." In England, while bishops and nobles constituted the Witenagemot, Provincial Councils, as at Hertford and Hatfield, consisted of the clergy only. The king came in time to be usually present; and larger exceptions occur in later times, as e.g. at the Council of Calchyth, A.D. 787, at which lay nobles were present as well as the king. In Carolingian France, the rule is laid down in terms in Abbot Adalhard's Ordo Palatii (ap. Hincmar. Opp. ii. 214):—"Utrunque autem seniorum susceptacula [reception rooms for the various divisions of the Palatine Councils] sic in duobus divisa erant, ut primo omnes Episcopi, Abbates, vel hujusmodi honorificentiores clerici, absque ulla laicorum commixtione congregarentur: similiter comites vel hujusmodi principes sibiimet honorificentiliter a cetera multitudine primo mane segregarentur, quousque tempus sive praesente sive absente Rege occurrerent: et tunc praedicti seniores more solito, Clerici ad suam, Laici vero ad suam constitutam curiam, subsellis similiter honorificentiliter praeparatis, convocarentur: qui cum separati a ceteris essent, in eorum manebat potestate, quando simul vel quando separati residerent, prout eos tractandae causae qualitas docebat, sive de spiritualibus sive de saecularibus seu etiam commixtis: similiter si propter quamlibet vesceudi vel investigandi causam quemcumque convocare voluissent, et re comperta discederet, in eorum voluntate manebat. Haec interim de his que eis a Rege ad tractandum proponebantur." III. There occur, besides these, a few exceptional cases, as e.g. the Conference at Whitby, A.D. 664, which can hardly be called a council in the proper sense. But these need not be here dwelt upon.

COURIER. [CURSOR.]

COUSINS, MARRIAGE OF. [COUSINS-GERMAN: MARRIAGE.]

COUSINS-GERMAN. No prohibition against the intermarriage of cousins-german is contained or implied in Leviticus xviii. or Deuteronomy xxvii., nor can any such be inferred from any other passage of the Old Testament; a direct sanction is, on the contrary, given to the practice in the instance of the five daughters of Zelophehad, who "were married to their father's brother's sons" (Numb. xxxvi. 11). Nor does any such prohibition occur in the monuments of early Christianity. If we take the so-called Apostolical canons to represent the customs of the Church prior to the Nicene Council, 325, neither in the text, nor in the ancient version of Dionysius Exiguus, as given in Cotelierus' "Patres Apostolici," is such a connection mentioned in the canon (c. 15, otherwise 10), which forbids clerical orders to one who has married two sisters, or a niece (ἀδελφίδην, rendered in the Latin filiam fratris). But it must be observed that in the version by Haloander, which is usually included in the Corpus Juris, the same canon (numbered 18) contains instead the larger term consobrinam, usually rendered "cousin"—a palpable tampering with the text to meet later ecclesiastical usage. At any rate Martene (De ant. Eccles. Rit. bk. i. c. ix.) admits that, till the end of the 4th century, marriages between cousins-german were allowed by the Church. It is therefore to be inferred that the disfavour with which the Church, especially the Western one, came to look upon cousins' marriages was rather borrowed from Roman feeling than from Jewish. It is certain that marriage between cousins-german was not practised in early times by the Romans, although, indeed, it had become prevalent in the 1st century of the empire, since we find Vitellius adducing the fact of the change in public opinion in this respect in order to justify the proposed marriage between the emperor Claudius and his niece, the younger Agrippina (Tac. Ann. bk. xii. c. 6). The jurists of the Digest do not, however, look upon first cousins' marriages with disfavour, as appears by Paulus quoting, with approval, an opinion of Pomponius, that if a man have a grandson by one son and a granddaughter by another, they may intermarry by his sole authority (Dig. xxiii. § ii. l. 3). In the latter part of the 4th century, indeed, Theodosius, by a law of which the text is lost, forbade these unions, except under special permission; and a letter of Ambrose (who indeed is suspected to have advised the prohibition) to Paternus, refers both to the law and to its relaxations in special cases (Ep. 66). Augustine also, in his City of God (bk. 15, c. 16), ys that such marriages, though not prohibited by the Divine law, were rare by custom, even when not yet prohibited by the human law; but who can doubt that in our time the marriages even of cousins were more fitly (honestius) prohibited?" And the law is likewise alluded to by Libanius, in his oration on Purveyances περί τῶν ἀρραβῶν. A constitution of Arcadius and Honorius, A.D. 396 (Cod. Theod. bk. iii. . xii. l. 3), confirms the law, assimilating the marriage with a cousin to that with a niece, and declaring that, though the man may retain his fortune during his life, he is not to be considered to have either wife or children, and can neither give nor leave anything to them even through a third person. If there be a dos, it must go to the imperial exchequer; it cannot be bequeathed to strangers, but must go to the next of kin, except such as may have taken part in or devised the marriage. Another law, of the same emperor, indeed (ib. t. x.), maintains the right of praying for a dispensation (this is a text which has strangely misunderstood), and a third one (A.D. 405), which took its place permanently in Justinian's Code, swept the prohibition away. Professing to "revoke the authority of the old law," it declares the marriage of cousins-german, whether born of two brothers or two sisters, or of a brother and sister, to be lawful, and their issue to be capable of inheriting (Code, bk. v. t. iv. l. 19).

Narrower views, however, prevailed in the West, and in Italy particularly, to that extent that we might almost suppose the Theodosian legislation to have remained unrevoked. In the Formularium of Cassiodore, under the Ostrogothic King Theodoric (end of 5th century), we find a text implying its subsistence, since it is that of a state privilege legalizing such unions—the 46th Formula of the 2nd part being one "by which a cousin may become a lawful wife." And the "Lex Romana," supposed to represent the laws of the Roman population under the Lombard rule, expressly reckons marriage with a cousin as incestuous (bk. iii. t. 12). Finally, a capitulary of Aruba, Prince of Benevento, who succeeded the fief after the death of Desiderius, the last Lombard king (A.D. 374), seems to prohibit—as in the earliest constitution of Arcadius and Honorius on the subject—all donations by a father to his children by such a marriage (c. 8). On the other hand, the Lombard laws themselves exhibit no restraint on cousins' marriages; and it appears clear that, whether the Theodosian legislation in the matter were inspired or not by the clergy, it was by the clergy that its spirit was preserved.

We need not indeed rely as an authority on an alleged decree on consanguinity by Pope Fabian (336-52), to be found in Gratian, allowing marriages within the 5th degree, and leaving those of the 4th undisturbed; nor on one of Pope Julius I. (A.D. 336-52), in the same collection, forbidding marriages within the 7th degree of consanguinity; nor on an alleged canon to the same effect of the 1st Council of Lyons, A.D. 517, to be found in Bouchard (c. 10). But the Council of Agde, in 506, declared incestuous the marriage with an uncle's daughter or any other nearwoman, the parties to remain among the interhumens till they had made amends, although existing marriages were not to be dissolved (c. 81); an injunction repeated by the Council of Epaoche, 517 (c. 30), and substantially by the 3rd Council of Orleans, § 38, and by the Council of Auxerre, 578, which forbade even the marriage of second cousins (c. 31); see also the 3rd Council of Paris, about 557, c. 4, and the 2nd Council of Tours, 567, c. 51. We need, again, lay no stress on an alleged canon without a distinctive number, quoted by Ivo as from the canons of the Council of Orleans, 511, imposing for penance, in respect of such marriages, a twelvemonth's exclusion from church (during which the parties are to feed only on bread, water, and salt, except on Sundays and holidays), abstinence during life, and a prohibition to marry—a regulation savouring altogether of the later Carolingian period.

Pope Gregory the Great (590-603), whilst recognizing that the law of the Church was upon this point in opposition with the civil law, sought to base the prohibition, in part at least, on a physiological reason. In an "exposition of diverse things," in answer to Augustine of Canterbury, which forms the 31st in the 12th book of his collected letters—a most valuable repertory of facts as well for the social as for the Church history of the period—he says (c. 5) that "some earthly law in the Roman empire" (he is evidently alluding to the Constitution of Arcadius and Honorius, before referred to) allows marriage between the son and daughter of a brother and sister or of two sisters [or brothers]; but "we have learnt by experience that from such a marriage no issue can proceed;" besides that, the "holy law" forbids the uncovering of a kinswoman's nakedness. (See also Bede, Hist. Eccles. i. 27.) A wide experience shows how rash is the former assertion; whilst it is clear that so far from the "holy law" of the Old Testament forbidding generally intermarriage amongst kinsmen, the whole fabric of Jewish society, in its separation from the heathen, in its distinction between the tribes themselves, is based upon it. Cousins' marriages were, however, forbidden some years after Gregory's death, by the 5th Council of Paris, A.D. 615 (c. 14).

In the latter half of the 7th century we find marriage with an uncle's daughter condemned by the Eastern Church itself at the Council of Constantinople in Trullo, 681, and separation of the parties ordered (c. 54). It is remarkable, however, that in the canons of a council held in Britain under Theodore, Archbishop of Canterbury (end of 7th century), it is stated that, "according to the Greeks, it is lawful to marry in the 3rd degree, as it is written in the law—in the 5th, according to the Romans—yet they do not dissolve the marriage when it has taken place" (c. 24, and see also 139), and the Roman rule is enacted in a later canon (108), which would seem to cast a doubt on the genuineness of the Trullan canon, about the middle of the 8th century. The Excerpta, attributed to Egbert of York, make it the rule that marriages are permitted in the 5th degree, the parties not to be separated in the 4th, but to be separated in the 3rd (bk. ii. c. 28). Substantially, first cousins' marriages seem for some considerable time, when once solemnized, to have been tolerated. Thus Gregory II. (714-30), in a long letter (Ep. 13) to Boniface, replying to various questions, whilst stating that he allows marriages after the 4th degree (c. i.), does not expressly condemn those in the 4th. This, however, is now repeatedly done by councils and by popes; in the 1st Council of Rome against unlawful marriages, 721 (c. 4); by Gregory III. 731-41, in his excerpts from the fathers and the canons (c. 11); in the Synod of Metz, 753 (c. 1), which, for the first time enacts corporal punishment—the guilty party, if without money, being a slave or freedman, to be well beaten, and if an ecclesiastical person of mean condition, to be beaten or sent to jail: in the 6th Council of Arles, 813 (c. 11); and that of Mayence in the same year (c. 54).

We have now to see the influence of the clerical view on civil legislation in respect of first cousins' marriages after the barbaric invasions. With the exception of Italy, the peculiarities of whose legislation on this head have been previously noticed, the only barbaric code in which we find a prohibition before the Carolingian era is the Visigothic one, strongly clerical in spirit, as must always be recollected. Here a law of Recarede forbids generally all marriages with the kindred of a father or mother, grandfather or grandmother, to the sixth generation, unless contracted by permission of the prince before the passing of the law, the parties to be separated and sent to monasteries (bk. iii. t. v. c. 1). In the case of Jews indeed there was superadded to separation the treble punishment of decalvation (scalping), 100 lashes, and banishment (bk. xii. 7, iii. c. 8). With these exceptions, all other enactments adverse to such marriages belong to the Carolingian rule or period. A capitulary of king Pepin at Vermerie, A.D. 753, only absolutely requires the dissolution of marriage in the 3rd degree, allowing those in the 4th, once contracted, to stand good under penance, but forbidding them for the future (c. 1). The capitulary of Compiègne A.D. 757 (see Pertz's text) is to the same effect (cc. 1, 2). On the other hand, the law of the Allamans (t. 39) renewed under Duke Lautfrid, supposed the 2nd (died 751), and the somewhat later law of the Bavarians (t. 6)—both indeed thought to have been touched up under Charlemagne—reckon all marriages between the sons of brothers and sisters unlawful, and require them to be dissolved; all property of the guilty parties to go to the public treasury, and if they be "mean persons" (minores personae) themselves to become slaves to it. The Carolingian capitularies proper, almost all of them confirmed by Church synods, are scarcely to be distinguished from ecclesiastical enactments. The text of some of the earlier ones must have been tampered with, since even King Pepin's Compiègne capitulary above referred to is brought into accordance with the far stricter rules of the Synod of Metz. As the law stands in the general collection of the capitularies, if a man marries his cousin, he is not only to lose all settled moneys, but if he will not amend his ways none is to receive him or give him food; he is to compound in 60 solidi, or be sent to gaol till he pays. If he be slave or freedman, he is to be well beaten, and his master to compound in 60 solidi. If he be an ecclesiastical person, he is to lose any dignity he has, or if not honourable, to be beaten or sent to gaol (A.D. 756-7, bk. vii. cc. 9, 10). A capitulary of the 6th book (130) forbids marriage to the 7th degree. So does one of the Additio tertia, c. 123, under pain of the ban (at 60 solidi) and penance for a freeman; but for a slave, of public flagellation and decalvation, and penance. If the offenders be disobedient, they are to be kept in jail "in much wretchedness" (sub magna aerumnâ), nor touch any of their fortune till they do penance; and whilst living in crime (c. 124) are to be treated as gentiles, catechumens or energumens. Jews marrying within the prohibited degrees are to receive 100 lashes after having been publicly decalvated, to be exiled and do penance, with forfeiture of their property either to their children by any former marriage, not being Jews, or in default of such to the prince (Additio quarta, c. 2), a provision borrowed mainly from one of the Visigothic codes above referred to. See also cc. 74, 75 of the Fourth Addition, anathematizing the man who marries a cousin, and repeating the prohibition against marriages within the 7th generation. The various enactments requiring inquiry to be made as to consanguinity before marriage, bear also on this subject; as for instance the Council of Frejus in 791, c. 6; Charlemagne's first capitulary of 802, c. 35; an inquiry which by his Edict of 814 is even required to be made after marriage, the 4th degree being expressly specified as one of prohibited consanguinity.

On the whole, the course of Church practice on the subject appears to have been this: the traditional Roman prejudice against cousins' marriages, although quite uncountenanced by the Jewish law or practice, commended itself instinctively to the ascetic tendencies of the Western fathers, and through them took root among the Western clergy generally, embodying itself indeed temporarily, towards the end of the 4th century, in a general civil law for the Roman empire. But whilst this law was abrogated in the beginning of the 5th century, and in the East such unions remained perfectly lawful both in the Church and in the State throughout nearly the whole of the period which occupies us, never being condemned by any Œcumenic Council till that of Constantinople towards the end of the 7th century, in the West the clergy adhered to the harsher view; Popes and local synods sought to enforce it; wherever clerical influence could be brought to bear on the barbaric legislators it became apparent; till at last under the Carolingian princes it established itself as a law alike of the State and of the Church. But the history of this restraint upon marriage is that of all others not derived from Scripture itself. Originating probably all of them in a sincere though mistaken asceticism, they were soon discovered to supply an almost inexhaustible mine for the supply of the Church's coffers, through the grant of dispensations, prosecutions in the Church Courts, compromises. The baleful alliance between Carolingian usurpation and Romish priestcraft, in exchange for the subserviency of the clergy to the ambition and the vices of the earlier despots, delivered over the social morality of the people to them, it may be said, as a prey, and the savageness of Carolingian civil legislation was placed at the service of the new-fangled Church discipline of the West. [J. M. L.]

COVETOUSNESS. The works of the earliest Christian authorities are full of warnings

the different forms of covetousness, e.g. 1 Corinth. bk. ii. cc. 5, 6; Hermas, bk. i. ad bk. ii. mand. 12; Const. Apost., bk. i. c. 46; iv. c. 4; vii. cc. 3, 4. The canon Constitutions follow St. Paul in treating covetousness as a disqualification for a bishop; c. 6; and in a later constitution also for a deacon; bk. vii. c. 31. The covetousness of the Church-widows is especially noted; "who deem gain their only work, working without shame and taking without shame already rendered most persons more in giving,"—who "running about to the doors of their neighbours, heap up for themselves an abundance of goods, and lend at usury, and have mammon for their sole god, whose God is their purse," &c. (bk. iii. The oblations of the covetous were not received (bk. iv. c. 6). With this may be compared the canonical epistle of Gregory the Great, archbishop of Neocesarea (about 590) which declares that it is impossible to read in a single letter all the sacred writings proclaim not robbery alone to be a fearful sin, but all covetousness, all grasping at others' or filthy lucre; the particular object of prohibition being apparently those persons who thought a late barbaric invasion to be an opportunity for gain (can. 7 and foll.). Of the Fathers in like manner vigorously defend the existence of the vice among the

The covetousness of Pope Zephyrinus (beginning of 3rd century) is denounced by Irenaeus in his Philosophumena (bk. ix. c. 7).

About the middle of the century, Ambrose, in his book De lapsis, speaks of those monks who "with an insatiable ardour for covetousness pursued the increase of their wealth." Ambrose, in his 7th sermon, describes those who, "not satisfied with the maintenance given by the Lord's command, from the altar. In his intercessions, grasps willingly the widows," and yet flatters himself by saying one charges me with robbery, no one me of violence"—as if sometimes flattery draw a larger booty from widows than

Jerome with bitter sarcasm speaks of; "who are richer as monks than they as seculars," and of "clerics who possess under Christ the poor, which they had from the devil, rich and deceitful, so that they sigh over those as wealthy, whom the world before held for beggars." And he addresses his correspondent to flee from the cleric who poor has become rich as from some snake (Ep. 2, ad Nepotianum; and see also Ep. ad Eliodorum). In his long letter or treatise addressed to Eustochius again (Ep. 22), he draws a satirical picture of an old cleric who has forced his way almost into the very bed-chamber of a sleeper, and praise some piece of ore or other article till he at last rather than obtained it; contrasting with the covetousness of Roman society the monk at Nitria, who at his death had to have saved 100 solidi which he had by weaving linen. The monks consulted to do; some were for giving it to the poor, the Church, some for handing it over to the family of the deceased; but Macarius, Pambos, and the other fathers of the community that it should be buried with him.

Gregory of Nyssa, indeed, in his letter to Letorius, observes that the fathers have affixed no punishment to this sin, which he assimilates to adultery; though it be very common in the Church, none inquires of those who are brought to be ordained if they be polluted with it. Theft, violation of graves, and sacrilege are, he says, the only vices taken account of, although usury be also prohibited by divine scripture, and the acquiring by force the goods of others, even under colour of business. Against this statement should indeed be set if not a decree (1) from Gratian ascribed to Pope Julius I. A.D. 336-52, which denounces as filthy lucre the buying in time of harvest or of vintage, not of necessity but of greed, victuals or wine, in order by buying to sell at a higher price, at least the 17th canon of the Council of Nicaea (A.D. 325), directed against the love of filthy lucre and usury, and enacting deposition as the punishment for the cleric. But here, as in a parallel canon (6) of the Synod of Seleucia, A.D. 410, it is perhaps to be inferred that the vice was chiefly if not solely aimed at under the concrete form of usury (as to which see USURY); as also when St. Basil, in his canonical epistle to Bishop Amphilocheus of Iconium, writes that the usurer who spends his unjust gains on the poor and frees himself from avarice may be admitted to orders (c. 14). That covetousness was as rife in the monastery as in the world may be inferred from the fact that Cassian's work, De Coenobiorum institutis (end of 4th or beginning of 5th century) contains a whole book (the 7th) De Spiritu philargyriae.

The very doubtful "Sanctions and Decrees of the Nicene fathers," of Greek origin apparently (2nd volume of Labbe and Mansi's Concilia, pp. 1029 and foll.), require priests not to be given to heaping up riches, lest they should prefer them to the ministry, and if they do accumulate wealth to do so moderately (c. 14). The 3rd Council of Orleans, A.D. 538, forbids clerics, from the diaconate upwards, to carry on business as public traders for the greed of filthy lucre, or to do so in another's name. As the times wear on indeed, covetousness seems often to be confounded with avarice, and to be legislated against under that name. The Code of Canons of the African Church, ending with the Council of Carthage of A.D. 419, has thus a canon "on avarice," which it says is to be reprehended in a layman, but much more in a priest (c. 5). So with the Carolingian Councils and Capitularies. That of Aix-la-Chapelle in 789 forbids avaritia; no one is to encroach on the boundaries of others nor pass his father's landmark (c. 32, and see also c. 64. "de avaritia vel concupiscentia"). The Council of Frankfort, A.D. 794, has a canon (34), and the contemporary capitulary of Frankfort a section (33 or 34), "de avaritia et cupiditate." The capitulary of Aix-la-Chapelle of 801, according to one codex, enjoins priests to abstain from filthy lucre and usury, and so to teach the people (c. 25, and see also the Admonitio generalis of the same year, in Pertz). The first capitulary of 802 requires monks and nuns not to be given to covetousness (cc. 17, 18), nor canons to filthy lucre (c. 11). Some Additions to a Nimegueu Capitulary in 806 (Pertz) treat at some length of "cupiditas"—which is said to be taken either in good or bad part, "in bad part of him who beyond measure will desire any kind of thing," (c. 3)— of "avaritia," which is "to desire the things of others, and having acquired them to impart them to none" (c. 4), and of "filthy lucre" (c. 5), of which an instance is given in the buying at harvest or vintage time, not of necessity, but for covetousness, in order to sell at a higher price; "but if a man buy for necessity, that he may have for himself and distribute to others, we call it trade" (c. 7). The Ecclesiastical Capitulary of Aix-la-Chapelle in 809 again enjoins priests to avoid all avarice and covetousness (c. 2). The second Council of Rheims, 813, also enacted that none (apparently of the clergy) were to follow the evil of covetousness and avarice (c. 28). The second Council of Châlons, in the same year, that if clerics gather together the fruits of the earth or certain revenues of the soil, they should not do so to sell the dearer and gather treasures together, but for the sake of the poor (c. 8).

One form of covetousness—the rapacity of judges and other functionaries in exacting fees,—would seem to fall better under the head of SPORTULAE, by which name such fees were known in the Roman world, and are designated in the legislation of Justinian (Code, bk. iii. T. ii. Novs. 17, 82, 123). We may however quote a chapter of the Wisigothic law (bk. ii. c. 25, amended by Chindasuinth), which says: "We have known many judges who by occasion of covetousness overpassing the order of law, presume to take to themselves one-third of the causes" (i.e. amounts in dispute); and which limits the judge's fee to 5 per cent., requiring him to restore any surplus beyond this proportion which he may have taken, with an equal amount besides.

COWL. [CUCULLA.]

CRATON, martyr at Rome, Feb. 15 (Mart. Rom. Vet., Usuardi). [C.]

CREDENCE (Lat. credentia, Ital. credenza, Gr. παράπρετος). The table or slab on which the vessels and elements for the Eucharist are placed before consecration. "Credentiam appellat mensam . . . supra quam ad sacrificandum necessaria continentur" (Ceremoniale Romanum, i. 3, quoted by Ducange, s. v.). It is doubtful whether such a table or slab existed in the sanctuary within our period, as it rather seems probable that the elements were brought from the sacristy and placed at once on the altar, when they ceased to be taken from the offerings of the faithful. See PROTIBES. [C.]

CREED, from the Latin credo. Hence the title should be confined to such confessions of our Christian Faith as commence with the words I BELIEVE, or WE BELIEVE, or, again, to any interrogatories as may be addressed at baptism or other occasions, DOST THOU BELIEVE? but, in practice, it has been used in a more general sense, and any document which has contained a summary of the chief tenets of the Christian Faith as held by any local or national Church, has been called the CREED of that Church. Thus the Rules of Faith, of which we find traces in the earliest Christian writers, and which were intended to guide teachers in the instruction which they conveyed, have been called Creeds. So, also, have been designated the instructions which were prepared for candidates for baptism.

NAMES.—(2.) For "Creeds," in this wider sense, we find the following words used by early Greek writers: ὁ πίστεως ἀρχαίος κανὼν, ὁ κανὼν τῆς ἀληθείας, τὸ κήρυγμα τὸ ἀποστολικόν, ἡ εὐαγγελικὴ καὶ ἀποστολικὴ παράδοσις. So Tertullian very frequently appeals to the regula fidei. The creed of the Church, properly so called, was designated first as ἡ πίστις or ἡ παραδοθεῖσα ἡμῖν ἀγία καὶ ἀποστολικὴ πίστις among the Greeks, and as fides, fides apostolica among the Latins. We find the word symbolum for the first time in Cyprian, and after the title became prevalent among Latin writers it found its way among the Greek authors. But even in the fifth century the Nicene Creed was commonly known as ἡ πίστις. The words τὸ σύμβολον τοῦ ἀποκεκράθαι, found in Origen, denote, not the Creed, but Baptism itself, or (possibly) "the outward and visible sign in Baptism." And, similarly, we must interpret a passage in Tertullian: "Testatio fidei et signaculum symboli." In a canon of the Laodicean council, however, the word occurs once. In later years the words σύμβολον, and symbolum or symbolus, became the favorite designation of the baptismal Creed. Its meaning will be discussed elsewhere.

3. The words of our Lord in the institution of Baptism undoubtedly gave the first form to the Baptismal Creeds which we find prevailing in the 3rd century. His injunction that His apostles should "make disciples of all nations, baptizing them in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost," seemed almost of necessity to call forth on the part of the recipient of Baptism some avowal of belief in God as thus revealed. The words which we read in our English version of Acts viii. 37, containing the appeal of Philip to the Eunuch and the reply of the Eunuch, are not found in the best extant MSS. of the Acts of the Apostles; but the incident thus recorded may be regarded as not improbable; and we find indications in the pages of Irenaeus that it was believed by him to have occurred. St. Paul reminds Timothy of the good confession which he had made "before many witnesses." This is generally believed to have taken place at his baptism. Passing by for the present, as scarcely applicable to our immediate purpose, the passage of Justin Martyr where he relates how "they who are persuaded and believe that the things are true which are taught by us, are taken to some place where there is water, and are there baptized," and the expression of Irenaeus regarding "the canon of the truth which every one received at his baptism," we come to words of Tertullian, in which he speaks of the Holy Spirit "sanctifying the faith of those who believe in the Father and the Son and the Holy Ghost." [BAPTISM, p. 160.]

4. Thus are we led to infer that the primary baptismal confession corresponded to the baptismal formula; that as the convert was "baptized into the name of the Father and the Son and the Holy Spirit," so was he called upon to state that "he believed in the Father and in the Son and in the Holy Spirit." And that our inference is correct seems clear from fragments of liturgies which have come down to us from various ages and different Churches. The Aethiopic manuscript of the Apostolic Constitutions describes the catechumen as declaring at the time of his baptism: "I believe in the only God, the Father, the Almighty, and in His begotten Son Jesus Christ, our Lord and our, and in the Holy Spirit, the Life-giver." The words follow. So the pseudo-Ambrose, in his treatise on the Sacraments (book ii. c. 7; 16, xvi. 429), "Thou wast asked, 'Dost thou believe in God the Father Almighty?' Thou sayest, 'I believe,' and thou wast immersed. Then thou wast asked, 'Dost thou believe also in our Lord Jesus Christ and in His cross?' Thou sayest again, 'I believe,' and wast immersed. Then a third time thou wast asked, 'And dost thou believe in the Holy Spirit?' Thou didst say, 'I believe,' and for a third time thou wast immersed." So, again, in the formula for baptism found in an old Gallican missal and printed by Martene (i. p. 51); in the old Roman Ritual given by Daniel (i. p. 173); and in the formula adopted by Boniface, for use among his Irish converts (Migne, vol. lxxix. p. 810).

CREED

But although this Baptismal Formula showed the type of the Baptismal Confession, and that, even in Tertullian's time, the Confession embraced something not mentioned in the words of Institution. "The Catechumen," says the great African writer (de Corona militis, § 3), "thrice immersed, answering something more than the Lord commanded in His Gospel." In his treatise (de Baptismo, § 11) we may see what that "something" was. "Some Cyprian writes" would depreciate baptism, because our Lord did not Himself baptize. But the apostles baptized at His command. . . . whereunto should He baptize? To repentance?—wherefore, then, His forerunner? To vision of sins?—which He gave by a word!

Himself?—whom in His humility He concealed! Into the Holy Spirit?—who not as yet descended from the Father! the Church?—which was not yet founded." In this passage Bishop Bull (Judicium Ecclesiasticum, Works, vol. vi. p. 139) infers (and, we think, is entitled to do so) that in Tertullian's neighbourhood and epoch, at the time of baptism, as mention was made, not only of the Father and of the Holy Spirit, and of the Son of God, but also of repentance, of remission of sins, of the Church. Thus we are induced to say at least these two articles may have been included in Tertullian's Creed, viz. "Repentance unto the remission of sins" and "the Church." But in regard to "the Church" all is removed by referring to a later section of the same treatise, where our author inquires the origin of its introduction thus: "where the Three are, there is the Church, the Father, the Son, and the Holy Spirit; of the Three: there the testatio fidei;" on the part of the baptized: "there the testatio salutis;" this on the part of God.

We purposely abstain from adducing passages bearing on the Rule of Faith to which Tertullian continually appeals, because in our present such Rule of Faith was so called as the guide of the believer and of the teacher, was of wider extent than the Baptismal Creed. So we will proceed to ask what light the works of Cyprian which have come down throw on the baptismal customs of his day? Allowed Tertullian by a generation, being a native of Carthage from 248 to 258, and his correspondence is in our present investigation important, as it contains several letters on the subject of re-baptizing those who had been baptized by heretical teachers; and these letters of course contain allusions (though they may be little more than allusions) to the ceremony of Baptism.

7. We will translate the most interesting: "If any object that Novatianus holds the same law of faith which the Catholic Church holds, that he baptizes with the same symbol" (the first time the name occurs in Latin), "knows the same God the Father, the same Son Christ, and may therefore avail himself of the power to baptize, because in the baptismal interrogations he seems not to differ from us: let such men know that we and the schismatics have not the same law of symbol, nor the same interrogations; for when they say, 'Dost thou believe remission of sins and eternal life through the Church?' in the question itself they speak falsely, because they have not the Church." This is found in his letter to Magnus (Ep. 69, § vii.). A passage somewhat similar is found in another letter (70, § ii.), and in his epistle to Firmilianus (75, § x.), he speaks of the "usitata et legitima verba interrogationis" at baptism. From all this we may safely conclude that this "fixed and legalised form of interrogation" did not then contain any reference to those points of doctrine on which Novatian went wrong: probably it called forth little more than the expression of belief in the Father, the Son, the Holy Ghost, and in remission of sins and eternal life, of which the assurance was conveyed when one was rightly admitted into the Church at Baptism.

8. We must pass now to consider the usage in regard to Creeds in the Churches of the East.

From the earliest years of the Christian era, the Oriental Churches were more harassed by strange teachings than were those of the Latin race. It was the boast of Rufinus that no heresy took its rise within the Church of Rome; and of Ambrose that the Church of Rome had preserved undefiled the symbol of the Apostles. Thus the difference between the Eastern and Western symbols may be learnt from the opening clauses of their respective Creeds. In the former (and among these we of course include the "canon" of the Greek-speaking community of Lyons) men professed their belief in one God; in the latter, their belief in God. The growth of the latter creeds we will consider hereafter; for the present we confine ourselves to the former.

9. The seventh book of the Apostolic Constitutions is regarded by most critics as older than the Nicene Council, and by many as representing the customs of Antioch, about the end of the third century. Dr. Caspari assigns it to the same period, though he considers it to have belonged to the Syrian Churches. Herein we have a full account of the ceremonies which were performed at baptism, and of the confession which the catechumen made. He said: "I renounce Satan and his works," . . . "and after his renunciation (proceeds the text) let him say, 'I enrol myself under Christ, and I believe and am baptized into one, unbegotten, only, true God, Almighty, the Father of Christ, the Creator and Maker of all things, of whom are all things; and in the Lord Jesus the Christ, His only-begotten Son, begotten before all creation, who by the pleasure of the Father was before all worlds; begotten, not made; through whom all things were made which are in heaven and on earth, both visible and invisible; who in the last days came down from heaven and assumed flesh, of the Holy Virgin Mary being born, and lived holily after the laws of His God and Father, and was crucified under Pontius Pilate, and died for us, and rose again from the dead, after his suffering, on the third day, and ascended into the heavens and sat down on the right hand of the Father, and is coming again at the end of the world with glory to judge quick and dead, of whose kingdom there shall be no end. I am baptized, too, into the Holy Spirit; that is, the Paraclete, which wrought in all the saints since the beginning of the world, and was afterwards sent from the Father, according to the promise of our Saviour and Lord Jesus Christ; and, after the Apostles, to all who believe in (ἐν) the holy Catholic and Apostolic Church, in (eis) the resurrection of the flesh, and the remission of sins, and the kingdom of heaven, and the life of the world to come." Such is the Creed which connects the rule of faith which may be found in Irenaeus with the Creed which has received the name of the Nicene.

10. It is beyond the scope of the present article to examine and enumerate the errors and the heresies to which reference is made in this long baptismal confession (ὁμολογία βαπτισματος). The Confession of belief issued by the Synod of Antioch against Paul of Samosata, and those of Gregory of Neo-Caesarea and Lucian the Martyr, and others, were not used in any office of the Church; and they thus have the character of an exposition of the Faith, rather than that of a Creed proper. Only, we must note in passing, that in the letter of Alexander of Alexandria to his namesake at Constantinople, we meet with the phrase, ἐν πνεύμα ἁγίῳ ὁμολογούμεν,—we confess one Holy Spirit, and doubtless the conception of confession we must extend to other points named in the letter; and thus we have further intimation that a custom of confessing God prevailed, not only at baptism, with the competentes, but amongst matured members of the Churches. This doubtless was made during some part of their common worship; and in the same sense we may perhaps understand his words, ταῦτα διδασκόμεν, ταῦτα κηρύττομεν (Migne, xviii. p. 549).

11. Still the passages in which the Creed is referred to speak almost exclusively of its use at baptism. When Eusebius wrote to his flock his interesting account of what had passed at the Council of Nicaea, and transcribed for it the Creed which he had recited as that used "when he had been a catechumen, and again when he was baptized," he makes no mention of its use at the Eucharist. "During his whole ministerial life, both when he was a presbyter, and since he became a bishop, he had believed it and had taught it." So, again, when the Nicene Creed proper was referred to in the famous decree of the Council of Ephesus, the great danger against which the fathers were anxious to provide was this: "that no one should offer or exhibit any but the accepted faith to such as were willing to turn to the knowledge of the truth from Hellenism or Judaism." No mention is made of the introduction of the Creed into the other offices of the Church. Eutyches recited the Nicene symbol at the Robber Synod of Ephesus, and stated that "in this faith he had been baptized and sealed, and in it he had lived, and in it he hoped to be perfected;" but no reference is made to any other public use: and once more, when at the second session of the Council of Chalcedon, the deacon Aëtius read out the Creed of the holy Synod of Nicaea and the holy faith which the 150 holy fathers put out at Constantinople agreeing with it, whilst both creeds met with the cry, "This is the faith of the Catholics: this is the faith of all. We all believe like this:" in regard to the Nicene symbol alone they added, "In this we have been baptized: in this we baptize;" but not a word was said as to the recitation of either at any other service (Mansi, vi. 957). Only the same limited use is mentioned by Epiphanius in the latter pages of his Anchoratus; and in the Catechetical Lectures of Cyril of Jerusalem.

12. We must not, however, omit to mention that it was the custom for the bishops present to subscribe to the Creed before they broke up from the great councils: thus, at the conclusion of the Council of Chalcedon, "all the most religious bishops cried out, 'This is our faith, let our Metropolitans subscribe; let them subscribe at once in the presence of the magistrates: things well defined admit of no delay: this is the faith of the Apostles: by this we all walk: we all thus think.'"

13. Let us now briefly trace the subsequent history of the use of the symbols. Timotheus, bishop of Constantinople A.D. 511, is stated by Theodorus Lector (Hist. Eccl. p. 563) to have ordered "that the creed should be recited καθ' ἑκάστην σὺναξιν, at every congregation; whereas previously it had been used only on the Thursday before Easter, when the bishops catechized the candidates for baptism." As the avowed object of Timotheus was to express the continued abhorrence which the Church felt for the teaching of Macedonius, it is clear that the exposition of Constantinople was intended in the order, even though it speaks of "the Creed of the 318." A similar direction had been given by Peter the Fuller, Patriarch of Antioch (450 to 488). Then it seems to have spread through the East, and thus the Creeds seem to have found their way into the liturgies which bear the names of Chrysostom, Basil, and others. From the East the custom came into the West. The 3rd Council of Toledo, c. ii. (A.D. 589) directed that "before the Lord's Prayer in the liturgy, the creed of the 150 should be recited by the people through all the churches of Spain and Galicia, according to the form of the Oriental Churches."

14. The words of Reccared's confirming order are so interesting, that we may be pardoned if we recite them at length: "Ut propter roborem gentis nostrae novellam conversionem,

* By the Creed of the 318 is meant the Nicene Creed. By the creed of the 150 the document as it is alleged to have been expanded in the Council of Constantinople, and as it was recited at the Council of Chalcedon. The chief difference between them is that the former after the words "and in the Holy Ghost," proceeded to declare the condemnation by the Church of all who maintained Arian views of the Saviour: in the latter the subsequent clauses were added as we now read them, save that the words were, "who proceedeth from the Father, who will," &c.

Hispaniarum et Galliae (Galliciae) ecclesiarum regulam servent, ut, omni sacrificio, ante communicationem corporis Christi (et) sanguinis, juxta orientalium patrum morem, unanimiter clara voce sanctissimum fidei seant symbolum, ut primum populi quam litatem teneant fateantur, et sic corda fidelium ad Christi corpus et sanguinem capiendū exhibeant" (Mansi, ix. 983). The priest recited the creed whilst he held the consecrated host in his hand (Mabillon, Liturg. Gall. 1683, p. 12, 450). [We should note that the position of the Creed in the Mozarabic Liturgy corresponds to the directions of Reccared.]

But the disputes regarding the interpolated Creed at Mass. Some monks of a Frankish monastery on Mount Olivet complained to Leo III. (A.D. 806) that they had been "accused of heresy, and partially excluded from the church of the Nativity on Christmas Day, because they held that the Holy Spirit proceedeth from the Father and the Son. Yea, they were reproached with reciting more than was held in the Roman Church. Yet one of their number had told them so sung in the West, in the chapel of the emperor. What were they to do?" Other allegations followed: Charlemagne was urged to retain the clause; Leo to continue to delete it. An account of the interview between the pope and the emissaries of the Emperor may be seen in Dr. Neale's History of the Holy Roman Church (pp. 1164-1186). The Pope decreed that the "clause should be retained: if difficulty arose, let them give up the custom of singing the creed in the palace of the emperor: it was not sung in the Holy Church of Rome: thus the cause of contention would be removed, and peace would be restored." (The mention of the singing indicates that the pope would miss the words if they were deleted.) And he begged again that the churches of Germany "would say the symbolum in the mysteries in accordance with the Roman custom" (see Martene, De Rituibus, p. 138; Bingham, Denkwürd. p. 357). Charlemagne refused to do so.

Thus it appears that in the time of Leo III. the symbolum was said at Rome at the time of the Sacrifice; whether the Roman Creed, as it is from the Sacramentary of Gelasius, or the original Nicene formula, or the uninterpolated faith of the 150, is uncertain. But a few years later, i.e. between 847 and 858, as we learn from Photius (de Spiritus Mystagogia, i. vol. cii. p. 395), Leo IV. and his successor Benedict III. directed that the Creed should be recited in Greek, ἵνα μὴ τὸ στενὸν τῆς διαλέκτου φωνῆς παρασχῇ πρόσβασις. The words are ambiguous, but they seem to mean—"lest the narrow character of the Latin language should afford any pretext for evil speaking," the part of the Greek Church. But the churches of the West continued to assert the independence of Rome. Aeneas, bishop of Narbonne, informs us (about 868) that "the church of Gallia Church chanted the Creed at Mass every Sunday" (apud Docher. Spiciem, tom. i. p. 113, xciii.); Walafrid Strabo (ix. cxiv. p. 947) notes that after the deposition of the heretic Felix, the Creed (as interpolated) began to be more frequently used in the office of the Mass, in the churches of Germany: and Walter, bishop of Orleans, about the middle of the 9th century, found it necessary to enact that in his diocese the "Gloria Patri et Filio et Spiritui Sancto" and the symbol "Credo in unum Deum" should be sung by all at the same service (Martene, lib. i. c. iv. art. vi. §§ 2. and 21.; Migne, cxix. p. 727). At length the pope gave way, and under the pressure of the Emperor Henry (A.D. 1014) Benedict VIII. consented to sing the Creed and after the form which was now universally received amongst the other Churches of the West.

17. One point connected with the Creed of Constantinople remains to be noticed—its use in the baptismal service of the so-called Gelasian Sacramentary. Dr. Caspari (Ungedruckte Quellen, part i. p. 236) considers that in the Church of Rome and some Churches of Gaul and Germany this Creed appeared first in the baptismal rite. The original Sacramentary is dated about 454, but we conceive that the rite which we are now about to describe cannot be regarded as older than the times of Leo IV. and Benedict III., the Popes of Rome who directed that the Creed should be recited in Greek, or as more modern than 1014, the date of the Emperor Henry's triumph over Benedict VIII. The Sacramentary directs that at the time of a baptism the priest shall address the elect on the importance of the faith, and bid them to receive the "sacramentum of the evangelical symbol inspired by the apostles, whose words indeed are few, but whose mysteries are great." The acolyth takes one of the children, a boy, and holding his left arm places his own right hand on the child's head, and the presbyter enquires, "In what tongue do they confess our Lord Jesus Christ?" The acolyth answers, "In Greek." The presbyter says, "State the faith as they believe it," and the acolyth chants the Creed of Constantinople in Greek: but, according to the MSS. of the Sacramentary, without the clause "God of God" and without the words "and the Son" (Assmanni without any MS. authority printed the words καὶ τοῦ υἱοῦ in his Codex Liturg. tom. i. p. 12; see Dr. Heurtley, Harm. Symbol. p. 158). The acolyth then takes a girl, and the question being repeated as to the language of the response, he answers "in Latin." In the first instance the Creed is written in Greek and Latin interlinearly, the Greek in Latin characters, thus—

Pateruo is hena theon patera pateratorem;

In the latter in Latin only. Possibly it is to this curious custom, possibly to a direct following out of the rule of Benedict III., that we owe three interesting relics of the 10th or 11th centuries, of which Dr. Caspari has given descriptions. The one is a MS. in the library of St. Gall which contains the interpolated Greek Creed in Latin letters, but with musical notes: the other two are MSS. in the library at Düsseldorf and Vienna respectively, which contain the uninterpolated Greek Creed, written in similar Latin characters. The earlier named MS. doubtless represents the Creed as it was chanted at great festivals; for Bingham (Denkwürd. p. 363) assures us that in the 9th century the Germans sang the Creed both in Greek and Latin.

18. Turning now to the symbol which for many years has been called in the Western Churches the APOSTLES' CREED, our first remark must be that the Eastern Churches denied all knowledge of it at the Council of Florence. Ephesius, one of the legates of the Oriental Churches, is said to have there stated, ἡμεῖς οὐκ ἔχομεν οὐδὲ εἰσέμεν τὸ σὺμβολὸν τῶν ἀποστόλων (Waterland, iii. p. 196, note r; Nicolas, Le Symbol des Apôtres, p. 270). Thus we must look to the Western Churches alone for evidence of the growth and usage of this Creed.

19. In his interesting volume on the Apostles' Creed, Dr. Heurtley traces its growth through Irenaeus and Tertullian and Cyprian; then we must take a leap from Novatian, A.D. 260, to Rufinus, bishop of Aquileia, A.D. 390, the intermediate space of 130 years affording only one stepping-stone, furnished by the notes of the Belief of Marcellus of Ancyra, which he left behind him on his departure from Rome: he says "I learnt it and was taught it out of the holy Scriptures." This Belief resembles in great measure the Creed of the Church of Rome, as we learn that Creed from the pages of Rufinus; but Marcellus does not speak of its being used in any liturgic office, except so far as his words above quoted may show that he had received it before he was baptised.

20. This surmise is upheld by the account of Rufinus. He describes the Creed of the Church of Aquileia as resembling very nearly that of Rome; he says that at neither Church had it ever been put into writing in a continuous form, but adds that he regards the type as preserved in the Church of Rome as probably of the purest character, because there the ancient practice was preserved of the catechumen reciting the Creed in the hearing of the faithful. He speaks of this as an ancient custom. At Aquileia it would appear that the baptism was a private service. About the same time we find Ambrose describing to Marcellina (Migne, xvi. 995) the riot at Milan: from his account it would seem that at that time the custom was to deliver the Creed to the competentes on any Lord's Day after the lessons and the sermon and the dismissal of the catechumens: his words are, "Sequente die, erat autem Dominica, post lectiones atque tractatum demissis Catechumenis, symbolum aliquibus competentibus in baptisteriis tradebam basilicæ," when he was called out to rescue an Arian.

21. The custom of preserving this symbolum unwritten is referred to again and again by Jerome and Augustine. It will be remembered that the Faith of the Churches of the East was treated with less reserve, although St. Cyril of Jerusalem desired that his lectures should be regarded as confidential documents. We are inclined to believe that the Creed must have been committed to writing when it became customary to recite it at the Mass. The Gelasian Sacramentary (which, even if interpolated, must describe the ritual of the Roman Church at some epoch or other) contains it. Since the time of Benedict VIII. as we have seen, the Nicene Creed so called, i.e. the interpolated faith of the 150, has been used at Rome in the Eucharistic service.

22. We have referred from time to time to the custom of repeating the creeds of the earlier councils at an early session of each succeeding assembly of a similar character. We have one interesting proof that the Apostles' Creed was deemed of sufficient importance to be so used in a council of the West. Etherius, bishop of Osma, and Beatus, presbyter of Astorga, recited it in 785 as against the errors of Elipandus archbishop of Toledo. The account is noteworthy: "Surgamus igitur," they cried, "cum ipsis apostolis et fidei nostrae symbolum, quem (sic) tradiderant nobis brevi compendio, recitemus, quicunque unum Dominum, unam fidem, unum baptismum habemus; et fidem in qua baptizati sumus^b in hac perversitate et duplicitate haereticorum non negemus: sed sicut corde credemus ore proprio proferamus publice et dicamus CREDO IN DEUM, &c." The Creed recited, Etherius added, "Ecce fidem apostolicam in qua baptizati sumus, quam credemus et tenemus." It will be noticed that the Creed was here put forth publicly.

23. Nor should the fact that there were creeds thrown into an interrogatory form be entirely passed over. Of these some were used from an early period at baptism; and others in later years at the visitation of the sick. Dr. Heurtley has collected several instances of the former series; and the pages of Martene contain many extracts from old MSS. giving the order for the latter. The earliest instance of such a use as confession that we have found is in the rule of Chrodegang (A.D. 750). [Migne, 69, p. 1070.]

24. The (so called) Athanasian Creed appears to have been originally composed as an exposition of the faith for the instruction of believers [CRESSY, COUNCIL OF], and then it came to be sung at the Church service as a Canticle. Gieseler and others consider that it was this Creed that was ordered to be learnt by heart by the Council of Frankfort, 794, when it decreed, "Ut fides catholica sanctae Trinitati et oratio Dominica atque Symbolum Fidei omnibus praedicatur et tradatur;" but it is more probable that the term fides catholica here is generic at all events we would refer to the creed contained in Charlemagne's letter to Elipandus [Migne, xcvi. 899], which is assigned to the same date (794) as being more probably the fides catholica of the Canon. It seems to have been recited at Prime on the Lord's Day at Basle in the 9th century: we hear that in 997 it was sung in alternate choirs in France and in the Church of England: in 1133 it was used daily at Prime in the Church of Autun; from 1200 it assumed the title "Symbolum S. Athanasii" and "Psalmus Quicumque cult," which mark the character it occupies in our services. It was daily used at Prime in those English churches which adopted the use of Sarum, but was always followed by the recitation of the Apostles' Creed as if the declaration of the Faith of the worshipper always followed on the instruction of the Church as to what it was necessary to believe.

(Books.—Great use has been made of Dr. August Hahn's Collection of Formulae: and Dr. Caspari's Programme. Dr. Heurtley's Harmon Symbolica has of course furnished important assistance. To other works reference has been made as required.) C. A. S.

STIER. [PASTORAL STAFF.]

SS. The official or public use of the s a symbol of our redemption begins with ntine, though it had doubtless been em-in private by all Christians at a much date. (See Guerick's Antiquities of the ian Church, Morison's tr., 1857, and Bin-Denkwürdigkeiten, &c., with Molanus, below.) In the Catacombs, and all the t records, it is constantly used in con-with the monogram of Christ; and this sint to the probable fact of a double mean-the use of the symbol from the earliest transverse monogram, or when separated from the monogram and used by itself, it directs special attention to the sacrifice and death of the Lord, and as it were avows and glories in the manner of His death. "Le triomphe de la Christianisme s'affichait bien plus ouvertement sur cet in-signe [the Labarum] au moyen du monogramme, comme exprimant le nom du Christ, que par l'idée de la croix." Its use as a symbol of His person is of high antiquity; see Ciampini, Vet. Mon. t. ii. pp. 81 and 82, tav. xxiv., and c. viii. tav. xvii. D; although some discredit may have fallen on it from the actual personification of the symbol in later days, after the publication of the Legend of the Cross, when churches were dedicated to it, as St. Cross, or Holy Rood, and it became an object of prayer.* [SIGN OF THE CROSS.] For the purely symbolic use of the great Christian and in part human emblem, Ciampini's plate, a copy of the great "Trans-figuration" in mosaic in St. Apollinaris at Ravenna, A.D. 545, may be here described as a typical example. It covers the vault of an arch. The presence of the Father is represented by the ancient symbol of a HAND [see a. v.] issuing from a cloud above all. Below it is a cross of the Western form, slightly widened at the extremities, or tending to the Maltese, in-scribed in a double circle or nimbus. At the intersection is the Face of our Lord, scarcely dis-tinguishable in Ciampini's small engraving, but visible in the now accessible photograph; and

* Didron, Iconographie C., vol. i. p. 367; Bohm: "Christ is embodied in the Cross, as He is in the Lamb, or as the Holy Spirit in the Dove. . . In Christian Iconography, Christ is actually present under the form and semblance of the Cross. The Cross is our crucified Lord in person," &c. In the 9th century the praises of the Cross were sung, as men sing those of a god or a hero. Rhaban Maur, who was Archbishop of Mayence in 847, wrote a poem in honour of the Cross, De Laudibus Sanctae Crucis. See his complete works, fol. Coloman Agrippinae, 1636, vol. i. pp. 373-337. He further quotes St. Jerome's comparisons of "species crucis forma qua-drata mundi;" "aves quando volant, ad aethera formam crucis assumant . . . homo natans, vel orans . . . parvis per maria antenna crucis similata. Tau littera signum salutis et crucis describitur."—Comment. in Marcan.

The Pontifical, or Bishop's office-book, of Egbert or Egbert, brother of Eadbert, king of Northumbria, and consecrated archbishop of York in 733, contains an office for the dedication of a cross, which certainly makes no mention of any human form thereon (v. Surtees Society, 1863, pp. 111-113). " . . . Quasumus ut consecres Tibi

fatuus sui religionis fides construxit trophaeum sufficit victoriae tuae et redemptionis nostrae. . . Radlet hic Unigeniti Fili tui splendor divinitatis in auro, emicet gloria passionis in ligno, in cruce rubiet nostrae mortis redemptio, in splendore cristalli nostrae mortis redemptio: sit suorum protectio, spei certa fiducia, eos simul cum gente et plebe fide confirmet, spe solidet, paces consociet: augeat triumphis, amplifiet secundis, proficiat eis ad per-petuitatem temporis, et ad vitam aeternitatis," &c. &c. A curiously mingled state of thought or feeling is indi-cated by this passage: the cross is a symbol of Christ and a token of His victory; it is of material wood, gold, jewels, &c.; but a sacramental power seems to be con-sidered as adherent in the symbol; its consecration gives it personality; and it is to be addressed in prayer as if possessed of actual powers.

verified on the spot, as we understand, by M. Grimoald de St. Laurent. (Didron's Annales Archéologiques, vol. xxvi. p. 5.) This Face of the Lord seems in a work of the 5th century to import no more than the name or monogram: but it is found again on the oil-vessels of Monza. (See Martigny, s. v. Crucifix, and Didron, Annales Arch. vol. xxvi.) The A and ω are at its right and left, and the ground of the inner circle is sown with stars; that of the outer with small oblong spots in pairs, which probably indicate only variations of colour in the mosaic. Further to right and left are Moses and Elias adoring the cross, with St. Apollinaris below. The ascent of the mountain is indicated by trees and birds, among which are the universally present sheep. The Holy Dove is not represented, the mosaic having reference to the Transfiguration only. Above the cross are the letters I N D V C, which Ciampini interprets as "immolatio Domini Jesus Christi:" below it the words "Salus Mundi." Didron, however (Christian Iconography, p. 386, vol. i.), asserts on the authority of M. Lacroix, who has given particular attention to the church of S. Apollinare in Classe, that these letters are really I X O T C. The accession of Constantine seems to have been an occasion of publicly avowing to the Pagans, and therefore of more vigorously enforcing on the Christian mind, the sacrificial death of the Lord for man. The office of Christ was distinguished from the person of Christ: the cross was, so to speak, extricated from the monogram; and its full import, long understood and felt by all Christians, was now made explicit. However long the change from the symbolic cross to the realist or portrait crucifix may have taken—with whatever long-enduring awe and careful reverence the corporeal suffering of the Lord may have been veiled in symbol—the progress of a large part of the Church to actual representation of the Lord in the act of death seems to have been logically certain from the time when His death as a malefactor for all men was avowed and proclaimed to the heathen. The gradual progress or transition from the symbol to the representation is partly traced out s. v. CRUCIFIX; and as the words "cross" and "crucifix" are to a great extent confounded in their popular use in most European languages, particularly in Roman Catholic countries, the following tentative distinction may perhaps hold good,—that a cross with any symbol or other representation of a victim attached to it, or anyhow placed on it, passes into the crucifical category.

The usual threefold division of the form of the cross into the Crux Decussata or St. Andrew's Christian emblem, the decussated cross may considered the most ancient: but all are of the earliest age of Christian work; as are many curious varieties of the cruciform figure. The forms in the woodcuts are Christian adoptions of pre-Christian crosses. They are supposed by Martigny and others to be what he calls formæ dissimulées; or ancient symbols adopted by Christians as sufficiently like the cross or type of punishment to convey to their minds the associations of the Lord's suffering, without proclaiming it in a manner which would shake heathen prejudice unnecessarily. Constantine appears to have felt that a time was come when his authority could enforce a different feeling with regard to the death of the Lord for man. He used the cross or monogram privately and publicly; impressed it on the arms of his soldiers and erected large crosses on the Hippodrome and elsewhere in Constantinople. His use of it as his standards is well known. (Cf. LABARUM DRACONARIUS.) Euseb., Vit. Const. iii. 3, refers to the Triumphal Cross made and set above the Dragon by Constantine. For his vision and making of the Labarum, see ibid. pp. 28–30. Bingham, Antiq. s. v. Crucifix. Of its use on coins, which appears to begin with Valentinian A.D. 364–375, see coin of Valens in Ang.

Rocca, infra. It seems as if Constantine resolved to use the Christian symbol as a token of union for his vast empire, with that mixture of sincere faith, superstition, and ability which characterized most of his actions. The frequent recurrence of the ταυρὸς πίνα ancient crosses shows the importance which he and others attached to his vision. The Julian's words may suffice to express the general use of the cross in private in his time (De Cor. Mil. c. iii.): "Ad omnem progressum que promotum; ad omnem aditum atque exitum; ad calceatum, ad lavacra, ad mensas, ad cubilia, ad sedilia:—quaecumque conversatio exercet, frontem crucis signaculo rimus." This is paralleled by St. Chrysostom's πανταχού ἐβρίσκεσθαι (τ. σταυρὸν)—παιχνοῖσι, παρὰ ἀρχαίοις, παρὰ γυναιξί, καὶ ἄλλοις, . . . ἐν οἰκίαις καὶ ἐν παστάσει, ἐν ἐκκλησίαις, ἐν τοῖς γραφείοις. Julian decided the Christians as εὐεχόμενος σταυροῦ καὶ γραφῶντες ἐν τῷ μετώπῳ, &c. They were accused of worshipping it as a divinity or setting to the words of the pagan Caecilius, in Minucius Felix Octav. cc. ix. and xxix.: "Et qui hominibus"

Cross,* is general from perhaps the earliest period. Some special difficulties appear to be connected with it, as it is beyond doubt a pre-Christian emblem, and as such connected in the minds of those who used it with special, at least pre-Christian, meanings. These meanings will of course be of two classes:—1stly, the interpretations of speculative minds in all ages which connect the tau-cross with Egyptian nature-worship through the Crux Ansata, and which include all the Ophite and Gnostic uses of the symbol, and its connexion with the serpent, as a sign of strength, wisdom, &c.; 2ndly, those of Hebrew origin, connected as types with the Old Testament, and through that with the Christian faith,—the wood borne by Isaac, and the tau or cross on which the brazen serpent was supported. Didron's remark seems appropriate here, that the tau is the anticipatory cross of the Old Testament. We are not concerned with it as such, and may refer for much interesting and erudite speculation on the pre-Christian cross, or decussated figure, to the text and references of an article in the Edinburgh Review of April, 1870.

The tau appears in the Callistine Catacomb, in a sepulchral inscription, referred to the 3rd century, thus: IRE  NE. This frequently occurs elsewhere (De Romi, Bullet. 1863, p. 35); and some of the crucifixes on the vessels of the treasury of Monza are of the same shape. (See Didron's Annales Archéologiques, vv. xxvi.-vii.) Still in some of the earliest examples it may possibly have been used, even by Christians, in the pre-Christian sense, as a type of life in the world to come.

In Boldetti, lib. ii. c. iii. p. 853, an Egyptian cross of black marble mosaic is given, which may probably be of later date than the catacomb in which it was found; but the next page contains an early inscription of the tau between A and ω, thus: A  ω. He quotes the following passage from Tertullian on this form of the cross, who refers to Ezekiel thus: "Pertransi medio portae in medium Jerusalem et da signum Tau in frontibus virorum. Ipsa enim litera Graecorum Tau, nostra autem T, species crucis."—Adv. Marcian. lib. iii. 22. This form of cross is specially appropriated to the thieves rather than the Redeemer, in some crucifixions of early mediæval type. [CRUCIFIX.]

Both Greek and Roman crosses, and in particular cruciform churches,¹ sometimes possess one or even two additional cross limbs, shorter than the main or central one. The upper additional bar  is supposed by Didron to stand for the title over the head of the Crucified One. If this be so, the lower may be taken to represent the suppedaneum, a support for His feet. In cases where both the shorter limbs are placed above the main cross-bar, as in the cross represented in Boldetti, lib. i. c. ii. p. 271, they certainly represent the crosses of the malefactors. [CRUCIFIX.] See two coins of Valens and Anthemius, Angelo Rocca, Bibl. Vaticana, vol. ii. p. 253 one, a nummus æreus, has the three crosses, the other with two smaller cross-beams under the large one.

The term "station-cross" is derived from the Cross on Tomb of Flavia Jovina, referred by Baronius to A.D. 367 (Boldetti, lib. i. c. ii. p. 271.)

On a single Tomb, Callistine Catacomb. (Boldetti, lib. ii. c. iii. p. 853.)

Roman military term statio, and applied to a large cross on the chief altar, or in some principal place of a church, but occasionally removed or carried in procession to another place, and then constituting a special place of prayer. (See Bottari, tav. xlv., and illustration of Lateran Cross.) Processional crosses may be traced to the use of the Labarum in Constantine's army, and also of his substitution of the Cross for the Dragon, or placing it above the Dragon on standards of cohorts, &c. (See the Church use of the word Draconarius, standard-bearer.)

The distinction between the Cross of the Resurrection, or Triumphal Cross, and the Cross of the Passion, is traceable to early times. In ampini, V. M. tav. xvii. D (ch. viii.), our Lord glory stands by and supports a large cross, with the angels Michael and Gabriel on either side. The Lamb is also frequently represented bearing the lighter and longer triumphal cross. [CRUCIFIX, and references to the Vatican Cross, &c.] It is also borne by our Lord in representations of the Descent into Hades. It is symbolic members of the Church it represented their Master, who was all in all to them; and thus in their view, a somewhat wider and happier one than in later days, is represented all the faith—the person of Christ, His death for man, and the life and death of man in Christ. The Lutheran and other crosses point to baptism and all its truth of Christian thought, witness immediate reference to the Lord's sacrifice. [LATER.] Con-stantine's cross (see Annotat. Vit. Pontif. in Christo) seems to have attached the symbolic Latin to the Baptist and the sacrament he administered, as well as to the Lord's Supper and the saving birth of His death. The tendency of Christian feeling towards special or exclusive contemplation of the Lord's sufferings and death is matter of ecclesiastical history; and its effect on Christian emotion, and therefore on Christian art, is the transition from the cross into the crucifix. (See a. v.)

An evidence of the feelings of sublimed triumph with which the cross was regarded in the earliest times, as a symbol first of the Lord's life and death, then of the life and death of man, is that it is so frequently wreathed, embossed, or otherwise ornamented with flowers. Even as late as the Monks' vessels, it is represented as a living and budding stem; but the cross from St. Pontianus, given by Bottari, xiv. is made to put forth golden or silver flowers half-way up its stem.

Count Melchior de Vogüé (Revue Archéologique, vol. vii. p. 211) gives a highly interesting account of the ruins, or rather the scarcely-injured remains, of four ancient Christian towns, on the left bank of the Orontes, between Antioch and Aleppo. They contain many ancient crosses, and were probably deserted at the same time, on the first Moslem invasion. "On est transporté," he says, "au milieu de la société chrétienne . . .
non plus la vie cachée des catacombes, ni l'ex-istence humiliée, timide, souffrante, mais une vie large, opulente, artistique. . . . Des croix, des tions indique une époque voisine du triomphe de

CROSS, ADORATION OF. (Adoratio Crucis,
i. apostolus rois crucis.)

I. Adoration of the Cross from the heathen point of view.—Christianity being a "religion of the cross," the cross being in every Christian teacher's mouth as the watchword of the new faith, the action of signing with the cross (SIGN OF THE CROSS) being believed in by the Christians as a preservative against all dangers bodily and spiritual, what wonder is it that the heathen should have seen in early Christianity but a crucifixion, and in the cross but a Christian idol not less material than their own?

Thus we find Tertullian feeling it necessary carefully to combat this among divers false views of Christian worship prevalent among the heathen. His words, with the logic of which we have nothing to do, are "Sed et qui Crucis nos religiosos putat, consecrans erit noster."— Even if we did worship the cross, we should be no worse than you, for the cross averts directly or indirectly into your own objects of worship; for example, as being the structure around which the makers of images of the gods would first erect the clay model, or as being the framework of trophies reared in honour of victory whom you adore as a deity (Apol. c. 16; and in similar strain, Ad Nationes l. c. 12).

We find references to the same heathen taunt in the Oration of Minucius Felix, as e.g. in c. 9, where the heathen objector winds up his remarks "ut id colant quod merentur;" and again (c. 12), "et jam non adorandae, sed subeundae Cruces." The writer in meeting this attack speaks as Tertullian had done of the way in which the cross entered into heathenism, and adds (c. 29), "Cruces etiam nec colimus, nec optamus," by which he seems to mean, We Christians do not worship the cross so as to give such adoration and honour to it as you heathen to your idols. That this misconception on the part of the heathen was not speedily overcome may be seen from the case of so intelligent a man as the Emperor Julian, who, a century after Minucius had written, taunts the Christians, as the Caecilius of that writer had done, with inconsistency, in that while they refused to reverence (σεβασμὸν) the sacred Ancile which fell down from Jupiter and was preserved among them as a pledge of the protection ever to be shown to the city, they still revered the wood of the cross, continually made the sign of it on their foreheads, and engraved it before their houses (Cyril Alex. Contra Julianum, lib. vi. Patrol. Gr. lxxvi. 795). The gist of Cyril's answer is worthy of notice:—Since Christ the Lord and Saviour of all divested Himself of His Divine Majesty, and leaving His Father's Throne was willing to take upon Him the form of a servant, and to be made in the likeness of man, and to die the cruel and ignominious death of the cross, therefore we being reminded of these things by the sight of the cross, and taught that One died thereon that we all might have life, value the symbol as productive of thankful remembrance of Him.

II. Point of view of early Christian writers.—Having thus alluded to the adoration of the cross as seen from the heathen point of view, we shall next endeavour to trace the existence of the idea among Christians of a modified form of reverence to be paid to the cross. That idea may be expressed roughly thus: No reverence is paid to the material cross as such; it is the idea of the cross for which reverence is felt; but the feeling is shown by the following more definite instances.

Ambrose (In ob. Theodosii, § 46) tells of the Empress Helena's adoration of the cross after her discovery of Pilate's superscription, and adds: "Regem adoravit, non lignum utique, quia hic Gentilis est error et vanitas impiorum; sed adoravit illum qui pependit in ligno, scriptus in Cruce." Shortly afterwards he describes how the cross was placed upon kings by Helena, "ut in regibus adoretur."

Jerome, again, in the Eptaphium Paulae Matris (Ep. 108 ad Eustochium, § 9, Patrol. xlii. 883), says that "Paula prostrata ante Crucem quasi pendentem Domitium cerneret, adorabat."

In the above instances Ambrose and Jerome are referring to the cross said to be found by Helena, but in the case of Minucius and others anterior to the time of Constantine the allusion is necessarily to crosses, viewed as signs and images of the true cross; and the view which is controverted is the belief of the heathen world in the veneration paid by Christians to the cross absolutely (see further, Origen, in Celsum ii. 47). Cf. further the distinction as drawn by Augustine (Tract. i. in Johannem, § 16): "Dicimus quidem lignum vitam, sed secundum intellectum lignum Crucis unde accipimus vitam." The same line is taken in the Quaestiones ad Antiochum duces (xxxix.: Patrol. Gr. xxviii. 622), falsely attributed to Athanasius, in answer to the question, Why, when God has forbidden through His prophets the worship of created things, do we offer adoration to images and the cross? Rusticus Diaconus, a writer of the time of Pope Vigilius, carefully defines the matter in the same way, for after maintaining the adoration of the cross as leading on to that of the Crucified, he adds, "non tamen Crucem adorare dicimus Christo" (Contra Acephalos: Patrol. lxxii. 1218).

John Damascenus (ob. circa 756 A.D.) is careful exactly to define, as the above-mentioned writers have done, the nature of the reverence paid by Christians to the cross. He says (de fide orthodoxa iv. 11): "προσκυνούμεν δὲ καὶ τὸν τύπον τοῦ τιμίου καὶ σωτηρίου σταυροῦ . . . ὅτι τῆς εὐαγγελικῆς τιμῆς (μὴ γένετο), ἀλλὰ τὸν τύπον ὡς Χριστοῦ σύμβολον." And hereon, he adds, may our adoration of the cross rest, ὅθεν γὰρ καὶ τὸ σημεῖον, ὡς καὶ αὐτὸς ἔσται.

Further illustrations of the wide spread of the feeling are to be found in numerous narratives of the Fathers, of a more or less legendary character, referring to the miraculous power inherent in the sacred symbol. Thus Sozomen (Hist. Eccl. ii. 3) gives us an account of a certain physician named Probianus who had been converted to Christianity, but who would not accord honour to the cross as the sign of salvation, until when suffering from a painful disease of the feet he was taught by a vision [cf. ALTAR, p. 68] to find in reverence of the cross a means of relief, and thus was cured. [We again find this story, cited from Sozomen, in the Historia Tripartita (li. 19), compiled by Cassiodorus.]

A parallel incident is that related by Evagrius (Eccl. Hist. iv. 26), to the effect that on the burning of Antioch by Chosroes, the bishop of Apamea consented to display the wood of the cross to the adoration of the people, that their

In the Synod held at Constantinople in 591 A.D. retained that since the cross shows to us of salvation, and therefore we offer to oris and in thought our adoration, it is distinctly prohibited to engrave crosses movement, where they would be trodden on, and that where these already existed could be erased (can. 73; Labbe, Com- 1175).

CROSS, ADORATION OF

III. Adoration of the Cross in ancient Litany —In the Western Church such a rite has our been observed on Good Friday. The custom is obviously very ancient, and has possibly flowed either from the East, for the words of Paulinus (Ep. 31. Patrol. lii. 320) with reference to the conservation of the true practice at Jerusalem, will carry back the date to the 4th century":—
"Quam ecclesiam ardes ejus quotannis, cum Pascha Domini agitur, adorandum populo principis tunc veneratum premit." According to the Gregorian Sacramentary (Patrol. lxxviii. 86), at Vespers on Good Friday a cross is set up in front of the altar: then—"Veni Pontifex, adoratum descendatur Crucem. Deinde episcopi, presbyteri, diaconi et ceteri per ordinem, deinde populus: Pontifex vero redit in sedem usque dum omnes saluenter." Whenever a salutation is made (salutate pontifice vel populo) the Antiphona Ecclebrum Crucis is sung; and then when all have saluted, the pope descends to the front of the altar and the service proceeds.
Sundry differences, but of no great moment, occur in the form given in the Gelasian Sacramentary (Patrol. lxxix. 1103). A more elaborate ritual, however, is to be found in the Mozarabic Liturgy (Patrol. lxxxv. 430; lxxxvi.
646), in which before Nones on Good Friday, after the Lord's Prayer, came the hymn Ad Salutationem Lagni Domini,

"Pange lingua gloriosi Problema certaminis." &c.

This was followed by the prayer, "O sancta Crux, in qua salus nostra pependit, per te introcamus ad Patrem, per te veniam mereamur, per te apud Christum habeamus indulgentiam et veniam;" and this again by three antiphons de Lagni Domini. Nothing further is added here in the Breviary as to the adoration of the cross, possibly because the rest is to be found in the Missal.

From this we learn the nature of the ceremony of adoration as performed at the Nones, and this, as in the preceding instance, we shall briefly describe.

Two priests hold before the altar a cross draped in black, standing first at the left, then at the right, and lastly at the middle of the altar.
As each position is occupied, the antiphons are respectively chanted—Populo meus quid feci tibi
... Quis eduxi te ... Quid ultra debui ... with its own response after each. At the end of the third station the officiating priest receives the cross from the hands of the two who are holding it, and standing successively at the right end, the left end, and the middle of the altar, he uncovers at each station respectively the right arm, the left arm, and the whole of the cross, saying on each occasion, with voice growing louder each time, the antiphon Eccle lignum Crucis, to which is responded, In qua salus nostra pependit, it being ordered that as each limb of the cross is unveiled, the people should bend the knee. The priest having reverently placed the cross in front of the altar
"statim presbyteri cum suis ministris adorent
Crucem flectendo genua ter, cum summa re-

¹ Paulinus, it will be observed, speaks of this rite as taking place on the "Pascha;" but there seems fair ground from the context for explaining this, with Ménard, of the anniversary of our Lord's crucifixion. (Notes to Greg. Ser. in Patrol. lxxviii. 332.)

verentia et humilitate osculando terram, et offerant oblationem Crucis, ut aliis praebeant exemplum;" the rite is then concluded by an oratio ad Crucem, in which, however, our Lord is addressed distinctly, and by the antiphon Crucem tuam adoramus Domine.

Alexander Leslie, the Jesuit editor, argues in his note on the above passage for the identity of the terms adoratio and salutatio as applied to the cross, the former word being that employed in the Gelasian and Gregorian Sacramentaries and the Mozarabic Missal, the latter in the Mozarabic Breviary; and Amalarius (De Eccl. Off. i. 14) cites the Ordo Romanus, "Praeparatur crux ante altare, quam salutant et osculantur omnes."

As illustrating our present subject, we may quote from the collect for the Festival of the Exaltation of the Cross in the Gregorian Sacramentary: "Concede propitius ut qui ad adorandam vivificam ejus Crucem adveniunt . . ." At the end of Mass on that day a cross was held up by the pontiff for the adoration of the people (cf. Alcuin, Adv. Elipantum, lib. ii. 9, who furnishes us with a collect, Ad Elevationem Sanctae Crucis); and a parallel instance is to be derived from the Greek Menology for September 13, χαλκοίς, ὁ ζωοφόρος τῆς εὐαγγελίας, τὸ ἀπὸ τῶν τρεῖς αἰώνων, ἡ θύρα τῆς παραδείσου, ὁ τῶν πιστῶν σπηλαιόμυς . . . [See also EXALTATION and FINDING OF THE CROSS.]

The season which in the Eastern Church has been specially associated with the adoration of the cross is the third Sunday in Lent, with the ensuing week. Numerous sermons are extant in the writings of the Greek Fathers having reference to this. Thus in one wrongly assigned to Chrysostom, but apparently not long subsequent to his time, εἰς τὴν προσκύνησιν τοῦ τιμίου καὶ ζωοποιῦ σταυροῦ τῇ μέσῃ ἐβδομάδι τῶν νηστειῶν, the writer speaks of the day as yearly appointed for adoration, and as though he would imply the custom to be a well established one:—Ἡμέραν τοιοῦτον προσκυνήσιμος ἡμέρα τοῦ τιμίου σταυροῦ καθίσταται. Again, in the works of Sophronius, patriarch of Jerusalem, is a sermon with the same title and occasion (Oratio v. Patrol. Gr. lxxxvii. 3309). Again (Oratio iv. in Exaltationem S. Crucis), in describing the change of the season of the Exaltation to a time subsequent to our Lord's resurrection, he speaks of σταυροῦ θεδοῦχος προσκύνησις. Sermons of the same character are also extant by Theodorus Studita (Patrol. Gr. xcix. 691), and by Theophylact (ib. cxxi. 113). For rubrical directions concerning this fast, see Constantine Porphyrogenitus, De caerimoniis Aulæ Byzantinae, i. 5, 24; and especially ii. 11 (op. cit. cxii. 137, 196, 1017); and cf. also Suicer's Thesaurus, and Ducange's Glossary, s. v. σταυροπροσκύνησις, by which name and by κυριακὴ τῆς προσκυνήσεως the Greek Church knows the day. The Epistle and Gospel for this day in that Church are Heb. iv. 14—v. 6, and Mark viii. 34—ix. 1. There is also in the Greek Church a bringing about of the cross for adoration on August 1 and thereabouts, for which see Const. Porph. ii. 9 (Patrol. Gr. cxii. 1009). This latter day is marked in the Menology thus: εἰς τὴν πρώτην ἢ πρόδοον τῶν τιμίων ἑλῶν τοῦ τιμίου ζωοποιῦ σταυροῦ; and its importance is testified to by the fact of its having its προεδρία or vigil.

IV. Disputes among Christians as to the Adoration of the Cross.—At the Second Nicene Council (787 A.D.), in their fourth actio, among the various testimonies read from the fathers support of the use of images in worship, was long extract from the fifth of the λόγοι ὑπὲρ τῆς Χριστιανῶν ἀπολογίας κατὰ Ἰουδαίων καὶ ἑλετών τῶν ἁγίων of Leontius, bishop of Neapoli in Cyprus (ob. 620 or 630, A.D.). The tenor of his remarks (for which see Labbé, i. 236) is as follows:—Christians are justified offering adoration to the cross, by way of remembrance of Him who died thereon, not with a feeling of reverence for the mere material. The decree sanctioned by the seal of the emperor is reverentially treated, not on account of the decree or the lead of the seal, but of him whom the seal indicates; and so we Christians, in our adoration of the cross, honour not its material but see in it a seal and signet of Christ Who was crucified thereon, and Whom we salute and adore. The further illustration may be taken of children who cherish some memento of an absent father even as all things associated with our Lord for His sake to be loved and revered. ὁ δὲ οὗτος, he concludes, ἵδως Χριστιανὸς προσκυνεῖν τὸν σταυρὸν, γινώσκει ὅτι τῷ σταυρωθέντι Χριστῷ τὴν προσκύνησιν προσάγει, καὶ οὐ τῷ ξύλῳ.

A counterblast to the views of the Nicene Council is to be found in a capitulary of Charlemagne, De Imaginibus (i. 13, Patrol. xcix. 1034), where we find an attack on the argument brought forward by the other party based on the expression, "Jacob . . . adoravit fastigium virg ejus" (Heb. xi. 21). The writer there insists on the "differentia crucis Christi et imaginum pictorum arte pictarum," and promises to enquire upon the subject "quanto mysterio Crux in gignibus emineat, sive quomodo humanum genus non per imagines, sed per Crucem Christi demptum sit, quas duo illi vel paria vel aequa putant." This promise is fulfilled subsequently (ii. 28; op. cit. 1096), where the language, though probably referring to adoration of the cross, is to a certain extent vague: "Non se imagines Crucis aequiparandas, non adorandas, non colendas, . . . et Tu solus adorandus, Tu solus sequendus, Tu solus colendus es."

The cause of the adoration of the cross and of images found a zealous champion in Theodorus Studita, who expounds his views in Antirrhetici iii. ad Iconomachos, in the form of a dialogue (see esp. Antirr. i. 15; iii. 3; Patrol. Gr. xcix. 345, 419). After an elaborate discussion, and after dwelling on the distinction between εἶκον and εἰδωλον, in which he fully repudiates any association of the adoration of the cross or image with the latter term he sums up in a number of theses which maintain the importance of the adoration, and again insists on the distinction referred to above. Thus (ib. 349): "If any one bold calls the relative (σχετικὴ) worship of Christ in the image, worship of the image and not of Christ Himself . . . he is a heretic." For further illustrations of the subject from the writings of Theodorus, see op. cit. 691, 1757; also Nicephorus (Patriarch of Constantinople Antirr. iii. 7. Later notices of the subject may be found in Photius, Epist. i. 1, Ad Nicæum Papam; i. 8, 20, Ad Michael. Bulg. Principem.

A brief reference may here be made in passing to the views on this subject of the Paulician heretics, who first appeared towards the end of the 7th century. They, generally speaking, were strongly opposed to any adoration of the cross or images. In regard to the cross, they maintained that the real cross was Christ Himself, not the wood on which He hung:—λέγοντες, ὅτι σταυρὸς ὁ Χριστὸς ἐστίν, οὐ χρὴ δὲ προσκυνεῖσθαι τὸ ξύλον ἐς κακοσημαμένον ὄργανον (Georgius Hamartolus, Chronicon iv. 238, in Patrol. Gr. cx. 889). In accordance with this is what we are told by Petrus Siculus (Hist. Manichaeorum 29; ib. civ. 1284; and cf. Photius, Contra Manich. i. 7; ib. cii. 25), to the effect that a certain Timotheus of this sect was sent by the Emperor Leo the Isaurian to the Patriarch of Constantinople to be reasoned with; and on being asked, "Why dost thou not believe and worship the honoured cross?" answered, "Anathema to him who does not do so." But by the cross he understood τὸν Χριστὸν τῷ ὀνόματι τῶν χειρῶν σταυρὸς ἀποτελοῦντα. The above quoted Georgius Hamartolus tells us (Patrol. Gr. cx. 892), with what truth is perhaps doubtful, that in cases of sickness they laid a cross on the patient, which cross on his recovery they dared even to break or burn (see also Euthymius, Panoplia Dogmat. Tit. 24; op. cit. xxx. 1196; and cf. Photius, Bibliotheca 279; ib. ciii. 524).

Much about this time there arose a contention of like character in the West. The actual literary warfare in this case belongs to the early part of the 9th century, but from its connection with the earlier struggle in the Eastern Church, and as throwing light on the tone of thought on this subject in the Western Church during the preceding period, it is of too much importance to be passed over here.

The immediate cause of the outbreak was the publication by Claudius, bishop of Turin (820 A.D.), of a fierce attack on the doctrine of the adoration of the cross and of images. Further he ordered the removal of crosses from all the churches of his diocese. When urged by a letter from a certain Abbot Theodemir to reconsider his views, he retorted, in a long treatise, that the Gauls and Germans were held in the nets of superstition. This work Jonas, bishop of Orleans, answers in detail in his treatise De Cultu Imaginum (Patrol. cvi. 905), in which he appeals largely to the writings of the Fathers of the earlier centuries, and discusses the objections of Claudius seriatim. See especially op. cit. 331, where he meets Claudius's remarks as to the superstition of the votaries of the cross: "Nos ob recordationem Salvatoris nostri crucem pictam . . . veneramus atque adoramus."

Other writers of the time joined in the fray, as Theodemir above mentioned; Eginhard, the biographer of Charlemagne, in a work De Adoranda Cruce not now extant; Wistremir, archbishop of Toledo (cf. Pseudo-Luitprand, Chronicon; Patrol. cxxxvi. 1103); and a priest named Dungalus, who (about the year 828 A.D.) wrote a treatise dedicated to Louis the Pious and his son Lothaire: "Pro cultu sacrarum imaginum adversus invidiosas blasphemias naenias Claudii Taurinensis Episcopi" (Patrol. cv. 457 seqq.).

CROSS, EXALTATION OF (Exaltatio Crucis, ἡ ὑψώσις τοῦ σταυροῦ). This festival, held on September 14, most probably celebrates primarily the consecration of the church of the Holy Sepulchre at Jerusalem by Bishop Macarius at the command of Constantine (335 A.D.), although some would see in it a commemoration of the Vision of the Cross seen by the Emperor.

It is, however, to the victory of Heraclius over the Persians and his subsequent restoration of the Cross to its shrine at Jerusalem that the renown of the festival is mainly due.

Still there are not wanting indications of its observance before that event, in both the Eastern and Western Churches. Thus in the Acts of the Egyptian penitent Mary, whose death is referred to 421 A.D., it is apparently recognized as a thoroughly established festival at Jerusalem: thus, e.g. . . . τῇ ὑψώσεως ἔρακεν τοῦ τιμίου σταυροῦ, ἥτις μετ' ἐλθὺς ἡμέρας εἰσὶν ἡμερῶν (Acta S. Mariae Aegypt. c. 19, in Acta Sanctorum for April 2; also in Patrol. Gr. lxxxvii. 3711).

In the life (c. 70) of the Patriarch Eutychius (ob. 582 A.D.) by his chaplain Eustrathius, this festival is spoken of as celebrated in Constantinople on September 14 (Acta Sanctorum for April 6); and in the 7th century the Patriarch Sophronius of Jerusalem refers to it as a feast then widely known. He adds that the Festival of the Exaltation had formerly (πάλαι) preceded that of the Ἀνδραγαθία (that is, the annual commemoration on September 13 of the dedication of the church at Jerusalem), but now the order had been reversed (Oratio in Exaltationem S. Crucis in Gretser, De Cruce, vol. ii. p. 90, ed. 1608).

Again, an observance of the festival in the Western Church prior to Heraclius's victory may be inferred from our finding it in the Gelasian and Gregorian Sacramentaries, and from its designation simply as Exaltatio S. Crucis, without any allusion to Heraclius, in the earlier Latin Martyrologies, as in that attributed to Jerome (Patrol. xxx. 475): it may be added that this is also the case with those of Bede and Rabanus Maurus (ib. xciv. 1044, cx. 1163).

The circumstances attending the victory of Heraclius are briefly these. In the year 614 Jerusalem was taken by the Persian king Chosroes II., and after the slaughter of many thousands of Christians, and the destruction, partially at any rate, of the church of the Holy Sepulchre by fire, a long train of captives was led away, among whom was the Patriarch Zacharias,* and with him the cross said to have been discovered by Helena [CROSS, FINDING OF], which was sealed up in a case by the patriarch himself. After some years of uninterrupted success on the part of the Persian king, during which the empire was reduced to the very verge of dissolution, Heraclius at last declared war (622 A.D.), and after three expeditions the boldness of which was justified by their success, the tide was turned and the Persian king worsted, until at last he was deposed and murdered by his son Siroes (628 A.D.).

* Nicéphorus (vide infra) styles the patriarch Modestus, though the other historians unite in calling him Zacharias. The error, for such it probably is, has been explained by supposing Modestus to have acted as deputy for Zacharias during his captivity (see Clinton, Fasts Romanæ, vol. ii. p. 170); or that the latter died shortly after his return to Jerusalem, and was succeeded by the former (Petavius in loc.).

The new sovereign speedily concluded a peace with the emperor, one of the conditions specially insisted on by the latter being the restoration of the cross, with which borne before him, as he rode in a chariot drawn by four elephants, Heraclius entered Constantinople. In the following spring he made a pilgrimage with the recovered cross to Jerusalem, where the patriarch recognized his own unbroken seals on the case containing the precious relic (τὰ τίμια καὶ ζωοποιὰ ξύλα, as Theophanes [vide infra] constantly styles it), thus preserved it is said by Sira the wife of Chosroes. Heraclius wished himself to carry the cross to its shrine, but before treading on the sacred ground he was bidden to divest himself of his splendid array, that so barefoot and clad in a common cloak he might more resemble the humble guise of the Saviour. Some of the Martyrologies referred to below remark that the emperor was held by some invisible power from entering upon the sacred precincts till he had so divested himself^b (cf. Theophanes, Chronographia, vol. i. pp. 503, 504, ed. Classen; Nicephorus, Breviarium, pp. 11 A, 15 A; Chronicon Paschale, vol. i. p. 704, ed. Dindorf; and more generally for the history of the period, Cedrenus, vol. i. pp. 717 sqq. ed. Bekker; also Gibbon, Decline and Fall, ch. 46).

Thus was the cross once more "exalted" into its resting-place, and the festival of the "Exaltation of the Cross" obtained fresh renown. Before long, possibly under Pope Honorius I. (ob. 638 A.D.), September 14 came to be observed as a festival with special memory of the restoration of the cross by Heraclius: the Eastern Church, which has not strictly speaking a separate festival of the Finding of the Cross, commemorates also on that day the original discovery by the Empress Helena.

This festival is referred to more or less fully by all Martyrologies under September 14. Of those of Jerome, Bede, and Rabanus Maurus we have already spoken. We may further specify that of Wandelbert [deacon of monastery at Trèves in the time of the Emperor Lothaire] where we find (Patrol. cxxi. 611)

"Exaltata Crucis fulgent vexilla relatae, Perside ab indigna victor quam vexit Heraclitus."

In the Martyrologies of Ado and of Usuardus we find a further addition: "Sed et procurrentibus annis, papa Sergius mirae magnitudinis portionem ejusdem ligni in sacrario Beati Petri Domino revelante repperit, quae annis omnibus ["in Basilica Salvatoris quae appellatur Constantiniana." Ado] ipso die Exaltationis ejus ab omni osculatur et adoratur populo" (Patrol. cxxiii. 170, 356; cxxiv. 467). See also the Martyrology of Notker (d. cxxi. 1151), and for various forms of ancient Western Calendars containing a mention of this festival, see Patrol. cxxviii. 1128, 1191, &c. Besides this, we may again refer to the presence of this festival in the Gelasian and Gregorian Sacramentaries. The collect for the day in the latter of these has been cited in the article on the Adoration of the Cross, that in the former runs as follows:—"Deus qui nos hodierna die Exaltatione Sanctae Crucis annua solemnitate laetificas, praesta ut cujus mysterium in terra cognovimus, ejus redemptionis praemia consequamur."

The Eastern Church, as we have already said, includes in the festival of September 14 the two festivals of the Finding and of the Exaltation of the Cross. As in the Calendars of the Western Church, so also in those of the Eastern Church is it invariably found. Thus in the Greek metrical calendar given by Papebroch in the Acta Sanctorum (vol. I. of May), we find under September 13, μνήμη τῶν ἑγκαίνιων τῆς ἁγίας τοῦ Χριστοῦ καὶ θεοῦ ἡμῶν ἀναστάσεως καὶ προέδρτια τῆς ὑψώσεως τοῦ τιμίου καὶ ζωοποιῶν σταυροῦ; that is, as has been already explained, they celebrated the dedication of the Church built by the Emperor Constantine to commemorate our Lord's resurrection. We further gather that the festival of the Exaltation had its προέδρτια or vigil. The notice for September 14 is ὑψώθη δεκάτῃ σταυροῦ ξύλον ἡδὲ τετάρτῃ; and the fact is also recognized in the pictorial Moscow Calendar accompanying the preceding. The Octave also of the festival (September 21) is given in the Menology under that day, ἐν ταύτῃ τῇ ἡμέρᾳ ἀποδίδεται ἡ ἑορτὴ τοῦ τιμίου σταυροῦ. See also the Calendar of the Arabian Church given by Selden (De Synedriis Ebraeorum, iii. 376, ed. 1655), where September 14 is marked "Festum Crucis gloriosae;" as also in those of the Ethiopic or Abyssinian and of the Coptic Church given by Ludolf (p. 3). We also learn from him that in the case of the latter of these churches, the festival extends over three days, September 13-15, marked respectively "Festum C. gl. (primum, &c.)."

Further, the Ethiopic Church, as well as several other branches of the Eastern Church, recognizes in addition a festival of the Cross in May, possibly having more or less reference to the "Inventio Crucis" of the Latin Church (op. cit. p. 17; Gretser, vol. i. 232; see also several Eastern Calendars in Neale, Holy Eastern Church, Introd. pp. 775, 799, 813). The proper lessons for this festival in the Syrian Church, as marked in the Peshito, are, for Vespers, Matt. xxiv. (possibly on account of verse 30); for Liturgy, Luke xxi. 5 sqq.; and for Matins, Mark xii. 41 sqq. (Gretser, l. c.).

CROSS, FINDING OF. (Inventio Crucis.)

I. Introduction.—By this name is to be understood the discovery which tradition asserts that the Empress Helena, the mother of Constantine, made of the cross on which our Lord suffered. The earliest account we have of the exploration for the Holy Sepulchre is that given by Eusebius (Vita Const. iii. 26 sqq.), who relates Constantine's determination to remove the abominations that defiled the holy place and build there a Christian shrine, as detailed in the emperor's letter to Macarius, bishop of Jerusalem (op. cit. 30; Socrates, Hist. Eccl. i. 17; Theo-

CROSS, FINDING OF

i. 18), but no allusion whatever is made to the discovery of the cross. Some have indeed said that an expression in Constantine's letter to Arius is better suited to the discovery of the cross than of the grave—τὸ γὰρ ὑπόμνημα τοῦ Ἰησοῦ ἐκείνου πάθος ἔχει τῆ γῆ πάσαις ἀνθρώποις...; but a comparison with c. 26 would not account for the above quoted language, and it is hard to understand that Eusebius had lost so good an opportunity of glorifying Constantine, had a real or supposed discovery of our Lord's cross taken place under his reign. The date of Helena's visit to Palestine, consequently that of the alleged discovery, is A.D. 326; yet in the Itinerarium Burdigalense, a record of a journey to Jerusalem in 333 A.D., seven years after this date, there is no reference to the finding of the cross, even in a place where we might certainly have looked for it: "Crypta ubi corpus ejus positum fuit ibi die resurrexit; ibidem modo jussu Constantii Imperatoris basilica facta est" (Patrol. 31).

The earliest mention we have of the Finding of the Cross is in the Catecheses of Cyril of Jerusalem, delivered rather more than twenty years after Helena's alleged discovery; in which, though he does not allude to the narrative form given by subsequent writers, he says that fragments cut off from the cross spread over the whole world (Catech. iv. 10; xiii. 4; Patrol. Gr. xxxiii. 468, 685, and he also alludes to the Finding of the cross in a letter written some years later to Constantine, the son of Constantine, on the occasion of a luminous cross appearing in the sky over Jerusalem (Ep. ad Const. c. 3, op. cit.).

From the beginning of the 5th century all ecclesiastical writers take the truth of the narrative in its main form for granted, and sundry variations of detail occur.

Legend.—The general tenor of the tradition is that an attempt had been made (by Maxentius, or at any rate, in his time, according to some, Epist. 58, Patrol. ix. 321) to destroy the site of the Holy Sepulchre, the ground had there been raised to a considerable height, and temples and statues erected thereon. On the death of Licinius, whom Constantine charges with the continuance of the evil, it was determined to purify the sacred places, and this resolution of the Emperor was carried out by his daughter Helena, who went in person to Jerusalem, with the Bishop Macarius. By the Divine assistance (and by the aid of a Jew, one Judas, afterwards baptized as Quiriacus, according to some of Tours and others, infra) the spot was cleared, and the superimposed earth having been removed, the sepulchre was seen with three stones lying near, and separate from these the inscription which Pilate had attached to that of our Lord. Not knowing which of the three crosses was the one they sought, Macarius caused them to be successively presented to the touch of a noble lady of Jerusalem then lying at the point of death. The first two crosses produced no effect, but at the touch of the third the sick woman rose up before them perfectly healed, thus showing that it was upon this that the Saviour had suffered. One part of the cross set in silver was entrusted to Macarius to be carefully guarded in Jerusalem, and the remainder, together with the nails was forwarded to Constantine. One of the nails was attached to his helmet, and another to the bridle of his horse, in fulfilment, according to sundry fathers, of the prophecy of Zechariah xiv. 20.¹

For the above tradition, see Socrates (l. c.), Theodoret (l. c.), Sozomen (ii. 1), Ambrose (de obitu Theodosii, c. 46; Patrol. xvi. 1398), Sulpicius Severus (Hist. Sacra, ii. 94; Patrol. xx. 148), Rufinus (Hist. l. 7, 8; Patrol. xxi. 1475), Paulinus of Nola (Ep. ad Severum 31; Patrol. lxi. 325), Gregory of Tours (Liber Miraculorum, i. 5 sqq.; Patrol. lxxi. 709). Cyril of Alexandria also (Comm. in Zach. in loc.; Patrol. Gr. lxxii. 271) refers to it as the current history in his day. Chrysostom evidently believed in the discovery of the cross, and speaks of the practice of conveying small portions of it about as amulets (Quod Christus sit Deus, c. 10; Patrol. Gr. xlviii. 826).

One or two further details may be added. Socrates states that the portion of the cross sent to Constantine was by him inclosed in his own statue, which was placed on a column of porphyry in the so-called forum of Constantine in Constantinople, that thus the city might be rendered impregnable by the possession of so glorious a relic. According to Sozomen, besides the miracle wrought on the sick lady, a dead man was instantly restored to life by the touch of the cross; but Paulinus, while mentioning this says nothing of the other miracle. In Ambrose, spite of a protest to the contrary, we see traces of the feeling in which respect for the cross, as a token of Him who hung thereon, drifted into an adoration of the cross itself. Thus Helena is represented as saying, "Ecce locus pugnae, ubi est victoria? . . . quomodo me redemptam arbitror, si redemptio ipsa non cernitur?" It may be added that according to Ambrose's version of the history, the inscription is found adhering to the cross it originally belonged to. The occasion of the notice in Paulinus is the sending of a piece of the cross to Severus for a church about to be consecrated, which affords him a natural opportunity for relating the story: he adds, that however much might thus be cut away from the cross, the bulk of the wood miraculously remained undiminished.

III. Festival.—With the belief in the discovery of the cross thus widely spread and thus cherished, it is only natural to expect that an annual festival to commemorate it would soon be established; though it is impossible from the want of satisfactory evidence to speak with any certainty as to the actual origin of such festival.

Jerome, however (Comm. in Zach. in loc.), speaks of it as one might have expected, "nam sensus quidem pietatis sed ridiculus."

¹ Jerome, however (Comm. in Zach. in loc.), speaks of it as one might have expected, "nam sensus quidem pietatis sed ridiculus."

An attempt has been made to assign its first appointment to Pope Eusebius (ob. 310 A.D.), who, in a letter "Episcopis Tusciae et Campaniae," is made to say "Crucis ergo Domini nostri Jesu Christi, quae nuper nobis gubernacula Sanctae Romanae Ecclesiae tenentibus quinto Nonas Maii inventa est, in praedicta Kalendarum die Inventionis festum vobis solemniter celebrare mandamus" (Patrol. vii. 1114).

Of course the utter spuriousness of this letter is shown, if by nothing else, by the fact that Pope Eusebius died before Constantine had embraced Christianity, and many years before the work of restoration began at Jerusalem at his command.

Nicephorus (Hist. Eccles. viii. 29) asserts that a festival to commemorate the Finding of the Cross was held at Jerusalem in Constantine's time, but appeals to no earlier authority in support of his statement: and in the Chronicon of Flavius Lucius Dexter, if the passage be genuine, Pope Silvester I. (ob. 335 A.D.) is claimed as the originator of the festival: "Festum Inventionis S. Crucis a Silvestro institutum celebre multis est" (Patrol. xxi. 563). It is not impossible that there may have been a festival peculiar to the Roman Church, before its observance had become general.

Most Western Martyrologies and Calendars mark May 3 as "Inventio S. Crucis," including the ancient Martyrologium Hieronymi (Patrol. xxx. 435); but there are grounds for doubting the genuineness of the words here, more especially from the fact that they are absent from the very ancient Cod. Epternacensis, as is pointed out by Papebroch (Acta Sanctorum; May, vol. i. p. 369). It is found in the Martyrologium Bunsuntinum (Patrol. lxxx. 415), the Mart. Romanum Vetus (ib. cxiii. 158), and those of Rabanus, Ado, Usuardus, and Notker (ib. cx. 1142; cxiii. 256; cxiv. 15; cxxi. 1075); also in a Gallican and an English Martyrology (ib. lxiii. 614, 620), the Mozarabic and the Gothic Calendar (ib. lxxxv. 98, lxxxvi. 39), the Cal. Mutinense (ib. cvi. 821), Floriacense (ib. cxxviii. 1187).

There is a special office for this day in the Gothogallic Missal (ib. lxii. 285), in the Mozarabic Breviary and Missal (ib. lxxxv. 739, lxxxvi. 1119), in the Gelasian Sacramentary (ib. lxxiv. 1162), in the Gregorian Sacramentary and Antiphonary (ib. lxxviii. 101, 687). To this last we shall again refer.

Some, however, omit the festival altogether, and some give it a secondary place after the names of the Martyrs who are commemorated on this day. Thus there is no mention of it in the Calendar of Leo (ib. lxxiv. 878), in the metrical Martyrology of Bede (ib. xciv. 604), in the Sacramentarium Suavicense (ib. cli. 823), and some others (see in Leslie's note to the Mozarabic Missal in loc.). Again in the Martyrology of Bede given in the Acta Sanctorum (March, vol. ii. p. xviii.), a long narrative of the Martyrs commemorated on this day is followed by "Ipso die Inventio Sanctae Crucis." So too runs the metrical Martyrology of Wandelbert (Patrol. cxxi. 598):—

"Praesul Alexander quinq[ue] et Eventius orant, Theodolusque Dei pariter pro nomine caesi,
His quoque celsae crucis radiant vexilla repertae."

* This, however, is doubtless to be connected with the festival of the Exaltation of the Cross (ib. 504).

The same is the case with an old English Calendar, which reads "Natale SS. Alexandri, Eventii et Theodoli presbyteri, Inventio Crucis" (ib. xciv. 1151). See also the Cal. Stabulense and the Cal. Brixianum (ib. cxxviii. 1196, 6270).

In the Gregorian Sacramentary also the mention of the Inventio Crucis follows that of the Saints commemorated on this day (as also the Antiphonary in the MSS.), and Méhard (note in loc.) states that in the most ancient MSS. this festival is altogether wanting.

In the list of feasts to be observed given in the Capitulare of Ahyto or Hatto (appointed Bishop of Basle in 806 A.D.) there is no mention of the Inventio Crucis (Patrol. cxv. 12), and in the Capitula of Walter, bishop of Orleans (857 A.D.), the festivals of the Inventio Crucis and Exaltatio Crucis are appended to the end of cap. xviii. "De Sanctorum festivitatibus indicendis et observandis" (ib. cxix. 742), as though they had been introduced at a later date than the others mentioned.

All this evidence seems, as far as it goes, to point either to the fact that the festival was established at a comparatively late date, or that it was for some time of local rather than general observance. Papebroch (Acta Sanctorum in loc. c. iii.) suggests 720 A.D. as approximately the date of the general recognition of the festival, but the reference above to its absence in documents of even later date will incline us to look upon the end of the 8th century or the beginning of the 9th as the earliest period we can safely fix on.

Attention may be called here to the fact that several of the above mentioned authorities make an error of at least half a century in the date of Helena's alleged discovery. Thus the Martyrologium Hieronymi speaks of it as "post Passionem Domini anno ducesimo trigesimo tertio," in which it is followed by Florus in the additions to Bede's Martyrology, by Rabanus and others.⁴

The Greek Church has not, properly speaking, a separate festival for the Finding of the Cross, but celebrates this event on the day of the Exaltation of the Cross, September 14. Some branches, however, of the Eastern Church do observe a festival of the Finding of the Cross also. Thus in the Calendars of the Ethiopic and Coptic Churches given by Ludolf (Fasti Sacri Ecclesiae Alexandrinae), March 6 is marked "Inventio S. Crucis" (p. 22), and, in the case of the former Church, May 4, "Helena reperit Crucem" (p. 27).

Mention may be made here of writings on the subject of the Finding of the Cross referred to in the decrees of a council held at Rome under the presidency of Gelasius: while allowed to be read, their statements are to be received with caution. "Item [recipienda] scripta de Inventionis Crucis Dominicae, . . . novellae quaedam relationes sunt, et nonnulli eas Catholicis legunt. Sed cum haec ad Catholicorum manus pervenerint, beati Pauli Apostoli praecedat sententia, omnia probate, quod bonum est tenete" (Patrol. lix. 161). Further, in the Acta Sanctorum (May, vol. i. p. 362), Papebroch adduces grounds for believing the unhistorical character of much of this writing,—among other things, the same error in the

Another form of the imperial headgear was a low-crowned cap, apparently destitute of diadem or any special distinction of royalty. This was known as CAMELAUCIUM (which see). Constantine appears in this garb on his triumphal arch in Rome (Ferrario, u. s. pl. 30, No. 2), and in an illumination from a MS. of the 9th century, representing the Council of Nicaea, given by Agincourt (Pen- sanctuary of San Vitale at Ravenna, has his head covered with a jewelled cap, while the Empress Theodora wears a tiara surrounded with three circlets of gems. Strings of pearls and other gems hang down from each. These jewelled tassels were known as κατασπαστάς. (Const.

ible band of gold, στέμμα, στέφανος, sometimes adorned with a band of pearls and precious form of spanocheta (Anast. Bibl. Paschalis, 434, &c.). Examples of this form of crown are given in the annexed woodcuts of the Emperor Phocas, A.D. 602-610, and the Empress Irene, wife of Leo IV., A.D. 797-802. In the time of Const. Porphyrt. the royal treasury contained circlets or stemma of various colours, white, green, and blue, according to the enamel with which they were coated. These circlets decorated with gems are mentioned by Claudian in connection with the two sons of Theodosius, Arcadius, and Honorius, towards the end of the 4th century. "Et vario lapidum distinctos igne coronas" (In pr. Cons. Stilich. ii. 92.)

The most ancient examples of crowns are those long preserved in the treasury of the cathedral of Monza, in Lombardy, belonging to the early part of the 7th century. These crowns were three in number: (1) the so-called Iron Crown, "Corona Ferrea"; (2) the crown of Agilulf; and (3) that of Theodelinda. Agilulf's crown was taken to Paris as a prize of war by Napoleon I., in 1804, by mistake for the Iron Crown, and was stolen from the "Cabinet des Médailles," in which it was deposited, and melted down. The most celebrated of these crowns is—

(1) The Iron Crown of Lombardy, the reputed gift of Queen Theodelinda, who died A.D. 628. This crown is formed of six plates of gold, each of gems is 22; of gold roses, 26; and of enamel, 24. Within the golden circlet thus formed is the iron ring, from which is derived the designation of the "Iron Crown" (which, however, Ferrario asserts, is comparatively modern, never being found in the rituals of the churches of Milan and Monza before the time of Otto IV., A.D. 1175. Before this epoch even its advocate Bellani allows it appears in the inventories as Corona Aurea). This is a narrow iron band .04 inch thick and .4 inch broad, united at the extremities by a small nail, and connected with the articulated plates of the crown by little pins. Bellani asserts that it was hammered into shape, and bears no marks of the file. Burges, a more trustworthy authority, states that the marks of the file are clearly visible. (Arch. Journal, vol. xiv. p. 14.) This iron ring, as is well-known, is regarded as a relic of the greatest sanctity, being reputed to have been fashioned out of one of the nails of the true cross. This belief cannot be traced further back than the latter part of the 16th century. The existence of the band of iron is mentioned by Aeneas Sylvius (Pope Julius II. d. 1464) in his Hist. Aust. lib. iv., but simply as lamina quaedam, without a hint at its supposed sanctity, and with an expression of contempt for the allegorical meaning assigned to its employment in the coronation of the emperors, as denoting strength—"stultae interpretationi efficit locum." According to Muratori (De Coron. Ferr. Comment. A.D. 1698), Bugatus is the first author who mentions it (Addit. ad Hist. Univ. 1587). He was followed by Zucchi (Hist. Cor. Ferr. 1613), whose violations of truth Muratori holds it charitable to attribute to gross carelessness. Two years before the publication of Bugatus' book, A.D. 1585, a letter, sent from the archpriest of Monza to Pope Sixtus V., quoted by Muratori, speaks of the Iron Crown as a most precious possession of his church, as having been used from early times for the coronation of the Roman emperors (even this fact is doubtful), but distinguishes it from the relics properly so called, and makes no allusion to its having been wrought out of a nail of the crucifixion. From the 16th century onwards the belief gained strength, but having been discredited by the searching historical investigations of Muratori in the treatise referred to above, the worship of the crown as a sacred relic was alternately suspended and re-enforced by decrees and counter-decrees of the ecclesiastical authorities, until in 1688 the matter was laid before the Congregation of Relics at Rome. A process was instituted, which lingered on till 1717, when a diplomatic sentence was pronounced, leaving the chief point—the identity of the iron ring with the nail—undecided, but sanctioning its ing exposed to the adoration of the faithful, and used in processions.

The chain of evidence connecting the Iron Crown with the crucifixion nail is very precious, and shows some alarming gaps. According to the statement of Justus Fontaninus, bishop of Ancyra, De Coron. Ferr. 1719, he wrote in defence of its genuineness, the iron ring was believed to have been formed out of one of the two nails given by the Empress Helena, after her discovery of the true cross on Mount Sion to Zech. xiv. 20; the other was used as a head-covering—a diadem, according to some authorities (Ambros. De Obitu Theod. Magn.); a met, according to others, and those the most credible. Constantine's idea seems indeed to have been that so sacred an amulet affixed to his helmet should be a protection to him in battle, "galea illi usibus aptum" (Rufinus, Hist. Eccl. x. 8; x. l. 17; Soz. ii. 1; Theod. i. 18; Cassiod. l. i.).

The orthodox theory identifies the Monza Crown with the diadem supposed to have been presented by Helena to Constantine, which passed, one knows when or how (it is needless to enumerate the more or less probable hypotheses), from Constantinople to Rome, and is affirmed—yet of which there is absolutely no evidence—to have been sent as a present by Gregory the Great to Queen Theodelinda; although it is in the highest degree improbable that Gregory, who is known to have been "tenax reliquiarum," should have parted with a relic of such supreme sanctity. He, if such a precious gift had been made, it would not fail to have been mentioned by Gregory in describing his donations (Greg. Mag. Ep. [vii.] lib. xiv. [xlii.]). The view of Bellani (son of Monza, who wrote an elaborate treatise, La Corona di Ferro, Costumi, Europa, vol. iii.) that the iron ring and the gold circlet were originally distinct; that the former is the sacred one affixed to the helmet of Constantine, while the latter was primarily a diadem, open behind, fastened to the head by clasps, the extremities of which were united in the present shape when it was adapted to the iron ring. The view of Muratori, which appears the most probable, dispenses all notion of sacred interest attached to the iron ring, which he considers to have been inserted within the gold circle, as in the crown of Charlemagne (see post), simply for the purpose of giving firmness to the articulated teeth.

However it may have reached Italy, the character of the workmanship of the Iron Crown reveals its Byzantine origin. La Barte, who regards this as an incontrovertible fact, remarks that the art of working in enamel had not penetrated into Italy in the time of Theodelinda (Les Arts Industriels du Moyen Âge, li. 56 sq.).

The small size of the crown, barely large enough for the head of a child of two years old, internal diameter being 8 inches (its height 14 inches), leads to the conclusion that it was never intended for ordinary wearing, but was a pensive or votive crown, with a cross and ap usually depending from it, hung over the ear, and employed temporarily, on the occasion of coronations, for placing on the sovereign's head as a symbol of royalty, and then returned again to its place. Such crowns are seen hanging over the altar in a bas-relief of a coronation, now in the S. transept of Monza cathedral (see the woodcut p. 460), exactly resembling that which is being placed on the sovereign's head. In the church of St. Sophia, at Constantinople, also, according to Codinus, the royal στέφαννα were suspended over the holy table, and were only worn on high festivals. Ducange (Constantiniana) also informs us that the Greek emperors were inaugurated with one of the lamp-bearing crowns ordinarily hanging over the altar [CORONA LUCIS].

(For the history of the Iron Crown, see Muratori, De Coron. Ferr. Comment. Mediolan. et Lips. 1719; also *Anecd. second husband, chosen by her A.D. 591, on the death of Authar. From its small size, even less than the Iron Crown, it is evident that it was not intended for ordinary wear, but was a votive, suspensory crown. This is also proved by the inscription it bore: "† Agilulf. Grat. Dñi. vir. glor. rex. totius. Ital. offeret. s'co Johanni. Baptist. in. Eccl. Modicia." A gold cross depended from it, with a large amethyst in the middle, two gems in each arm and four large pearls. Seven little chains with pendent acorns hung from the cross. The crown itself was a circle of gold, decorated with 15 arched niches of laurel boughs containing figures of our Lord seated between two angels, and the Twelve apostles standing. It bore a circle of emeralds, carbuncles, and pearls above.

The inscription was in enamel. The clumsiness of execution leads La Barte u. s. to the conclusion that this and the following crown were of Lombard, not Byzantine workmanship.

(3) The Crown of Theodelinda.—This is a plain circlet, enriched with a vast quantity of gems of more or less value, chiefly emeralds and pearls, and a great many pieces of mother-of-pearl. From it depends a cross, also set with emeralds and pearls. (For these crowns consult Muratori, Ant. It. i. 480; Ferrario, u. s. iii. 70; Frisi, and eight large pearls, with jewelled pendants attached to its foot and limbs. To the upper margins are attached four golden chains of beautiful design, by which it might be suspended, uniting in a foliated ornament, and surmounted by a knob of rock crystal, with sapphires hanging round.

A second crown discovered in the same place has been assigned with much probability to the queen of Reccesvinthus. In form and arrangement it corresponds to that of the king, but the enrichments are less gorgeous. Like that, it is formed in two pieces with a hinge, to adapt it to the head of the wearer. The hoop is set with fifty-four gems, rubies, sapphires, emeralds, and

(4) Crowns of Reccesvinthus, King of the Spanish Visigoths, and his Queen and Family.—These eight gold crowns belonging to the 7th century, now in the museum of the Hôtel de Cluny, were discovered buried in the earth at Fuente de Guarrazar in 1858, having probably been interred early in the 8th century on the invasion of the Saracens. The whole of the crowns found were evidently, from their form and dimensions, votive crowns, probably dedicated by the king and queen and chief officers of the court. The crown of Reccesvinthus, who reigned A.D. 653–675, is one of the most gorgeous and remarkable relics of its age, composed of a fillet jointed and formed of a double plate of purest gold. It measures about 9 inches in diameter, or 27 inches in circumference. The hoop is about 4 inches broad, and more than half an inch in thickness. The rims of the hoop are formed of bands of intersecting circles in cloisonné work in red and green, with incrustations of cornelian. It is enriched with thirty uncut sapphires of large size, alternating with as many very large Oriental pearls, forming three rows. The intervening spaces are pierced with open work, and engraved so as to represent foliage and flowers. To the lower edge of this hoop is suspended by small chains a very remarkable fringe of gold letters about 2 inches long, incrustated with gems, with a pendant pearl and sapphire attached to each, forming the inscription—

A little below the fringe of letters hangs a massive Latin cross mounted with six fine sapphires

opals. From the lower rim hang eight sapphires. There is no inscription. The pendant cross is covered with jewels, but less costly than those on the former one.

The six smaller crowns are reasonably supposed to have belonged to the younger members of this royal family. Three of these are gold hoops without pendant crosses, jewelled, enriched with repoussé work and mother-of-pearl. One is decorated with an arcade of little round-headed arches, and has a fringe of rock crystal. The other three are of a very singular construction. They consist of a kind of open framework or basketwork of gold, formed of three horizontal and lustrous brilliancy." (Lasteyrie, Description du Trésor de Guarrazar, Paris, 1860. La Barte, Arts indust., i. 499 sq.)

(5) The Crown of Svintila.—Svintila was king of the Visigoths, A.D. 621–631. His crown, preserved in the royal armoury at Madrid, is of massive gold enriched with sapphires and pearls set rose fashion between two borders set with delicate stones. From the lower rim hangs a fringe of open letters of gold, set with red glass, suspended by chains of double links, with pendant pear-shaped sapphires. The letters form the inscription, SVINTILANVS REX OFFERT.

(Proceedings of the Soc. of Antiq. ii. 11. José Amador de los Ríos, El Arte Latino-germano, Madrid, 1861.)

These Spanish crowns are considered by La Barte to be of Spanish workmanship. Lasteyrie, on the other hand, assigns to them a Gothic origin, and, with less probability, thinks that they were brought into Spain by North-German barbarians.

The suspensory form of these crowns and the inscriptions some of them present prove that they were of a votive character, and were dedicated to God by the king and his family on some memorable occasion, to be hung up over the altar. But this does not preclude their previous use as crowns for wearing. That such was their primary destination is rendered almost certain by the variation in diameter of the different circlelets, and by the hinges and fastenings which facilitated their being fitted to the wearer's head. The queen's crown also has little loops, above and below, for attaching a lining or cap within the gold circlelet, to prevent it from galling the wearer's brows.

(6) The Crown of Charlemagne.—This crown, preserved in the treasury at Vienna, is evidently made up of portions belonging to different epochs. It is composed of eight round-headed plaques of gold; four larger, enriched with emeralds and sapphires en cabochon, and four smaller, presenting enamelled figures of David, Solomon, Hezekiah, and Christ. Strength and unity are imparted to the whole by the insertion of two little circlelets of iron. A jewelled cross rises from the apex of the front plaque, from which an enamelled arch stretches over the head to the back, bearing the name of the Emperor Conrad, A.D. 1138. The costumes of the figures in the enamels are Byzantine. (Hangard-Mangé, Les Arts somptuaires, Paris, 1858, pl. 31, vol. ii. p. 31.)

CROWNS FOR BRIDES. } These two uses CROWNS FOR BURIALS. } of crowns or wreaths, as connected with Christian social life, seem to call for a separate notice. In each case there was a custom belonging to a non-Christian period. The bridal crown, of Greek origin, had been adopted by the Romans, and was in universal use, sometimes worn by the bride alone, sometimes by the bridegroom also. The rigorous-ness of early Christian feeling rejected the use of coronae generally, as connected either with the excesses of heathen feasts, or the idolatry of heathen worship. Christians were to avoid marriages with heathen women lest they should be tempted to put the evil thing upon their brows (Tertull. de Coronâ, c. 13). Flowers might be worn as a bouquet, or held in the hand, but not upon the head. It was not long, however, before the natural beauty of the practice freed itself from the old associations and reasserted its claim.
It is probable that the objections to it were never very widely entertained. In the time of Chrysostom it was again a common usage. Bridegroom and bride were crowned as victors, assuming their purity, over the temptations of the flesh. It was a shock to Christian feeling when the wreaths were worn by the impure (Rom. ix. in 1 Tim.).
The bridegroom's wreath was for the most part of myrtle (Sidon. Apollin. Carm. II. ad Anthem.), the bride's of verbenæ. The prominence of the rite in the Eastern church has led the whole marriage service to be described in the Greek ἑὸς λόγιον as the Ἀκολουθία τοῦ στεφανώ- ματος; and the ceremony itself, as probably handed down from an early period, deserves mention here. First, the bridegroom solemnly crowns the bride in the name of the Father, the Son, and the Holy Ghost. Then the bride in like manner crowns the bridegroom. Lastly, the priest blesses them with the thrice-repeated words, "O Lord our God, crown them with glory and honour."

The use of wreaths for burials, common among both Greeks and Romans, on the head of the corpse, on the bier, on the tomb, was for like reasons rejected by the more rigorous teachers. The disciples of Christ were to seek an incorruptible crown, the amaranth which grows on no earthly soil (Clem. Alex. Pædag.
ii. 8). To those who had been accustomed to shew their honour to the dead by this outward sign, this refusal seemed cruel and unfeeling; and Christians had to defend themselves against the charge, "Coronæ etiam sepulcris denegatis" (Minuc. Fel. c. 12), with the answer, "Nec adnectimus arescentem coronam, sed a Deo æternis floribus viridem sustinemus" (ibid. c. 37). Here also, after a time, though less formally in the case of the nuptial crown, the old practice was revived with a higher significance. The crown appears on tombs and paintings as the symbol of martyrdom; and modern Christendom reproduces, without misgiving, the practice which the ancient Church rejected. [E. H. P.]

CRUCIFIX and REPRESENTATIONS OF THE CRUCIFIXION. It is necessary to

linguish between the use of the crucifix as an act or instrument of devotion, and that of orial or other representations of the Crucifixion as a scene. Every variety and combination of the arts of sculpture, mosaic, painting, engraving has been applied to this great act from early times, and to all parts of and this distinction is one of principle as well as convenience. The modern crucifix and use of course form no part of the subject. Within the limits of our period, all representations of the crucified Form of our Lord alone, as pictures, reliefs, and mosaics, in which the Form is the central object of a scene, may be considered alike symbolical, without historical or artistic appeal to emotion. There is still a divergence in the direction of realism, appeal to feeling by actual representation is in, whenever the human figure is added to symbolic cross.* The use of the sculptured, gilded, or enamelled crucifix or crucifixion in later times, is a development of that of the cross, the transition between them may have been gradual from the first; but the rude efforts of earlier days, with which alone we have to do, neither call on the imagination by vivid presentation of the actual event, nor awaken feeling appeal to the sense of beauty, nor distress by full details of bodily suffering. While the primitive rules of representation were adhered to they are to this day in the Greek Church, picture or icon dwells on the meaning of the act rather than its resemblance, and shadows it, rather than represents, the God-Man in act of death for man. These rules were first changed by, or naturally collapsed in the presence of, increased artistic power. The paintings of Masaccio and Giotto, and the reliefs of N. Pisano, brought the personality of the artist into every act, and introduced human motive and treatment, in the artistic sense of the words. To those whose minds are drawn to ascetic thought and practice, it has always been natural to state, and to communicate their thoughts in, the bodily sufferings of the Saviour of man. This was done by Angelico and others gradually and freely before the Reformation; in that period a somewhat polemical and artificial use has been made of this line of thought; painting and sculpture have been applied to body it accordingly in the Roman Catholic Church. It may be remarked, before retiring in our proper limits of time, that the use of blood, by Giotto and his followers down to Michelangelo, has doctrinal reference to the Holy Eucharist, and to Scriptural promises of cleansing by the blood of Christ.⁵ Giotto is less inclined to dwell for terror's sake on the bodily sufferings of the Passion, than to dwell with awe on its mystery as a sacrifice for man. But the rise of mediæval asceticism, and its attribution of sacramental efficacy to bodily pain, bore painters with it as well as other men. And in later times, when Christian feeling on the subject was lost, many men seem to have considered the final scene of the Redemption of Man chiefly as a good opportunity of displaying newly-acquired powers of facial expression and knowledge of anatomy.

The Crucifixion he calls "mysticis res coram adumbrata . . . emblematicis figuratissime modis; innocui videlicet agni juxta crucis lignum placide stantis typo." See Bottari, tavv. xxi. xxii. See, however, (ib., tav. cxviii.), the crucifix found in the tomb of St. Valentin in the Catacombs; which so much resembles the mosaic crucifix of John VII. that it hardly be of very early date. It is generally assigned to Adrian, about 880.

If Hallam's division of periods be accepted, which makes the end of the 5th century the beginning of the Middle Ages, the public representation of the Crucifixion may be said to be a mediæval usage in point of time. Further, Martigny (Dict. des Antiq. Chrétiennes, p. 124. n. v.) claims for France the honour of having possessed the first public crucifix-painting which ever existed; for which he refers to Gregory of Tours (De Glor. Martyr. l. 23), and which he says must have been at least as old as the middle of the 6th century. But he says above, probably with great correctness, that all the most eminent Crucifixions known were objects of private devotion, instancing the pectoral cross of Queen Theodolinda and the Syriac MS. of the Melchior

Theodolinda's Crucifix.

Library at Florence, both hereafter to be described. The official or public use of the cross as a symbol of Redemption begins with Constantine, though of course it had been variously employed by all Christians at an earlier date. [CROSS.]

Crucifixes, according to Guericke, did not appear in churches till after the 7th century. Such images, probably, in the early days of the Church, would produce too crude and painful an effect in the Christian imagination, and to that of the more hopeful Pagan they would be intolerable; not only because his feelings would recoil from the thought of the punishment of the cross, but from superstitious terror of confect, in a conventional form, as a crimson cord, which is twined strangely beneath about a skull. (Baedeker, Ital. P. vol. II. p. 125.)

necting the Infelix Arbor with a Divine Being. The Graffito Blasphemo of the Palatine illustrates this (see woodcut): but Christian teachers may have refrained from any addition to the cross, as a symbol of divine humiliation and suffering, from purely charitable motives. The cross itself may have been felt to be temporarily unwelcome to persons in certain stages of conversion.

If we set aside the various monograms of His name, and the emblematic fish, which is an anagram of it, there are but two classes of representations of our Lord,—those which point to His divinity and lordship over all men, and those which commemorate His humanity and sufferings for all men. The earliest of the former class is the Good Shepherd; the earliest of the latter the Lamb: and both are combined in the painting given by De Rossi, vol. ii. tav. v. The symbolic Lamb, as will be seen (Gen. iv. 4, xiii. 8; Exod. xii. 3, xix. 38; Is. xvi. 1; 1 Pet. i. 18; Rev. xiii. 8), connects the Old Testament with the New, and unites in itself all types and shadowings of Christ's sacrifice, from the death of Abel to St. John's vision of the slain victim. It is well said by Martigny to be the crucifix of the early times of persecution; and its emblematic use grows more significant as time advances. The cross is first borne by the Lamb on its head, in the monogrammatic form (Bottari, Sculture e Pitture sacre estratte dai Cimiteri di Roma, &c., Rom. 3 fol. 1737-54, tav. xxi. v. 1), about the latter half of the 4th century. The simple cross occurs thus in the 5th century (Bottari, tav. xxii.). In the 6th century the Lamb bears the cross (Aringhi, ii. lib. iv. p. 559, Roma Subterranea), and rests sometimes on a book, sometimes at the foot of an altar (Ciampini, Vetera Monumenta, vol. i. tab. xv. p. 28; vol. ii. tab. xv. p. 58), above which is the cross; and then it is represented "as it were slain," with evident reference to the Paschal feast (Ciampini, V. M. t. ii. tabb. xv. xlv.). Towards the end of the 6th century the Wounds of the Cross are represented on the sides and feet of the Lamb. In Ciampini (De Sacris Aedificiis, tab. xiii.) the Lamb is raised on a throne at the foot of an ornamented cross, the throne itself bearing resemblance to an altar-table.

The famous Vatican Cross (for which, and for the Cross of Velletri,* see Cardinal Borgia's monographs, Rome, 4to. 1779 and 1780) is the 6th century type of symbolic representation. A medallion of the Lamb bearing the cross, and with a nimbus, is placed at its central point of intersection, and it is accompanied by two half-length figures of our Lord, with the cruciform nimbus at the top and foot of the vertical limb. Two others at the horizontal ends are supposed to represent Justin II. and his Empress Sophia. The upper half-length of the Lord holds a book in the left hand, and blesses with the right; the lower one holds a roll and a small cross. The embossed lily-ornaments are of great beauty,

* The Cross of Velletri, which Borgia attributes to the 8th or 10th century, contains the symbols of the four Evangelists. The Vatican Cross is photographed in M. St. Laurent's paper in Didron's Revue Archéologique (see infra). The result reflects great credit on the accuracy of Borgia's illustration; and M. St. Laurent speaks highly of Ciampini and others.

Rambona, and others), "and embroidery on vestments. The renunciation of sculpture grew to a rigid passionate aversion . . . as of a Jew or Mohammedan." There can be no doubt that the first step in a progress which has frequently ended in idolatry was made in the Quinisext Council, or that in Trullo, at Constantinople in 681. It is the challenge to Iconoclasm. It decrees (can. 82) that, as the antitype is better than type or symbol in all representation, the literal representation of the Lord shall take the place of the symbolic Lamb on all emblems of His sacrifice, and ordains thus: *Τὸν τοῦ αἱματός τῶν ἁμαρτιῶν κόσμον Ἄμωδ Χριστοῦ τοῦ Θεοῦ ἡμῶν, κατὰ τὸν ἀνθρώπινον χαρακτῆρα καὶ ἐν τοῦ εἰκόσω ἀπὸ τοῦ νῦν ἀπὸ τοῦ παλαιοῦ ἀμωδ ἀναστηλοῦσθαι ἀρχόμεν.*⁴ [Compare AGNUS DEI.]

A very early crucifix of the 6th century seems to be mentioned in the following passage, which is produced by Binterim (Denkschrift iv. part i. 48) without reference, but which he may have seen in some unpublished record. He is speaking of the church of Hoya in the bishopric of Liege, destroyed by the Huns in the 4th century, and restored A.D. 512, at the time of the first synod of Orleans. This church "a suis civibus reedificatur, et in longum versus Orientem extenditur usque ad gradus Chori sub crucifixis, altari tamen antiquo semper remanente," &c. Further, he quotes Aegidius as stating that Robert, Provost of Liege, "sub crucifixo sepulchrum accepit." This only proves the existence of crucifixes at the time of the writers, especially as the original altar is spoken of as remaining, without mention of cross or crucifix, at the end of the choir which contained it. Had the name or date of the author of the passage quoted been known, it would have been of great importance; but it may be, and its Latin might indicate that it is, from some late chronicler, familiar with the appearance of the church, and using the words as meaning no more than "under the present crucifix, or rood above the altar-screen." Dr. Binterim finds no argument on it as to the date of the German change from cross to crucifix, and the passage may be let pass. The "Santo Volto," "Vultus de Luca," or Crucifix of Lucca (corrupted by William Rufus, for imprecatory purposes, into the "Face of St. Luke"), is carved in cedar-wood, and is attributed to Nicodemus, and supposed to have been conveyed miraculously to Lucca in 782. It is said to be of the 6th century, and is certainly one of the earliest crucifixes in existence. It bears the Lord crowned as king, and vested in a long pontifical robe as priest, and thus combines symbolic treatment with realism, perhaps in the way afterwards intended by the Council in Trullo. The idea is that of the Crucified King of Men, and the work is an assertion of the combined deity and humanity, and of the submission to death of the Lord of humanity. A crucifix greatly resembling this was found during some operations at Christchurch, Oxford, and is now preserved in the Bodleian: it was probably an outer ornament of some Evangelium. We understand M. St. Laurent to consider these examples to date from the 12th century (Iconographie de la Croix et du Crucifix; Didron's and exhaustive summary of our whole subject, admirably illustrated).

The steps of the progress from symbolic to literal representation will be noticed immediately; but two more Crucifixions of great and undoubted antiquity (the first having a claim to be considered the most ancient in existence) remain to be briefly noticed. Both confirm to a certain extent the remark insisted on or suggested by many Roman Catholic writers, that the private use of the crucifix in devotion dates from very early times. The first is the famous Syriac Evangelium in the Medicean Library at Florence, widely known for the probably unique detail of the soldiers, not casting dice, but playing at the world-old game of "Mora" on their fingers, for the garment without seam. It is represented in Assemani's Catalogus Bibl. Medic.
Florence, 1743, tav. xxiii. The whole MS. is one of the most interesting documents in the world; with many illuminations, performed with that indescribable grimness of earnestness which was the root of Eastern asceticism, and which still lingers in the handwork of the stern Arcagnoli,

CRUCIFIX

RUM, over the cross. The nimbus is cruciform, the waistcloth reaches almost to the knees, and is strangely formed into an eye. The Virgin and St. John stand under the arms of the cross. But the distinguishing detail is the lion of the Roman wolf and twins below the cross, with the words ROMVLVS ET REMVLVS PA NUTRITI. This wonderful ivory is now in the Vatican Museum (see Murray's Handbook), and is in the most ancient style of what may be called dark-age Byzantine art, when all instruction and sense of beauty are departed, but so as to give a sense of the reality of the fact rather than to render the work highly impressive also in the Medici MS. Professor Westwood (Pal. Sac. pl. 18) enables us to refer to a Crucifixion found in an Irish MS. of about 800. It is in the Library of St. John's College, Cambridge, and is partly copied from the Palaeographia by Mr. Ruskin (in The Paths, p. 27), who selects one of the angels as the cross as a specimen of absolutely degraded art. This is perfectly correct, and the work is a painful object of contemplation, as it plays the idiom of a contemptible person executed in a decaying style, rather than the work of a barbarian workman like the carver of the diptych. The absurd interlacings and use of the sharpening of fingers into points, and treatment of the subject entirely as a matter of craftsmanship, without either devotional sense or spontaneity or artistic effort to realize it, make the MS. most disagreeably interesting as far as the work of a craftsman is concerned. The plea or hypothesis of Roman Catholic writers, that actual images of the crucified body of the Lord may have been used in the very earliest times for private devotion, is open to the objection that none of them can be proved, whereas symbolical memorials of the Crucifixion are found in regular succession, both in fixed and in portable forms. Father Martigny states that the notorious Grafito of the Palazzo dei Cesari may be a caricatured copy of some covered crucifix used for Christian worship. Dr. Garrucci's description of it, "Il Crocifisso in casa dei Cesari," is given by Canon Bazzani in his 7th Bampton Lecture (p. 397); and the remarks which accompany it are most important, as they show "the more intelligent and bitter hostility of Paganism to the Church since the apostolic martyrdoms a century and a half before, when converts had also been made in Caesar's household." He shows also, incidentally, that it can hardly have been derived from any Christian emblem, as the ass's head connects it evidently with the Gnostic invective, which attributed to the Jews the worship of an ass. This Tacitus mentions (Hist. v. c. 4); and Tertullian (Apolog. 16) notices Tacitus' confusion between Jews and Christians, and appeals to his own account of the examination of the Jewish temple by Pompey, who found "no image" in the temple. For proof of the confusion of the early Christians with the Jews by the pagan world, Dr. Liddon refers to Dr. Pusey's note on the above passage in Tertullian, in the Oxford Library of the Fathers.

The relics of the treasury of the Cathedral of Monza, closely described and partly represented in woodcut by M. Martigny, are valuable examples of the transition between symbolical and actual representation of the Crucifixion. One of the ampullae for sacred oil is said to have been presented by Gregory the Great to Theodelinda, wife of Anstasius king of Lombardy, probably some time soon after 590, about a hundred years before the Council in Trullo. It is circular, and the head of the Lord, with a cruciform nimbus, is placed at the top. Below, to right and left, are the two thieves, with extended arms, but without crosses; and below them two figures are kneeling by a cross which seems to be budding into leaves. Two saints or angels are on the extreme right and left, and the usual Holy Sepulchre below, with an angel watching it on the right in the act of benediction, while St. John and St. Mary Magdalene are (apparently) approaching it on the other side. Another vessel bears a figure of the Lord, clothed with a long robe, with the nimbus and extended arms, but without the cross. Finally, the reliquary of Theodelinda, so called, has the crucified Form, with the nimbus and inscription IC XC, clothed in the long tunic, with the soldiers, two figures apparently mocking Him, and the Virgin and St. John on the right and left. The clothed figure indicates symbolical treatment, since it must have been well known that the Roman custom was to crucify naked; and Martigny argues that the Grafito, which is clothed, must therefore have been copied from some Christian picture. But from this time, or from that of the Council of 691, the artistic or ornamental treatment begins. The earliest Crucifixions are narrative, not dramatic; the Resurrection being so frequently introduced into the same composition, as if without it the subject would be altogether too painful for Christian eyes. And, indeed, till the first efforts of Pisan sculpture and Florentine painting, the importance of the event represented withdrew all attention to the personality of the artist. In works of after days the painter's power is all. Their range of excellence is as wide as the difference between the tender asceticism of Fra Angelico, and the mighty sorrow of Michael Angelo, and the intense power, knowledge, and passion of the great canvases of Titoret in the Scuola di San Rocco at Venice. The treatment of this picture resembles that of the most ancient works. All its consummate science is directed to bringing every detail of the scene into a great unity, while attention is expressly withdrawn from the face of the Lord, which is cast into deep shadow. (See Ruskin, Modern Painters, vol. ii.) In all ancient work the Lord's face is abstracted and expressionless: any attempt to represent bodily pain belongs to modern work of the baser sort, which forms no part of our present subject.

For the details and accessories of the Crucifixion, whether things or persons, they have been for the most part enumerated and described. The nails are always four in number in ancient works, two for the feet and two for the hands. The crossed legs and single large nail or spike belong to the artistic period. Martigny refers to St. Cyprian (De Passion. Dni. inter Opusc. p. 83, ed. Oxon.) as speaking of the nails which pierced our Lord's feet in the plural number. St. Cyprian, he says, had seen the punishment of the cross. The suppedaneum or rest for the feet occurs in the crosses of Leo III. and of Velletri, not in the Diptych of Rambona. The Graffito indicates its presence. It seems to have been occasionally left out, in deference to those passages in Holy Scripture which allude to the disgrace or curse attaching to one "hanging" on the tree. The title of the cross, which is given with slight differences in St. Matt. xxvii. 37, Mark xv. 26, Luke xxiii. 38, John xix. 9, varies greatly in different representations. It is omitted in the crosses of Lucca and Velletri. Early Greek painters reduce it to the name of Christ, IC XC, or substitute the A and ω . The sign $\Phi\Xi$ ($\phi\chi$) occurs, as well as LVX MVNDI, frequently accompanied by the symbols of the sun and the moon, as a red star or face and crescent, or in the Rambona ivory [see page 515] as mourning figures bearing torches. They are introduced as emblematic of the homage of all nature, or in remembrance of the eclipse of the Crucifixion.

The Blessed Virgin and St. John appear in the Medicean MS., and very frequently in ancient works; the soldiers rather less so, though they occur in the above MS. and the reliquary of Monza. The typical figure of the first Adam rising from the earth as a symbol of the resurrection of the body, with the Hand of Blessing above indicating the presence of God, is given in Ciampini (Le Sacr. Aedif. tab. xxiii. p. 75). The skull, whether human or that of a lamb, placed at the foot of the cross, either as an emblem of sacrifice or in reference to the place Golgotha, is of late use, and is almost the only late addition of symbolic detail.

The rare addition of the soldiers casting lots is said to be found in an ivory of the 8th century from Cividale in Friuli (Mozzoni, Tavole cron- logiche della Chiesa universale, Venezia, 1863). The only other representation of it is the Medici MS. The wolf and twins are in Rambona diptych alone. The types of the four Evangelists are on the back of the Cross of Velletri, in the Gospel of Egbert, of Trier, and on numerous crosses of later date. So additional inscriptions have been mentioned, well as the addition (in the Vatican Cross) medallion portraits. Considerable liberty in the matter seems to have been allowed in the early times, as is indicated by Constantine's introduction of the words of his Vision; and still more strongly in an instance referred to by Borgia, Anastasius (tom. i. a. 2, ed. Vignolli), of a cross given by Belisarius to St. Peter—"per mai Vigilli Papas"—of gold and jewels, weigh 100 lbs., "in qua scripsit victorias suas."

But even the Vatican Cross yields in interest to two German relics of the same character lately described and well illustrated in No. 45 the Jahrbucher des Vereins von Alterthumsfreunden im Rheinlande, p. 195, Bonn, 1868. The first of these is the Station-Cross of Mainz, is of gilded bronze, of the Western form (Carmichael), and rather more than one foot in height. Herr Heinrich Otte refers it to the end of the 11th century, a date far beyond our period. But interest is paramount, more particularly for the evident intention of the designer to make embody a whole system of typical instruction and to leave it behind him as a kind of sculptured document, or commentary, connecting Old and New Testaments. Thus, at the mid or intersection of the arms of the cross, the Lamb is represented in a medallion, his head surrounded with a plain nimbus. On the base of the cross in the same place there is a square plate, with an engraved representation of Abraham offering up Isaac, the angel, and the ram. Round the latter is the beginning of a hexameter line—†Cui patriarcha suum—which is completed round the medallion of the Lamb in front thus: †Pater offert in cruce natum. In like manner, four engravings on each side at extremities of the cross refer to each other and are described by corresponding halves of hexameters. The New Testament subjects all in front, with the Lamb in the centre, antitypes: the Old Testament or typical events or persons are at the back. Thus on the apostle's left at the back of the cross is an engraving of Moses receiving the Tables of the Law Mount Sinai, with the words Qui Moysi legem. Corresponding to it on the right front is Descent of the Holy Spirit, with dei alium Pneumatis ignem. The remainder as under—

The decorative scrollwork is rather sparingly disposed with great judgment, and on the spike, ferule, or metal strap probably intended for fixing the cross on a staff for processional or other purposes [see CAORN, DRACONARIUS] is an engraving of the probable designer and donor, THEODERIC ABBAS. The graphic power, exceeding quaintness of the Scriptural engravings is that of the finest miniatures of the 11th or 13th century.

The second of these most interesting works is inferior as a work of art from its barbaric work-

ness and the preference for ugliness so often observed in Northern-Gothic grotesque, is of even greater interest as a transitional cross, especially when viewed in relation to the changes enforced by the decree of the Council in Trullo, A.D. 691. This is the Station-Cross of Planig, near Kreuznach; of the same size and form as that of Mainz, but referred by Otto to the 10th century. The ancient symbol of the Lamb is preserved on the back of this crucifix, which displays the human form in front, as in many other Romanesque crosses of bronzed copper. On this combination—perhaps a compromise between the feeling of the older times and the more modern spirit of the Quinisextine Council—Otto quotes Durandus, Rationale, lib. i. c. 3, n. 6: "Non enim agnus Dei in cruce principaliter depingi debet; sed homine depicto, non obest agnus in parte inferiori vel posteriori depingere." He also gives the express words of Adrian I., in his letter to Tarasius, Patriarch of Constantinople, in 785: "Verum igitur agnum Dominum nostrum J. C. secundum imaginem humanam a modo etiam in imaginibus pro veteri agno depingi jubemus." (De Consecr. Dist. iii. c. 29; see Labbe, vi. 1177.) He refers also to the splendid work on Rhenish antiquities called Kunstdenkmäler des christlichen Mittelalters, by Ernst aus'm Werth, Leipzig (Weigel), 1857, taf. xxiv.–vi., for the Essen and other roods, which much resemble those of Kreuznach and Mainz, combining the Lamb with the human form, and adding personifications of the sun and moon which remind us of the Diptych of Rambona, and the symbols of the four Evangelists, as in the Crucifix of Velletri. Space forbids us to give accounts of these most interesting relics, but the subject appears to be treated with exhaustive fulness and illustrated to perfection in the two German works referred to. The Planig-on-Nahe rood, however, is entitled to a briefly-detailed description. In front is the crucified form, severely archaic in treatment; the long hair is carefully parted and carried back; the head is without nimbus; and the limbs are long, stiff, and wasted, the ribs being displayed, as is so commonly done in mediæval crucifixes, to complete the illustration of the text, "They pierced my hands and my feet: I may tell all my bones." A triple serpentine stream of blood runs from each hand, and also from the feet, being there received in a cup or chalice, the foot of which is a grotesque lion's head. The back of the cross bears on its centre the Lamb with cruciform nimbus; below it a medallion of the donor, "Ruthardus Custos;" and four other bas-reliefs, now wanting, occupied the four extremities of the arms, and almost certainly represented the four Evangelists. As in the Diptych of Rambona, the navel resembles an eye. Scarcely inferior to these is the 10th century miniature of a single crucifix with the title IHS NAZAREN REX JUDEORUM, and the sun and moon above the cross-beam, within circles, and represented with expressions of horror,—seated in chariots, one drawn by horses, the other by oxen. And it is impossible to omit the Crucifixion picture from the Gospel of Bishop Egbert of Trier, 975–993 (in Mooyer's Onomasticon Chronographicon, Hierarchia Germanica, 8vo. Minden, 54), now in the Stadtbibliothek there. Here the Lord is clad in a long robe to the ankles; the robbers are also clad in tunics so close to the form as to give the appearance of shirts and trousers. Above are the sun and moon, hiding their faces. The cross has a second cross-piece at top, forming a tau above the Western cross. The robbers are on tau-crosses; suspended, but with unpierced hands; the passage in the 22nd Psalm being referred to the Redeemer alone. Their names, Demas the penitent, and Cesmas the obdurate, are above their heads. The Virgin-Mother and another woman stand on the right of the cross, St. John on the left. The soldier "Stephaton" is presenting the sponge of vinegar: two others are casting lots below. This detail reminds us of the great Florentine miniature of the monk Rabula, excepting that the game of Mora is there substituted for dice.

These works are somewhat beyond our period; yet as a paper on Crucifixes must contain some account of the things whose name it bears, and the first eight centuries supply us with so few examples of what are popularly called crucifixes, a short inroad into early mediævalism may be allowed. The Iconodulist transition formally made at the Council in Trullo was well suited to the Northern mind, and to the sacramental theory of pain; but it fell in also with that tendency to personification advancing on symbolism, which the Western races inherit, perhaps, from ancient Greece, and which Mr. Ruskin, in his late Oxford Lectures, points out as the idolatrous tendency of Greek art. With Cimabue and Giotto, and from their days, artistic skill and power over beauty are brought to bear on the crucifix, as on other Christian representations, for good and for evil. Of the cautious and gradual compromise of the Greek Church we have already spoken. [R. St. J. T.]

CRUET. [AMA: AMPULLA.]

CRYPTA. In the well-known passage of St. Jerome in which he describes the Sunday visits he and his schoolfellows at Rome paid to the graves of the apostles and martyrs, he uses the term cryptas to designate what we now call the catacombs. "Dum essem Romæ puer . . . solebam . . . diebus Dominica sepulchra apostolorum et martyrum circumire, crebroque cryptas ingredi quas in terra profunda defossas ex utraque parte ingredientium per parietes habent corpora sepulcorum." Hieron. in Eccl. c. xl. We find the word again used metaphorically in Jerome's preface to Daniel, "Cum et quasi per cryptam ambulans rarum desuper lumen aspicerem." The word is employed in the same specific sense by Prudentius, Peristephan. Hymn. ii.:—

"Haud procul extremo culta ad pomeria valla
Mors latebroso crypta latet forella.
Hujus in occultum gradibus via prope reflexa
Ire per anfractus luce latente docet."

The classical use of crypta for an underground passage or chamber, whether the drain of a cloaca, or a subterranean arcade, or a storehouse for fruit or corn, or a tunnel, such as that of Pausilipo at Naples, shews the appropriateness of the term. (See for examples Faccioliuti, Lexicon.) Crypta seems to have been sometimes used in Christian times as synonymous with coemeterium. Thus we have in the church of St. Prassede an inscription commemorating the translation thither from the catacombs of the relics of more than two thousand saints, in which occur the words "in coemeteriis seu cryptis." We may, however, mark this distinction between the two words that coemeterium is a word of wider signification, including open-air burial-grounds, while crypta is strictly limited to those excavated beneath the surface of the ground. Padre Marchi, after an elaborate investigation of the inscriptions in which the word crypta occurs, endeavours to demonstrate that it was employed to indicate a limited portion of a subterranean cemetery, including several burial chapels or cubicula, so that the relation of the cubiculum to the crypta, and again of the crypta to the coemeterium, was that of a part to the whole. (Monumenti primitivi, pp. 156 sq., 168 sq.) His chief authority for this conclusion is a passage of Anastasius, Vita S. Marcellini, § 30, which appears to draw this distinction between the cubiculum in which the body of Pope Marcellinus was buried, and the crypta of which it formed part. There are also inscriptions which support Marchi's view that a crypta was a smaller division of a coemeterium. One from that of Priscilla records that Gregory lies "in the eleventh crypt," "in undecima crypta Gregorius." Others speak of "new crypts" constructed in a cemetery; e.g. an inscription now in the Vatican "in cimiterium Balbinae in crypta nova;" one from St. Cyriaca given by Boldetti, "in crypta nova retro sanctus." But Mich. Stef. de Rossi has shown satisfactorily, Rom. Sott. i. 23 sq. that Marchi presses the supposed distinction too far, and that it is very far from holding good generally. The truth is that crypta was a word of general meaning, and embraced every kind of subterranean excavation, whether smaller or more extensive.

We sometimes meet with the expressions cryptae arenarum, or cryptae arenariae, in connection with the interment of Christian martyrs. Bosio, Rom. Sott. pp. 192, 186, 481, 300, &c. These would seem to indicate the galleries of a deserted pozzolana pit, as places of sepulture. But it has been shewn in the article CATACOMBS that, though the subterranean cemeteries very frequently had a close connection with these quarries, and were approached through their adits, the sand-pits themselves were seldom or never used for interment, for which indeed they were unfit without very extensive alteration and adaptation. The passages referred to, which are chiefly found in the not very trustworthy "Acts of the Martyrs," have probably originated in a confusion between the catacombs themselves and the quarries with which they were often so closely connected. CTESIPHON ON THE TIGRIS (COUNCIL OF), A.D. 420, under Taballaha, abp. of Seleucia, on the opposite bank of the river, where the Nicene faith was received, and with it the canons to which the consent of the rest of the church westwards had been given (Mansi iv. 441-2).

CUBICULUM. In addition to the use of this word to designate the family grave chambers in the subterranean cemeteries at Rome (for which see CATACOMBS, p. 310), we find it employed to denote what we should now call the side chapels of the nave of a church. The first instance of its use in this sense is in the writings of Paulinus of Nola. Writing to his friend Severus, Ep. xxxii. § 12, he describes the church recently erected at Nola, and particularizes these side chapels, which were evidently novel features in church arrangement. There were four on each side of the nave, beyond the side aisles (porticus), with two verses inscribed over the entrance. Their object was to furnish places of retirement for those who desired to pray or meditate on the word of God, and for the sepulchral memorials of the departed. The passage is: "Cubicula intra porticus quaterna longis basilicae lateribus inserta, secretis orantium, vel in lege Domini meditantium, praeterea memoriis religiosorum ac familiarium accommodatos ad pacis aeternae requiem locos praebent, omne cubiculum binis per liminum frontes versibus praenotatur." They differed from the side chapels of later ages in containing no altars, as originally there was but one altar in a church. (Remondini, tom. i. p. 412.) Paulinus also speaks of these chapels under the name of cellae or cellulae, e.g. when speaking of a thief who had concealed himself in one of them all night, he says:

"Cellula de multis, quae per latera undique magna,
Apposita tectis praebent secreta sepulchris
Hospitia."—Poema, xix. v. 478 sq.

Cubicula is also of frequent occurrence in the Liber Pontificalis of Anastasius Bibliothecarius, as synonymous with oratoria. In the description of various oratoria erected by Symmachus A.D. 498-514, we find, § 79, "quae cubicula omnia a fundamento perfecta construxit." Of Sergius, A.D. 687-701, we read, § 163, that he repaired the decayed chapels around St. Peter's. "Hic tectum et cubicula quae circumquaque ejusdem basilicae quae per longa temporum stillicidiis et rudibus fuerant disrupta studiosius innovavit et reparavit." And it is recorded of Leo III. A.D. 795, that he also rebuilt the ruinous cubicula attached to the same basilica (§ 412). Perhaps the earliest existing example in Rome of such a chapel attached to the body of a church is that of St. Zeno in the church of St. Prassede, built by Pope Paschal I. about A.D. 817. In an early description of the basilica of San Lorenzo fuori le Mura, given by De Rossi, Bullett. di Arch. Crist. Giugno, 1864, p. 42, from a MS. in the Vienna Library, we find the word used in a similar sense: "Est parvum cubiculum in porticu ad occidentem ubi pausat Herennius martyr." Paulinus also describes cubicula or cellae of this nature in the porticos of the atrium of the church of St. Felix. They were intended for private prayer. The altar of the basilica could be seen from them by means of windows. They were ornamented with scriptural paintings:

"Metanda bonis habitacula digne
Quos huc ad sancti justum Felicis honorem, Duxerat orandi studium non cura bibendi."

Poem. xxvi. v. 395 sq.

The last words quoted have reference to the custom, the abuse of which, degenerating into gross license, is severely inveighed against by Paulinus, of holding feasts in the cubicula. Cf. Paulin. Poema xxvi. De Felicis Natal. ix. v. 541.

The word οίκτος was used in Greek in the same sense. We have an example in a letter of Iulus to Olympiodorus the prefect, relating to the church he had built, ἐν δὲ τῷ κοινῷ οἴκῳ ἀλλοῖς καὶ διαφόροις οἰκίσκοις διελλαμένῳ ἡχοῖσθαι, ἵναστον πεπεγμένῳ τιμῇ σταυρῷ.

From the use of cubiculum as a chapel, cubicularii came to be employed in the sense of aplainis. "Hic [Leo I.] constituit et addidit ipsa sepulchra apostolorum ex clero Romano istodes qui dicuntur cubicularii quos modo dicimus capellanos. Cubiculum enim idem erat yud antiquos quod hodie apud nos capella." Iacconius, Vit. et Gest. Pont. Roman. i. p. 307.

CUCUFAS, martyr at Barcelona, July 25 Mart. Usuardi. [C.]

CUCULLA, cucullus, cucullio, is one of the w articles of the monastic dress specified by the founder of the Benedictines (Reg. c. 55); it has commonly been considered the badge of monks, e.g. in the old proverb, "cuculla non facit onachum." Benedict ordered the "cuculla," hood, to be shaggy for winter, and for summer lighter texture (cf. Conc. Reg. c. 62); and a "scapulare" to be worn instead out of doors, as ore suitable for field-work, being open at the sides. The "cuculla" protected the head and shoulders, and, as being worn by infants and ascetics, was said to symbolise humility; or, on another account, it was to keep the eyes from ancing right or left (Cass. Inst. i. 5; Sozom. ist. Ecc. iii. 13, 14). It was part of the dress of nuns, as well as of monks (Pallad. Hist. Laus. .), and was worn by the monks of Tabenna at the mass (Pall. H. L. 38). If, as the words seem to say, it was their only clothing on that occasion, it must of course have been longer than hood or cape. Indeed, "cuculla" is often taken as equivalent to "casula" (from "casa"), covering of the whole person; in later writers means, not the hood only ("cucullus"), but the monastic robe, hood and all ("vestis cucullata," Reg. Comm. S. Bened. c. 55, cf. Mab. Ann. 17). These same monks of Tabenna or Pacholani, like the Carthusians, drew their hoods forward at meal times, so as to hide their faces from one another (Pall. 48; Ruff. Vit. Mon. 3). The "cappa" (probably akin to our "cape"), in which seems to correspond with the Gallic cuculla, and both were nearly identical, it is thought, with the "melotes" or sheepskin of the earliest ascetics (Cass. Instit. i. 8; Pall. Vit. Laus. 28); and so with the "perna" (or penula," according to Al. Gazaeus, ad loc. cit.), the "pellis caprina dependens ab humeris lumbos" (Isidor. Orig. xix. 21, ap. Reg. Comm. Bened.). Of course it is difficult to identify precisely the technical names for dress in various countries, and in a remote period. [I. G. S.]

CUCUMELLUM. A vessel mentioned among those which Paul, bishop of Cirta, delivered up to Felix (Baronius, Annales, an. 303, c. 12). The cucumellum was of silver, and was probably a urlet or flagon for use on the altar. Compare MA. (Ducange's Glossary, s. v.) [C.]

CULDEES. [COLIDEL.]

CUNIBERT, bishop, deposition at Cologne about A.D. 683, Nov. 12 (Mart. Usuardi). [C.]

CUP. [CHALICE: COMMUNION: GLASS, CHRISTIAN.]

CUPELLA, a small loculus or sepulchral recess. At present we have only one instance of its use to adduce, which is given by Marchi (Monumenti Primit. p. 114). The inscription in which it is found records the burial of her two children, Secundina and Laurentius, by their mother Secunda. The solecisms in grammar and orthography with which it is full show that Secunda was a person of humble rank. The stone is preserved in the Museo Kircherianum. The inscription is as follows:—"Ego Secunda feci cupella bone | memorie filium meum Secun | dinem que recessit in fidem | cum fratrem suum Lauren | tum in pace recesserunt." Cupella is evidently the diminutive of cupa, explained by Du Cange to mean urna, arca sepulchralis. This sense is a derivative one from its classical meaning of a large cast, butt, or vat (Caes. Bell. Civ. c. 11; Lucan. lib. iv. v. 420; Varro apud Non. c. ii. No. 113). It appears in pagan inscriptions but rarely: e.g., "D. Apuleius Ionicus fecit Eutychie sorori suae et Eutycheti filio ejus. In hac cupa mater et filius positi sunt" (Gruter, Inscr. p. 845, No. 1 D); "D. M. Olus Publicus Polytilius Tutor Titi Flavi Alghathangeli pupilli sui Matri | Sexetiae Fortunatae defunctae locum emit, marmam | calcavit cupam aedificavit de bonis ejus omnibus consumat." (Doni class. 11, No. 6). The use of the word survived till later times, and Du Cange quotes from a monkish writer "in alia cuba juxta orientem sepulchrum SS. Victoria, &c." The idea has been propounded by the Rev. J. W. Burgon (Letters from Rome, p. 206), that we may find in cupella, as a place of Christian burial, the etymology of the word capella, chapel, which has so long perplexed philologists, and of which no satisfactory derivation has ever yet been discovered. The architectural term cupola is another form of the same root. [E. V.]

CURCODEMUS, deacon, martyr at Auxerre, May 4 (Mart. Usuardi). [C.]

CURIA ROMANA. [APPEAL: COUNCIL.]

CURSE. [ANATHEMA: EXCOMMUNICATION.]

CURSUALES EQUI, post-horses, i.e. horses belonging to the curia publica, called also for shortness curvae, Gr. ῥόδοι. The Roman posting or postal system—the distinction between the two belongs to a late stage of civilization—was established by Augustus. According to the "Secret History" of Procopius (c. 30), the day's journey consisted of eight posts, sometimes fewer, but never less than five. Each stable had 40 horses, and as many stablemen or stabularii (who seem elsewhere to be called hippocomi, Code. bk. xii. T. li. l. 13). Bingham gives a quite incorrect idea of the system in describing the curiales equi as being simply impressed for the army and exchequer. A constitution of the Emperor Constantine, A.D. 326, expressly enacts that no one but the Prefect has the right to go by any other road than that which has a "curia," shewing that no mere occasional impressment is meant (sed nec per aliam viam eundi quisquam habeat facultatem, nisi per quam curvae publicae stare dignoscitur; Code. bk. xii. T. li. l. 2). But Bingham, with his almost habitual inaccuracy, seems to have confounded the curvus publicus with the coectio or right of gratuitously using it, which was confined to officials, to envoys, and under certain circumstances to senators (Code, v. s., l. 8, and see also ll. 11, 16), and which did in such case resemble a right of impressment, though the true equivalent for impressment seems to be found in the angariae or parangariae. The cost of providing both the horses and fodder for them was supplied by the State, i. e. as it appears, by the provinces (the duty being deemed one which belonged to the land and not to the person, Code, bk. x. l. 4, law of Valerian and Gallienus), but it would seem that they were not bound to maintain post-carriages (paravereda) or horses for them, since a law of Arcadius and Honorius, A.D. 403, enjoins the rectors of the provinces to see that the curials or provincials were not compelled to provide animals which they did not owe to the post (ll. l. 19). Through the rogery of the officers employed the cost of fodder was, it seems, often exaggerated, whilst the animals were starved. (Code, v. s. l. 18; constitution of Arcadius and Honorius, A.D. 400, and see also ll. 2, 7, 19.) By way of compensation, the stable manure was left to the provinces (l. 7, of Valentinian, Valens, and Gratian). The sale of the public horses was forbidden (l. 10); those who used more horses than they were entitled to had to pay, according to circumstances, four times the price of the horses, or a pound of gold for each (ll. 15, 20). A curious constitution of the Emperor Constantine, A.D. 316, which is to be found at length in the Theodosian Code, bk. viii. T. v. l. 66, but of which only a brief extract remains in that of Justinian (bk. xii. T. li. l. 1)—anticipating the labours of "the Society for the Prevention of Cruelty towards Animals"—enacts that "Forasmuch as many with knotted and very thick sticks (nodosis et validialmis fustibus) at the very outset of a stage compel the public animals to exhaust whatever strength they have, placeat that none in driving should use a stick but either a rod or a whip, with a short goad (aculeus) infixed to the point, which may admonish their idle limbs with a harmless tickle (inaocuo titillo), without exacting what their strength cannot compass"—the punishment varying from loss of rank to exile according to the original Constitution; but the extract in Justinian's Code simply threatens punishment generally (poena non defutura).

It seems to be considered that the clergy were exempt from the obligation to pay tax for the horses of the curvus, under their general exemption from sordida munera, extraordinary charges, the "parangarian prestation," or the translatio, or obligation to carry goods (see Code, bk. iv. T. iii. l. 2, of Constantine, A.D. 357; T. ii. l. 5, of Gratian, Valentinian, and Theodosius, A.D. 412; Nov. 131, c. 5). It seems, however, difficult to identify the ordinary contribution for the curvus publicus with one of these. The opinion has probably arisen from confounding it with the liability to the "parangaria praestatio," which, as above intimated, seems rather to relate to occasional impressment. Certain it is that as one of the duties belonging to the land, which were to be borne by all (munera, quas patrimonii publicae utilitatis gratia indicuntur, ab omibus subeunda sunt, Code, bk. x. l. xli. l. 1, of Antonine) it does not seem by its nature to have been one from which the clergy would be exempt, and we have proof from the story of St. Augustine having declined to accept for the Church an estate charged with the patrimonial munus termed the "navicularian," i. e. that relating to the transport of corn from Africa, lest the Church should have to undertake such a duty, that no ecclesiastical immunity obtained in a precisely similar case (the Digest classes together as patrimonial munera those "rei vehicularia, item navicularia;" bk. l. T. iv. l. 1). [J. M. L.]

CURSOR. (1) In the days when it was dangerous for Christians to make known publicly the times and places of their assemblies, the faithful were frequently summoned by a messenger going from house to house, who was called cursor or praecon. To this custom Tertullian seems to allude when (De Fuga in Persecutione, c. 14) he says, speaking of the difficulty of holding assemblies, "Non potes discurre per singulos;" An epitaph published by Brower, URSACIUS CURSOR DOMINICUS (Annal. Trevrens. i. 53), is generally referred to an official of this kind; but this Ursacius may have been an ordinary letter-carrier of the church. (See Ducange, s. v. Cursor.) Assemblies seem to have been, at least in some instances, announced in this way in the 4th century; for Jerome, writing to Eustochium (Epist. 22), speaks of a praecon giving notice of the Agape; and Eusebius of Alexandria (quoted by Binterlin, Denkwürd. iv. 1, 281) speaks of the unreadiness of many to go to church when the herald called.

(2) An official to whom was specially committed the task of circulating letters of popes or other bishops; see Baronius, Annales, an. 58, § 102. "Romae adhuc durant Papae cursores, qui deferunt ejus ordines ac pontificis bullas publicant." (Macri Hieroglossicon, s. v. Cursor.) [C.]

CURSUS. The divine office, or series of prayers, psalms, hymns, and versicles said daily by the clergy in churches. For instance, the seventh canon of the council of Chelsea [Calcutt.] is, "Ut omnes ecclesiae publice canonicis horis cursum suum cum reverentia habeant" (Haddan and Stubbs, Councils, iii. 451). See HOURS OF PRAYER; OFFICE, THE DIVINE. [C.]

CURTAIN (cartina, awlactum, celum, βῆλος, καπερίσπασμα, κατανέσπασμα, ἀμφίδωρον). Curtains were used in ancient churches for the following purposes. 1. To hang over the out doorway of the church. 2. To close the doorway between the nave of the church and the sanctuary, or perhaps rather to fill the open space or CANCELLI of the door, during the time of consecration of the Eucharist. 3. To fill the space between the pillars of the ciborium, canopy of the altar. 4. Curtains were also used in baptisteries.

1. The Paschal Chronicle (p. 294) mentions curtains embroidered with gold, for the doorway in enumerating the gifts of Constantine to the church at Constantinople. St. Jerome (Epistolae Nepot. Epistolae ad Heliod.) praises the priest Nepotianus for the care with which he provided curtains for the doors of his church: "Erat illicitum . . . si vela semper in ostiis." We find again indications of this custom in Epiphanius and Paulinus of Nola tell us (Poem. xviii. 8) that those surpassed him in magnificence who offered rich curtains (vela foribus) for the doorway brilliant in the purity of linen, or ornament coloured patterns woven into their substance. He is yet more precise in speaking of the church of St. Felix at Nola (Form. xiv. where he says, "the golden doorways are mounted with curtains white as snow," curtains were suspended by iron or bronze, the remains of which are still to be discerned in some ancient Roman basilicas, for example in those of St. Clement, St. Mary in the Medin, St. Laurence, St. George in Velabro. The office of raising these curtains before priests and other dignified persons was assigned to the inferior clerks (Concil. Narbon. xliii. A.D. 589); the subdeacon as well as ostiarius is to raise the door-curtains (velastia) before the elders (senioribus). They sometimes adorned with figures of saints or crosses, or flowers, arranged in patterns, and various purple ornaments.

It is probable that from the time of Constantine curtains were used to enclose the sanctuary, or to fill the apertures in the rails or rug [CANCELLI] which surrounded it. Athanasius (Epist. ad Solit., opp. i. 847, ed. Paris), speaking of an outrage committed by the emperor, says that they carried out and burned benches, the throne, the table, and the curtain (ῥὰ βῆλα) of the church, where the context only suggests that these were the curtains of the sanctuary. Theodoret (Hist. Eccl.) tells that St. Basil invited the Emperor Valens to enter into the enclosure of the sacred curtains where he was himself seated; that is, into the sanctuary of his church, which was enclosed by curtains. And St. Chrysostom, in a passage containing much information as to the manner of celebrating the eucharist in his time, "when the sacrifice is borne forth . . . thou seest the curtains (ῥὰ ἀμφὶ θύρα) drawn back, then think that the sky above us is, and angels descend" (In Epist. Rom. 3, § 5, 3). Here the curtains are clearly those which closed the doorway of the sanctuary, which drawn back after consecration, when the priest communicated. Evagrius (Hist. Eccl. vi. says that Chosroes, after his victory over the emperor (A.D. 590) sent to Gregory bishop of Carthage, among other presents, "ἀμφὶ θύρας εὐαγγελισμῶν χρυσῆς;" that is, according to the most probable interpretation, a curtain of gold work for the door of the sanctuary. See Ducange (s. v. Hunniscus), who cites the word Hunniscus from a letter of Charles the Great to Offa king of Mercia (Haddan and Stubbs, 98), and believes it to be equivalent to the "manticum" of Gregory of Tours (De Vit. c. 8). Cyril of Alexandria (Catech. in c. ii. v. 24) bids the guardians of the mysteries not to admit the uninitiated in the sacred curtains (ῥῶν ἱερῶν κατακλῆδων), nor to permit neophytes to draw the Holy Table. In this case the curtain veil of the sanctuary is clearly intended; the term itself is adopted from the Jewish temple. Germanus of Constantinople (Hist. p. 153, ed. Paris, 1560) says that the curtain symbolized the stone which was rolled to the door of the sepulchre.

Curtains were also fixed to the ciborium in a manner as to surround the Altar [ALTAR], upon certain occasions. The tetravela, or of four curtains, which are frequently mentioned in the Liber Pontificalis among the gifts of the popes to certain Roman churches were no doubt intended for this use. See, for instance, the life of Sergius I. (p. 150 B, ed. Muratori), who is said to have given to surround the altar of a church eight tetravela, four white, four scarlet. Similar presents are attributed by the same authority to Leo III. Some have thought that the RUGAE presented by various popes to Roman churches were curtains, but this does not seem probable.

4. They were also used in baptisteries, as may be seen in a very ancient mosaic at Ravenna (Ciampini, Vet. Mon. II. plate xxiii.); and see BAPTISM, p. 161.

CUSTODES ECCLESIAE. Either doorkeepers, otherwise called Ostiaarii, one of the inferior orders in the ancient Church, or, more probably perhaps, the same officers who are sometimes distinguished as Seniores Ecclesiae, and whose duties corresponded in certain points with those of the modern churchwardens. [See CHURCHWARDEN.] Bingham, iii. 13, 2. [D. B.]

CUSTODES LOCORUM SANCTORUM. The keepers of the holy places of Palestine, so called because of their relation to our Lord's earthly history: e.g. Bethlehem, Mount Golgotha, the Holy Sepulchre, Mount Olivet. Such an office was probably occasioned by the custom which arose among Christians in early times of visiting these places for purposes of piety and devotion; and that the function of these custodes was accounted a religious service appears from their having been exempted, by a statute of Theodosius, in the same manner as ecclesiastics generally, from personal tribute, in regard to this their special employment (Bingham, iii. 13, 2). [D. B.]

CUSTOS AROAE. A name given to the archdeacon, as having charge of the treasury of the Church, and the care of dispensing the oblations of the people. In this capacity Caecilian was accused by the Donatists of having prohibited the deacons from carrying any provision to the martyrs in prison. And the 4th Council of Carthage (c. 17) directs the bishop not to concern himself personally in the care and government of widows, orphans, and strangers, but to commit the duty to his archpresbyter or archdeacon (Bingham, ii. c. 21). CYMBAL. The word cymbalum seems occasionally to be used for a bell, or some sonorous instrument used instead of a bell. Thus Gregory the Great (Dialogus i. 9) speaks of a cymbalum being struck by way of passing-bell; and Durandus (Rationale, l. 4, § 2) of monks being called to the refectory by the sound of a cymbalum which hung in the cloister. DALMATIC. (Δαλματική [Δελ.]; Dalmatica, sc. tunica or vestis; the substantive, as in the similar case of alba, is seldom expressed.)

The dalmatic, which derived its name from the province where it was first manufactured, was a species of long-sleeved white tunic, with a longitudinal stripe (clavus) from either side of the neck downwards. ("Dalmatica vestis primum in Dalmatia provincia Graeciae texta est, tunica sacerdotialis candida cum clavis ex purpura." Isidore, Etymol. xix. 22.)

There are fair grounds, however, for believing that in its original form the dalmatic, as worn by men, was a short-sleeved or sleeveless tunic, equivalent to the colobion (χιτὼν ἀχειριωτός, Sozomen, iii. 14).^a This is shown by the way in which the two words are used synonymously, as in Epiphanius (Haer. xv. vol. i. p. 32, ed. Petavii), Δαλματικὰς, εἶπουν κολοβίωνας, ἐκ πλατυσῆμων διὰ πορφύρας ἀλουργοφείς κατεσκευασμένους. (So too Joannes Damascenus, in Cotelier, Eccles. Graec. Mon. Ined. i. 284.) Again, in a most important early document, to which we shall subsequently refer, the edict of Diocletian fixing the maximum price of articles throughout the Roman empire, the two words are used as equivalents (Waddington, L'édit de Diocletien, p. 38). Nor need any difficulty be felt from the occurrence of passages which speak of the substitution of the dalmatic for the colobion. If the above theory be correct, such passages will merely refer to the adding of long sleeves to the previously sleeveless tunic; and the change having been once made, it would be natural to employ the word colobion to denote that form of the garment implied by the name, and to retain the neutral word dalmatic to indicate the modified form; and indeed a passage from the Life of Silvester I. to which it will be necessary to allude subsequently, seems to support the above view, . . . ἀλλ' ἐπειδὴ τὸ τῶν βραχιόνων γυμνὸν ἐφύετο, Δαλματικὰ μανικεῖα μᾶλλον συνέβη ὀνομασθῆναι ἔπειτα (leg. ἥπει) κολόβια (Vit. Silvestri, p. 266, ed. Combefis). It is of course also just possible that this term may have been susceptible of slightly different meanings in different countries.

We first meet with the dalmatic as a secular dress, of a stately or luxurious character, worn in high position. Thus there would be something exceptional in the use of then like other articles of Roman dress it became adopted by the Church for ecclesiastics. We shall cite first Scriptores. Lampridius charges Commodus [ob. 192 A.D.] with unseemly behaviour when he appeared in the streets in a dalmatic num. c. 8; see also Capitolinus, Vita . 8). Heliogabalus [ob. 222 A.D.] also of appearing abroad thus clad (Lampridius Heliogab. c. 25). See also Trebellianus ita Clodia, c. 17. The fact of Diocletian already cited furnishes much interesting information as to the varieties of this garment in use in the empire at the end of the 3rd century A.D. made of various materials, wool, silk, lino, lana, sericeo, etc.; sometimes mental clonus was present (A. Exon. i); sometimes absent (Exon. i). Dalmatics for men's and women's use are mentioned for the former, as we have already carrying the title Δαλματικὸν ὑποπαιδῶν. Three different qualities are given sex, the price varying both according to ity and the place of manufacture, of ythopolis, Tarsus, Byblos, Laodicea, &c. ioned.

^a Such was also the Levitō [al. Lebition] or Levionarium (words having no connection with Levite) of the Egyptian monks. (See Binterlin, iv. 1. 214.)

It is not uninteresting to add that these various sorts varied from 10,000 denarii; the denarius, it should be red, being of the debased currency of the art of Diocletian's reign, and in value d. (op. cit. pp. 30, 37, &c.).

Centuries later we find the dalmatic part of a senator's dress in the case of a the father of Gregory the Great, who sat order (Joannis Diaconi Vita S. Greg. 83); and the father and the son are ken of as wearing the planeta and dalmatic c. 84, Patol. lxxv. 229.

At times the dalmatic has been a dress of sovereigns at their coronation and on at occasions. [See COBONATION.] It was, then, of dignity and stateliness were d with the dalmatic as a secular dress. The first notice of its ecclesiastical use is, if ment be genuine, in the Acta Martyrii of prius, of whom it is said (c. 5) that l out to martyrdom "se lacerna byrron t. . . , et cum se dalmatica expoliasset ibus tradidisset in linea stetit." Here ere the dress is evidently that ordinarily the bishop (if indeed a distinction be e everyday dress of the Christian ministat used by them in divine service had a), we find first the under linen garment ver this the dalmatic, and finally the r cloak.

It is not quite clear in what the impropriety con- we are right in supposing that the dalmatic of had short sleeves, there would be an obvious us in a person of rank being seen abroad with- er garment. Others who hold that even then it was a long-sleeved dress, refer the cause of s to the implied effeminacy of the wearer (cf. lina, vii. 12, "Tunica uti virum prolixis ultra naque in primores manus, ne prope in digitos ne omni in latio indecorum fuit"); and others ga nature of the garb.

About fifty years later we come to something more definite in the already cited order of Pope Silverster I. [ob. 335 A.D.] that deacons should for the future wear dalmatics instead of colobias. It is a matter of small moment whether this means the substitution of one vestment for another, or, as we have tried to show, a modification in the shape of the existing vestment: in either case the result is the same, the introduction of a long-sleeved in place of a short-sleeved tunic.* Walafrid Strabo [ob. 849 A.D.] tells us that "Silverster appointed that deacons should use dalmatics in the church, and that their left hand should be covered with a cloth of linen warp (pallium sinistrimum). Now at first, priests (sacerdotes, that is doubtlessly bishops and priests both) wore dalmatics before chasubles were introduced, but afterwards when they began to use chasubles, they permitted dalmatics to deacons. That even pontiffs, however, ought to use them is obvious from the fact that Gregory or other heads of the Roman see allowed the use of them to some bishops and forbade it to others. Hence it follows that at that time the permission was not given to all to do what now almost all bishops and some priests think they may do; namely, wear a dalmatic under the chasuble." (De Rebus Ecclesiasticis, c. 24; cf. Rabanus Maurus, De Clericorum Institutione, i. 7, 20; Amalarius, De Eccl. Off. ii. 21; Pseudo-Alcuin, De Div. Off. c. 39; Anastasius, Vitae Pontificum, Silverster I. p. 35.)

It will be seen here that the ordinance has special reference to deacons, whether from the higher orders of the ministry already wearing the long-sleeved tunic, or, as Marriot (Vestiarium Christianum, p. lviii.) suggests, with the view of compensating for the absence of a super-vestment among deacons.

Noticeable in the next place is the reference to permission granted or withheld by the bishop of Rome as to the wearing of the dalmatic by other bishops, so that as late as the middle of the 9th century this dress was in some special way associated with the local Roman Church, and considered the peculiar privilege of ecclesiastics of that Church, others being only allowed to use it by special permission. Of this state of things, doubtless originally due to the use of the vestment at Rome by persons of high secular position, numerous illustrations can be given. Thus in the life of Caesarius, bishop of Arles [ob. 542 A.D.], it is mentioned that on his visit to Rome, the then Pope Symmachus granted him as a special distinction the privilege of wearing the pallium [PALLIUM], and to his deacons that of dalmatics after the Roman fashion (Vit. Caes. Arl. c. 4, Patol. lxxvii. 1016).

Another instance occurs in a letter of Gregory the Great to Aregius, bishop of Vapincum (the modern Gap), in which he accords to him and his archdeacon the sought-for privilege of wearing dalmatics (Epist. ix. 107). An allusion to the same thing occurs in a letter of Pope Zacharias [ob. 752 A.D.] to Austrobert, archbishop of Vienne (Patol. lxxxix. 956). The genuineness, however, of this letter is doubtful. One or two

* Reference may perhaps be made to Anianus Marcellinus (xiv. 9), who, writing in the latter part of the 4th century, still speaks of the short-sleeved tunic in connection with deacons, showing that as yet the change had not become wide-spread.

instances more, in which the dalmatic is associated with the Roman Church, may suffice. Eutychianus, bishop of Rome [ob. 283 A.D.], ordered its use when a martyr was buried (Anastasius, Vitae Pontificum, Eutychianus, p. 28). In the Gregorian Sacramentary (p. 65), in the rubric for Maundy Thursday, we find "ingressi sacrum induunt dalmaticas, tam pontifex quam omnes diaconi," where pontifex is doubtless the pope. Gregory also refers in his dialogues to the dalmatic of Paschasius, a deacon of Rome, as laid on his bier (Dial. iv. 40), and from a decree of the same pontiff, said to have been given at a synod of Rome in 595 A.D., we find the same custom prevailed in the case of popes, which custom is here forbidden (Opp. p. 1336 Migne).

Indirect evidence pointing to the same result may be gathered from the fact of the absence of any mention of the dalmatic in the Acts of the Fourth Council of Toledo [633 A.D.] among the regulations as to the dress of the Christian ministry (Concil. Tol. iv. can. 28, 40, 41; Labbe, v. 1714, 1716), showing that this vestment was not one then in use in Spain, as indeed might be further inferred from the style of the one solitary mention of it in the writings of Isidore, under whose presidency the council was held.

It does not fall within the province of the present article to discuss at length the regulations of a later date as to the use of the dalmatic by bishops and deacons, for the latter of whom it was the distinctive vestment at the Holy Communion (see e. g. the pontifical of Egbert, archbishop of York [ob. 786 A.D.], where we find "diaconi dalmaticis vestiti" in the form for the celebration of a mass on Maundy Thursday; p. 120, ed. Surtees Society). It still continued, however, to be used by them on other occasions. Thus Amalarius (De Eccl. Off. ii. 26) speaks of the "dalmatica diaconi et sui ministri [i.e. the sub-deacon] quae est stineri habita," as emblematic of the activity to be shown by them in good deeds to others.

The dalmatic thus being a vestment which even in the West had primarily only a local acceptance, we are prepared to find that in the East there is nothing which strictly speaking answers to it. The σχιδάριον or σχιδάριον, however, is the representative of the general type of white tunic, which under whatever name we know it, alb, dalmatic, or tunicle, is essentially the same dress (Goar, Euchologion, p. 111).

DANCING

One or two further remarks may be made in conclusion as to the ornamental stripes (CLAVUS) of the dalmatic. As to the colour these it is stated by Marriott that he has with exclusively black clavi in all ancientures of ecclesiastical dalmatics prior to year 600, as in the well-known Ravenna (see woodcut), the earliest exception being a mosaic of the date 640 (a coloured drawing which is in the Windsor collection) in the Apostles have red clavi on their tunics (p. lix. n.). The red or purple clavi afterwards became common (see the passage already from Isidore, if indeed the reference there to ecclesiastical dalmatics; also Rabanus 1 l.c., Amalarius l.c., etc.), and the later we have referred to (e.g. Rabanus 2 Amalarius, etc.) speak of these as worn on the front, "ante et retro descendentes" whether this was the case with the origin of the dress may perhaps be doubted. If these ornamental stripes are found on the sleeves of the sleeves; and on the left side in days was a border of fringe, for which writers have found appropriate symbolical into which however there is no need to here.⁴

For the matter of the foregoing article mainly indebted to Marriott's Vestiarium, to Hefele's valuable essay, Die Kirchen Gewänder in his Beiträge zur Kirchengeschichte, Archäologie und Liturgik, ii. 26 to the articles Dalmatica and Colobium in his Glossary. DANCING. Many passages in the and many decrees of councils censure and prohibit promiscuous and lascivious dancing. Ambrose thus describes the dancing of women in his time (De Elia et Severino, "They lead up dances in the streets unbecomingly, in the sight of intemperate youths, their hair, dragging their unfastened gowns with their arms uncovered, clapping their

In the New Testament διακονεῖν is used: 1. In the general sense of an agent or instrument. Thus the sovereign power is called Θεοῦ διακονεῖν (Rom. xiii. 4), and Timothy διακονεῖν ἱεροῦ Χριστοῦ (1 Tim. iv. 5). Sometimes "bishops and deacons" express all the offices of the Christian ministry (ἐν ἐπισκόποις καὶ διακόνοις, Phil. i. 1). 2. But the word appears to have assumed its distinctive ecclesiastical meaning at the ap- pointment of the Seven to superintend the distri- bution of the alms to the Hellenist widows, ἐν τῇ διακονίᾳ τῇ καθήκουσῃ (Acts vi. 1-6), when the διακονία τῶν τραπεζῶν became distinct from the διακονία τοῦ λόγου. These seven are never called deacons in the Acts of the Apostles. In the only passage in which mention is made of them as a body, Philip is described as one of "the Seven" (Acts xxi. 8). It has therefore been contended that the institution of the diaconate was not

DEACON. Διάκονος, diaconus; διάκων (Du- cange, Gloss. quoting Malaxus, Hist. Patriarch.); diacones (Cyprian, Ep. ad Succressum, and repeat- edly in the decrees of councils, e.g. Conc. Elib. c. 18 and 76, I Arslat. c. 15, I Tolet. 1).

1. Names.—The first idea contained in the word appears to be that of service rendered in an inferior capacity. It seems too as if some- thing of a sacred character attached to the word even before its use in the Scriptures. Thus we find διακονεῖν γὰρ, "metaphora sumpta ab is qui pocula aut victum ministrant egen- tibus et petentibus" (Steph. Thes. in verb. διακονεῖν. comp. Buttmann's Lexilogus, and Stanley, Apo- stolic Age, p. 69).

In the New Testament διακονεῖν is used: 1. In the general sense of an agent or instrument. Thus the sovereign power is called Θεοῦ διακονεῖν (Rom. xiii. 4), and Timothy διακονεῖν ἱεροῦ Χριστοῦ (1 Tim. iv. 5). Sometimes "bishops and deacons" express all the offices of the Christian ministry (ἐν ἐπισκόποις καὶ διακόνοις, Phil. i. 1). 2. But the word appears to have assumed its distinctive ecclesiastical meaning at the ap- pointment of the Seven to superintend the distri- bution of the alms to the Hellenist widows, ἐν τῇ διακονίᾳ τῇ καθήκουσῃ (Acts vi. 1-6), when the διακονία τῶν τραπεζῶν became distinct from the διακονία τοῦ λόγου. These seven are never called deacons in the Acts of the Apostles. In the only passage in which mention is made of them as a body, Philip is described as one of "the Seven" (Acts xxi. 8). It has therefore been contended that the institution of the diaconate was not really connected with the appointment of the Seven. One theory would identify the deacons with the νεώτεροι or νεανίσκοι elsewhere mentioned in the New Testament (Acts v. 6 and 10) as performing certain subordinate offices in the church. But this theory appears to be at variance with the account given in the Acts, where it is distinctly said that, at the time of the appointment of the Seven, the distribution of the alms, ἡ διακονία ἡ καθημερινή, was performed by the apostles themselves.

A theory something like this has been adopted by later writers. In this case it is alleged that the appointment of the Seven was merely to meet a particular emergency, and "had probably no connection with the deacons in the later period of the apostolic age," though it is admitted "that they may possibly have borne the name," and that "there was in some respects a likeness between their respective duties" (Stanley, Essays on Apostolic Age, p. 62; comp. Vitringa, iii. 2, 5; Lightfoot, Essay on Christian Ministry, in Comm. on Philippians, p. 186, note). A passage from St. Chrysostom is brought forward in support of this theory, in which he distinctly asserts that the ordination (χειροτονία) of the Seven was neither that of deacons, nor that of presbyters, nor that of bishops (Hom. on Acts vi.). This passage is incorporated into a decree of the Council in Trullo (c. 16) which, referring to the institution of the Seven "deacons" (ἡ τῶν πρῶτων βίβλος ἐπὶ τὰ διακόνους ὑπὸ τῶν ἀποστόλων καταστήναι παραδίδωσιν), expressly distinguishes these ministers from the deacons proper who took part in the sacred ministry of the altar (ὁ λόγος αὐτοῖς οὐ περὶ τῶν τοῖς μυστηρίοις διακονουμένων ἦν ἀνδρῶν, ἀλλὰ περὶ τῆς ἐν ταῖς χρεαῖς τῶν τραπέζων ὑπουργίας). Compare Thomassin, Vet. et Nov. Eccles. Disciplina, Part I. L. 1, c. 51, § 11, 12.

On the other hand there is abundant testimony that the early church in general considered the order of deacons to have originated in the institution of the Seven. Irenaeus speaks of "Nicolaum unum ex septem qui primi ad diaconium ab apostolis ordinati sunt" (Haeres. i. 27). Sozomen asserts that the church of Rome retained the custom of only having seven deacons, in accordance with the number of those ordained by the apostles, of whom Stephen was first (H. E. vii. 19), so Constitut. Apost. viii. 46; Hilary, Comm. in 1 Tim. iii. 11, apud Ambrosii Opera; Cyprian, Ep. 65, ad Rogatian.; Id. Ep. 68, ad Pleb. Leg.; Conc. Neocaes. c. 15; Epiphanius, Haeres. i. De Incarn. 4).

The name of deacon (i. e. servant or subordinate) was given to the third order of the ministry on account of the duties which they had to perform, ἐξυπηρετεῖσθαι τῷ ἐπισκόπῳ καὶ τοῖς πρεσβυτέροις, τουτέστι διακονεῖν (Constitut. Apost. iii. 20); τοῦ ἐπισκόπου ὑπηρετᾷ εἰς (Conc. Nic. c. 18). "Diaconus ita se presbyteri et episcopi ministrum noverit" (iv. Conc. Carth. c. 37; comp. i. Conc. Turon. c. 1; Conc. Eliv. title of c. 18, and c. 33). In the last named canon, however, the heading "De Episcopis et Ministris" includes the presbyters and all other orders of the clergy.

They are also continually called Levites, from the analogy of the Mosaic Dispensation; οἱ Λευῖται ὑμῶν οἱ νῦν διάκονοι (Constitut. Apost. ii. 25); Λευῖταις ἰδὶαι διακονίαι ἐπικείμεναι (Clem.

ad Cor. i. 40). Jerome (Epist. ad Evangelum) compares the bishops, priests, and deacons with Aaron, his sons, and the Levites respectively. (Comp. i. Conc. Turon. c. 1, 2. Salvian, ad Eccles. Cathol. ii. 394.)

II. Position of Deacons.—They are always spoken of in conjunction with the bishops and priests in the service of the church. The canons of the councils are almost invariably addressed to the bishops, priests, and deacons as to the three orders of whom the clergy was composed, and the same rule is observed in the writings of the apostolic fathers (See Ign. Trall. c. 3, Philadelph. c. 7; Polycarp. Philipp. 5; Martyr. Ignatii, 3). In the Constitutiones Apostolicæ (viii. 46) they are said to be ordained in the same manner as the priests and bishops; and in another place (ii. 26, 28) a type of the threefold operations of the Holy Trinity is found in the distinctive offices of bishops, deacons, and deaconesses. In many respects, indeed, their position was put on a level with that of the priests. The same rules apply to the married deacons as to the married priests (i. Conc. Tolet. 1, i. Conc. Turon. 2). In later days the oath of purgation to be taken by a deacon was the same as that of a priest, and differed from that of the inferior orders of clergy (Conc. Bergum. c. 18, 19). Their share of the first-fruits (ἀπαρχαί) offered at the agape was the same as that of the presbyters, and was double that allotted to the πρεσβύτεροι (Constitut. Apost. ii. 28). Of the EULOGIAE which remained after the administration of the Eucharist, the bishop was to receive four portions, the presbyter three, and the deacon two (Ibid. viii. 30, 31). In some churches it would seem as if the emoluments of the deacons were even greater than those of the priests, since Jerome warns them against estimating the dignity of their ecclesiastical position by its pecuniary results: "Presbyter noverit se lucris minorem, sacerdotio esse majorem" (Hieronymus, Ep. 85, ad Evang. comp. Comm. in Ezet. c. xlviii.).

There are places also in which their office is spoken of as sacerdotal in the general sense. Thus Optatus speaks of it as the third grade: "Quid commemorem diaconos in tertio? quid presbyteros in secundo sacerdotio institutos?" (c. Donatist. lib. i. 35). Jerome speaks of their ordination to a priesthood (sacerdotium) in common with the bishops and priests (Hieron. Apolog. Jovin.), and St. Augustine (Ep. 16) addresses one Praesidius as a fellow priest (consacerdos), of whom Jerome, in the epistle that follows, speaks as a deacon.

But notwithstanding such expressions as these their right to be considered as in any way partakers in the office of the presbyter, or priest in the narrower sense, is in many places emphatically denied. In the Quaestiones it is held impossible that a deacon can in any case discharge the duties of a priest (sacerdotis), since he is in no degree a partaker of the priestly office (Quaest. Vet. et Nov. Test. inter Augustini Opera, N. T., 46); deacons are inferior to priests (πρεσβύτεροι, i. Conc. Nic. c. 18); a deacon might be ordained by one bishop only, because the ordination was only to a ministerial, not a priestly office (non ad sacerdotium sed ad ministerium consecratur, iv. Conc. Carth. 4); and deacons distributed the consecrated elements, not as

but as the attendants upon priests (Constitut. Apost. viii. 28); so Ambrosius says "non sunt sacerdotes" (Comm. s. iv. 11). His inferiority of office was marked by not being given them in the discharge of the While the bishops and the presbyters sat on their thrones in the church, the deacons stood near them (Constitut. Apost. i. 18). The first council of Nice (c. 18) strictly ordered the deacon to sit among the priests as of right rule and order. So it was ordered that a deacon might only be seated by express permission in presence of a priest (Constitut. Apost. c. 20; comp. Conc. Agath. c. 65, iv. 28. c. 39); but the same respect was shown to the deacons by the subdeacons and in the Evangelium (Ibid.). So it is said that even the deacons of the churches at Rome, though inferior in rank to the presbyters, did not to sit themselves during the services (Conc. Q. i. 10); and the testimony of Jerome confirms this: "In ecclesia Romae presbyteri, et stant diaconi" (Epist. 85, ad Evangelium). In councils their position was standing, as is apparent in the records of their proceedings; e. g. "consistentibus presbyteris, adstantibus diaconis" (Tolet. Proem.); "adstantibus ministris sacro clero" (i. Conc. Bracar. Proem.); was strictly enforced by canons; the deacons sat at the back of the bishops, the subdeacons stand in front (iv. Conc. Tolet. 4). However, who held ecclesiastical offices (ἐκκλησιαστικὰ) were allowed to be present on no account before any presbyter, they represented their own patriarch or their city, in which case they take the place allotted to the person they represented (Conc. Quinisext. c. 7). Canon provides that they should not sit in councils unless especially bidden (iv. 28. c. 40). [CONCILES, p. 481.] In every way their position appears to be associated with the discharge of duties which are recognized as honourable in themselves, conferring honour on those to whom they are entrusted, yet distinctly marked off from the sacerdotal, and care apart from those which specially belong to the priests.

Duties.—These were of a varied nature, and it is to be expected that in every case suggested which were originally allotted to them, they were comprehended in διακονία τῶν ὑποτάκτων distinguished from the διακονία τοῦ they were stewards of the property of the church and of the funds belonging to the widows and orphans. Thus Cyprian speaks of Nicomedia having not only robbed the church but also the widows and orphans (Cyp. Ep. 49 ad Cornelium). So Jerome calls the "mensarum et viduarum minister" (Ep. 85, ad Evangelium). They were also entrusted with the oblations (εὐχαρίσται) which refer to the celebration of the Eucharist by the different orders of the clergy, in due proportions (Constitut. Apost. viii.

they were almoners of the charities distributed to the church. It was part of their duty to seek out and visit the sick and afflicted, and report to the bishop respecting such as were in affliction (Constitut. Apost. iii. 19). But all alms were to be distributed strictly under the direction of the bishop (Ibid. ii. cc. 31, 32, 34). They were also to select the aged women (ὑποτάκτων) invited on the ground of poverty to more frequent participation in the ἀγῶναι (Ibid. ii. 28).

3. The discipline of the church was in a great measure intrusted to their hands as the immediate ministers of the bishop. In times of persecution it was their duty to minister to the confessors in their prisons, and to bury the bodies of the martyrs (Euseb. H. E. vii. 11). They were also to strengthen the faint-hearted and exhort the waverers. Thus it was one of the complaints against Novatian that he persisted in remaining in his hiding-place when exhorted by the deacons to come forth (Euseb. H. E. vi. 43). If any for misconduct were cast out from the congregation, the deacons were to intercede for the offender, since, it is added, Christ intercedes for sinners with the Father (Constitut. Apost. ii. c. 18). They were also associated with the bishop in the work of seeking out and reproving offenders (Ibid. ii. c. 17). As deputies of the bishop they were to relieve him of the lighter cases brought for adjudication, leaving the weightier for his own decision (Ibid. ii. 44), and might even, in his absence, take charge of the diocese (Bede, H. E. ii. 20). They also appear to have been entrusted, in the absence of a presbyter, with some jurisdiction over the inferior clergy (Constitut. Apost. viii. 28). When any of the faithful brought letters commendatory from one church to another (Ignat. Philadelp. c. 10). They also sometimes represented their bishops in councils (Conc. Quinisext. A.D. 691, c. 7), though this was forbidden in the West, on the ground that a deacon being inferior to the priests (presbyters junior), could not be allowed to sit with bishops in the council (Conc. Emerit. A.D. 666, c. 5). Thomassin however asserts that this provincial decree was never acted upon (Novae et Vet. Eccl. Discipl. i. 2, c. 23, § 19). At all councils a deacon was to read the decrees by which the proceedings were regulated (capitula de conciliis agenda) before the business commenced (iv. Conc. Tolet. 4). It appears also to have been the duty of the deacons on these occasions to keep the doors, and call for those whose presence was required before the council (Codex Eccl. Africanus, c. 100).

4. In other respects they were to be channels of communication between the bishop and the laity (Constitut. Apost. ii. 28). All the offerings of the people (τὰς δωρεὰς θεοῦ ὑποτάκτων, τὰς ἀναρχὰς καὶ τὰς ἀναρχὰς καὶ τὰς ἀναρχὰς καὶ τὰς ἀναρχὰς), when not made directly to the bishop, were to be presented to him through their hands (Ibid. ii. 27). So various were their duties in relation to the bishop that they are called in one place his ears and eyes and mouth and heart (Ibid. ii. 44); in another his soul and perception (ψυχὴ καὶ αἴσθησις, Ibid. iii. 19).

5. These duties were connected with the διακονία τῶν ὑποτάκτων, as relating to the material needs of the community. Another class of duties arose from the "ministry of the Table," considered in relation to the celebration of the Eucharist. Thomassin says that, although the occasion for instituting the order of deacons arose from the necessities of the common table, yet that it also had reference to the celebration of the Eucharist, "ad sacram mensam, quae tunc a civili non divellebatur" (Vet. et Nova Discip. Eccl. i. 1, c. 51, § 4; comp. Wordsworth, Comm. in Acta vi. 2, and, there quoted, Bishop Pearson, "In communi victu sacramentum Eucharistiae celebrabant").

a. They were to provide for the maintenance of order in the congregations during the performance of the various services. They were to see that all the congregation took the places allotted to them, that no one lingered in the entrance, or whispered, or slept, or in any way misbehaved during the service (Constitut. Apost. ii. 57, viii. 11). So Chrysostom says, "If any misbehave, call the deacon" (Hom. 24 in Acta); and they were to be particularly careful in assigning honourable places and giving a cordial welcome to the poor and aged and to strangers (Constitut. Apost. ii. 58). They were to stand at the men's gate lest any should go in or out during the celebration of the Eucharist (Ibid. viii. 11). They also discharged the lesser offices belonging to the Lord's Table; they arranged the altar, placed on it the sacred vessels, and brought water for the hands of the officiating priest. Their duty was to minister both to bishops and priests in things pertaining to their several offices, that all things relating to the worship of God might be rightly celebrated (Ibid. viii. 46). These duties, however, in large churches where there were many clergy, devolved on those belonging to the inferior orders: "ut autem non omnia obsequiorum per ordinem agant multitudo facit clericorum. Nam utique et altare portant, et vasa ejus et aquam in manus funderent sacerdotis, sicut videmus per omnes ecclesias" (Questions, Q. 101); and in another place it is ordered that the subdeacon should pour the water on the hands of the officiating priest, ἀντιφώνη ὑποδιάκονος τοῖς ἱερεῶσι (Constitut. Apost. viii. 11). But there are decrees of councils strictly forbidding the inferior orders of clergy (ὕποψευς) to enter the Diaconicum or touch the sacred vessels (Conc. Laodic. c. 21, Agath. c. 66). In the decree of the latter council ὑποψεύς is rendered "unsacred ministers." The second canon of the first council of Toledo orders that a deacon who had been subjected to public penance should only be received among the subdeacons, so that he might not handle the sacred vessels; and it was expressly ordered that the deacons should take the remains of the consecrated elements into the Pastophoria or Sacristy (Constitut. Apost. viii. 13).

It was their duty also to present the offerings of the people at the altar, proclaiming at the same time the names of those who had made them; αἱ δακονοὶ προσεγγίζουσιν τὰ δῶρα τῶ ἐκκλησίᾳ καὶ τὸ θυμιατῆριον (Constitut. Apost. viii. 12). "Public diaconus in ecclesia recitet offerentium nomina, tantum offert ille, tantum ille pollicetur est" (Hieron. Comm. in Exchiel. xviii.). [DIPTYCHER.]

They had also an important part to fill in the service itself. At the commencement of the Communion Office the deacon who ministered was to stand near the bishop and proclaim a loud voice: μὴ τις κατὰ τὰς, μὴ τις ἁγίους, "let none come who has ought; any one, none in hypocrisy" (Constitut. ii. 54, 57, § 12). The reading of the Gospel allotted either to a deacon or to a priest (Ibid. ii. 57, § 5); though in some churches appears to have been the special office of the deacon, "Evangelium Christi quasi dilectissimum" (Hieron. Epist. ad Sabin.). So says of the church at Alexandria, the archdeacon only read the Gospel, but in churches the duty was discharged by the deacon, and in many only by the priests (S. E. vii. 19). The second council of Vaison permitted that a deacon, in the absence of a priest, might be permitted to read a homily of the Fathers in the church, on the ground that those who were worthy to read the Gospel of were not unworthy to recite expositions of the Fathers (ii. Conc. Vassense, c. 2), and for reason it was forbidden that a deacon should be appointed who could not read (Conc. i. c. 11; comp. Cyprian, Ep. 84, al. 39). Perhaps in allusion to this part of their duty that the duty was assigned to them of holding the Gospels over the head of a bishop at the time of his ordination (Constitut. Apost. v).

The deacon appointed for the purpose was to give the signal for the departure of the servers (Ibid. cc. 5, 12), to recite the prayers for the catechumens, the exorcisms for those preparing for baptism, and the prayers to dismiss each class in its proper place (Ibid. viii. cc. 6, 7, 8). He was to make proclamation which was the signal for the beginning of the service, and to recite the prayer for the universal church (Ibid. ii. 57, viii. 11, 13, 35). Thus Chrysostom (Hom. Rom.) speaks of the deacon offering the prayer on behalf of the people (τὸν ἄνθρωπον). Liturgy given in the Constitutiones under the name of St. James, it is ordered that two should stand by the altar bearing fans [BELLUM] made of fine membrane, or peacocks' feathers, or linen, to drive away flies or from the sacred elements (Constitut. Apost. c. 12).

At the administration of the Holy Communion it was the duty of the deacons to receive the consecrated elements from the officiating priest in order to distribute them among those who were present, and to convey them to the altar (Justin Martyr, Apolog. viii. c. 2); "ordo est accipere a sacerdote et sic dare" (Questions, 101). But their peculiar office in the administration of the cup; ὁ δακονος χέει τὸ ποτήριον (Constitut. Apost. viii. 12). "solemnibus adimpletis diaconus offerentiis coepit" (Cyprian, De Lapsis). They were strictly forbidden to distribute bread if a priest was present (ii. Conc. c. 15), unless some necessity arose for doing so and they were bidden to do so by the bishop (iv. Conc. Carth. c. 38). But it was also noted that the deacon only acted as the minister of the priest (Constitut. Apost. v) and had no right whatever to offer the Eucharist (Ibid. viii. 46). Priests under censure were deprived of the privilege of consecrating, of ministering (Conc. Agath. c. 1); and forbidden that they should give the comto the priests, on the ground that it was only those who had no power to consecrate should administer to those who had (i. Conc. 18). So Jerome says of Hilarius, the that he had no power without priests or to celebrate the Eucharist, "Eucharistiam re" (Hieron. contra Lucifer.). And though the act of consecration appears to have been in some places, it was strictly forbidden (c. Arclat. c. 15).

There are, however, two passages which may favour the idea that deacons had some power to consecrate. One of these is the of the council of Ancyra, which forbids those who have offered sacrifice to idols to either the bread or the wine, ἀπὸν ἢ οὐκ ἀποσπῶν (Conc. Ancyra. c. 2). But undoubtedly refers either to the offering the us which preceded the prayer of consecration (Thomas. Vel. et Nov. Eccl. Discip. i. 2, § 14), or to the distribution of the ele after consecration (Bingham, Antiquities, v. § 7; comp. Suicer, Thesaurus, t. i. § 1). The other is the speech put by Ambrose into the mouth of Laurentius, the when meeting his bishop, Sixtus, on the day to his martyrdom: "Cui commissi mei sanguinis consecrationem, cui conditorum consortium sacramentorum" (c. De Offic. i. 41). But this doubtful sion seems interpreted by the words immediately preceding, "nunquam sacrificium ipistrio offerre consueveras," the "offerre veras" clearly referring to Sixtus himself the "sanguinis consecrationem" probably means "sanguinem consecratum," and is attributed to the deacons was the ceremony always performed after consecration προεσφύζοντες τῷ τοῦ κυρίου σφύρατι μετὰ (Constitut. Apost. ii. 57; see Bingham, Antiquities, ii. 26, § 8).

For the administration the deacons were to say what remained of the sacred elements in the sacristy, to recite (ἐκπύρρειν) the Postunion Prayer, and dismiss the people (Constitut. Apost. viii. cc. 13, 35, 40). Thus it is said that Anastasius commanded his deacon ἐκπύρραι (Soc. H. E. ii. 11), and ἐκπύρρειν is used among the sacred offices from the nance of which the deacons who had worshipped idols were to be suspended (Conc. Ancyra. c. 40), that the deacon (Levita) should stand over the left shoulder, "propter orat, id est, prædicat." Chrysostom too he deacons ἐκπύρραι (Hom. 17 in Heb. ix.). Basil says that the word ἐκπύρρειν, used in the council of Ancyra, expressed the recital of prayers and exhortations and the reading of the epistle, which were done with raised voice (c. Constitut. Apost. i. 2, c. 29, comp. Suicer, Thes. in voc. ἐκπύρρειν).

It appears that the daily services in district churches were sometimes entrusted to the deacons and priests in alternate weeks. In this case the deacons and deacons were to assemble on Saturday evening, that the Sunday services be celebrated with due honour (Conc. Carth. c. 7). The council of Elberis (c. 77) speaks of a deacon in charge of a parish, either priest or bishop, "regens plebem in domino vel presbytero."

DEACON

7. It does not appear that preaching was among the duties which were usually entrusted to deacons, though Philip and Stephen undoubtedly did preach. Hilary, the commentator, holds that in the earliest days of the church, all the faithful both preached and baptized, but that afterwards a different course was adopted, and separate offices assigned to different members, so that in his days the deacons did not preach, though he says that at first all deacons were evangelists, and had commission given them to preach, though without any settled charge (sine cathedra) (Comm. in Ephe. iv. 11, in Ambrose's Works). Yet that some faculty of preaching was inherent in the office, at least at the command of the bishop, appears from the language of Philostorgius (H. E. iii. 17), where he says that Leontius ordained Aetius as a deacon, in order that he might teach in the church, but that he declined to undertake the other duties of a deacon, only accepting that of preaching (ἡδοναὶν ἀνέστη); and though Leontius was a heretic, the words seem to indicate that this was reckoned among the ordinary functions of a deacon. On the other hand, the duty of preaching could not have belonged to them in the Western church in ordinary cases, since Caesarius, bishop of Arles, in giving permission to the priests and deacons in his diocese to read certain homilies to the people, when he himself could no longer preach to them through the infirmities of age, gives as the ground of his permission that, since they were allowed to read the Holy Scriptures in the church, it could not be wrong for them to read homilies composed by himself or by other fathers of the church (Thomas. Vel. et Nov. Eccl. Discip. ii. 1, c. 89, § 9), words adopted by the second council of Valson, already quoted. And so Vigilantius in his letter to two deacons, Rusticus and Sebastian, speaks of their execrable pride in venturing to preach without permission of the bishop, as contrary to all precedent and canon law, "contra omnem consuetudinem vel canones" (Labbe, Conc. v. p. 554).

8. They had also certain duties to perform at the administration of baptism. It was to be administered by bishops and priests only, with the assistance of the deacons (ἐξυμπεροσπόμενοι αὐτοῖς τῶν βαπτισμάτων) (Constitut. Apost. iii. c. 11). They had to undertake the preliminary enquiries into the circumstances of the candidates (Ibid. viii. c. 32). They were to apply the unction which preceded the administration of the sacrament to the foreheads of the women (Ibid. iii. c. 15), and to undertake all the necessary arrangements for the male candidates (Ibid. iii. c. 16). [BAPTISM.] It was their duty, or that of the subdeacons, to fetch the CHRISM from the bishop before Easter (ii. Conc. Brac. c. 51. i. Tolet. 20).

But they were strictly forbidden to assume that the administration of baptism was one of the functions of their office. In the Apostolic Canons and Constitutions, the decrees concerning baptism are directed only to bishops and priests, though the other general canons are addressed to all three orders of the ministry (Canones, c. 39, 41, 42; Constitut. viii. c. 23). The Constitutions, too, distinctly assert that it is not lawful for a deacon to baptize (viii. c. 28, iii. c. 11, vii. c. 46). In the latter passage it is added, that if any argument is drawn from the fact of baptism being administered by Philip and Ananias, it is for want of perceiving that these men were specially appointed for these duties by the Lord, the High-Priest. Epiphanius asserts that no deacon was ever entrusted with the administration of a sacrament (μυστήριον ἐπιτελεῖν; Haeres. 79, cap. 4). So Hilary, while asserting that all the faithful were once accustomed to baptize, adds, "nunc neque clerici vel laici baptizant" (Com. in Eph. iv. 11, in Ambrose's Works).

Yet it appears that they were permitted to baptize by command of a bishop, or when in charge of a parish without a presbyter. The right of baptizing resides generally in the bishop [BAPTISM, p. 166], but from him may be communicated both to priests and deacons (Tertullian, De Baptismo, c. 17). So a decree of the 5th century, speaking of the necessity of a holy life even for the laity, adds, how much more is this necessary for priests and deacons, since they may be called at any moment to offer the sacrifice or baptize? (i. Conc. Turon. 1). In another decree it is ordered that if a deacon having charge of a parish (regens plebem) without a bishop or presbyter should have baptized any, the bishop should confirm it by his blessing, "per benedictionem perficere debet" (Conc. Elib. 77); and again, in another, it is provided that while priests, in cases of urgent sickness, may baptize at any season of the year, deacons may only do so at Easter (Synod. Rom. A.D. 384? c. 7, in Bruns's Canones, ii. 278); and Jerome, speaking of those who in remote places were baptized by priests and deacons, places the right of both to baptize on exactly the same footing, as derived from the license of the bishop and the possession of the chrism, "sine chrismate et episcopi jussione neque presbyteri neque diaconi jus habeant baptizandi" (Dial. contra Luciferum, c. 4). It seems then that, at least in the Western Church, the deacons were permitted to baptize when the bishop gave them authority and sent them the chrism. Thomassin however (i. 2, c. 29, § 14), thinks they had less liberty in this respect in the Eastern Church.

c. The power of receiving penitents appears generally to have been confined to bishops and presbyters; yet this rule was not invariable. Thus Cyprian allows deacons to receive confession (exomologesis) and bestow the parting blessing in the case of those penitents who had obtained "libelli" and were prevented by the near approach of death from receiving absolution at the hands of a priest (Ep. 13, al. 18, ad Cler.). A decree of the first council of Toledo (c. 2) provides that those deacons who had performed public penance should be reduced to the order of subdeacons lest they should lay hands on any. But it is probable that this was not the act which conferred absolution, but only a ceremony which went before the reception of the Eucharist and prepared the penitent for its administration (Thomass. Vet. et Nov. Eccl. Disc. i. 2, c. 29, § 8). A decree of the council of Eliberis (c. 32) provides that in certain cases of urgent necessity, and at the command of a bishop, the deacon may receive a penitent to communion. But this probably only meant that the deacons might convey the consecrated elements, which, as in the case of Serapion recorded by Eusebius (H. E. vi. 44), might be sent even by a child (Thomassin, i. 2, c. 29 § 9).

In these cases their duties were evidently only ministerial and strictly limited to the subordinate functions belonging to their office. Their right to bestow any blessing on their own authority is plainly denied (Constitut. Apost. viii. 28, 46). [BENEDICTION; DOMINUS VOBISCUM.]

§. From their bearing the chairs of priests and bishops (iv. Conc. Brag. Proem. c. 5), it would appear that in some churches they were expected to perform duties scarcely consistent with the dignity of their office. But their general tendency appears to have been either to claim functions which did not belong to them (i. Conc. Arelat. c. 15; Conc. Quinisext. c. 16), or to assume a precedence which may indicate that they were in some cases superior to the priests in wealth or social position. Thus they are rebuked for administering in some churches the Eucharist to priests and partaking of it even before bishops and presuming to sit among the priests (i. Conc. Nic. c. 18); for their pride in sitting in the first choir and compelling priests to take their places in the second (iv. Conc. Tolet. c. 39); for claiming precedence at councils of presbyters when they held any ecclesiastical office (Conc. Quinisext. c. 7); for exciting seditions against the bishop (Constitut. Apost. ii. 32); for bestowing the benediction at private banquets in presence of priests (Hieron. Ep. 85 ad Evang.); and for esteeming themselves, on account of their superior wealth, as of higher dignity than the priests (Idem Comm. in Ezek. xlvi.).

η. Deacons were strictly limited in the discharge of their office to the parishes for which they were appointed, and there are many decrees of councils forbidding them to wander elsewhere without the consent of the bishop (Canones Apost. c. 12; i. Conc. Nic. c. 15; Conc. Quinisext. c. 17; i. Arelat. c. 21; ii. Bracar. c. 34; Agath. c. 52).

IV. Promotion to a higher order.—It has been doubted whether in the earliest ages admission to the diaconate implied, or was a necessary preliminary to, advancement to the priesthood. That this was the case has been inferred from the words of St. Paul to Timothy—οἱ καλῶς διακονήσαντες βαθμὴν ἑαυτοῖς καλὴν περιποιούνται (1 Tim. iii. 13). See DICTIONARY OF THE BIBLE, i. 417. It is undoubtedly true:—
1. That in later times βαθμὴς was used as a technical term denoting degrees of ecclesiastical office. So it was said of Athanasius, πᾶσαν τὴν τῶν βαθμῶν ἀκολουθίαν διεξελθὼν (Greg. Naz. Orat. 21), and in that sense it repeatedly occurs in the decrees of councils (Conc. Eph. c. 6; Chalcedon. c. 29; Quinisext. c. 13).
2. That the elevation of deacons to the priesthood was part of the system of the church in after years. Thus it was ordered that deacons who maintained communication with their wives should not be elevated to the priesthood (i. Conc. Tolet. c. 1), "ad ulteriorem gradum non ascendat" (i. Conc. Turon. 2). So, in the Quaestiones, the priest is spoken of as being ordained from among the deacons, "ex diaconis presbyterus ordinatur" (Quaest. Q. 101). And so Jerome argues the higher office of the priesthood from the fact that the diaconate was a step to the priesthood, "ex diacono ordinatur presbyter" (Hieron. Epist. ad Evang.). But many deacons appear to have grown old and died without promotion to the ments.—Concerning the dress of a deacon, it was ordained that when engaged in the service of the altar their apparel should be flowing, with a view to the readiness of their duties, for they are like the boatwains (κοιτοπλοῖς) in a ship (Apost. ii. 57). They were to wear a stole, "orarium," unadorned with gold, on the left shoulder, the right being to typify the expedition with which they were to discharge their sacred functions (iv. c. 40). The manner of wearing the stole distinguished them from the priests; the deacon's was the mark of their office, since the clergy were expressly forbidden to wear it (Laod. c. 22, 23). Due care was to be taken that this distinctive portion of the dress was clearly seen, "non licet diacono velo scapulas suas involvi" (Conc. Autis. c. 1). Another decree notice is taken of deacons who were accustomed to wear their stole beneath their alba, so as to resemble subdeacons, and they are ordered to open it for the future on the shoulder (Brac. c. 9). Those who had been tempestuously for any offence were presented for reconciliation with an alb and a stole, as of their restoration to their office (Tolet. c. 28). It was to the stole that the apostle alluded when he saw a vision of ministering angels in the fine linen dressed over the left shoulders of those engaged in the service of the altar (αἱς λευκαῖς ὡς ἐν τῶν ἀποστόλων ἑσθῶν κεκρίσται; Hom. in Fil. Prodig.). [STOLE.] The stole was worn only at the time of ministering at the altar, or reading the Gospels—"Diaconus oblationis tantum vel lectionis albat" (iv. Conc. Carthag. 41; Conc. Narbon. c. 1). When performing the duty of the deacon at the opening of councils (iv. Conc. Tolet. c. 1), this renders more emphatic a rebuke directed to certain priests and bishops who were wont on great festivals to be borne on litter by deacons in albs—"albatibus" (iv. Conc. Brac. Proem. Sec. c. 5). They wore a Dalmatic (which see).

number of Deacons.—The number of deacons allotted to each church appears to have been fixed by the council of Neocaesarea (c. 15) or that there should be seven deacons and one presbyter in every city, however large, since that had been ordained by the apostles (comp. Acts. c. 18), and this appears to have been the normal number in many churches (Apost. viii. cc. 4, 46; Euseb. H. E. vi. c. 14; Comm. in 1 Tim. iii. 8). But practice appears to have been as stated in the canon, that the church of Rome retained a fixed number of seven deacons, as instituted by the apostles, but that other churches acted on their own convenience (Soz. H. E. c. 1). The number of deacons seems, however, to have been generally small; for St. Paul speaks of Phoebe as διακονῶσα (Rom. xvi. 1); but it was usually supposed by ancient commentators that the "women" mentioned by St. Paul in the passage in which he enumerates the qualifications of a deacon (1 Tim. iii. 11) were really deaconesses, whether, as the A.V. assumes, wives of deacons (Chrysost.,

allowed to be ordained was universally fixed at twenty-five (iii. Conc. Carth. c. 4; Conc. Agath. c. 18; Conc. Quinisext. c. 14; iv. Conc. Tolet. c. 20; iii. Conc. Aurel. c. 6); but Thomassin relates that Caesarius, bishop of Arles, would not permit any deacon to be ordained in his diocese who was under the age of thirty, and who had not read four times all the books of the Old and New Testament (Vet. et Nov. Eccl. Discip. ii. 1, c. 89, § 8).

VIII. Jurisdiction over.—A deacon could only be judged by three bishops (i. Conc. Carth. c. 11; ii. Conc. Carth. c. 10, but Bruns gives a different reading of this canon) of whom one was to be his own diocesan (iii. Conc. Carth. c. 8). See DEGRADATION, p. 542.

IX. Diaconus in Monasteries. In monasteries the name of deacon was sometimes given to those who discharged the office of steward and almoner—"oeconomi et dispensatores" [OECONOMUS] (Thomassin, Vet. et Nov. Eccl. Discip. iii. 2, c. 3, § 4; 3, c. 29, § 23.) [P. O.]

X. Cardinal Deacon.—A cardinal deacon (diaconus cardinalis) was in ancient times a deacon who was permanently attached (incardinated) to a particular church (Gregory the Great, Epist. v. 2; see CARDINAL, p. 289).

The name cardinal seems also to have been given to the deacon to whom seniority or pre-eminence among his fellows had been assigned by competent authority. So Gregory the Great, writing to Liberatus, a deacon at Cagliari (Epist. i. 81), warns him not to set himself above the other deacons, unless he had been made cardinal by the bishop. Under Charlemagne a cardinal deacon of the city of Rome (diaconus in cardine constitutus in urbe Romæ) is mentioned with special distinction (Capitula, anni 806, c. 23, p. 458*, Baluze; and Capitularium, i. c. 133, p. 728).

XI. A deacon was assigned to each of the seven REGIONS into which the city of Rome was ecclesiastically divided; these were called Regionary Deacons (diaconi regionarii). The acolytes of each region were under the authority of the regionary deacon (Mabillon, Com. Praev. in Ord. Rom. p. xix.).

XII. Stationary Deacons were those who ministered to the pope on his going to any STATION where an office was to be said.

XIII. Diaconi Testimoniales were those deacons who always lived with and accompanied a bishop, for the avoiding of scandal (ii. Conc. Turon. c. 12). See SYNCELLUS. [C.]

DEACONESS (ἡ διακονισσα, διακονισσα, Diaconissa, Diakonissa.) I. An order of women in the Primitive Church who appear to have undertaken duties in reference to their own sex analogous to those performed by the deacons among men. Their office was probably rendered more necessary by the strict seclusion which was observed by the female sex in Greece, and in many Oriental countries. The word itself is only once used in the New Testament, in the place in which St. Paul speaks of Phoebe as διακονῶσα τῷ ἐκκλησίᾳ (Rom. xvi. 1); but it was usually supposed by ancient commentators that the "women" mentioned by St. Paul in the passage in which he enumerates the qualifications of a deacon (1 Tim. iii. 11) were really deaconesses, whether, as the A.V. assumes, wives of deacons (Chrysost.,

1.—The age at which deacons were Theophylact, Theodoret, Oecumen., quoted by Wordsworth, Comm. in loco), or women-deacons (Lightfoot, Essay on Christian Ministry in Comm. on Philippians, p. 189).

II. Qualifications for the Diaconate.—It has been thought that these deaconesses were widows in the earlier days of the Church, on the ground of the injunction of St. Paul that no widow should be taken into the number under sixty years of age (1 Tim. v. 9, cf. Thomass. Vet. et Nov. Eccl. Discip. i. l. 3, c. 50, n. 10; Hooker, Eccl. Pol. v. c. 78, § 11). But it does not appear certain that St. Paul is in this place speaking of deaconesses (cf. Wordsworth, Comm. in loco). And it appears certain that virgins were admitted to the office. Thus Pliny speaks, in his epistle to Trajan, of two handmaidens (ancillae) whom the Christians called “ministrae.” The Apostolic Constitutions (vi. 17) say that the deaconess should be a chaste virgin (παρθένος ἀγνή) or else a widow (cf. Just. Novell. vi. 6). The 4th council of Carthage (c. 12) speaks of widows and consecrated virgins (sanctimoniales) who are selected to discharge the duties of deaconesses. Epiphanius gives three classes from whom they are to be chosen, the virgins, the widows of one husband, and those who lived in continence with one husband (Expositio Fidei, n. 21). The council in Trullo also provides that the wife of a bishop who has retired into a convent on the consecration of her husband may, if found fit for the office, be admitted to the diaconate (Conc. Quinisext. c. 48). Gregory Nyssen (Vita Macrinae) speaks of his sister Macrina, and of one Lampadia, as being virgins and deaconesses. Sozomen (H. E. viii. 23) speaks of a noble virgin named Nicarete whom Chrysostom urged without effect to become a deaconess; and of one Olympias, a young widow, who was ordained to the same office (Id. viii. 9). Thus it seems evident that the deaconesses cannot be absolutely identified either with the widows or the virgins of the early church, but were probably chosen from these orders as occasion served. It would even appear that, under some circumstances, married women were admitted.

The age at which they were to be admitted to their office was strictly defined. Tertullian (De Vel. Virg. c. 9) lays it down that they should be 60 years of age, widows of one husband, and mothers, that their own experience may enable them to give sympathetic help to others (compare Basil, Epist. Canon. c. 24 and Jerome, Ep. ad Salvan.). The council of Chalcedon (c. 15) fixes it at 40, and says they are to be chosen after strict enquiry, giving as a reason the dishonour done to the grace of God, if any, after having undertaken this service, should marry. The council in Trullo (cc. 14, 40) also assigned the age of 40 for the admission of a deaconess, and 60 for that of a widow, grounding the latter rule on the words of St. Paul (1 Tim. v. 9), thus proving conclusively that, in their opinion, he was not speaking in this place of deaconesses. Theodosius issued a decree that no woman should be admitted to the diaconate till she had attained the age of 60, and borne children (Soz. H. E. vii. 16). Justinian's legislation fixed the age of admission at 40 (Novell. 123 c. 13) or 50 (Id. vi. 6). Thomassin thinks that only the canons which relate to women of 60 years of age refer to deaconesses, and the others apply to widows who have merely taken the vow of continence.

But he is obliged to own that he is maintaining this opinion in the face of the decree of the council of Chalcedon (Thomass. Vet. et Nov. Eccl. Discip. i. l. 3, c. 52, § 3, 4). Yet much appears to have been left to the bishops. Olympias is described as a young widow, and Tertullian (De Vel. Virg. c. 9) expresses great indignation at a case, with which he says he was himself acquainted, in which a virgin under 20 was admitted to the order of widows “in viduatu,” under which term the context proves that he is speaking of the diaconate.

From the passages already quoted it will be seen that it was always required that, if widows, deaconesses should only have been once married. This was probably in obedience to the injunction of St. Paul, “the wife of one man” (1 Tim. v. 9). Other names of female servants of the Church are, πρεσβύτιδες, women-elders, and πρεσβυτέραι, aged women. In the N. T. the words appear identical in meaning (cf. 1 Tim. v. 2, and Titus ii. 3). But in the Apostolic Constitutions (ii. 28), the πρεσβυτέραι, the poorer of whom were to be invited more frequently to the Agapae, are clearly different from the πρεσβύτιδες who, as ministers of the church, are allotted a definite share of the first-fruits then offered, while the same proportion of the “eulogiae” is allotted in another place to those who are there called deaconesses (διακονίσσαις, Ibid. viii. c. 31). Epiphanius appears to make a distinction between the two, when he says that the deaconesses were called widows (χήρας), but the elder of them (τὰς ἑτι γηραιώτερας) were called πρεσβύτιδας, and notes carefully that the word is quite different from that which designates women-presbyters (πρεσβυτερίδας) (Epiph. Haer. 79, cap. 4, cf. Conc. Laod. c. 11).

Probably from the difficulty of finding virgins qualified for the office, it would appear that the deaconesses were in a great measure chosen from among the widows. And thus they were often called χήραι, although distinct from the general body of widows belonging to the Church. Thus Epiphanius, in the passage already quoted, speaks of the order of deaconesses (διακονισσῶν τάγμα) who are called widows. So there is a canon speaking of the ordination of widows whom they call deaconesses, “Viduarum consecratio quas diaconas vocitant” (Conc. Epau. c. 21); and Basil speaks of a widow who has been taken into the number of widows, that is, received by the Church into the diaconate (Basil, Ep. Can. c. 3). Under this term were included all deaconesses, whether they were widows or not. So Ignatius speaks of the virgins who were called widows, τὰς παρθένους τὰς λεγόμενας χήρας (Ad Smyrn. c. 13). So that it is probable that the word may have meant those living without a husband, whether in widowhood, or under a vow of continence (see Jacobson in loco).

III. Duties of Deaconesses.—The duties of the deaconesses were various. The most important related to the administration of baptism to women [BAPTISM, p. 160]. Thus the 4th council of Carthage (c. 12) speaks of them as widows or virgins selected for the purpose of assisting in the baptism of women, and who therefore must be qualified to assist the unlearned candidates how to answer the interrogatories in the baptismal office, and how to live after baptism. Epiphanius says that the order was instituted to at the baptism of women, that all things be done with proper decency (Haer. 79, 3). In the Apostolic Constitutions (iii. 8) it is said that the deaconess (ῥῆς δῆς) was to be chosen for ministering to women, because it was impossible to send a man into many houses on account of the uncleanliness. At the baptism of women the deaconesses were to administer the chrism before him, and to undertake all the necessary ministrations for the women, as the deacon did for men. No woman was to have any intercourse with the bishop or deacon except through deaconesses (Ibid. ii. c. 26). They were also to receive women who were strangers, and allot them their places in the church (Ibid. ii. c. 58), to stand at the door of that part of the church which was allotted to women (Ibid. ii. c. 59). Thus the Pseudo-Ignatius (Ad Antioch.) speaks of the deaconesses who kept the doors of the church. They were to attend to women who were sick or in affliction as the men did to the men (Constitut. Apost. iii. 19), in time of persecution to minister to the prisoners in prison (Cotel. Annot. in Constitut. i. iii. 15, quoting from Lucian and Libanius). They were to exercise some supervision over the general body of widows, who were to be sent to the bishops, priests, and deacons, and also to the deaconesses (Constitut. Apost. iii. c. 1). They also probably had authority over virgins. Thus Gregory Nyssen, in the life of Lampadia, says that Lampadia was set over the virgins in the diaconate. But the latter appears to have been separable from the diaconate. Sozomen says that Nicareta refused to become a deaconess, or to preside over the virgins of the Church, as if she might have held the one position without the other (H. E. viii. c. 23).

Rank and Privileges.—There can be no doubt that deaconesses were considered to be an order in the Church. Nectarius is said to have named Olympias to the diaconate, δῆσσαν οὐδὲν (Soz. H. E. viii. 9), and the same is used in the decrees of the councils in Asia (ca. 14, 40), and Chalcedon (c. 15). Epiphanius speaks of them as an order, τάγμα, in the Church (Haer. 79, cap. 3); and they were to receive the consecrated elements immediately after the male clergy, taking precedence over widows and virgins, and the lay people (Constitut. Apost. viii. c. 13). Their ministry is to be dependent upon that of the deacons (Ibid. i. c. 26). A form of ordination by the bishop is also given in which the words ἐπιθεῖς χεῖρας, which express the act of ordination, are the same as those employed in the office for the ordination of deacons, which the whole form very much resembles (Ibid. viii. 19, 20).

Thomassin understands deaconesses to be meant in the decree of the 2nd council of Carthage (c. 17) which forbids a virgin to be consecrated by a bishop, "puellarum consecratio a presbytero fiat" (ii. Conc. Carth. c. 3), or, as modified in the 3rd council (c. 36), without the consent of the bishop (Vel. et Nov. Eccl. Discip. i. l. 3, § 11, 12).

There is however a somewhat remarkable passage in a decree of the council of Nice, which, speaking of the Paulianist clergy who were to be reordained on their admission to the Catholic Church, goes on to say that the deaconesses who had assumed that office, or habit, since they had no imposition of hands, could only be reckoned among the laity (1 Conc. Nic. c. 19). But this appears simply to refer to certain women among the Paulianists who had assumed the habit or office of deaconesses without imposition of hands, and who therefore could not be reordained but simply reckoned among the laity (cf. Thomassin Vel. et Nov. Eccl. Discip. i. l. 3, c. 50, § 12). Indeed the same canon speaks of deaconesses as among the clergy (ἱερεῖς καὶ δῆσσαι) and to be received in the same manner. Thus clearly making a distinction between those among the Paulianists who had been regularly ordained, and those who had assumed the office without ordination. But the reading is doubtful (see Brunus, Canonica, i. 19), though Thomassin, in the place above quoted, accepts it without question as authentic.

The ordination, however, was expressly understood to confer no sacerdotal functions of any kind. The 4th council of Carthage (c. 100) expressly orders that no woman should venture to baptize. It appears that certain sects of the Montanists ordained women as priests and even as bishops. In opposition to these Epiphanius, while speaking of them as an order in the Church, asserts that they were women-elders, but not priestesses in any sense (ὑποεπισκόπιδες ἡγούμεναι), and that their mission was not to interfere in any way with the functions allotted to the priests (ἐπισκόποις), but simply to perform certain offices in the care of women (Epiph. Haer. 79, cap. 3). Tertullian also says that it is not permitted to a woman to speak in the church, nor to baptize, nor to make the oblation (offerre), nor discharge any of the offices allotted to men (virile munus) (Tert. de Vel. Virg. c. 9), and is indignant at the forwardness of women who take upon themselves to teach and to baptize contrary to the express command of the Apostle (1d. De Baptis. c. 17). The Constitutions (iii. 9) emphatically deny the right of women to baptize, asserting that priestesses are ordained for female duties, and are a heathen, not a Christian institution; and that if Our Lord had wished them to baptize, he would himself have been baptized by his own mother rather than by John the Baptist. The latter argument is also used by Epiphanius, who says that if Our Lord had ordered women to exercise any priestly or ecclesiastical ministry, he would first have given that office to the Virgin Mary (Haer. 79, cap. 3).

V. Celibacy.—It is evident that the ordination of deaconesses included a vow of celibacy. The council of Chalcedon (c. 15) pronounces an anathema against those who should marry after having been ordained to the diaconate. And Justinian's legislation ordered that those who married should be sentenced to forfeiture of property and capital punishment (Novell. vi. 6).

VI. Discontinuance.—It is probable that this occasioned the discontinuance of the order. Certainly it did not last long. The council of Laodicea, A.D. 320, forbade the appointment of any of those who were called ὑποεπισκόπιδες (Conc. Laod. c. 11). The 1st council of Orange (c. 26), A.D. 441, simply forbids the ordination of any deaconess whatever; and again, "Viduarum consecrationem quas diaconas vocitant ab omni regione nostrâ penitus abrogamus" (Conc. Epom. c. 31).

The 2nd council of Orleans (cc. 17, 18) decrees that deaconesses who had married were to be excommunicated unless they renounced their husbands, but none in future were to be ordained on account of the weakness of the sex. It would appear that, in the time of the writer of certain commentaries which appear under the name of Jerome, the order was quite extinct in the Western Church, and only known by report as existing in the East. Thus he speaks of "those whom in the East they call deaconesses" (Hieron. Comm. in 1 Tim. iii. 11), and "In the East women deaconesses (diaconissae mulieres) appear to minister to their own sex in baptism and the ministry of the word" (Id. Comm. Rom. xvi. 1). Thomassin thinks that the order was extinct in the Western Church in the 10th or 12th century (Vet. et Nov. Eccl. Discip. i. l. 3, c. 49, § 8), but that it lingered on a little longer in the Church of Constantinople, though only in convents (Id. i. l. 3, c. 47, § 10).

The title of deaconesses was also given sometimes to the wives of deacons (ii. Conc. Turon. c. 19), and to abbesses of convents (Thomass. Vet. et Nov. Eccl. Discip. i. l. 3, c. 47, § 10). [P. O.]

DEAD, BAPTISM OF AND FOR THE.

DEAD, COMMUNION OF THE.

The three practices thus grouped together had a common origin in the feeling that baptism was an indispensable condition of salvation; that for those who had been baptized the other great sacrament of the Church was almost as essential; that it, at least, brought with it priceless advantages to the receiver when he entered on the unseen world; that it was the viaticum for that last journey. The earliest trace of the feeling and its results is seen in the strange, passing allusion by St. Paul in 1 Cor. xv. 29, to the βαπτίζομενοι ὑπὲρ νεκρῶν. It is not within the scope of the present paper to enter fully into the exegesis of that perplexing passage. The strange contrast which its apparent meaning presented to the received doctrine and practice of the Church made the interpreters of a later period anxious to find a way of escape, and from Chrysostom and Theophylact downward there have been those who have seen in it a reference to the profession of faith in the resurrection of the body made at baptism. It is believed, however, that this is simply a non-natural and untenable interpretation. It is better to take the words in their obvious sense, and to remember that St. Paul simply draws from the practice of which they speak an argumentum ad hominem, and does not, in the slightest degree, sanction the practice itself. However startling it may seem that a feeling so gross in its superstition should spring up so soon, we have to remember that it was more or less analogous to the "sorrow without hope", of which St. Paul speaks in writing to the Thessalonians (1 Thess. iv. 13), and which sprang out of the belief that those who died before the coming of the Lord were shut out from all participation in the glory of the kingdom. So it was at Corinth and, it may be, elsewhere. Men were told that by baptism they were admitted to the kingdom of God; that it was the pledge not only of immortality for the soul, but of resurrection for the body. But what would become of those who, though they had believed, were cut off by death before receiving baptism?

His answer led to the expedient of a "vicarium baptismi" (Tertull. De Resurr. Carn. c. 48, Adv. Marcion. v. 10), to which the usages of later Judaism offered, at least, some remote analogies (Lightfoot, Hor. Hebr. in 1 Cor. xv.). The practice assumed among the Ebionites (Epiphanius, Haeres. 30) and the Marcionites (Chrysost. Hom. 40 in 1 Cor.) a somewhat dramatic form. The corpse was laid upon the bed, and beneath there was concealed a living man. The question "Wilt thou be baptised?" was formally put and answered, and then the rite was performed on the living as the proxy for the dead. There is no reason for thinking that the practice ever became common in the Church. Its adoption by heretical sects probably secured its condemnation. But the feeling had showed itself in another form more widely. The stronger the feeling that baptism conferred what could be conferred in no other way, the more men lamented over the non-fulfilment of the condition by those they loved. The Church allowed baptism in articulo mortis, it is true, even where the ordinary conditions were not fulfilled. It might, in case of necessity, be administered by a layman or even by a woman. But still death might come beforehand. What was to be done then? What was to be done in the parallel case of the baptized man dying without communion? In all parts of the Church, and for some centuries, we find traces of the prevalence of the practice of administering baptism to the corpse. It is forbidden, it is true, by Councils, but the locality and date of the Synods that prohibit it, are significant as showing how widely spread it was. We have canons against it and against the analogous practice of placing the Eucharist within the lips of the dead, in the third Council of Carthage (A.D. 397 c. 6); in the Council in Trullo at Constantinople (A.D. 692, c. 83); in that of Auxerre (A.D. 578, c. 12); in the Canons of Boniface, Bishop of Mainz (Can. 20). Gregory of Nazianzum (Orat. 40) utters a serious warning against it. Even when the better sense of the Church rejected the more revolting usage, there was, as has been said under BURIAL, both in the East and West, the corresponding usage, hardly less superstitious, of placing a portion of the consecrated bread upon the breast of the corpse to be interred with him, as a charm against the attacks of malignant spirits. The practice of the baptism of the dead prevailed most, according to one writer, among the Phrygian followers of Montanus (Philastr. De Haeres. c. 2). [E. H. P.]

RS. The Jewish law in reference to debtors, and to the redemption of vry peculiar. That of the Christian been mainly founded on the Roman, ginally very harsh towards debtors a, c. xlv., &c.), under the empire y mitigated in their favour. Thus itution of Diocletian and Maximin It was expressly enacted that the t suffer freemen to be compelled to ves to their creditors by reason of (Code, bk. iv. tit. ix. l. 12). Under w there had already been introduced of the debtor the expedient of the sso, something between our bank- l what a few years back was distin- m it as insolvency (see Dig. bk. xlii. It was a question among the jurists a man had once given up all his s creditors, any after acquired pro- was subject to their claims. Sabinus would have him free (Ibid. l. 4), lating him to the bankrupt. Ulpian die, and it must be said, an unwise ding that the liability depended on the quantum of the subsequent earnings, and that he was not to be disturbed in the possession of anything left or given to him by way of charity for his maintenance (Ibid. l. 6). Modestinus also held the liability to attach, if the property were sufficient to justify the action of the praetor (Ibid. l. 7). Under the Code, by a constitution of Alexander Severus (A.D. 224), the debtor was not held free from his debt till the creditor was paid in full, but the cessio bonorum exempted him from imprisonment and from torture (bk. vii. tit. lxxi. ll. 1, 8). It was in the option of the creditors to allow the debtors five years' delay instead of accepting the cessio, such option to be exercised, in case of difference of opinion, according to the figure of the debt, so that a single creditor whose claim should amount to more than the sum total of all the others had the fate of the debtor in his hands (l. 8; Const. of Justinian). An attempt having moreover been made to make the cessio compulsory on the debtor, the 135th Novel forbade this.

Debtors were under the Christian emperors admitted to the right of sanctuary in churches and their precincts, Jews only excepted, who pretended a wish to become converted in order to frustrate their creditors, and who were not to be admitted until they had paid all their debts (Code, bk. i. t. xii. l. 1 ff.), although the public imposts might be levied within the churches themselves, and if the collectors were subjected to violence or seditious opposition, the defensores and oeconomi of the Church were made responsible for the fiscal dues not collected (Novel 17, c. 7); but otherwise it was expressly enacted by a constitution of the Emperor Leo, A.D. 466 (bk. i. t. xii. l. 6), that the bishops and oeconomi were not to be held responsible for the debts of persons claiming sanctuary.

We may moreover observe in the 60th Novel a law forbidding creditors to torment their dying debtors or their families, place their seals upon the property, or interfere with the funeral, under severe penalties (c. i.); and in the 115th another which forbade the pressing by creditors of the heirs, parents, children, wives, husbands, agnates, cognates, connexions or sureties of a deceased debtor within nine days of his death, the delay not to be reckoned as time running for prescription nor otherwise to prejudice the creditor (c. v.). The 134th Novel forbids a custom which it speaks of as prevalent in various places, that of detaining a debtor's children as pledges, or as slaves or servants for hire, under penalty of forfeiture of the debt, damages to an equal amount, and corporal punishment (c. vii.). As to debts due to bankers, see the 136th Novel, and 7th Edict of Justinian.

Under the Ostrogothic rule in Italy, the Edict of Theodoric required debtors condemned by judicial sentence to pay within two months, under pain of the sale of their pledges (c. 124). Where, however, a creditor seized the goods of one who was not under obligation to him, he was to pay fourfold the value, if sued within the year, otherwise simply to restore the amount seized; and so of the fruits of land (c. 131). Under the Lombard law, on the contrary, by practice of seizing the person of the debtor the way of pledge seems to reappear, although the liability is confined to himself and his gaphnas, or nearest future heir (Laws of Rotharis, c. 149;

A.D. 638 or 643). Little, however, is found generally in the barbaric Codes on the subject.

It is not surprising to find the Church occasionally interfering either by spiritual penalties, or conversely by kindly assistance to the unfortunate, where the municipal law failed to take effect for their relief. A signal instance of ecclesiastical assistance to a debtor is that which forms the subject of Augustine's 215th or 268th letter, addressed to his congregation, to which he appealed to repay Macedonius, who had suffered by his kindness to one Fascius, a debtor who had taken sanctuary.

An Irish Synod of the middle of the 5th century (450 or 456) enacted the excommunication of fraudulent debtors, as if they were heathens, till they paid their debts (c. 20). In the collection of Irish canons, supposed to belong to the end of the 7th century, there is a whole book (xxxii.) "of debts and pledges, and usury," and another (xxxiii.) "of sureties and rates." There is however no reason for supposing that enactments like this ever took effect beyond the limits of Ireland.

From the letters of Gregory the Great, (A.D. 590-603) we obtain some glimpses of the condition of debtors at the heart of Christendom, towards the end of the 6th and beginning of the 7th century, and of the behaviour of the Church towards them. Two of his letters (Epist. ii. 56 and iii. 43) are occupied with the case of a Syrian named Cosmas, a poor debtor, whose sons, according to his account, were detained by his creditors as pledges for his debts, and whom he was anxious to benefit.

Several other instances to the same effect occur in the same collection. A letter (Epist. v. 35) to Secundinus, bishop of Taormina, is written in favour of one Sincerus, whose wife was pressed to pay the debts of her late father. See also Epist. vii. pt. 2, 37 and 60. DECANICIUM, DECANIA, or DECANICA (Δεκανικόν), an ecclesiastical prison, carcer canonicalis or demeritorum domus, a place of confinement in which criminous clerks were incarcerated by their bishops and other ecclesiastical superiors. The word is derived from the decani, the subordinate officials—the βαβδούχοι or lictors of the church—who were the jailers. By a false etymology it is sometimes written δικανικόν. Another form, διακονικόν, also found, may be justified by the fact that the sacristy and other annexed ecclesiastical buildings sometimes served the purpose of a prison. Cf. the letter of Pope Gregory II., A.D. 731-741, to the Emperor Leo Isaurus, in which, comparing the mercy of the ecclesiastical with the severity of temporal rulers, he says that when one of the clergy was proved to be worthy of punishment, instead of hanging or beheading him, the bishop hung round his neck the gospels and the cross, and imprisoned him in one of the treasuries or diaconica, or catechumena of the church (Labbe, Concil. viii. p. 25). The word decanicum is not unfrequently met with in early times: e.g. in the petition of Basil the deacon to the Emperor Theodosius, complaining of the cruel indignities he and his friends had been subjected to at the hands of Nestorius (Acta Concil. Ephes. pars i. c. 30, § 3 et passim; Labbe, Concil. iii. 425-431). "They had been stripped and beaten, and led off half-naked to the decanicum, where they were detained without food, and again beaten by the decani."

The Decanica are named among the buildings of which heretics were to be deprived, in a decree of Arcadius and Honorius (Justin. Cod. lib. i. tit. v. c. 3); and in the Novells of Justinian (lxxix. c. 3, p. 211) we find a decree addressed to Mennas, Archbishop of Constantinople, ordering that officers venturing to execute a sentence of secular courts on clerics should be imprisoned in the so-called decanica (καθειργέσθωσαν ἐν τοῖς καλουμένοις δεκανίκοις). [E. V.]

DECANUS (in an ecclesiastical sense) =

I. A member of a guild, whose occupation was that of interring the dead [COPIATAE]: reckoned among clerici by St. Jerome, Epiphanius, the Cod. Theodos., &c.; called also κοπίτης (Epiphanius), fossarius (Pseudo-Jerom., De VII. Ord. Eccl.), lecticarius (Justinian, Novel. xliii. Praef.), collegiatus (in the laws of Honorius, &c., Justinian, Theodosius the Great), decanus (same laws; and Collect. Constit. Eccl. in Biblioth. Jur. Canon. p. 1243). The office was apparently instituted by Constantine at Constantinople, where it numbered in his time 1100 members, but was afterwards reduced to 950; but then again increased by the Emperor Anastasius, who also endowed it (Justinian, Novel. xliii. lix.; Cod. lib. iv. De Sacrosanct. Eccl.). From thence it spread to "other populous churches." The poor were to be buried by its members gratuitously, at least where it was endowed (id. Novel. lix.). The δεκανοὶ mentioned by St. Chrysostom (Hom. xiii.) were a different, and a civil, body of officials, attached to the emperor's palace. (Bingham, Du Cange, Meursius, Suicer.)

Turon.* II. c. 19, A.D. 567; Bruns's Canones, ii. 229), to distinguish him from the urban archipresbyter or protopope, and succeeding under that name to some of the functions of the older chorepiscopus: originally in the Church of France:—first called Decanus, and his district Decania,—(setting aside a canon, wrongly attributed to the Council of Agde, A.D. 506, but really of the date of Charles the Great, acc. to Dansey, and two questionable canons respectively of *Conc. The developed functions of the office in a period later than that to which the work relates. In Ireland, the peculiar of the court became mixed up with plebanus, or rural dean. Beyond the Isles and France, the office does not seem to stand. (Dansey, Horae Decanicas Rurales, 1844; Du Cange; Spelman.)

The chief officer of a cathedral, decanus ecclesialis, as distinguished from the decanus and ruralis, or city and country archpriest of the chapter of the cathedral had separate and corporate body [CANONICI]; so entitled dates in its full development in the 10th or 11th centuries, Normandy and England being the countries where occurs, Rouen having a dean in the 10th and the Dean of St. Paul's, A.D. 1086, the first English dean. But as a cathedral the decanus dates from the 8th century.

is found, after the monastic pattern, finite to the praepositus or provost, who bishop's vicegerent as head of the chapter. The arrangement still survives, after a fashion, relative positions of the provost or head, a dean, in Oxford and Cambridge colleges. The will of Mayence, A.D. 813, substituted provosts. And that of Aiz la Chapelle, subordinated the provost to the dean.

of provosts, afterwards mostly common deans—at Canterbury until the time of the, at Worcester A.D. 872-872, at Ely, at Lichfield A.D. 818-822, at Wells, 1088, at Beverley A.D. 1070, at several cathedrals, and in some English col- lurches—is given by Walcot (Cathedrals).

The change probably arose from the dependent on the part of the provosts of the and internal direction of the chapter, their attention to its temporal and ex- ternal concerns. The functions of the dean are, for the diocese of Lincoln, A.D. 1212, ordered by Pope Alexander III. (Wilk. 535, 536), and for that of Lichfield, by Bishop Nohant (ib. 497), and for Durham, as adopted by Glasgow (ib. 741). office, in this full sense of the title, is a period long subsequent to the date of the Great.

subordination to the 'pater,' 'abbas,' 'beg- menos' or 'archimandrita' (Bingh. ib.). The 'decanus' was deputed by him to superintend the younger brethren, drilling them in self- denial and encouraging them to confess to him even their secret thoughts (Cassian, Instit. v. 8, 9). Especially he was to watch over the novices just emerging, their first year of proba- tion being past, from the 'xenodochium' or strangers' room (ib. 7), setting them an example of obedience by himself obeying the 'praepositus' even in things impossible (ib. 10). Augustine speaks of the 'decanus' as having charge over ten monks (De Mor. Eccl. 31); Jerome, over nine; (Ep. 22 ad Eustoch.). The 'decanus' was to provide for the temporal necessities of his monks, for instance, by sending out to them the linen under-garments; (cf. Cass. Instit. iv. 10) to watch by night over their cells; to lead them to and from refectory; to assign to each the allotted task; and, at the close of the day, to hand over the work done to the 'oeconomus' or steward, who was to make a monthly report of it to the abbat (Jerome, ib. cf. Bingh. u.s.).

The great monastic legislator of M. Casino adopted cordially this important feature in coenobitism, prescribing more precisely the duties of the 'decanus,' and placing him next in rank to the 'prior' or 'praepositus.' Indeed, Benedict preferred deans to priors as less likely to collide with the supreme authority of the abbat (Reg. c. 65; cf. Conc. Mogunt. i. 816, 11). All monas- teries, except the very smallest, for the words 'major congregatio' are taken to mean any number over twenty (Mart. in Reg. S. Bened. 17), were to have deans, one for ten brethren. He was to have charge of his 'decania' in all things, with this proviso, "according to the precepts of the abbat" (Reg. 21). He was to be appointed not by seniority, 'per ordinem,' but by merit, at the choice of the abbat, or, according to some com- mentators, of the abbat and seniors (ib.). He was to hold office for an undefined period, one year or more (Mart. in Reg. 31-2), in fact, "quamdiu se bene gesserit," but after three ad- monitions was to be deprived (Reg. 21). He was to guard the morals and conduct of the monks under his care, especially the dormitory (Reg. 32; cf. Reg. Magist. 11); and to hear their confessions (Reg. 46).

In subsequent adaptations of the Benedictine Rule the office of Dean is defined still more pre- cisely. By the rule entitled 'Magistri,' his badge of office was to be a wand 'virga,' or rather a crook, symbolic of pastoral duties (Reg. Mag. 11, cf. Menard in Conc. Reg. 28, 2). The same rule orders two deans for each decade of monks, to relieve one another, so that one or the other may be always with them (ib.). They were to preside at table in the refectory (ib.). By the rule of Fructuosus, the dean is to keep watch over the younger monks, even in minute points of deportment, to receive their most secret con- fessions, and to delate impenitent offenders to the abbat or prior (Reg. Fruct. 12). By the council of Aachen, in 817, the eldest in rank of the deans is to superintend the other deans (Conc. Aquisgr. 55).

According to Menard (in Reg. S. Bened. 21), the practice of the Reformed Benedictines as to the office of dean has varied considerably. With the Cistercians it has been unknown (ib.). With the monks of Clugni, the deans administered the temporalities of the monastery, being the 'vil-larum provisores' or 'suffraganei Prioris' (ib. cf. Du Cange, Glossar. s.v.). With the monks of M. Casino, the dean at one time ranked next to the abbat (cf. Alteser. Ascetic. ii. 9); but afterwards, the original institution of deans was revived (Menard. ib.). In some monasteries, according to Du Cange (Glossar. s.v.), there was a 'foris decanus' to look after the interests of the monastery, outside its walls; in some a 'decanus operis' or 'operariiprum' over the work-people; in some, the tenants under the monastery, 'villici' or 'coloni' were called 'decani.' Hence the 'decania' or 'decanatus' came to mean sometimes a grange belonging to a monastery (ib.). In nunneries there were officials, 'decanæ,' corresponding to the 'decani' in the older sense of the word, to maintain order and discipline (ib.).

DECIMAE. [TITHES.]

DECREE. [DECRETUM.]

DECRETAL. As has been observed in a previous article [CANON LAW], a decretal in its strict canonical sense is an authoritative rescript of a pope, in reply to some question propounded to him, just as a decree is an ordinance enacted by him, with the advice of his cardinals, but not drawn from him by previous inquiry.* The very word therefore implies power and jurisdiction. Hence, though from the 4th century downwards epistles of the Bishops of Rome are extant,^b the earlier specimens do not come up to the full canonical idea of decretals, inasmuch as they possessed, when issued, a moral weight rather than a legislative force. They are thus spoken of by Gieseler:—"Another source of influence to the Roman bishops was the custom of referring to them particularly, as the head of the only apostolic Church of the West, all questions concerning the apostolic customs and doctrines, which in the East were addressed indiscriminately to the bishops of any church founded by an apostle. This gave them occasion to issue a vast number of didactic letters (epistolae decretales), which soon assumed a tone of apostolic authority, and were held in high estimation in the West, as flowing from apostolic tradition." (Gieseler, Ch. Hist., Second Period, chap. iii.)

As the papal power became firmly established, such epistles acquired more and more force, until at length they occupied the position tersely expressed by the canonist Lancellottus in later days—"Decreta Pontificum Romanorum canonibus conciliorum pari potestate exaequantur" (lib. i. tit. 3). Conversely, also, the papal power itself was mainly indebted for its development to the canonical doctrine of decretals. For it was the collection of forged decretals put forth by the Pseudo-Isidore which chiefly persuaded the world that the popes had from the most primitive times been in the habit of issuing authoritative rescripts; and this being once admitted, it followed that they must still have power to act in a like manner.^c Moreover, the pretended decretals were so full of assertions of the papal prerogatives, that when they were once accepted as genuine and valid, they were a sufficient justification for the issue of any subsequent document of the same sort, however extravagant. As the collection of the Pseudo-Isidore did not appear until the middle of the 9th century, it lies beyond the period to which the present work is confined. But some notice of it is required on many grounds. It contains numerous alleged decretals of very early popes, the spuriousness of which must be pointed out. It gave the chief support to the canonical idea of a "Decretal," and therefore enables us to show that that idea in its full development is probably later than 800 A.D. It contains several decretals taken from the older collections of Dionysius and of the Spanish Church, and therefore gives us occasion to notice that the idea in question, though not fully matured, was not unknown at an earlier period. It may be convenient therefore briefly to indicate the character and contents of the work.

It commences with nearly sixty letters of various Bishops of Rome, from Clement to Melchisedes. These are all fictitious, and are all (according to Heinschius, cxxxi.), with the exception of two letters of Clement (which are in whole or in part more ancient forgeries), the work of the Pseudo-Isidore.

Then follow various conciliar decrees, with which we are not here concerned, but many of which are unauthentic. In a third part we have again decretals of popes down to Gregory II. In this series the first that is genuine is that of Siricius to Himerius or Eumerius, Bishop of Tarragona.^d Among those that follow, some are to a certain extent genuine, or, at all events, have been taken, with more or less exactness, from existing records. Others, on the contrary, are either the invention of the compiler, or have been compounded by him out of some existing materials, or, lastly, were forgeries found ready to his hand.^e Everywhere, however, unwarranted alterations and additions are to be found,

* The work is considered by Heinschius to have appeared between 847 and 853, A.D. It has been usual to trace its origin to the province of Mayence, but Heinschius attributes it to that of Rheims. The author is not certainly known (see Heinschius, ccviii. and ccxxix. et seq.). By some he has been identified with Benedictus Levita; but, according to Heinschius, he only availed himself of materials found in the collection of Benedictus. (Heins. cxliii.)

^e Milman makes 39, Phillips 35, false decrees in this part of the work. It is hard to say with precision how many of the forgeries were previously in existence. On this point the careful analysis in the preface of Heinschius should be consulted. See also Phillips, p. 63, Bickell, & 35, note. It is impossible to condense the results.

* Decretalis epistola est, quando Papa ad consultationem alicujus respondet: sive solus, sive de consilio fratrum. . . . Decretum est, quod Papa de consilio fratrum, nulla consultatione facta, super aliqua re statuit, et in rescriptis redegit. . . . Constitutio est quod Papa proprio motu statuit, et in rescriptis redegit, sine consilio fratrum et nulla consultatione facta.—Hostiensis, Aurea summa, Proem. 14.

^b As regards the 3rd century, see Phillips, p. 6, and Bickell, l. 35, note. Cornelius is the only Pope of whom any letters of that date remain.

y spurious letters being apparently mixed those that have some title to be deemed authentic. It thus appears that the work is not real, unmixed forgery. It rests in part on collections. These are the Hispana collection, the so-called Hadriano-Dionysian collection (Index Hadrianus), and some other works of importance. Of these some account has been given under a previous head (CANON), and it is therefore unnecessary to repeat here. As there mentioned, the work of Dionysius (subsequently sanctioned by Pope Hadrian) was the first which placed the papal epistles side by side with the decrees of Councils. This seems to have been the important step. From this time on, the series was given to contend that they were par, and the wide circulation which the work had very materially assisted the pretensions led on it. Then came the Spanish collection which yet further contributed to invest the papal epistles with a legislative, as distinguished from a moral, authority in the Church. It carried the series further than Dionysius had done; and at length, in the 8th century, the appearance of the work of the Pseudo-Isidore (so called to distinguish him from the Isidore to whom the Spanish collection is attributed), with a crowd of fictitious epistles which an uncritical age received in implicit faith, put into the hands of the popes the greatest weapon which they ever wielded. The result therefore is that, owing to the year 800 A.D. the foundations were really laid for the superstructure afterwards raised; but it was chiefly due to the subsequent work that that superstructure attained its proportions and peculiar character. For the forgeries invented by, or enshrined in, that work, not only vastly increased the number of papal epistles, and carried them back to primeval times, but were directly framed with a view of supporting the highest claims of the papacy. There is little or nothing in the genuine epistles which could be made the foundation of many of the later papal claims, whereas the fictitious decretals furnish a basis for the most extravagant pretensions. It was for this reason that an indication that the learned of all communions substantially agreed at the present day as to the character of the work as a whole, it may not be uninteresting to give the following summary of the work from the Bibliotheca Canonica of Ferrara, edit. (stated to be published "Superiorum permisso et approbatione.") Under the title "Canones" the collection of Pseudo-Isidore is thus spoken of:—"Continet collectio quinquecenta Canones Apostolorum ex Hadriano, quatuordecim, epistolae Romanorum Pontificum a Clemente ad Silvestrum, quarum omnium ipse Isidorus auctor exceptis duabus Clementis ad Jacobum litteris; tum a plurimum conciliorum, in quibus fides habetur Constantini ad Silvestrum; postremo Pontificum ab ipso Silvestro ad Gregorium M. alia cum epistolae monumenta, quorum pars ex aliis collectionibus vera est atque germana, praeter epistolae omnes cum Siricio antiquiorum ab Isidoro confictas, ex Siricio ad Paulinum litteris, pars altera cum multis Romanis sub Julio et Concilio I. V. et VI. sub Isidoro, excogitata et inventa est." See another account from a Roman Catholic point of view, in Le Droit Ecclésiastique, chap. I. § 8. Phillips (p. 29) seems to think that some decretals dating from the earliest popes had been included in the collection of Dionysius at the end of the 7th century, thus carrying the series backward also, and the way for Pseudo-Isidore.

they were brought at once into prominence, and that from the time of their appearance decretals, as distinguished from other sources of ecclesiastical law, play so large a part in the works of the canonists.

"The false decretals," says Milman (Lat. Christ. book v. chap. 4), do not merely assert the supremacy of the popes—the dignity and privileges of the Bishop of Rome—they comprehend the whole dogmatic system and discipline of the Church, the whole hierarchy from the highest to the lowest degree, their sanctity and immunities, their persecutions, their disputes, their right of appeal to Rome.¹ They are full and minute on church property; on its usurpation and spoliation; on ordinations; on the sacraments, on baptism, confirmation, marriage, the Eucharist; on fasts and festivals; the discovery of the cross, the discovery of the reliques of the apostles; on the chrism, holy water, consecration of churches, blessing of the fruits of the field; on the sacred vessels and habiliments. Personal incidents are not wanting to give life and reality to the fiction. The whole is composed with an air of piety and reverence: a specious purity, and occasionally beauty, in the moral and religious tone. There are many axioms of seemingly sincere and vital religion. But for the too manifold design, the aggrandisement of the see of Rome and the aggrandisement of the whole clergy in subordination to the see of Rome; but for the monstrous ignorance of history, which betrays itself in glaring anachronisms, and in the utter confusion of the order of events and in the lives of distinguished men—the former awakening keen and jealous suspicion, the latter making the detection of the spuriousness of the whole easy, clear, irrefragable—the False Decretals might still have maintained their place in ecclesiastical history.²

DECRETUM, DECRETALE. The letter of the clergy and people of a city, sent to the metropolitan and the comprovincial bishops, signifying the election of a bishop of their city [BISHOP, p. 220], whom they require to be consecrated; equivalent to τῆς πόλεως ἐκκλησία (Palladius, Vita Chrysos. p. 39). Gregory of Tours (Vita Maurici, c. 13, in Du-cange) says that in the choice of Mauritius the electors could not "in unum venire decretum." A form for such a letter is given in the Ordo Romanus Vulg. under the title, "Decretum quod clerus et populus firmare debet de electo episcopo." The proper form of one addressed to the pope himself is given in the Liber Diurnus Pon-

² It should perhaps be added that in this article the strict canonical sense of "decretal" has been taken. The word, like other ecclesiastical terms, is sometimes used in a looser and more general sense.

diff. Romm. c. 3, p. 54. In the same place there follows (p. 56) a "Decretale, quod legit diaconus designatus episcopo." The difference between this and the foregoing Decretum appears to be, that the one was sent by the hands of some official of the vacant see immediately on the election of the bishop; if thereupon the pope gave his assent, the bishop became technically designatus, and a deacon of his church read the Decretale or petition for consecration (Garnier, in loco). Several forms of Decreta on the election of bishops may be found in Sirmund's Concil. Gall. ii. 647 ff. and in Usher's Vet. Epist. Hibern., Epp. 25, 33, 40. [C.]

DEDICATION. [CONSECRATION OF CHURCHES; PATRON SAINT.]

DEDICATION, FESTIVAL OF (Εγκαινία). The observance of the anniversary of dedication arose contemporaneously with the custom of the solemn dedication of churches. It was natural that an epoch so intimately connected with the religious life of the congregation should not be allowed to drop into oblivion. By a very intelligible metaphor the day of consecration was considered the birthday of the church, or congregation meeting for worship within its walls. St. Leo (Sermo lxxvii. in Natal. Machab.) calls it the "dies natalis" of the church. By another metaphor it was regarded as the day of the church's espousals to her heavenly Bridegroom. Most naturally therefore these anniversaries were celebrated with the same joyous feelings and outward festivities as birthdays and wedding-days. These celebrations having their first origin in the time when the Christians were a poor and barely tolerated sect, exposed continually to persecution, and when any outward pomp attracting the notice of the heathen population around would be fraught with peril, assumed a character of magnificence in their period of security and opulence. The earliest instance on record of the observance of such anniversaries is in the case of the church of "the Great Martyr" erected by Constantine on Calvary, and consecrated A.D. 335. In memory of this solemn dedication, the most magnificent the Christian world had yet witnessed, a yearly festival was held for eight days at Jerusalem, attended by immense crowds not of the citizens only but of strangers from all parts (Soz. H. E. lib. ii. c. 26). But the custom was certainly anterior to this, for not many years later, towards the middle of the 4th century, the observance of these anniversaries is spoken of by Gregory Nazianzen as "an ancient usage," ἐγκαινία τιμᾶσθαι παλαιὸς νόμος καὶ καλὸς ἔχων καὶ τοῦτο οὐχ ἑκατὶ ἀλλὰ καὶ πολλάκις, ἐκείνης τοῦ ἐνιαυτοῦ περιτροπῇ τῇ αὐτῇ ἡμέρᾳ ἐπαι- ούσης (Greg. Naz. In Novam Dominicam. Orat. xliii.). Two centuries later it was laid down by Felix IV. c. A.D. 530, as a law of the Church that such anniversaries should be solemnly kept for eight days, "solemnitates vero dedicationum ecclesiarum per singulos annos sunt celebrandae" (Epistola ad Episcopos, Labbe, Concil. iv. 1655). The example of Christ attending the Feast of Dedication (John x. 22), and of Solomon feasting the people for eight days at the Dedication of the Temple, 1 Kin. viii. 65, 66, were adduced as authorities for this observance. At the commencement of the next century we find the first

indication of the revelry with which these festivals were subsequently disgraced, and which made them a by-word for scandalous licence. Gregory the Great writing to Mellitus when proceeding to join Augustine in England, A.D. 601 after retracting the advice previously given that the heathen temples should be destroyed, and recommending their purification and conversion into Christian Churches, proceeds in a similar spirit to advise that the popular festivals formerly held on these consecrated sites should not be wholly discontinued, but that "as some solemnity must be conceded as a compensation, they should be transferred to the anniversaries of the day of dedication, or the natiivities of the martyrs by whose relics the churches were hallowed. On these days he recommends that huts or arbours should be erected, about the transformed temples, in which after "killing cattle to the praise of God in their eating, they should celebrate the solemnity with religious feasting" (Greg. Mag. Epist. ad Mellitum, Hadan and Stubbs, vol. iii. p. 37; Bede, lib. i. c. 30). In other places Gregory alludes to the eagerness with which the country folk flock together to these festive celebrations, and the mixed crowds that were attracted by the good cheer (Greg. Mag. Homil. in Evang. xiv. Epist. lib. i. 52, 54; Vita, c. 37. See also Sidonius Apollinaris, Epist. lib. iv. ep. 15). Such gatherings of half-leavened pagans inevitably assume a character of gross licence entirely at variance with their sacred intention. Dramatic representations were performed, drinking was prolonged to intoxication, and singing and dancing were continued far into the night. In fact they were characterized by all the revelry and licentiousness of a village fair, which in so many cases is the lineal successor of the dedication festival, changed only in its externals. These gross scandals were not allowed to pass unreprieved. The serious attention of bishops and councils was directed to them, and earnest attempts were made for their suppression. The 19th canon of the council of Châlons, A.D. 650 is directed against the custom (the prohibition indicates the practice) of bands of women singing foul and obscene songs, "turpia et obscena cantilena," at the porches or churchyard wall on the dedication festivals (Labbe, Concil. vi. 391 [compare DANCING]). But so thorough had these licentious festivals established themselves, that their authoritative condemnation proved idle, and they lived on in defiance of prelates and councils.

Gavanti lays down (Theat. Sacr. Rit. § 8, c. 5) that the Feast of Dedication is a festival of the first class, of greater dignity than that of the Patron Saint or the Titulary of the Church. The reason for this superiority is assigned by St. Thomas Aquinas (lect. 5 in Joann. c. x.) because the dedication festival is a commemoration of the benefits conferred on the whole church, which exceed those given to any individual saint. The Feast of Dedication is a "duplex majus" and has an octave. If it happens to coincide with any greater festival the consecrator, or afterwards the bishop of the diocese, may transfer the anniversary to some Sunday, or any other day convenient for the large attendance of the country people (Gavanti u. s.; Bellarmin. de cultu sanctorum, lib. iii. c. 5, de dedicatione et consecra- in ecclesiis; Ducange sub voc.; Bingham, ig. bk. viii. c. ix. § 14; Isid. Hispal. De Eccl. lib. i. c. 36; Gratian Decret. De Consecr. d. l. c. 17; Ivo Carnot. Decret. pars iii. c. 24). After the establishment of Christianity newly added cities were solemnly dedicated to Christ and the Saints, and the anniversary of the dedication was celebrated. This was notably the case with Constantinople, the anniversary called ἡμέρα τῆς πόλεως ἡγιασμένης [p. 448] being kept the 11th of May (Ducange, Constantinopolitana, lib. i. c. 3). [E. V.]

DEER. [STAG.]

DEFENSOR ECCLESIAE. [See ADVOCATUS ECCLESIAE.] The Division into Defensores ecclesiae, Pauperum, Matrimonii, &c., is one of titles, not of persons. In addition to their proper work, already described under ADVOCATUS, a law Justinian (Novell. lxxiv. 4) imposed upon them in certain cases the incidental duty of witnessing and registering espousals. Setting aside the one hand the case of senators and persons of the highest rank, who were bound to have a regular settlement of dowry and antenuptial dower, &c., and on the other that of persons of the lowest rank, who needed no written document at all, Justinian ordained that officers, merchants, professional men, and the like, if they desired their marriage to be lawful, must present themselves in church in the presence of a Defensor Ecclesiae [CONTRACT OR MARRIAGE, p. 488]; and that officer, with three or four of the superior clergy of the church, is to draw up and sign, with at least three of the said clergy, a dated and formal attestation of the marriage contract, one copy to be deposited in the archives of the church, others to be given if required to the parties themselves (Bingham. XXII. 10). [A. W. H.]

DEGRADATION, DEPOSITION, DESTITUTION, DEPRIVATION, were terms first used indiscriminately to signify the total or absolute withdrawal from a clergyman, by ecclesiastical sentence, of his clerical office, and the reducing of him to simple lay communion: radare, ab officio removere, deordinare, ab ordine clericali amovere, καθαιρεῖν, ἀπὸ σιελου βαπτισμῶν ἀρσενεύειν, ἀπαινεῖν τοῦ κλήρου, being used of the same thing; which is also expressed by "deponi ab officio communionis causa." As a punishment of clergymen, it stood midway between a temporary withdrawal of the clerical office, viz. suspension, and an exclusion from the Church altogether by excommunication. There were also various degrees of degradation itself: as e.g. the degradation simply from a higher order to a lower; or again, degradation from the office, but with permission to retain its title and dignity: for which, and for some minor variations, see Bingham, XVII. iv.

and Conc. Sardic., and also under APPEAL. And the provincial Council of Seville (Hispal. II. A.D. 619, c. 6) endeavoured to restore the older practice also, and insist on the bishop acting ab initio with his council—"Solus honorem dare potest, auferre solus non potest." The rule however gradually came to be, that three bishops were required to degrade or try a deacon, six in the case of a priest, and twelve in that of a bishop. [See APPEAL.] The synod of the province indeed was alone the tribunal which could depose a bishop, and subsequently a priest also.

2. As to the crimes for which clergy were to be degraded, it may be taken for granted that they were liable to the penalty for all such immoral acts as would involve excommunication in the case of a layman. But in addition to these, there are special offences against clerical discipline to which various canons attached the like penalty, such as digamy, usury, having recourse to a secular tribunal, keeping hawks or hounds, meddling with secular business, frequenting taverns needlessly; besides such matters as more immediately related to their duties, as, e.g. altering the form of baptism, despising fasts and festivals, not rightly keeping Easter, &c. The 58th Apostolic Canon (al. 57) deposes for negligence in pastoral care, ἀσθενεία. See BISHOP, PRIEST, DEACON.

3. There must always have been some ceremonial in the infliction of such a sentence, although the elaborate details of later customs are not traceable in early times, and date in their formal fulness from the Roman Pontifical and from a Bull of Boniface VIII. Martene (De Rit. Ant. Eccl. lib. iii. c. 2) has collected what can be gathered of earlier practice. Liberatus' Breviarium supplies his earliest instance. The principle on which the later practice was formed was so natural in itself, that something of the kind no doubt was the rule from the first. Since the clerical office was conferred with the accompaniment of delivering to each order certain appropriate instruments, and with the adoption also of certain vestments, there could be no more effectual or natural symbol of the taking away of its office than the taking away of these appropriate instruments and vestments. In the case mentioned by Liberatus, accordingly, an archbishop is deprived by taking away his pail. The more elaborate and later ceremonial in the Pontifical and in Boniface's bull gives each separate article and then solemnly takes it away, with a form of words for each, and this either privately, "before the secular judge," or on some public and elevated stage; ending by scraping the thumb and hand of the degraded clerk, to signify the removal from him of unction and blessing. The Donatists it appears proceeded to shave his head bald also. That some words as well as acts were used from the beginning may likewise be taken for granted (see e.g. Socrates, H. E. i. 24, speaking of the deposition of Eustathius). Regular and minute ritual forms are of a late date. They may be found in Martene and in Böhmer, as quoted below.

4. After degradation, there still followed in stricter times, and for bad cases, confinement to a monastery and penance, as may be seen in e.g. Gregory the Great's letters; the clerk being still quasi subject to ecclesiastical law, although now a layman only.

DEICOLAE (compare COLIDEI). A name sometimes applied to monks, as in the Epistle of Martin of Braga to King Miro, in D'Achery's Spicilegium, iii. 312 (Ducange, s. v.). [C.]

DEI GRATIA. The bishops of the Church, regarding themselves as called to their office by the will of God, have from ancient times been in the habit of using formulae implying a divine call. Thus Pope Felix II. (A.D. 356) calls himself "per gratiam Dei episcopus" (Hardouin, Concilia, i. 757). Aurelius says that he holds his office "dignatione Dei" (C. Carth. iii. c. 45; A.D. 397). Other bishops used equivalent expressions, as "Dei" or "Christi nomine, miseratione, misericordia." The German bishops have used, from the 7th century onward, the form "Dei gratia," to which in later times some such phrase as "apostolicae sedis gratia" or "providentia" was added. Zallwein (Principia Juris Eccl. iv. 278) believes this addition not to be earlier than the middle of the thirteenth century, and Thomassin (Vetus et Nova Eccl. Discip. pt. i. bk. i. c. 60, § 10), will not allow that it was used in Germany before the beginning of the fifteenth; but the germ of it is certainly found in the writings of Boniface, the apostle of Germany, who styled himself "servus apostolicae sedis" (Hartzheim, Concilia Germaniae, i. 43).

A similar style was adopted by secular persons of exalted rank; thus Agilulf on his crown [CROWN, p. 508] is described as "Gratia Domini . . . Rex totius Italiae" (A.D. 591); and Rothar (A.D. 643), in his Edict for the Lombards (Walter, Corpus Juris Germanici, i. 683), speaks of himself as "in Dei nomine rex, anno, Deo propitiante, regni mei octavo." In England, Ethelbert of Kent, in a charter of the year 605, styles himself, "Aethilbertus Dei gratia Rex Anglorum" (Haddan and Stubbs, iii. 55), Ethelbald (A.D. 716) styles himself "divina dispensatione rex Merciorum" (Codex Dipl.). From the days of Pepin the form "Dei gratia" seems commonly to have been adopted by the Frankish kings. Charles the Great (A.D. 769) adopted the following style and title: "Carolus gratia Dei rex regnique Francorum rector et devotus sanctae ecclesiae defensor atque adiutor in omnibus apostolicae sedis" (Pertz, Monum. Germaniae, iii. 33). Selden, Titles of Honour, in Works, iii. 214; Allen, Royal Prerogative, p. 22, ed. 1849; Herzog, Real-Encyclopädie, iii. 312. [C.]

DEMON (IN ART). The evil spirit is always represented in early Christian art as the enemy and tempter of mankind under the form of the serpent, excepting in the Laurentian MS. [DEMONIAC] and in the singular diptych (in Gori, Thesaurus, t. iii. tab. viii.) which represents the cure of a demoniac. As Martigny observes, these cases are in all respects exceptional; but they are probably the earliest works of art in which the devil or any inferior evil spirit is represented in the human form. [But see DEVIL.] It might be expected that as the form of Job occurs frequently in early carvings and paintings (Bottari, tavv. xv. cv.; Perret, i. xxv. &c.) some representation of the evil one as an agent of torment might be found with him; but this seems not to be the case. The figure of the SERPENT (see s. v.) accompanies most representations of Adam and Eve in Bottari and elsewhere: his head is generally turned towards Eve. The first known instance of the human-headed serpent as tempter is found in the Catacomb of St. Agnes (Perret, ii. pl. xli.), if the painting be of the same date as the catacomb. This point involves great difficulties, which time and inquiry seem rather likely to aggravate than to diminish. For the Serpent threatening the Doves see DRAGON; and Gori, Thesaurus Diptych. iii. p. 160. [R. St. J. T.]

DEMONIACS. The Church inherited from both Jews and heathens the belief that demons, i.e. "unclean" or "evil" spirits, could take possession of the bodies and the souls of men, women, children, and subject them to a cruel bondage. The history of our Lord's miracles naturally tended to confirm and deepen the belief. Abnormal physical or mental states, which could not be otherwise explained, were referred to demoniacal possession as a sufficient cause. From one point of view, indeed, it was held as a dogma that every child born into the world was thus under the power of an evil spirit, of the chief of evil spirits, and from an early period a formula of exorcism was employed as a preliminary rite to baptism, and the work of catechist and exorcist was thus brought into close connection [BAPTISM; EXORCISM]. In the present article, however, it is proposed to deal only with those in whom the condition was more or less chronic, and who were brought therefore under a continuous course of treatment.

It is clear from the narratives of the New Testament, and from the records of the Church, that the class consisted chiefly though not exclusively of those who in our own time would be classified as insane. They were known as the δαιμονιζόμενοι, the N. T. name more frequently as the εμεγυμμένοι (emegymeni), men operated on, exercised by, unclean spirits, less frequently as χεμαζόμενοι (hyemantes)* or κλυδασιζόμενοι, those who are tossed to and fro by the storms and billows of uncontrollable impulse. The boundary-line between mental and moral disorder is at all times difficult to trace, and the name is at times extended, as by the Pseudo-Dionysius (de Eccles. Hierarch. iv. 3), to those who were the slaves of lust or other master-passions, probably to those in whom the moral evil assumed the character of a possession, overpowering the ordinary restraints of prudence and self-control. For the most part, however, the emegymeni, as demoniacs, may be identified with those who suffered from some form of insanity. The symptoms described by Cyprian, sleepless nights, panic fears, restless agitation (de Idol. Vanit. p. 239); the outward appearance of the demoniacs as portrayed by Chrysostom (Hom. IV. De incomprehens. Nat. Dei), squalid, foul, with hair dishevelled, and in rags, all point to the same conclusion. It is not within the scope of this article to discuss the theory which referred all these phenomena to an actual possession of the human nature by a malignant spiritual power. It is enough to say that it was postulated in the whole treatment of such cases by the Church. The suggestion of a more scientific view that the symptoms originated in excess of bile, or the inflammation of a tissue, or other physical cause, was rejected as the whisper of unbelief, itself the suggestion of the demons, who wished thus to deprive men of the prayers and incantations which were the only effectual weapons against them (Hom. Clem. ix. 12). Men dwelt with exultation on the power which their prayers, and the utterance of the Divine Name, and the laying on of hands, had to drive the demon howling and blaspheming from his usurped abode (Cyprian, de Idol. Vanit. l. c.; ad Demetr. c. 15). It might have seemed, looking at the matter from the modern, scientific stand-point, as if the Christian Church had itself got into a hopelessly wrong groove, from which no good results were to be expected, which tended to stereotype the delusions that fed the madness, and were utterly at variance with any rational treatment. It will be found, however, it is believed, that partly in spite of the theory, partly in consequence of it, the treatment of the insane in the early ages of the Church assumed before long a true therapeutic character, and brought them under influences which tended, in the natural course of things, to bring them to a sound mind. Cases of instantaneous expulsion of the demon, like those described by Cyprian, became less frequent; and, where the mastery of a strong will had for a time calmed a paroxysm of frenzy, were followed by a relapse. Putting aside the case of the symbolic or hypothetical exorcism which preceded baptism, we have to think of the emegymeni as brought, by virtue of the theory, within the range of sympathy and cure. Instead of being left, as in most eastern countries, to go wild, like the Gadarene and other demoniacs of the N. T., when the insanity was not dangerous, or to be brutally chained and fettered if it was, they were marked out as objects of pity and of special prayer (Const. Apost. viii. 7). They occupied a fixed place in the porch of the church, and so were brought within the soothing influence of psalms and hymns and words of comfort (Dionys. de Eccles. Hierarch. iv. 3). With them, as fellow-sufferers, might sometimes be found the lepers of the neighbourhood; sometimes also those whose loathsome depravity had made them defiled like the leper, and incapable of human society like the demoniacs (C. Ancyr. c. 17). When the prayer was over they were brought to receive the benediction of the bishop (Const. Apost. viii. 7). The church itself became a kind of home for those who otherwise would have been homeless. There the exorcists paid them a daily visit, and gave them food, and laid their hands upon them (4 C. Carth. c. 90, 92). There, if the nature of the case required it, they were brought under a discipline of abstinence that might subdue the impulses of passion (Hom. Clement. ix. 10). There they were employed in industrial tasks that were suited to their condition, such as sweeping the pavement of the church (4 C. Carth. c. 91) or lighting its lamps (C. Elib. c. 37).^b If they were in the status of catechumens they might be admitted to baptism at the hour of death, even though there had been no complete cure (Const. Apost. viii. 32; Cyprian, Epist. 76; 1 C. Aruensis. c. 15; C. Elib. c. 37). If they were already among the faithful they might even, if the insanity did not take a violent form, be admitted to communion (Cassian, Collat. vii. 30; Timothy, Alex. Respons. c. 3), and that daily. It is almost needless to say that they were excluded, even after recovery, from ordination. The exorcists were instructed to repeat their prayers and other forms of adjuration memoriter (Isidor. Hispal. Epist. ad Loudefred.). They were often identical with the catechists, and were therefore more or less experienced in the work of teaching (Balsamon on C. Laod. c. 26). The influences thus brought to bear upon the real or supposed demoniacs were, it is submitted, calculated to soothe and encourage, to bring them under the influence of sympathy. Even the ceremonial imposition of hands, over and above the sacramental associations connected with it, and their power to soothe the paroxysms of suicidal remorse, may have had what we have learnt to call a mesmeric effect, calming the over-excited brain, through the tones of pity, into something like tranquillity. It is not too much to claim for the Christian Church, whatever may be thought of its theory of madness, the credit of having taken some practical steps, and those steps the first, towards a rational treatment of the insane. Here, also, as in the institution of hospitals, love and pity were not without other fruits than those they sought for, and ministered to the attainment of a truth at which they did not aim. [K. H. of a representation of this miracle; it is one of the instances of single sufferers, perhaps that of the youth after the Transfiguration. The evil spirit issues in human form from the head of the possessed (Gori, Thes. Diptych. t. iii. tab. viii.).

* The word χεμαζόμενοι and its Latin equivalent are sometimes explained as pointing to the position which the demoniacs occupied in the outer porch of the church, exposed to the inclemency of cold or rain. The meaning given in the text rests, however, on better authority. Comp. Suicer, s. v. χεμαζόμενοι.

DENIS, COUNCIL OF ST. (ad S. Dionysium, near Paris), A.D. 788, was rather a national council of bishops and nobles, at which Pipin shortly before his death divided his kingdom between his sons Carl and Carloman (Labbe, vi. 1720, 1721.) [A. W. H.]

DENARIUS. [PETER'S PENCE.]

DENUNTIATIO MATRIMONII. [MARRIAGE.]

DEO DICATUS. One of the terms by which persons who devoted themselves to religion were designated. Thus Hatto or Alito, bishop of Basle (Capitulare, c. 16) forbade even Deo dicatus to meddle with the service of the altar [compare DEVOTA FEMINA]; and Lucifer of Cagliari, describing the conduct of his enemies, says (in the tract Moriendum esse, etc.) that they tortured and slew even dedicated persons (Deo dicatos). [C.]

DEO GRATIAS. τὸ θεῷ χάρις, "Thanks be to God!" A response of the people, frequently occurring in divine service from very ancient times, derived no doubt from the apostolic use of the phrase (1 Cor. xv. 57; 2 Cor. ii. 14). The best-known instance of its use is probably that in which it forms the response of the people to the Re, missa est of the priest at the end of the liturgy.

According to the Mozarabic rite the people said Deo gratias, "Thanks be to God," at the naming of the passage to be read as the "Prophecy" in the Liturgy. Bona mentions this phrase as being also occasionally used instead of Amen, or Laudis tibi Christe when the Gospel is read. CHRIST. ANT.

was ended (De Rob. Liturg. ii. vii. 4). St. Augustine notices it as a common mode of greeting among the monks in his time, for which they were ridiculed and insulted by the Agonistici, as they called themselves, among the Donatists (Aug. in Psalm. cxxxiii. p. 630). The expression appears to have been frequently used on other occasions by way of acclamation. When Evodius was nominated as Augustine's successor the people called out for a long time—"Deo gratias, Christo laudes" (Aug. Ep. 110, de Actis Evodii). [C.]

DEPORTATIO. One of the usages of the Gallican Church was that a bishop on his way to be enthroned was borne in a chair by the hands of his fellow-bishops. Thus Wilfrid of York, who was consecrated in Gaul, is said (Life by Eddius, c. 12) to have been borne to his throne by the hands of the bishops who were present, "more eorum," i.e. after the Gallican custom [BISHOP, p. 225]. Gregory of Tours perhaps alludes to this custom when he says (Hist. Franc. iii. 2) that the assembled bishops and people placed (locaverunt) Quintianus in the episcopal throne of Clermont. A "chairing" of the bishop on the shoulders of certain persons of rank, the first time he entered his cathedral, was customary in several of the French churches in the middle ages (Martene, De Ant. Eccl. Ritibus, l. viii. 10, § 19). [C.]

DEPOSITION. [DEGRADATION.]

DEPOSITION, IN HAGIOLOGY (Depositio). The word depositio is explained in the sermon of Maximus, De Depositione S. Eusebii (in the Works of Ambrose, ii. pt. 2, p. 469) to mean, not the day of burial, but that on which the soul lays down the burden of the flesh; and it is probably with this idea that it is used in calendars and martyrologies. For instance, in the Mart. Hieron. we have on March 21 "Depositio Benedicti Abbatis;" in the Mart. Bedae on the same day, "Natale Benedicti Abbatis," as if Depositio were exactly synonymous with Natale, which confessedly means the death-day of a saint.

Yet on July 11, the day on which the Translation of St. Benedict is placed by Bede and Ade, the Mart. Hieron. has again Depositio. We may infer that the word was at least occasionally used to designate the day on which the relics were entombed.

Papebroch, in his Conatus Chronologico-Histor. ad Catal. Pontiff. Roman. (Acta Sanctorum, May, vol. iv.), contends strongly that Depositio is used for the day of death; Elevatio, Cultus, or Translatio for that of burial.

In early calendars the word Depositio is said to be confined to bishops [CALENDAR, p. 258]. (Binterim's Denkwürdigkeiten, vi. pt. 8, p. 370 ff.) [C.]

DEPRECATORIAE. In an ancient codex quoted by Ducange (s. v.), litterae deprecatoriae are explained to be simple "letters of request" given by presbyters, who were unable to grant the formal "dimissory letters" (formatae) of bishops. [COMMENDATORY LETTERS: DIMISSORY LETTERS.] [C.]

ESERTION OF THE CLERICAL E. Several centuries elapse before we find tion of the clerical life recognized as an ce. The Council of Chalcedon in 451, enacts) that those who have once been received the clerus are not to desert it for any ary service or worldly dignity. The Council ngers in 453 declared (c. 7) that clerics who ng their order have turned away to secular are and to a lay life are not unjustly removed the church which they have left. The 1st cell of Tours, A.D. 461, has an equivalent ion expressed in somewhat clearer lan- (c. 5), specifically enacting excommunication for the offence. We have an instance of the practice by a Breton Council of uncertain date (supposed about 555), recorded by Gregory of Tours (Hist. Franc. ix. 15), in which a bishop, who let his hair grow and took back his wife, was excommunicated. Under Justinian's Code, by a constitution of that Emperor himself, A.D. 532, renewing and extending a previous one of Arcadius and Honorius, if a person deserted the clerical or monastic life for a military one (the term militia with its congeners, did not at this period imply necessarily the use of arms) he was punished by being made a curialis of the city of his birth, i.e. charged with all the burthens of the state. If there were already very many curiales in the city he was to be placed in any neighbouring or remote one, or even in any one of a different province which should happen to be in special want of these political beasts of burthen. If he hid himself, the curiales could at once enter upon his property and detain it to answer legal demands (bk. i. tit. iii. l. 53 § 1). If, on the other hand, a clerk or monk embraced an ordinary secular life, all his property passed to the church or monastery which he had deserted (Ibid. l. 56, § 2)—a provision confirmed as to monks by the 5th Novel, c. 4. The 6th Novel, which extends the prohibition to subdeacons and readers, transfers the benefit of the forfeiture, as respects clerics,—if indeed there be anything to forfeit,—to the curia, providing moreover that if the clerk in question be poor, he shall be reduced to an official condition, i.e. probably to that of a mere servant to the public offices (c. 7); and this forfeiture to the curia is confirmed by the 123rd Novel, c. 15. But as respects monks, the same Novel (c. 42) requires a monk who betakes himself to a secular life—being first deprived of any office or dignity he may acquire—to be sent to a monastery, to which moreover it assigns all property acquired by him after his leaving his former one. If he absconds from this, the judge of the province is to hold and admonish him.

In a letter of Pope Zacharias (A.D. 741–51) to king Pepin, the Pope decrees that those who have once been admitted into the clergy, or have desired monastic life, are not to betake themselves to military service, or to any worldly dignity (Ep. 7, c. 9), under pain of anathema if they do not repent and return to their former life—a provision substantially identical with that of the Councils of Angers and Tours. In Charlemagne's Capitularies also is a provision "that a priest ought to continue in the religious habit" (Additio Tertia, c. 110). See also the 31st canon of the Council of Frankfort in 794, "that clerics and monks should continue steadfast in their determination."

Desertion of the clerical life must of course be distinguished from desertion of the clerical functions in a particular diocese or parish. See, amongst other authorities, as to bishops leaving their districts (wapouilas), the so-called Apocritical Canons, c. 11 (otherwise 13 or 14), and the 123rd Novel; and as to presbyters, deacons, and other clerics so acting, Apost. C'm. c. 12 (otherwise 14 or 15); also the 16th Canon of the Council of Nicaea. One of the temptations to the breach of discipline in question appears to have been the serving in private oratories, as to which see Novels 57, 58, and 131. [J. M. L.]

DESIDERATA

DESIDERATA. A name sometimes used for the sacraments, as being desired of all Christians. Zeno of Verona (Invit. 8 ad Fontem, quoted by Ducange) asks why his hearers delay "ad desiderata festinare." [C.]

DESIDERIUS. (1) Bishop of Vienna, martyr at Lyons; Natale, Feb. 11 (Mart. Bedae, Adonis in Appendice, Usuardi). According to Ado he suffered martyrdom on May 23, and was translated Feb. 11.

(2) Bishop of Ferrara; "Passio" May 23 (Mart. Adonis, Usuardi).

(3) The reader, martyr at Naples under Diocletian, with Januarinus the bishop and others; commemorated Sept. 19 (Mart. Rom. Vet., Bedae, Adonis, Usuardi). [W. F. G.]

DESPONSATIO. [ARRHAE: BETROTHAL: MARRIAGE.]

DESPOTICAE (Δεσποτικά ἐπορά). The greater festivals of the Church are so called by the Greeks; they are generally reckoned to amount to twelve, but authorities vary on this point. [FESTIVAL.] (Daniel's Codex Liturgicus, iv. 235.) [C.]

DETRACTION is defined to be the concealed and unjust attack in words upon the reputation of another person. It differs from Calumnia in that the latter is a false accusation made in the course of legal proceedings, and from Contumelia in its being concealed from the person affected.

This sin has been condemned both by fathers, as by St. Augustine (in hom. 41 De Sanctis), St. Jerome (Ep. 2, al. 52, ad Nepotian. c. 14), and St. Chrysostom (De Sacerd. 5, 6), and by various canons of councils (e.g. Conc. Carth. iv. cc. 55-60) under wider words which include other offences against the 9th commandment (Bingham, Chr. Ant. 6, 2, 10, and 16, 13, 3; Ferraris sub voc.; Thom. Aq. Summa, 2. 2. quæst. 73; Soto De Just. et Jure, 5, 10). [I. B.]

DEUS IN ADJUTORIUM. The canonical Hours, according to Western usage, generally begin with the words of the 70th [69th Vulg.] Psalm.

V. Deus in adjutorium meum intende.

R. Domine ad adjuvandum me festina.

Cassian (Collatio, x. c. 10) tells us that this verse was frequently used by monks in their devotions before his time, but it does not appear that it was definitively prefixed to each Hour before the time of St. Benedict, who prescribed that use in his Rule (c. 9).

The Roman use at Matins prefixes the verse and response,

V. Domine, labia mea aperies.

R. Et os meum annuntiabit laudem tuam, from the 51st [50th Vulg.] Psalm; in the monastic breviaries, on the other hand, the Domine, labia follows the Deus in adjutorium.

In Compline, Deus in adjutorium is preceded by V. Converte nos, Deus salutaris noster.

R. Et averte iram tuam a nobis, from the 85th [84th Vulg.] Psalm.

The verse, "O Lord, open thou our lips," &c., also occurs in the early part of the Greek morning office.

DEVOTA FEM

DEVIL (IN ART). The to have contemplated the spirit and man principally as to his action and possession in this world. Representations of him as the final accuser and claimant of the souls of the lost, or as their tormentor in the place of his own condemnation, belong to mediæval rather than to primitive art. The present writer is not aware of the existence of any hell earlier than the mosaics of Torcello, as that painted by Methodius, even if its story be true, has altogether vanished. On the sarcophagi, and later in Anglo-Saxon and Irish MSS. more particularly, the tempter is symbolized, as so often in Holy Scripture, under the form of the SERPENT (see s. v.). One instance there is, however, given by Didron in the Iconographie du Serpent (Ann. Archeologiques, v. 2) of a Gnostic combination of human and serpent nine head and face (see woodcut from a bronze in the Vatican derived, he says with certain Egyptian symbol of a lion-h the human form and expressant as to make it appear that of the personified serpent represented in the Book of northern MSS. examples of St. Paul (Acts xviii. 23, 24), four disciples at Jerusalem (Acts xxi. 4) that like practices were adopted by the Catholic Church. But over and above temporary vows, it is clear that the church-widows were considered as perpetually devoted to God. Moreover, in his speaking of virgins, St. Paul clearly has in mind those who have authorized themselves to have power to "keep" them (see 1 Cor. vii. 34, 37, 38). The local Constitutions, besides their abundant examples of the church-widows, shew us also the existence of a distinct class of church-virgins to God in like manner. The term devota, as applied both to widows and virgins, in both organizations and spread beyond the limits of the Church, seems to serve as a transition link between them and female monachism. From the history downwards there are many texts which can hardly be applied, at all events exactly, to either institute as such, and antedate organized female monachism, but which imply a practice of self-consecration to the part both of widows and unmarried girls, and which serve as the foundation of the practice of the Church in later times in respect to the first Council of Valence, A.D. 374, which "of girls who have devoted themselves to marriage, they shall not even be allowed immediate penance, and shall not be admitted to communion till they have given full satisfaction. Now it was only in the 5th century monachism, under the Basilian rule, penetrated into Southern Gaul, so that the puellae in question cannot have been nuns properly so called. It applies to the canons of the 1st Council of Arles, A.D. 400, which enact that a "devota" who has a husband is not to be admitted to communion during his life, unless she preserves continence (c. 16), or, with still greater severity, if she is a bishop's, or priest's, or deacon's daughter, who, being devoted to God, sins and marries, her father or mother restore their affection to her, they are to be excluded from communion. The father may indeed shew cause in appeal against the sentence, but the woman herself is only to receive the communion after her husband's death and penance, unless at her last will (c. 19)—a text which indeed admits the validity of the marriage.

A stamp was set on the woman's devotio by her taking, or rather receiving from the hands of Christ, the veil, symbol of her being devoted to Christ. Hence the distinction we find made between the gravity of marriage and the ease of the veiled and unveiled; as we see in Pope Innocent I.'s 2nd letter, to the Archbishop of Rouen, cc. 12, 13, and the canons of doubtful authority, supposed contemporaneous "of the Roman to the Gallican," cc. 1, 2. The devotional or virginal habit might indeed be assumed, at all events in the 5th century, without actual consecration; as we see in the 167th letter, A.D. 458 or 459, of Rusticus Bishop of Narbonne, c. 15.

"virgin devoted to God" is assimilated to monk in a canon of the Council of Chalcedon, A.D. 451, forbidding both to marry under excommunication, but subject to the indulgence of the local bishop (c. 15). The 2nd Council of Arles, A.D. 452, seems to confine excommunication in such cases to marriage after 25, and provides that a penance is not to be refused if asked for, but communion only to be granted after long delay (c. 52). An exaggerated strictness on the other hand pervades a letter of Pope Symmachus (A.D. 488-513) to Bishop Caesarius, of Arles. Not only does he require the excommunication of those who have sought to marry virgins consecrated to God, whether with their own will or against it, and declare that "we do not suffer" widows to marry who have long persevered in the religious purpose; but he forbids those virgins to marry "to whom it may have happened to pass their age during many years in monasteries"—enforcing, in short, virginity without even a profession.

The practice of the religious profession, both in convents and outside of them, is shewn in the Canons of the 5th Council of Orleans, A.D. 529, which excommunicates alike, together with their husbands, both girls who in convents have put on the religious garment, and those who, whether girls or widows, have assumed the habit in their houses (c. 19). On the other hand, the 1st Council of Macon in 581 pronounced excommunication for life against both parties, in case of such marriages.

Towards the end of the 6th or beginning of the 7th century, in the letters of Pope Gregory the Great (A.D. 590-603), we seem to perceive a distinction between the "religious" and "monastic" habit, which may have indicated that between the simple devota and the nun. Writing to the Roman exarch (bk. iv. ep. 18), he speaks of women till now "in the religious and monastic habit" who have thrown off the sacred garment and veil, and married, and who are said to be under the exarch's patronage, and warns him against the iniquity of such protection. It will not have escaped attention that the "veil" in this passage seems to correspond, as in later and present Romish practice, with the specially monastic profession. On the other hand, an earlier letter of the same pope (bk. iii. ep. 24, ad Cumanium), distinguishes between veiled virgins and women in convents. The incompatibility between marriage and the religious "habit" is indicated in another letter of the same pope to bishops Virgilius and Syagrius, (bk. vii. pt. ii. c. 119).

That in spite of all prohibitions, marriages with "religious" women continued to take place, and to be celebrated even in church, is evident from an edict of King Clothair II., issued at the 5th Council of Paris, A.D. 614 or 615. No one was to carry off religious girls or widows, who have devoted themselves to God, as well those who reside in their own houses as those who are placed in monasteries (thus clearly distinguishing between the two classes); and if any, either by violence or by any kind of authority should presume to unite such to himself in marriage, he was subject to capital punishment, or, under special circumstances to exile, and forfeiture of goods.

The 7th letter of Pope Zacharias (A.D. 741-751), addressed to Pepin as mayor of the palace, and to the bishops, abbots, and nobles of the Franks, refers to Pope Innocent's letter before mentioned, as to the distinction between the marriage of veiled and unveiled virgins, the former of whom are to be separated, the latter only to do "some" penance (cc. 20, 21). On the other hand, a capitulary of the 6th book (c. 411) treats as absolutely null a marriage with "a virgin devoted to God, a woman under the religious habit or professing the continuance of widowhood," re-enacting the punishment of separation and exile for the offenders. One of the 7th book (c. 338) is addressed to the case of those widows and girls who have put on the religious habit in their own houses, either receiving it from their parents or of themselves, but afterwards marry; they are to be excommunicated till they separate from their husbands, and if they will not, to be kept perpetually excluded from communion. A Lombard capitulary of 783, contains a like enactment (Pertz, Leg. t. 1). [J. M. L.]

DEXAMENE, Δεξαμένη, a cistern or tank for the water needed for the replenishing of the font and the various ecclesiastical offices (Procop. Histor. Arcan. c. iii.). Erroneously interpreted by Suidas, sub voc. of the altar; and by Bingham, Orig. bk. viii. c. vii. § 4, of the font. [E. V.]

DIACONIA. (1). The name given to the localities in which food and alms were distributed to the poor by the deacons of the Church of Rome. Each was under the administration of one of the seven deacons, one for each region, the whole being under the superintendence of an archdeacon. Each diaconia had a hall for the distribution of charity, and an oratory or chapel annexed. These last remained when the original purpose of the diaconia had passed away, and have risen to the dignity of churches, of which there are now fourteen, each assigned to one of the cardinal deacons.

The original purpose of the diaconia is illustrated by the following passages from Anastasius:—Stephan. II. § 229: "foris muros . . . duo fecit Xenodochia . . . quae et sociavit venerabilibus Diaconis illic foris existentibus . . . id est Diaconiae S. Dei genetricis, et B. Silvestri duae." Hadrian. I. § 337: "constituit Diaconias tres foris portam B. Apost. Principis . . . et ibidem dispensatione per ordinem pauperibus consolari, atque eleemosynam fieri [constituit]." Infra, § 345: "idem egregius Praesul Diaconia constituit . . . concedens eis agros vineas etc. ut de eorum redditu . . . Diaconiae proficientes pauperes Christi reficerentur."

(2). The word diaconia was also used for that part of the deacon's office which consisted in dispensing food and money to the poor. It is thus employed by Gregory the Great in a letter to John, in which he says, "te mensis pauperum et exhibendae diaconiae eligimus praeponendum;" and goes on to speak of the money received "diaconiae exhibitione erogandum" (Greg. Magn. Ep. ad Joann. 24). See Suicer, Ducange, Hospinian. de Templis, p. 18. [E. V.]

(3). In the earlier days of monachism this term was used for monastic alms-giving (Cass. Collat. xviii. 7; Gregor. M. Ep. 22). The oldest monk was entrusted with it in Egypt (Cass. Collat. xxi. 1); in the East the "oconomus" or bursar (Martene in Cass. ib. xxi. 8, 9). [I. G. S.]

DIACONICA (Διακονικά). Certain short prayers or "suffrages" in the Liturgy are called Diaconica, as being recited by the attendant deacon. They are also called Εἰρηνικά, as being mainly prayers for peace. In the consecration of a bishop the Diaconica are said by bishops. (Ménard on the Gregorian Sacramentary, p. 523; Neale's Tetralogia Liturgica, p. 217.) [C.]

DIACONICUM. (1) The vestry or sacristy of a church, so called from being the place where the deacons performed their duties in getting ready the vestments and holy vessels, heating the water, preparing and lighting the incense, and other essentials for the celebration of the Eucharist, and other divine offices. No minister of a lower grade was permitted to enter the Diaconicum (Concil. Laod. can. 21; Concil. Agathens. can. 66). The diaconicum was, as a rule, placed on the right or south side of the bema or sanctuary, answering to the prothesis on the north, and communicating with the bema by a door in the parabema or side-wall. It also usually had an independent entrance through an external door. The diaconicum generally terminated apsidally, and was always provided with an altar (Θυσιαστήριον, Apophthegmata Patrum apud Gelas. No. 3; ἁγία τραπέζα, Eucholog. Goar, p. 245), on which the bread and wine were placed prior to their removal to the prothesis. Its wall was often adorned with pictures of saintly deacons, Stephen, Benjamin, &c. Within it was the treasury, κειμηλιαρχεῖον, or σκευοφυλάκιον, where the sacred vessels and other treasures of the church were kept (Cyril Scyth. in Vita S. Sab. apud Ducange). It was also used by the priests as a vestry, in which they changed their vestments and put on their eucharistic dress (εἰσελθόντες ἀλλάσσουν τὴν ἱερατικὴν στολὴν ἐν τῷ διακονικῷ, Typicon Sabae, cap. ii. ap. Suicer). Relics were preserved in it (Catalog. Patriarch. Constantinopol. ap. Suicer). Worshippers who for disciplinary reasons were excluded from the actual church were permitted to offer their devotions here, e.g. the Emperor Leo VI. when excommunicated for his fourth marriage (Cedrenus, Compend. Hist.). The diaconicum was sometimes a spacious chamber annexed to the church (diaconicum majus), large enough for the reception of a provincial or general synod [COUNCIL, p. 477]. In the diaconicum of the church at Paneas, the statue, supposed to be that of the woman with the issue of blood, removed for safety from the market-place, was erected (Philostorg. lib. vii. c. 3).

Other names by which the diaconicum was known were, ἀσπαστικόν (as being the hall of reception), σκευοφυλάκιον, μετατόριον or μυτατόριον (a word of various orthography and very uncertain etymology, perhaps representing "mutatorium," as the place where the clergy changed their vestments), παστοφόριον, secretarium, on which see Bingham, Orig. Eccl. bk. viii. c. vii. § 7; Leo Allat. De Templ. Graec. Rec., ep. i. § 13-15; Suicer, sub voc.; Ducange, Glossar. Id. Descript. S. Sophiae, ad Paul. Silentiar.; Neale, Hist. East. Ch., General Introd. p. 191, § 9.

(2) Diaconicum also signifies the volume containing the directions for the due performance of the deacon's office, βιβλίον τῆς Διακονίας. Cf. Leo Allatius, Dissert. i. de Libr. Eccl. Graecor.

(3) The word is also used for certain prayers said at intervals in the service by the deacon: εὐχαὶ διακόνου, known also as εἰρηνικά. [DIACONICA.] [E. V.]

DIADEMA. [CROWN: CORONATION.]

ASON, DIAPENTE, DIATESSA- These are the three intervals of the perfect fifth, and the perfect fourth; which determine them are $\frac{1}{2}$, $\frac{2}{3}$ and $\frac{3}{4}$. These are the only intervals that were consonances, and were always of the same in every scale whether diatonic, chromatic or enharmonic, while the others were (see CANON IN MUSIC, p. 274). Although the use of reckoning by tetrachords continued the time of Guido Aretinus, yet the name shows that the ancients attributed to it a greater degree of perfection in consonance, which is also shown by the name preserved by Alypius, where in the mode the Dorian in pitch, for most of the notes (which would be the latest extension of the respective scales) the symbols represent notes an octave below were adopted, the addition of a acute accent. It is strange that the plan was not extended over the whole of the modes, which would have effected a material simplification, and is indeed a considerable approximation to our present method of calling all notes differing by an octave the same name. This however appears to have been the notice of the early Latin authors, for they did make great simplifications, and they completed the recognition of the system by reducing the names of notes to 7, which have remained to this day. The fifth and fourth together make an octave, and according as the former or the latter is the lower in pitch, the octave was said to be harmonically or arithmetically divided; visions were also called authentic and $\frac{1}{2}$ v.), thus:

a:  Here the value of G ($\frac{2}{3}$) is the Harmonic between those of C and c (1 and $\frac{1}{2}$).

 Here the value of F ($\frac{3}{4}$) is the Arithmetic between those of C and c (1 and $\frac{1}{2}$).

It is worth noticing that if two harmonic intervals are inserted between C and c, F is one of which would point to the conclusion that the ancients were wrong in taking an arithmetic division at all, though it is most natural that error should have been made by them. Division can be made in any octave, except that from F to f can only be divided equally at c, and that from B to b can be divided plagally at E. [J. R. L.]

ENTE. [DIAPASON.]

SALMA. This is the word used in the Septuagint and recognized by other writers as equivalent to "Selah," which occurs in the Psalms and in the Canticle of Habakkuk. The Septuagint's Dict. of the Bible, sub voc. Selah, he observes of the subject is fully ascertained. As the early Christians used the psalms in their worship so it is natural they would have used the Hebrew method of singing the psalms. The Septuagint of St. James prescribes Pss. 23, 34, 42, 43, 44, 45, 46, 47, 48, 49, 50, 51, 52, 53, 54, 55, 56, 57, 58, 59, 60, 61, 62, 63, 64, 65, 66, 67, 68, 69, 70, 71, 72, 73, 74, 75, 76, 77, 78, 79, 80, 81, 82, 83, 84, 85, 86, 87, 88, 89, 90, 91, 92, 93, 94, 95, 96, 97, 98, 99, 100, 101, 102, 103, 104, 105, 106, 107, 108, 109, 110, 111, 112, 113, 114, 115, 116, 117, 118, 119, 120, 121, 122, 123, 124, 125, 126, 127, 128, 129, 130, 131, 132, 133, 134, 135, 136, 137, 138, 139, 140, 141, 142, 143, 144, 145, 146, 147, 148, 149, 150, 151, 152, 153, 154, 155, 156, 157, 158, 159, 160, 161, 162, 163, 164, 165, 166, 167, 168, 169, 170, 171, 172, 173, 174, 175, 176, 177, 178, 179, 180, 181, 182, 183, 184, 185, 186, 187, 188, 189, 190, 191, 192, 193, 194, 195, 196, 197, 198, 199, 200, 201, 202, 203, 204, 205, 206, 207, 208, 209, 210, 211, 212, 213, 214, 215, 216, 217, 218, 219, 220, 221, 222, 223, 224, 225, 226, 227, 228, 229, 230, 231, 232, 233, 234, 235, 236, 237, 238, 239, 240, 241, 242, 243, 244, 245, 246, 247, 248, 249, 250, 251, 252, 253, 254, 255, 256, 257, 258, 259, 260, 261, 262, 263, 264, 265, 266, 267, 268, 269, 270, 271, 272, 273, 274, 275, 276, 277, 278, 279, 280, 281, 282, 283, 284, 285, 286, 287, 288, 289, 290, 291, 292, 293, 294, 295, 296, 297, 298, 299, 300, 301, 302, 303, 304, 305, 306, 307, 308, 309, 310, 311, 312, 313, 314, 315, 316, 317, 318, 319, 320, 321, 322, 323, 324, 325, 326, 327, 328, 329, 330, 331, 332, 333, 334, 335, 336, 337, 338, 339, 340, 341, 342, 343, 344, 345, 346, 347, 348, 349, 350, 351, 352, 353, 354, 355, 356, 357, 358, 359, 360, 361, 362, 363, 364, 365, 366, 367, 368, 369, 370, 371, 372, 373, 374, 375, 376, 377, 378, 379, 380, 381, 382, 383, 384, 385, 386, 387, 388, 389, 390, 391, 392, 393, 394, 395, 396, 397, 398, 399, 400, 401, 402, 403, 404, 405, 406, 407, 408, 409, 410, 411, 412, 413, 414, 415, 416, 417, 418, 419, 420, 421, 422, 423, 424, 425, 426, 427, 428, 429, 430, 431, 432, 433, 434, 435, 436, 437, 438, 439, 440, 441, 442, 443, 444, 445, 446, 447, 448, 449, 450, 451, 452, 453, 454, 455, 456, 457, 458, 459, 460, 461, 462, 463, 464, 465, 466, 467, 468, 469, 470, 471, 472, 473, 474, 475, 476, 477, 478, 479, 480, 481, 482, 483, 484, 485, 486, 487, 488, 489, 490, 491, 492, 493, 494, 495, 496, 497, 498, 499, 500, 501, 502, 503, 504, 505, 506, 507, 508, 509, 510, 511, 512, 513, 514, 515, 516, 517, 518, 519, 520, 521, 522, 523, 524, 525, 526, 527, 528, 529, 530, 531, 532, 533, 534, 535, 536, 537, 538, 539, 540, 541, 542, 543, 544, 545, 546, 547, 548, 549, 550, 551, 552, 553, 554, 555, 556, 557, 558, 559, 560, 561, 562, 563, 564, 565, 566, 567, 568, 569, 570, 571, 572, 573, 574, 575, 576, 577, 578, 579, 580, 581, 582, 583, 584, 585, 586, 587, 588, 589, 590, 591, 592, 593, 594, 595, 596, 597, 598, 599, 600, 601, 602, 603, 604, 605, 606, 607, 608, 609, 610, 611, 612, 613, 614, 615, 616, 617, 618, 619, 620, 621, 622, 623, 624, 625, 626, 627, 628, 629, 630, 631, 632, 633, 634, 635, 636, 637, 638, 639, 640, 641, 642, 643, 644, 645, 646, 647, 648, 649, 650, 651, 652, 653, 654, 655, 656, 657, 658, 659, 660, 661, 662, 663, 664, 665, 666, 667, 668, 669, 670, 671, 672, 673, 674, 675, 676, 677, 678, 679, 680, 681, 682, 683, 684, 685, 686, 687, 688, 689, 690, 691, 692, 693, 694, 695, 696, 697, 698, 699, 700, 701, 702, 703, 704, 705, 706, 707, 708, 709, 710, 711, 712, 713, 714, 715, 716, 717, 718, 719, 720, 721, 722, 723, 724, 725, 726, 727, 728, 729, 730, 731, 732, 733, 734, 735, 736, 737, 738, 739, 740, 741, 742, 743, 744, 745, 746, 747, 748, 749, 750, 751, 752, 753, 754, 755, 756, 757, 758, 759, 760, 761, 762, 763, 764, 765, 766, 767, 768, 769, 770, 771, 772, 773, 774, 775, 776, 777, 778, 779, 780, 781, 782, 783, 784, 785, 786, 787, 788, 789, 790, 791, 792, 793, 794, 795, 796, 797, 798, 799, 800, 801, 802, 803, 804, 805, 806, 807, 808, 809, 810, 811, 812, 813, 814, 815, 816, 817, 818, 819, 820, 821, 822, 823, 824, 825, 826, 827, 828, 829, 830, 831, 832, 833, 834, 835, 836, 837, 838, 839, 840, 841, 842, 843, 844, 845, 846, 847, 848, 849, 850, 851, 852, 853, 854, 855, 856, 857, 858, 859, 860, 861, 862, 863, 864, 865, 866, 867, 868, 869, 870, 871, 872, 873, 874, 875, 876, 877, 878, 879, 880, 881, 882, 883, 884, 885, 886, 887, 888, 889, 890, 891, 892, 893, 894, 895, 896, 897, 898, 899, 900, 901, 902, 903, 904, 905, 906, 907, 908, 909, 910, 911, 912, 913, 914, 915, 916, 917, 918, 919, 920, 921, 922, 923, 924, 925, 926, 927, 928, 929, 930, 931, 932, 933, 934, 935, 936, 937, 938, 939, 940, 941, 942, 943, 944, 945, 946, 947, 948, 949, 950, 951, 952, 953, 954, 955, 956, 957, 958, 959, 960, 961, 962, 963, 964, 965, 966, 967, 968, 969, 970, 971, 972, 973, 974, 975, 976, 977, 978, 979, 980, 981, 982, 983, 984, 985, 986, 987, 988, 989, 990, 991, 992, 993, 994, 995, 996, 997, 998, 999, 1000.

DICE

St. Jerome enters into the question at some length in his letter to Marcella, but leaves the matter in doubt; he mentions it also in his commentary on Ps. 4 and Habak. 3.

It appears to the writer that an interpretation suggested by the primary meaning of $\phi\alpha\lambda\lambda\omega$ will nearly, if not quite, reconcile the conflicting opinions and perhaps account for them; viz., that it was a direction for the instruments to play, while the chorus was silent or perhaps producing a series of notes without words, i.e., a "division,"^a or "Pneuma." It has been said that the Jews used Pneumata; if so, the adoption of them by Christians is obvious; but in any case it would seem that they were commonly in use at an early period. In consequence of the common use of various musical instruments at feasts and entertainments at which Christian morality was likely to be outraged in the period of the empire, the Christians were chary of their use in religious services, fearful doubtless of the association of ideas. Sir John Hawkins (Hist. of Music, p. xxvii.) gives a list of fathers who have denounced musical instruments, but he gives no references; and the writer has succeeded in verifying Epiphanius only, who speaks of the flute as a diabolical instrument. In the Eastern Church to this day instrumental music is, we believe, unknown. Thus the Pneuma may have been invented by the early Christians as the nearest approximation to the Diapsalma. [J. R. L.]

DIABETOR. The Codex Eccl. Afric. (c. 78) runs thus (Bruns's Canones, i. 175): "Rursus placuit, ut quoniam Hipponensium diabetorum ecclesie destitutio non est diutius negligenda . . . eis episcopus ordinetur." The equivalent in the Greek version is " $\phi\alpha\lambda\lambda\omega$ τῆς ἐκκλησίας," "caretakers of the church" [INTERVENTOR], as if during a vacancy of the see, which is implied in the concluding words of the canon. Ducange (s. v.) conjectures "directorum," Hardouin "diarrhytorum." The word does not seem to occur elsewhere. [C.]

DIASTYLA, Διάστημα, the CANCELLI by which the beta was separated from the noos (Sym. Thessalon. apud Ducange; $\delta\iota\alpha\ \tau\omega\nu\ \kappa\epsilon\gamma\alpha\lambda\iota\sigma\mu\omega\nu\ \eta\tau\omega\iota\ \tau\omega\nu\ \delta\iota\alpha\sigma\tau\acute{\eta}\mu\alpha\tau\omega\nu$). DIATESSARON. [DIAPASON.]

DICE (Alca, κύβηαι; Low-Latin, Decius; whence Fr. De). The playing at dice, or games of chance generally, never looked upon favourably by moralists or laws (see Dict. of Greek and Rom. Antiq., s. v. ALCA), early attracted the notice of the censors of Christian manners. The Paedagogus of Clement (iii. 11, p. 497) forbids dice-playing, whether with cubes or with the four-faced dies called $\delta\sigma\tau\acute{\rho}\eta\gamma\alpha\lambda\omega$ (see Rost u. Palm, s. v.), out of desire for gain. Apollonius (in Euseb. H. E. v. 18, 11), denouncing the Montanists, asks whether prophets play at tables ($\tau\acute{\alpha}\beta\lambda\alpha\iota\varsigma$) and dice. And gaming is one of the forms of vice which we find denounced by the Church in the earliest canons which remain to us. The Apostolical Canons (cc. 41, 42 [al. 42, 43]) forbade either clergy or laity to play with dice on pain of degradation or excommunication. The Council of Eliberis (A.D. 305) also denounced the penalty of excommunication against any of the faithful who played at dice, "that is, tables," for money (can. 79). And at the end of the 7th century the Trullan Council (can. 50) repeated the same penalties of degradation and excommunication. Nor was the civil power indifferent. Justinian (Code, lib. i., De Episc. et Cler. l. 17; Nov. 123, c. 10) forbade the clergy of every rank from playing at games of chance (ad tabulas ludere), or even being present at them, on pain of suspension with seclusion in a monastery for three years. Another enactment (Code, lib. i., De Episc. Audien. l. 25) commits the investigation of such offences to the bishops, and empowers them to call in the secular arm, if necessary, for the reformation of scandalous offenders; and yet another (Ib. l. 35), complaining bitterly that even bishops did not abstain from these stolen pleasures, denounces such laxity in the severest terms. These imperial laws are all inserted in the Nomocanon of Photius and John of Antioch.

The laws themselves indicate that Christians and even clergy were by no means exempt from the almost universal passion for games of chance. One or two instances may serve to confirm this. Jerome relates (De Script. Eccl. in Apol. Ep. 105) that Synesius alleged his own irresistible propensity for gambling as a reason why he should not be made a bishop. Gregory of Tours (Hist. Franc. x. 16) tells us that certain nuns of the convent of St. Radegund at Poitiers accused their abbess, among other matters, of dicing; whereupon the abbess declared that she had done the same thing in the lifetime of St. Radegund († 587) herself, and that it was not forbidden either by the common law of canonical life or by their own Rule; nevertheless, she would submit to the judgment of the bishops. (Thomassinus, Nora et Vet. Eccl. Discip. pt. iii. lib. iii. c. 43.) [C.]

DICIERIUM. Διχρίσιον, cereus bisulcus, a two-forked wax taper used by bishops of the Greek Church in the Benediction of the people. It was also employed in the benediction of the Book of the Gospels lying on the Holy Table. The bishop was said διχρήσιον σφραγίζειν. The double taper was considered to symbolize the two natures of Christ.

Tricerium, Τριχρίσιον, cereus trisulcus, was similarly used, and held to symbolize the Trinity.

DICTERIUM. [PULFIR.]

DIDYMUS, martyr at Alexandria; commemorated April 28 (Mart. Rom. Vet., Adonis, Usuardi). (W. F. G.)

DIES. The word dies is used, like the English "day," to designate a festival: as (e. g.) the Annales Franc. A.D. 802, "Ipse rex celebravit diem S. Joannis Baptistae." The principal special uses of the word are the following:—

1. Dies adoratus, GOOD FRIDAY.

2. Dies Aegyptiaci. Certain "unlucky days" once marked in calendars (see the ancient calendars published by Bucher), supposed to have been discovered by the ancient Egyptians from astrological calculations. Decrees were made against the superstitious observance of these days (Decret. pt. 2, caus. 26, qu. 7, c. 16), and ancient Penitentials (see Ducange, s. v.) forbid men to avoid these days especially for blood-letting or commencing a work; indeed the superstitious preference for, or avoidance of, a day (Decret. u. s. c. 17) was forbidden generally. A memorial verse for showing when the Egyptian days fall is given by Durandus (Rationale, viii. 4, § 20).

3. Dies boni, "les bons jours," used for festivals (Sidonius, Epist. v. 17).

4. Dies Cinerum, the first day of LENT, or Ash-Wednesday.

5. Dies Coenae Domini. MAUNDY THURSDAY.

6. Dies Consecrati. The Capitularium Car. M., (ii. c. 35), enjoins that four days at Christmas should be observed as festivals; these days are referred to in the council of Soissons, A.D. 853, c. 7, and in the Capit. Car. Calvi at Compiègne, A.D. 868, c. 8, as dies consecrati, on which no courts were to be held.

7. Dies Dominica. [EASTER; LORD'S DAY.]

8. Dies Magnus, Felicissimus, EASTER-DAY (Capitularium Car. M. v. c. 136); "dies magnus Coenae," Maundy Thursday (Capit. Herardi, c. 14). So ἡ μεγὰλὴ ἡμέρα (Conc. Ancyr. c. 6) is used for Easter-Day. "Dies magnus" is also used for the Last Day (Capit. Car. M. vi. c. 378).

9. Dies Natalis. [NATALIS.]

10. Dies Neophytorum, the eight days, from Easter-Day to its octave, during which the newly baptised wore their white garments. Augustine (Epist. 119, c. 17) speaks of the "octo dies neophytorum" as days of special observance.

11. Dies Palmarum, or in Ramis Palmarum, PALM-SUNDAY.

12. Dies Sancti, the forty days of LENT. See the Theodosian Code, lib. ii. De Feriis, and Baronius, ad an. 519, § 42.

13. Dies Scrutini, the days on which candidates for baptism were examined, especially Wednesday in the fourth week of Lent.

14. Dies Solis, Dies Lunae, and the other days of the week; see WEEK.

15. Dies tinearum or murium; certain days on which ceremonies were performed to avert the ravages of moths or mice (Audoenus, Vita Eligii, ii. 15). See Delrio, Disquis. Magic. lib. iii. pt. 2, qu. 4, § 6.

16. Dies Viridum, in some ancient German calendars, Thursday in Holy Week, "Gründonnerstag." [MAUNDY THURSDAY.]

17. Dies rotorum, a wedding-day; Leges Longobard. lib. ii. tit. 4, § 3. [C.]

DIETA. The ecclesiastical CURSUS or daily office. Victor of Paris (MS. Liber Ordinis, c. 27, quoted by Ducange) orders his book to be carried round whenever office is said (quando dieta cantatur). See Belet, De Div. Off. c. 21; Durandus, Rationale, v. 3, 29. [C.]

DIGAMY. It has been stated under the head BIGAMY that we propose to consider under the present head whatever concerns the entering into marriage relations with two persons successively. The subject is one in respect to which a different morality has been applied to the clergy and laity. As respects each class moreover, it divides itself under two branches—which, however, it will not always be necessary to consider separately—that of successive marriages after divorce or ion, and after the death of a husband or respect of the clergy, it has been already under the head BIGAMY that the premisses as to bishops and deacons in 1 Tim. iii. and Tit. i. 6, requiring them to be husbands of one wife, apply more probably to successive than simultaneous marriages. The explanation seems to lie in those enactments in the Pentateuch (Levit. xxi. 7, 13, 14), which forbid the priest to marry a widow or divorced woman. The oldest authorities support this view. The Apostolical Constitutions (ii. 2) require the bishop to be the husband of a single woman once only; a prescription extended by a constitution of later date (vi. 17) to bishops, deacons, and even singers, readers, and exorcists; the deaconesses also were to be pure, or at least widows of one husband (as to see also viii. 25, no doubt later still). The so-called Apostolical Canons in like manner forbid that if any one after baptism shall twice marry, or marry a widow or divorced woman, he cannot be a bishop, priest, or deacon, nor be on the list of the sacred ministry (c. 14, otherwise 16, 17, or 17, 18). It is from the Philosophumena of Hippolytus that by the beginning of the 3rd century a rule of monogamy for the clergy was well established, since he complains that in the days of the "digamist and trigamist bishops, and deacons, began to be admitted into the clergy." Tertullian recognizes the rule as binding. Thus in his De Exhortatione Castitatis (7), he asks scornfully: "Being a digamist thou baptize? being a digamist, dost thou make the offering?" And he points to the certain honours paid among the heathens to monogamy.

The rule of the Church, it will be observed, is alike to the clergy both personal digamy, marriage with a digamous woman. St. Ambrose in the first book of his Offices (c. 50), further states the case of prebaptismal marriage, persons, it seems, being surprised that before marriage should be an impediment.

As from the testimony of the fathers to councils and popes. The so-called canons of the Nicene Council from the Arabic—which indeed only represent the state of the Church of Arabia at a much later period—enact anathematization of deposition against a priest or deacon who, after dismissing his wife in order to change her for a fairer or better or richer, or "on account of his concupiscence" (c. 66, or 71 of the Nellensian version). The still more precise "Sanctions and Decrees" attributed to the fathers require, in accordance with the existing laws of the Church, the candidate to be "the husband of one wife, not a bigamist or trigamist," and forbid him to marry a divorced or dismissed woman, &c. (c. 14).

The 1st Council of Valence (A.D. 374) enacts that one after this synod . . . be ordained to the clergy from among digamists, or the husbands of previously married women (internupti) but decrees that nothing should be inserted as to the status of those who are ordained (c. 1). Compare the 4th Council of Carthage (A.D. 397), c. 68, and the 1st of Toledo (A.D. 400), cc. 3 and 4.

DIGAMY

The letters of pope Innocent I. (A.D. 402-17) deal frequently with the subject, and more than once on the point already treated by St. Ambrose of the effect of prebaptismal marriage. In his 2nd to Victorinus bishop of Rouen, besides laying it down that clerics should only marry virgins (c. 4), he dwells on the absurdity of not reckoning a wife married before baptism (c. 6). The 23rd letter of the same pope, addressed to the Synod of Toledo, reverts a third time to the error of not reckoning in cases of digamy a prebaptismal marriage.

The letters of Leo the Great (A.D. 440-61) repeatedly recur to the subject. See the 4th, 5th, and 6th.

Second marriages were, however, still allowed to the inferior clergy. Thus the 25th canon of the 1st Council of Orange, A.D. 441, ordained respecting "those fit and approved persons whom the grace itself of their life counsels to be joined to the clergy, if by chance they have fallen into second marriage, that they should not receive ecclesiastical dignities beyond the subdiaconate." The same enactment is repeated almost in the same words in the 45th canon of the 2nd Council of Arles, A.D. 452. In some dioceses, however, the rule was still stricter, if full faith is to be given to a letter of bishops Leup of Troyes and Euphronius of Autun to bishop Talasius of Angers (A.D. 453), which lays it down that the Church allows digamy as far as the rank of porters, but excludes altogether exorcists and subdeacons from second marriage, whilst in the diocese of Autun the porter himself, the lowest of the inferior clergy, if he took a second wife lost his office, and, as well as a subdeacon or exorcist falling into the same "madness," was excluded from communion (see Labbé and Mansi's Concilia, vol. vii. p. 942). As respects marriages to widows, we must not overlook a Council of uncertain place, of the year 442-4, by which a bishop named Chelidonius was deposed, amongst other reasons, for having contracted such a marriage; though he was afterwards absolved by Pope Leo. See further, against the 2nd marriages of the clergy or other marriages to widows or divorced women, the 4th canon of the Council of Angers, A.D. 453; the 4th canon of the 1st Council of Tours, A.D. 461; the 2nd canon of the Council of Rome, A.D. 465; letter 9 of pope Gelasius I. (A.D. 492-6) to the bishops of Lucania, cc. 3, 22; and two fragments of letters by him to the clergy and people of Brindisi.

Among the Nestorians of the East indeed, towards the end of the 5th century, the remarriage of the clergy was held valid. One of their synods held in Persia, under Barsamas archbishop of Nisibis [BIGAMY], expressly lays it down that a priest whose wife is dead is not to be forbidden by his bishop to marry again, whether before or after his orders. And even in the West it is evident that instances of digamy or quasi-digamy must at the beginning of the 6th century have been so frequent in France at least as to require toleration. Thus the Council of

* A somewhat later Nestorian synod under the patriarch Babaius, however, seems to allow but one wife to the "Catholici," all inferior priests, and monks. It is difficult, however, to collect the exact purport of the enactment from the short notice in Labbé and Mansi's Concilia, vol. 8, p. 229.

Agde, A.D. 506, after the canons and statutes of the fathers had been read, determined, "as touching digamists or husbands of women before married (internuptarum)—although the statutes of the fathers had otherwise decreed—that those who till now have been ordained, compassion being had, do retain the name only of the priesthood or diaconate, but that such persons do not presume, the priests to consecrate, the deacons to minister" (c. 1). So the Council of Epône, A.D. 517, c. 2; the 4th [3rd] Council of Arles, A.D. 524, c. 3; and the 4th Council of Orleans, A.D. 541, c. 10. It seems superfluous to multiply authorities as respects the Western Church, except to notice the introduction of the same legislation among new communities. Thus for England, a Council held under archbishop Theodore of Canterbury, towards the end of the 7th century, forbids the priesthood (c. 116) to the husband of a widow, whether married to her before or after baptism. The Collection of Irish Canons, supposed to be of about the same date, in its first book 'On the Bishop,' requires him to be a man "who having taken only one wife, a virgin, is content" (c. 9). And pope Gregory II. (714-30) in a capitulary to his ablegates in Bavaria, forbids a digamist, or one who has not received his wife a virgin to be ordained (c. 5). On the other hand, a Spanish canon seems to imply that quasi-digamous marriages might in that province be contracted with the advice of the bishop, since the 4th Council of Toledo, A.D. 633, enacted (c. 44) that clerics who without such advice (sine consultu episcopi sui) had married widows, divorced women, or prostitutes, were to be excluded from communion.

The last authority we shall quote, as embracing the East as well as the West, is that of the [5th] 6th General Council, that of Constantinople in Trullo, A.D. 691, which treats of the subject in a manner proving that the canonical injunctions against digamous or quasi-digamous marriages among the clergy were yet in many instances transgressed. Those who had become involved in second marriages, and down to a given past date had "served sin," were to be deposed, but those who, having become involved in the disgrace of such digamy before the decree, had forsaken their evil ways, or those whose second wives were dead already, whether priests or deacons, were ordered for a definite time to cease from all priestly ministrations, but to retain the honour of their seat and rank, whilst praying the Lord with tears to forgive them the sin of their ignorance. On the other hand those who had married widows, whether priests, deacons, or subdeacons, after a short period of suspension from ministerial functions, were to be restored to their rank, but without power of further promotion. For all those committing the like offence after the date assigned, the canon was renewed "which says that he who shall have become involved in two marriages after baptism, or shall have had a concubine, cannot be bishop, or priest, or deacon, or in anywise a member of the sacerdotal order; and so with him who has taken to wife a widow or divorced woman, or a harlot, or a slave, or a stage-player" (c. 3). It would probably be difficult to assign the original canon thus referred to. The text is moreover remarkable as confining the disability of second marriage to post-baptismal unions—in direct opposition to the authority of St. Ambrose and others before referred to.

It is sufficient to state here that so long as we retain the female diaconate in sight, the same obligation of monogamy attaches to the deaconesses as to the male clergy; e.g., not to speak of Epiphanius for the East, when the female diaconate reappears in Gaul during the 6th century, we find the 2nd Council of Orleans, A.D. 533, enacting that "women who have hitherto received against canonical prohibition the diaconal benediction, if they can be proved to have again lapsed into marriage, are to be expelled from communion;" but if they give up their husbands, they may be readmitted after penance (c. 17).

It must not be overlooked that the civil law of the Roman empire since the days of Justinian followed the canon law on the subject of clerical marriages. This is perhaps only implied in the Code (see bk. i. t. iii. l. 42, § 1, and l. 48), but distinctly enacted in the Novels. Under one or other of these, bishops, priests, deacons, and subdeacons were alike forbidden to receive ordination if they had been twice married, or had married widows or divorced women (6th Nov. cc. i. v.; 22nd Nov. c. xlii.; 123rd Nov. cc. i. xii.; 137th Nov. c. ii.). Readers who remarried or contracted the like marriages, could rise to no higher clerical rank (an indulgence which did not, however, extend to a third marriage), or if they obtained such irregularly, forfeited altogether their clerical position (6th Nov. c. v.; 22nd Nov. c. xlii.; 123rd Nov. c. xiv.). Deaconesses must in like manner, if not virgins, have been only once married (6th Nov. c. vi.).^b

II. As respects the laity, the distinction between second marriages after divorce or separation, and after death, which is unimportant as respects the clergy, becomes an essential one. In both respects the practice of the Church, instead of being founded, as it was with reference to the clergy, on the prescriptions of the Old Testament, depends upon a more or less narrow interpretation of the New, or on more or less bold deductions from its teachings, combined with the surrounding influences of civil society. In conformity with St. Paul's views as to remarriage after death, we

^b A curious offshoot from the subject of the prohibition of clerical bigamy is the extension of that prohibition to the widows of clerics. Thus, the first Council of Toledo, A.D. 400, enacted that if the widow of a bishop, priest, or deacon took a husband, no cleric or religious woman ought so much as to eat with her, nor should she be admitted to communion except in articulo mortis (c. 18). The 4th Council of Orleans, A.D. 511, required the widow of a priest or deacon married again to be separated from her husband, or if she remained with him, both to be excluded from communion (c. 13). The Council of Epône (A.D. 517), somewhat more sharply decreed immediate exclusion of both, till they should separate (c. 32). The Council of Lerida (A.D. 524) according to Surius, forbade the communion to the remarried widow of a bishop, priest, or deacon, even in articulo mortis. The Council of Auxerre (A.D. 578) again forbade such marriages as respects the widows of the superior clergy; the Council of Mâcon, A.D. 585, extended the prohibition to those of subdeacons, exorcists, and acolytes, under pain of confinement for life in a convent of women (c. 16). Yet Pope Gregory the Great (A.D. 599-603) did not go so far, for we find him in a letter to Leo, bishop of Catania, (bk. ii. letter 34) ordering a certain Honorata, widow of a subdeacon, who on her marrying again had been shut up in a monastery, to be restored to her husband.

Hermas writing that "whose marries"—as shown in the context, after the death of her wife or husband—"does not sin, but if he lies by himself, he acquires great honour to self with the Lord" (bk. ii. M. iv. § 4); but stating the stricter view as to remarriage after divorce, declaring it to be adultery in the man when he has put away his wife for that cause itself, and the same to be the case with wife (ibid. § 1). Negatively, on the other hand, it may be observed that the epistle of Barnabas, in enumerating the works of the "way of light," does not specify monogamy (see c. 19). The Apostolical Constitutions (iii. 1) speak of marriage of a church-widow as bringing disgrace to the class, "not because she contracted second marriage, but because she did not keep promise (ῥωγυλαίω)"—a passage clearly lying even in this case the full lawfulness of second marriage. See also cc. 2 and 3, and et. Can. 40, al. 47 or 48.

Although amongst the earlier Romans there was one form of marriage which was indissoluble, viz., that by confarreatio, still generally second marriage either after death or divorce, by no means viewed with disfavour. There is, however, certain clear indications that already in the first century of our era conformity to a single partner was in the Roman world beginning to be looked upon with favour. Tacitus speaks of Germanicus's being a man of one marriage as one of the causes of his renown (Ann. ii. 73), and mentions a little later on (c. 76) that the daughter of Pollio chosen to be chief vestal "for no other reason than that her mother remained married to the same man." The same Tacitus observes of the Germans that the best of their municipalities (civitates) were those where the men only married as virgins, so that they never had but one husband (De Mor. Germ. c. 1). And it is perhaps worthy of notice that jus connubii, when given to soldiers, was restricted under Philip (247-9) to the case of a first marriage, though this was probably not attributable to any moral considerations (see Storck, Thes. Inscr. i. 362).

Meanwhile an intensifying spirit of asceticism was leading many in the church to a condemnation of second marriage in all cases. Minucius Felix (Octavius, c. 31, § 5) only professes on behalf of the Christians a preference for monogamy. Clement of Alexandria (A.D. 150-220) seems to confine the term marriage to the first lawful union (Stromata, bk. ii.—quoted, as well as several of the following references, in Colinus, Patres Apostol. vol. i. p. 80, n. 16). Augustine terms second marriage "fair seeming adultery." Tertullian (A.D. 150-226) is in the same attitude against it with unwearied urgency, in two books Ad Uxorem, in his De Exhortatione Virginitatis, in his De Monogamia, and in his De Civitate—the last but one, however, written when he was altogether a Montanist. In the first of them, indeed, he admits that his wife had not actually sin if she married after his death, but argues from clerical to lay monogamy. In the Exhortation to Chastity (which is addressed to a man) he uses the same argument, goes so far as to say that second marriage is itself adultery (c. 9). Origen (184-253) so in the Latin text of his 17th homily on

Luke can be trusted, is not much less severe. Recommending perseverance in widowhood, he says: "But now both second and third and fourth marriages, not to speak of more, are to be found, and we are not ignorant that such a marriage shall cast us out from the kingdom of God."

It would seem, however, that when these views were carried to the extent of absolute prohibition of second marriages generally by several heretical sects, the Montanists (see Augustine, de Haeresibus, c. 26), the Cathari (ibid. c. 38), and a portion at least of the Novatianists (see Cotel. Patr. Ap. vol. i. p. 91, n. 16), the Church saw the necessity of not fixing such a yoke on the necks of the laity. The forbiddance of second marriage, or its assimilation to fornication, was treated as one of the marks of heresy (Augustine, n. s.; and see also his De bono viduitatis, c. 6). The sentiment of Augustine (in the last referred to passage) may be taken to express the Church judgment at the close of the 4th century: "Second marriages are not to be condemned, but had in less honour;" and see also Epiphanius, in his Exposition of the Catholic Faith, c. 21.

What the "less honour" consisted in may partly be inferred as respects the Greek Church, from the 'Sanctions and Decrees' attributed to the Nicene Fathers (Labbe and Mansi, Concilia, vol. ii. p. 1029 and foll.), which distinctly authorize widowers' and widows' marriages (i. 7). Yet the blessing of the crowns is not to be imparted to them, for this is only once given, on first marriages, and not to be repeated. . . . But if one of them be not a widower or widow, let such one alone receive the benediction with the paralytici, those whom he will.

The 7th Canon of the Council of Neocaesarea, in A.D. 314 or 315, bears that the presbyter ought not to be present at the marriage festivities of digamists, as the act would be incompatible with his assigning a penance to such persons. The canon implies, it will be seen, that the act of second marriage entailed the infliction of a penance. This appears more clearly from the 1st Canon of the Council of Laodicea, (between A.D. 357 and 387), which rules, as respects those who have "freely and lawfully" contracted a second marriage, without any secrecy, that after a short time, and some chastisement in prayers and fastings, they should be admitted to Communion. And Basil (A.D. 326-379) in his Canonical epistle to bishop Amphilochius of Iconium fixes one year as the period of the suspension of digamists from communion.

We must thus consider that two views on the subject of simple remarriage after the death of husband or wife were abroad in the Church; one which, with Augustine, looked upon it as merely less honourable than monogamy, and deemed its actual condemnation a mark of heresy; the other, which looked upon it as in itself an offence deserving penance, however slight this might be.

The latter view found most colour as respects second marriages after what was deemed a religious profession, as that of the penitent, and of the widow. See IV. Conc. Carth. c. 104; II. Arles, c. 21; Pope Symmachus, Epist. 5, § 5; V. Paris, c. 13, and many others.

A more extraordinary instance of the enforcement of monogamy on a particular class of women is confined to Spain. The 13th Council of Toledo, in 683, declared it to be "an execrable crime, and a work of most inveterate iniquity, after the death of kings, to affect the royal couch of their surviving consorts" (c. 5). This was confirmed some years later by the 3rd Council of Saragossa, A.D. 691, which required the widows of the kings to enter a convent for the remainder of their lives (c. 5).

The penance for ordinary digamy recurs in our own country, in the canons of a Council held under Archbishop Theodore, of Canterbury, which fixes it at two days fasting from wine and flesh-meat every week during the first year, and fasting for three consecutive Lenten, "but without dismissing the wife" (c. 26). But subject however to some such qualifications, second marriage after the death of husband or wife remained fully recognised as the right of the laity. In later times, indeed, so slight a feeling subsisted in the Romish Church against re-marriage among the laity after the death of a husband or wife, that Muratori (Antiquitates Medii Aevi, ii. Diss. 20), says that the Latin Church never forbade second, third, or even more marriages after the death of one of the parties, although the ancient church, especially during the 3rd and 4th centuries, bore such unions impatiently, and subjected them to penance.

It must now be observed that the feeling against second marriage traceable in early times in the records of the Church gradually extended to the Civil Law, especially as regards widows. The earliest laws which indicate this feeling appear to belong to the time of Theodosius the Great (A.D. 380-2), and are to be found in Justinian's Code, bk. v. tit. ix., De secundis nuptiis, and bk. vi. tit. lvi.

Substantially the Roman civil law, like that of the Church, fully recognised the right of second marriage of a surviving husband or wife, latterly confining itself to securing with especial care the rights of the issue of the first marriage. The barbaric codes do not vary materially from this point of view. See the Edict of Theodoric, c. 37; the Laws of Notharis (A.D. 638 or 643), cc. 182, 183; Laws of Liutprand (A.D. 724), vi. c. 74. The laws of the Wisigoths recognised fully the right of remarriage after the death of a partner among the laity. See the Laws of Chindaswinth, bk. iii. tit. 1, l. 4.

Among the Carlovingian Capitularies is one forbidding marriage with widows without their priests' (suorum sacerdotum) consent and the knowledge of the people (bk. v. c. 40). Marriages with professed widows were declared to be no true marriages, and the parties were to be separated, without any accusation being brought against them, by the priest or the judge, and were to be sent into perpetual exile (ib. c. 411); though another enactment (bk. vii. c. 338) seems to limit the penalty to suspension from communion till amendment of life, or in default of such amendment, to perpetual exclusion. If, indeed, a widow who was also a penitent remarried, she and her husband were not to be suffered to enter the church (ib. 317, and see also Add. Quarta c. 88). A woman who had connexion with two brothers was never to marry again (ib. 381). A limit was even sought to be imposed on the number of marriages which might be contracted: "Let none take more than two wives, since the third is already superfluous" (bk. vii. c. 406).

III. We come now to a branch of the subject on which the law of the Church has seldom run precisely in the same groove as that of the state, viz., remarriage not after death of one of the parties, but after divorce or separation. Several classes of cases have here to be distinguished. The first is that in which physical separation involves the presumption or at least the possibility of death. The 22nd Novel fixed a period of five years, after which the wife of a captive husband, who could hear no tidings of him, might lawfully marry again (c. 7). The Visigothic Code was less indulgent. One of its older laws enacted that no woman might marry in her husband's absence, till he was known to be dead; otherwise, on his return, both she and her second husband were to be given over to him, so that he might do with them what he chose, whether by selling them or in any other way (bk. ii. t. ii. l. 6). As respects the church, a letter of Pope Innocent I. (402-17) to Probus simply lays down that where a wife had been carried into captivity and her husband married again in her absence, on the return of the former the first marriage alone held good (Ep. 9). Leo the Great ruled to the same effect in his letter (A.D. 458) to Nicetas, Bishop of Aquileia. Wives whose husbands had been taken in war were bound to return to their former husbands under pain of excommunication; but the second husbands were not to be held guilty for the act of marrying (Ep. 159). The Council in Trullo (A.D. 692), more severe, decreed that the wife of an absent husband marrying before she was certain of his death was guilty of adultery (c. 93).

The next group of cases are those of simple prolonged physical separation. The Roman law took especial account of the case of soldiers. The 22nd Novel allowed the wife of a soldier after ten years' absence, during which she must have repeatedly pressed her husband by letters or messages, whilst he either repelled her importunities, or wholly neglected them, to marry again, altering in this respect a constitution of Constantine's (Code, bk. v. t. xvii. l. 7), which seemed to fix four years as a sufficient period of separation. But the wife was required to present a protest, apparently a written one, to the soldier's superior officers (c. 14); and the 117th Novel surrounded this proceeding with certain formalities, requiring moreover the wife to wait a year further after taking the step in question before she could lawfully marry again (l. 11). St. Basil on the other hand notices the case in his first canonical epistle to Amphilochius, and decrees that where the soldier's wife remarries, the circumstances should be examined into, and some indulgence shewn (c. 36). The Council in Trullo adopted this view, and authorized a soldier, who might return after a long absence and find his wife married to another, to take her back, indulgence being shewn both to the woman and to her second husband (c. 93).

Physical separation through captivity constitutes the next group. A council held under Theodore, Archbishop of Canterbury, towards the end of the 7th century, allows a layman, if his wife were by force carried away into captivity, and he could not recover her, to take another, as being better than to commit fornication (c. 31). After such a second marriage (which uld be contracted after a twelvemonth, c. 140), was not at liberty to take back his former wife if married to another, but she might herself also marry another husband (c. 31). One of the later Lombard laws (A.D. 721) enacts that any one go away for a matter of business or trade, whether within a province or out of it, and do not return within three years, his wife may apply to the king, who may allow her to marry again (Law of Liutprand, bk. iii. c. 4).

If we now consider the case of voluntary desertion or divorce, we shall find considerable action in the rules and practice of the Church as to a second marriage following thereon. St. Paul had, indeed, admitted that desertion for the faith's sake dissolved the social obligations of marriage: "If the unbelieving depart, let him depart; a brother or a sister is not under bondage in such cases" (1 Cor. vii. 15). Did the not being "under bondage" imply freedom to marry again? An alleged canon of Gregory the Great is reported to have ruled that was no sin to do so (c. 17). The same conclusion may, perhaps, be drawn, as respects heresy at least, from a canon (72) of the Council in Trullo, which not only forbids marriage between an orthodox person and a heretic, but declares void and dissolved; and seems only by way of permission to allow that where two infidels have married, and one comes to the light of the truth, he or she may remain in union with the other. And under the canons of the English Council under Theodore, the case would be included in that of desertion generally, in which was laid down that a layman deserted by his wife might after two years take another with a bishop's consent (c. 140). Indeed St. Basil the 4th century had ruled in his first canonical epistle to Amphilocheus that a woman who married a man deserted by his wife, if dismissed, the latter's return, had only fornicated in ignorance, and was not forbidden to marry again; though he thought it better that she should remain single (c. 46). The 93rd canon of the Council in Trullo confirmed this view.

There was indeed one case of separation, the very converse of that of a Christian husband or wife deserted by an infidel partner, which Justinian's code specially dealt with, that of the husband or wife embracing the monastic profession. This was held to give freedom to the other party to marry again, although as respects women, by analogy with the law in case of marriage after death, only after the expiration of a twelvemonth. She was, however, at once sent a divorce bond gratia to her husband (Code, bk. i. t. iii. l. 53, § 3; and see l. 56; in Nov. c. 5; 22nd Nov. c. 5). The avoidance of marriage by the religious profession was however maintained, after the divorce bond gratia had been forbidden; see the 117th Nov. cc. 10, 11, and the 123rd, c. 40.

The great struggle was, however, on the subject of marriage after divorce. Our Lord's teaching on the subject, it will be remembered, was not only in professed opposition to the Jewish law, but in no less signal opposition to the Roman, in which the facilities for divorce were simply scandalous. The right of divorce in specified cases, and of subsequent remarriage for the innocent party, was maintained by the state for a long time under the emperors (see Code, bk. v. t. xvii.). No limitation of time for remarriage was fixed for the man (lib. l. 8, § 5, Constitution of Theodosius and Valentianus, A.D. 449); but by analogy with the case of remarriage after death, the woman's right to remarry after divorce for her husband's wrong, or after a divorce by mutual consent, was limited to arise after the expiration of a twelvemonth (§ 4 and l. 9, Constitution of Anastasius, A.D. 497). But if she divorced herself from her husband otherwise than in the cases specified, she could not remarry within five years, and if she did, became infamous, and the marriage void (l. 8, § 4). The right of remarriage by a wife after the year was by the 22nd Nov. extended to all cases of "reasonable" divorce ~~caused~~ by her; the husband in the like case being always free to remarry at once (cc. 16, 18). The divorce by mutual consent, except for the sake of observing chastity, was however forbidden by the 117th Nov. c. 10.

In Italy the right of divorce and remarriage was maintained by the edict of Theodoric according to the old constitutions (c. 34), and though it cannot be traced through the Lombard laws, probably subsisted till the Carlovingian conquest, when by a capitulary of the year 789, enacted for Lombardy, marriage after divorce was forbidden (bk. l. c. 42).

The Visigothic law seems first to have admitted divorce, then sought to forbid it altogether. An "ancient" law prohibited a divorced woman from marrying, and if she did, ordered both her and her second husband to be given over to the former one (bk. iii. t. ii. l. 1).

If we turn now to the law of the Church, we find the Council of Eliberis in 305 forbidding communion even in extremis to women leaving their husbands without cause and marrying another (c. 8). See also c. 9 and c. 10.

Basil in his canonical epistle to Amphilocheus dwells at length on the subject of divorces (c. 9). He doubts, indeed, whether a woman living with a divorced man is to be treated as an adulteress; but she is one certainly who leaves her husband and marries again. But the deserted husband may receive absolution (συγγνωστής ὁντι), and the woman who lives with him is not condemned; though it is otherwise if the man himself leaves his wife (ιδ.). Such a man marrying again is an adulterer, and only in the 7th year is to be readmitted among the faithful (c. 77). To Basil's mind, a dismissed wife should remain unmarried (c. 48).

The African Council of Milevis, A.D. 416, the 17th canon of which forbids generally dismissed women to marry other husbands, hardly agrees with an Irish Council of uncertain date held under St. Patrick, which lays it down that first marriages are not made void by second ones, "unless they have been polluted by adultery" (c. 28); nor with the Council of Vannes (Vannesensis) in 465, which enacts excommunication against those who having wives, except by reason of fornication, without proof of adultery marry other women (c. 2). The Council of Hertford in 673 seems to revert to the stricter view, enacting that a man is not to leave his wife except for fornication, nor, if dismissing her, to marry another (c. 10). The Council in Trullo declares that both the woman leaving her husband and marrying another, and the man leaving his wife and marrying another, commit adultery, and enacts a graduated scale of penance for seven years (c. 88). On the other hand, the English Council under Theodore enacts that where a wife is unfaithful a man might dismiss her and marry another, the woman however not to be allowed to marry her lover (c. 143). And yet by a seemingly strange contradiction it is enacted that a harlot's husband may not marry any other woman during her lifetime (c. 166), the case aimed at being probably that of a marriage with a full knowledge that the woman did not mean to leave her course of life. Among the Excerpts from the chapters, "de remediis peccatorum," by the same archbishop, published in the Anecdota of Martene, we find that the penance assigned to a man dismissing his wife and marrying another is seven years "with tribulation," besides five years of lighter penance. If the wife departed, and the husband married again, his penance was for one year only.

A letter (7) of Pope Zacharias (A.D. 741-51) to Pepin as mayor of the palace, enjoins again the excommunication of laymen dismissing their wives and taking others in their place (c. 7), and reiterates the prohibition against marriage after divorce (c. 12), which we find also repeated in the replies made by Pope Stephen II. in 754 to certain queries put to him when he was at Querry in France (c. 5).

Under Charlemagne a different spirit becomes obvious. The law is made stricter, but the rulers are above it. All injunctions to morality on the part of the popes were powerless against the passions of their Carlovingian patrons. See the curious letter addressed by Stephen III. (A.D. 768-70) to Charlemagne and Carloman his son, then associated with him on the throne.

The Council of Aix in 789 (c. 42) and the Council of Friuli in 791 (c. 10), endorsing the stricter construction of our Lord's words as to divorce, enacted that after a divorce for adultery neither party should marry again. The latter, however, "by indulgence," allowed those who were separated for consanguinity's sake on discovery to marry again, if they could not remain unmarried, which it recommended them to do; but if they wilfully contracted such a marriage they were after separation to do penance all their lives and never marry again, nor could their children inherit from them (c. 8). The prohibitions against a second marriage after divorce are repeated in the Capitularies, bk. vii. cc. 73, 382 (the latter expressly including the case of adultery); bk. v. c. 300, Add. quarta cc. 118-161,—the prohibition being here extended to marrying again after "killing a wife without cause." And the edict of Charlemagne (A.D. 814) directs inquiry whether all men noble or ignoble, have lawful wives, "not the dismissed wives of others."

Strange to say, the Eastern empire presented at this same period a similar scandal to that of the imperial court of the west. The Emperor Constantine had sent his wife to a convent and married another, the Archbishop Joseph performing the ceremony. For so doing he was ejected by the patriarch Tarasius, but received to communion by a Constantinopolitan synod in 806 in spite of the efforts of Theodorus Studita and of the monks, and another assembly in 809, declared the emperor's marriage to be lawful, on the shameful ground that "the divine laws can do nothing against kings."—It is somewhat curious to add that a Nestorian synod held in Persia in 804, following the stricter view, had laid it down that after a divorce for fornication neither husband nor wife could marry again.

To sum up the conclusions of this inquiry, we find—1st, that as respects the clergy, a rule borrowed from Leviticus or derived from its prescriptions was held by the church to forbid to the clergy all marriages which should on either side be of a digamous character; and that although this rule was evidently constantly infringed in practice, and its infringements oftentimes condoned in the past, it was nevertheless steadily upheld as binding throughout the whole period to which this work refers, and latterly extended or sought to be extended to the inferior clergy; the one open protest against its application being that of a Nestorian synod in Persia, towards the end of the 5th century. 2nd, that as respects the laity, notwithstanding the stricter views taken by several writers of the earlier church, the right of remarriage after the death of a husband or wife became firmly established, though in the Eastern church such marriages were subjected to some ceremonial disparagement, and were generally sought to be discouraged by penances more or less severe. 3rd, that considerable fluctuation in the views and practice of the Church seems to have prevailed on the subject of remarriage after separation or divorce, and that whilst second marriages in such cases were generally condemned by the letter of the canon law towards the end of the 8th and beginning of the 9th centuries, the sovereigns both of the East and West set such prohibitions at naught for themselves, and parted with their wives to marry others almost at their will.

DIGNITAS. A well-known classical word = id, quo quis re aliquâ dignus est, as Facciolati defines it. By degrees it was used as a generic term for ranks or offices, "Dignitas equestria, senatoria, consularis," and so forth. From Pliny downwards, by "dignitates" were frequently meant "magistracies." The well-known notitia, or "Table of dignities of the Roman Empire in the east and west," which Pauciolus thinks may have been published about the end of the reign of Theodosius the younger in its present shape, was probably commenced under Augustus (Böcking's Notit. p. liii.-v.). They form the subject of the 6th book in the Theodosian Code, and of the 1st and last books in that of Justinian (Gothofred Op. Jurid. Min. pp. 1263, 1374, and 1415-18). All, of course, were purely secular; but, in process of time, when ecclesiastics were promoted to secular offices, and ecclesiastical offices themselves began to confer as much social distinction as secular, people talked of "dignities" in the Church as freely as in the State. Hence; retrospectively, this term might be extended to the offices of bishop, metropolitan, archbishop, patriarch, pope, cardinal, bishop-suffragan, archpriest, archdeacon, chancellor, &c., though, as matter of fact, it was never applied to them till it had been used to denote later and more subordinate posts first. In ecclesiastical parlance, says Ducange, "when a benefice included the administration of ecclesiastical affairs his jurisdiction, it was called a dignity." And Thomasin, to the same purpose, speaks of "proctors, deans, stewards, chamberlains, treasurers, lawers, and sacristans, as among the 'dignities' separable from cathedrals and abbeys" (De Ben. i. 70). True, we meet with none of these words in their received ecclesiastical meaning before the 9th century; nor was it till then, probably, that ecclesiastical offices of any kind began to be styled "dignities:" still, practically, they had been this long before. DIMISSORY LETTERS. (Litterae dimissoriae, formales; ἐπιστολαὶ ἀπολυτήριαι.) Letters sent by a bishop to one of his clerks removing to another diocese; or to a layman of his diocese desiring to be ordained elsewhere. [See SHOP, p. 232; COMMENDATORY LETTERS.]

1. In ancient times a bishop was forbidden to receive a clerk from another diocese, or to admit to higher orders a clerk already ordained to the inferior rank, or to ordain a layman domiciled in another diocese (alterius plebis hominem), without the express and formal consent of the bishop of that diocese (Conc. Nicaen. i. c. 16; Sardic. cc. 16, 19, A.D. 347; C. Carthag. i. 5, A.D. 348; C. Taurin. c. 7; C. Arausic. i. 8, 9; C. in Trullo, c. 17; Ordo Rom. VIII. 87). Readers, psalmists, and doorkeepers, were included under the designation of clerks (Carth. iii. c. 21; compare Augustine, Epist. 5, 240, 242). A bishop was not to hinder the presbyter of his diocese from being ordained bishop of a church to which he was elected, nor was one who had a superfluity of clerks to refuse them to a diocese where there were few (C. Carth. iii. c. 45). The decision in cases of this kind seems to have rested with the metropolitan. In a case in which a bishop, Junius, wished to reclaim a lector who belonged to his diocese by birth, though he belonged by baptism to the bishop who had ordained him, Dionysius, it was ruled that the lector belonged to the diocese of his baptism, to which he had come as a catechumen with commendatory letters (C. Carth. iii. c. 44).

The rules, however, with regard to the ordination of extraneous laymen were probably never forced with the same strictness as those which related to clerics. Origen, an Alexandrian, was dained presbyter by the bishops of Caesarea and Jerusalem, much to the indignation of his metropolitan bishop, Demetrius; there was, however, in Origen's case a special reason—his mutilation—by which he should not be ordained (Euseb. H. E. vi. 8, 26, 27). Jerome was ordained priest at Antioch, neither the church of his birth nor of his baptism. And there are other instances of the like kind.

The theory on which all this rests is that a bishop by the act of ordination acquired a perpetual right to the services of the clerks whom he ordained ("Quisquis semel in hac ecclesia ordinatus sacrum acceperit, egrediendi ex ea ulterius facultatem non habet." Greg. Magn. Epist. v. 38), and even—in a less degree—to the services of one whom he baptised. Hence letters dimissory were not merely letters testimonial or commendatory, but properly ἀπολυτήριαι; instruments, at is, setting the clerk free from his allegiance to his first bishop, and transferring the same powers over him to the bishop of his adopted diocese (Thomasin, Nova et Vetus Ecclesiae Disciplina, ii. i. 1 ff.).

2. It was probably from the same notion, of the clerks being bound by a peculiar allegiance to their bishop, that the practice arose of requiring the clergy, and "religious" persons generally, to have the sanction of the bishop before they approached their king or lord (dominus) for the purpose of asking benefices (Conc. Aurelian. i. c. 7, A.D. 511. This canon is, however, wanting in several MSS.) [C.]

DINGOLVINGA, COUNCIL OF (Dingolwingense), at Dingolfing, on the river Isar, in Bavaria, A.D. 772, under Tassilo, Duke of Bavaria, passed 13 canons upon discipline and reformation of manners. Labb. Conc. vi. 1794, 1795; Le Cointe, Annal. v. in an. 770; Harrheim, Conc. German. i. 130. [A. W. H.]

DIOCESE. The word διοίκησις, signifying in its general sense any kind of administration, came to be specifically applied by the Romans to a Provincia, but to one of the lesser sort, for Cicero speaks of his Provincia Ciliciensis "cui acis tres διοικησεις Asiaticas attributas fuisse" (Epist. ad Fam. lib. xiii. ep. 67).

At a later period, however, when Constantine remodelled the civil divisions of the empire, a diocesis, instead of being a minor province, contained within it several provinces. Thus, for instance, there were ten provinces in the Egyptian diocese. About the same time the word passed from the terminology of the civil government into that of the church. It was employed in a sense analogous to its secular application, and signified an aggregate not merely of several districts governed each by its own bishop, but of several provinces (ἐπαρχίαι) each presided over by a metropolitan. The diocese itself was under an Exarch or Patriarch [ΕΞΑΡΧΗ]. It is in this sense that the Council of Constantinople (can. 2) speaks of the Asian and Pontic dioceses, and the Council of Ephesus of the Egyptian diocese. Διοίκησις ἵστιν ἡ πολλὰς ἐπαρχίας ἔχουσα ἐν ἑαυτῇ. λέγει Βασίλειος, αὐτὸν καὶ τὴν αὐτῆς ἐπαρχίαν Μετροπολίτην ἐπισκοπῶν ἡ κληρικὴ ἀμφισβητοῖ, καταλαμβάνεται ἡ τὴν ἑαρχίαν τῆς διοικήσεως ἡ τὴν τῆς βασιλευμένης Κωνσταντινουπόλεως θρόνον, καὶ ἐν αὐτῇ δικάζεται. About the same period the word diocese began also to assume the sense which has finally prevailed to the exclusion of that just mentioned, and to be used to signify the district governed by a single bishop. For the three first centuries this was commonly denoted by paroikia, but it now began also to be called diocesis, as in the Council of Carthage (see Bing. Antiq. bk. ix. ii. § 2) we have "Placuit ut nemini sit facultas, relicta principali cathedra, ad aliquam ecclesiam in diocesi constitutam se conferre." In point of fact, however, the word, which perhaps retained to a certain degree its general rather than its technical sense, is found applied in turn to every kind of ecclesiastical territorial division. For, while Hincmar (Epist. ad Nicolaum) uses it of the province of a metropolitan ("non solum diocesis, verum etiam parochia mea inter duo regna sub duobus regibus habetur divina"). Suicer alleges other authorities to show that the word is sometimes employed in a sense closely resembling our word parish, viz. the district of a single church in a diocese. It has been observed that this was a Latin, and especially an African use of the term (Thomass. l. i. c. 3).

Considered in the acceptation of the word, which has prevailed in later times to the exclusion of the others, a bishop's diocese and his power over it are thus spoken of in the 4th century—

“Ἐκαστον ἐπισκοπον ἔχουσιν ἔχειν τῆς αὐτοῦ παροικίας, διωκεῖν τε κατὰ τὴν ἐκάστου ἐπιβάλλουσιν ἐντάβειαν, καὶ πρόνοιαν ποιεῖσθαι πάσης τῆς χώρας τῆς ὑπὸ τὴν αὐτοῦ πόλιν ὥς καὶ χειροτονεῖν πρεσβυτέρους καὶ διακόνους, καὶ μετὰ κρίσεως ἕκαστα διαλαμβάνειν. περαιτέρω δὲ οὐδὲν πρῶττειν ἐπιχειρεῖν διχα τοῦ τῆς μητροπόλεως ἐπισκόπου, μηδὲ αὐτὸν ἕνευ τῶν λοιπῶν γνώμης. (Concil. Antioch. can. 9.)

It has been thought that, from every bishop having a right to erect new churches in his own diocese, and to set up a cross on the spot where they were to be placed, his diocese has sometimes been called σταυροπήγιον (Bing. viii. 9, 5).

The canonical rule was not only that a diocese should have but one bishop, but that a bishop should have but one diocese. In subsequent times, however, the latter part of this rule was much broken down by the practice of “commenda.” This practice came into use on various grounds. One of these is thus indicated by Thomassin:—“Incurstationes barbarorum juges et cruentissimae Fundanā civitate episcopum plebemque propemodum omnem effugarant. Cum viduata tunc pastore suo fuisset Terracina, Fundanum sibi postulavit episcopum. Confirmata est a Gregorio Magno in electio, a quo jussus est Agnellus titulum et administrationem gerere ecclesiae Terracinenensis, et nihil secius veluti commendatam sibi curare ecclesiam Fundanam. ‘Sic te Terracinenensis ecclesiae cardinalem constituimus esse sacerdotem, ut et Fundensis ecclesiae pontifex esse non desinas’” (Thomassin, pt. ii. lib. 3, cap. 10).

In other cases a vacant diocese was simply committed to the care of a neighbouring bishop till a successor could be appointed. This was in the earlier times the most common species of commenda, and was of course temporary only.

Sometimes there was a kind of double commenda, the pope commending to the care of a neighbouring bishop a diocese whose own diocesan was occupied in administering the affairs of another church previously commended to him.

In other instances, again, where a bishop was under sentence of penance, the affairs of his church were entrusted to another, or to the metropolitan, until he was restored. “Emeritense Concilium Metropolitano commendavit ecclesias eorum episcoporum, qui ad poenitentiam secedere jussi fuerant, quod a Concilio Provinciali abfuissent” (Thomassin, pt. ii. lib. 3, c. 11).

In one instance Childeric appears to have commended a diocese to the care of an abbot (ibid.).

At first the bishop to whom a diocese was commended appears only to have received his actual expenses. Gregory the Great, however, when Paulus had charge of Naples during a vacancy, directed as follows:—“Praedicto Paulo centum solidos et unum puerulum orphanum quem ipse elegerit pro labore suo de eadem ecclesia facias dari” (ibid. c. 10).

By degrees large profits were derived from a commenda, and it thus became an object of ambition, and was bestowed by popes and sovereigns without reason and to the prejudice of the Church. In later times it became a flagrant abuse, but its worst forms belong perhaps mainly to a period beyond our present limits. It came to be held in perpetuity, instead of for a limited period, and the revenues of two or more sees were accumulated upon one person as a provision for life.

One peculiar kind of commenda must not be omitted, viz. where a part of the revenues of a church was assigned to a great lay noble, in return for his taking on himself its defence against its heathen or other enemies. Such protectorates were common in the more disturbed periods. They are styled ‘commendae militares.’ In the same manner and on like grounds the sovereigns retained to themselves portions of church property. But the subject of Commendae is too large to be discussed at length here. The learning of the whole subject will be found in Thomassin.

The limits of dioceses were probably fixed in the first instance by local or accidental circumstances.* They differed widely in size and population. Details on these points will be found under NOTITIA. It is more important to observe that when too large they were, not unfrequently, divided, as in the following instance:—“In the Council of Lucus Augusti, or Lugo, under King Theodemir, anno 569, a complaint was made that the dioceses in Gallacia [in Spain] were so large that the bishops could scarce visit them in a year: upon which an order was made, that several new bishoprics and one new metropolis should be erected, which was accordingly done by the bishops then in council, who made Lugo to be the new metropolis, and raised several other episcopal sees out of the old ones, as declared in the acts of that council” (Bing. ix. vi. § 16).

As his own diocese was the proper sphere of the action of a bishop, in acting in the diocese of another he was under certain restrictions. These prevailed at all times to a greater or less degree, but seem eventually to have been laid down in

* “The Diocese,” says Milman, “grew up in two ways—
1. In the larger cities the rapid increase of the Christians led necessarily to the formation of separate congregations, which to a certain extent, required each its proper organization, yet invariably remained subordinate to the single bishop. In Rome, towards the beginning of the 4th century, there were above forty churches, rendering allegiance to the prelate of the metropolis. 2. Christianity was first established in the towns and cities, and from each centre diffused itself with more or less success into the adjacent country. In some of these country congregations, bishops appear to have been established, yet their chorepiscopi, or rural bishops, maintained some subordination to the head of the Mother Church; or where the converts were fewer, the rural Christians remained members of the Mother Church in the City. In Africa, from the immense number of bishops, each community seems to have had its own superior; but this was peculiar to this province. In general, the churches adjacent to the towns or cities either originally were, or became, the diocese of the City Bishop: for as soon as Christianity became the religion of the State, the powers of the rural bishops were restricted, and the office at length was either abolished, or fell into disuse.”—History of Christianity, Book iv. ch. 1.

DIPPING. [BAPTISM.]

DIPTYCHS. (Διπύχην, ἑκατὸν βέλους, ἀντι- λῶγος; diptycha, matriculas, nomina, tabular)

1. The name of diptych is given to a tablet, pri- marily two-leaved, as the word implies, in which were contained the names of Christians, living and dead, to be recited during the celebration of the Eucharist. It would seem that the origin of the custom is to be referred to the primitive practice by which the members of a church brought offerings of bread and wine from which were taken the sacred elements. Then, before the consecration, the names of those who had contributed were read aloud, as well as those of deceased members of the church whom it was wished specially to commemorate.

This primary use was subsequently extended so as to include the names, on the one hand, of sovereigns, patriarchs, bishops, and the like, as well as of those who had deserved well in any way of the church; while, on the other hand, in conjunction with departed saints and confessors, a special mention was thought desirable in each church of those who had previously been its bishops. The great length to which these lists necessarily grew caused the habit of reciting them fully to be subsequently abandoned, but in some form or other the practice has been retained in both the Eastern and the Roman Church.

This custom was doubtless primarily suggested as to its form by the practice which prevailed under the Roman Empire, by which consuls, praetors, aediles, and other magistrates were wont to distribute to their friends and the people, on the day on which they entered office, tablets inscribed with their names, and containing their portraits, in token of the commencement of their magistracy. (See e.g. Cod. Theodos. de expensis ludorum, 15, tit. 9, § 1; Symmachus, Epist. ii. 81, v. 56, x. 119; Claudianus, De Sec. Consulatu Stilichonis, 347.) For another possible, but certainly not probable, connection of the use of Christian diptychs with an earlier heathen custom, see Casaubon's Animad. in Athenaeum, vi. 14.

2. Diptycha episcoporum (κατάλογος τῶν ἐπισκόπων; comp. CATALOGUS HIERATICUS, p. 317). We shall now, however, confine ourselves to the subject of diptychs as used in the Christian Church, and shall refer first to that class of them in which were inscribed the names of deceased prelates. Each church would of course specially commemorate its own past bishops, or at any rate the more renowned among them, and thus in these local fasti we may see the germs of later calendars and martyrologies. An interesting illustration of the employment of these tabellae episcopales is furnished by the well known case of St. Chrysostom, whom the persecution of his inveterate foes drove into exile [CHALCEDON, p. 333]; and even after his death would have refused his name a place on the diptychs as a denial of his orthodoxy: the insertion of his name in the prayers of the church, when his friends were strong enough to obtain it, is spoken of as the usual privilege of departed bishops (Socrates, Hist. Eccl. vii. 25; comp. Theodoret, Hist. Eccl. v. 35).

Another illustration may be taken from Venantius Fortunatus (Poem. vii. 35, de S. Martino; Patrol. lxxxviii. 332).

"Nomina vestra legat patriarchis atque prophetis Cui hodie in templo Diptychus edit ebur."

The names thus engraved on the tablets were recited, as has been said, during the celebration of the Eucharist. See, for example, the proceedings of the conference at Carthage between the Catholics and Donatists (411 A.D.), where we find the remark: "In ecclesia sumus, in qua Caecilianus episcopatum gessit et diem obiit. Ejus nomen ad altare recitamus, ejus memoriae communicamus, tanquam memoriae fratris" (Coll. iii. c. 230; Labbé, ii. 1490). See also Concil. Constant. ii. Coll. v.; Labbé, v. 478, 495.

It will be understood that such a mention has no connection with the practice of prayers for the dead, for the names thus enrolled were held to be of those included among the blest, and in fact the word 'canonization' primarily meant a mention of this kind in the CANON of the Mass (see p. 267). Conversely, a place would be denied in the diptychs to those who were suspected, rightly or wrongly, of heretical or heterodox views; and further, names wrongly inserted, whether inadvertently or through set evil design, might be subsequently removed. Thus we find Anastasius chronicling, "deinde abstulerunt de diptychis ecclesiarum nomina Patriarcharum . . . Cyri, Sergii, Pauli, Pyrrhi, Petri per quos error orthodoxae fidei pullulavit" (Vitae Pontificum, 'Agatho,' p. 145).

This power of refusing to a name a place in CHRIST. ANT.

the diptychs, or of removing a name once entered, would doubtless degenerate at times into the venting of personal spite, as we have seen in the case of the disgraceful attempt to rob Chrysostom of his well deserved honour. For a still stronger case Peter the Fuller is responsible, in that, on his usurpation of the see of Antioch, he removed from the diptychs the names of Proterius and Timotheus Salafatiarius, and put in their stead those of Dioscurus and Hellurus who had murdered the former (Victor Tunnunensis, Chronicon, 480 A.D. in Gallandi Bibl. Vet. Patr. xii. 225).

3. Diptycha vivorum.—We shall briefly consider, in the next place, the case of the mention of living persons, the origin of which, as has been already said, would appear to be found in the recital of the names of those members of a church who had furnished the elements for the holy communion. As time went on, it would be natural to add the names of those who held civil and spiritual authority, of special benefactors to a church, and generally to embrace all faithful believers; the presence of a name on the list being viewed as a recognition of Christian brotherhood, and thus, by implication, of the full church membership and orthodoxy of the person named; while, conversely, its absence implied heresy in belief or laxity in life or discipline (see Cyprian, Epist. i. § 2).

This original association of the practice with the names of the offerers was maintained in later times. Thus we find Innocent I. (ob. 417 A.D.) ordering that the names of those who offered should not be recited before the oblations were made (Epist. 25, ad Decentium, c. 5); Jerome also (Comm. in Ezech. xviii. vol. v. 209) refers to it, "Publicaeque diaconis in ecclesia recitet offerentium nomina." For further injunctions to the same effect, see Capit. Aquisgranense, 53 [789 A.D.], Capit. Francoford. 49 [794 A.D.], in Baluze's Capitularia Regum Francorum, i. 231, 270. In this way too it is most natural to understand the original reference of the words in the corresponding place of the Roman canon, "qui tibi offerunt hoc sacrificium laudis et gratiarum actionis."

The commemoration of the faithful living, other than the offerers, includes names of holders, first of ecclesiastical and then of civil office, in due order. We may refer, for example, to Maximus Confessor, who remarks (Collatio cum Principibus in Secretario, c. 5, vol. i. p. xxxiv. ed. Combefis), "at the holy oblation on the holy table, after prelates, priests, and deacons, and all priestly ranks (ἱερατικὸν τάγμα), when the deacon says, 'And those laics who have died in faith, Constantine, Constans, and the rest,'" and then proceeds, οὕτω δὲ καὶ τῶν ζώντων μνημονεύει βασιλέων μετὰ τοὺς ἱερομένους πόντας." We find a similar regulation in the Arabic canons of the Nicene Council, to the effect that, "on the Sabbath and festivals, when the holy elements are placed upon the altar, the deacon shall make mention, first, of the patriarch by name, then of the chief bishop, the suffragan bishop, the arch-priest, the archdeacon, because these are the rulers of the church" (can. 64; Labbé, ii. 312).

In documents of the Western Church, we meet with injunctions to insert on all such occasions the name of the pope. See, e.g., the order of second Council of Vasto (529 A.D.), "ut Domini Papae, quicumque sedi apostolicae ierit, in nostris ecclesiis recitetur." (can. 4, iv. 1680: cf. Sugg. ii. Germani et aliorum Epist. 40 Hormisdas Papae, ibid. 1484; allusion is made to the omission of all, save of the pope only, in the celebration of Mass at Scampae, a usage of which Mar-p. 145 B. gives some later examples.) For the mention of the names of ecclesiastical grades came that of the sovereign, as shown in the above quoted passage of Maximian and among those who had deserved well of the church in various ways we find special mention enjoined by the Council of Merida A.D. of the names of those who had re-ed a church (Concil. Emeritense, c. 19; Labbé, 17).

On these diptycha vivorum also, as we have in the previous case of the tabellae episcoporum, a name might be removed, justly or unjustly, as, e.g., in the case of Vigilius (Baluzius, Acta Nova Conciliorum, 1542). Thus too we find a sentence threatening, in case of certain conduct coming to the clerical office, "delebo eum bulis clericorum" (Serm. 356, vol. v. 2059, aume); and in another passage of the same work, we find him protesting against an unjust use of this punishment (Epist. 78, vol. ii).

Again, we find the name of Pope Felix III. dropped from the diptychs by Acacius, and afterwards restored by Euthymius, who erased at the same time that of Peter Mongus (Theophanes, 81 A.D. pp. 205, 206, ed. Classen). Felix, however, ungraciously returned this by refusing to recognise Euthymius, from his having retained the names of Acacius and Phravitae (op. cit. A.D. p. 209).

Diptycha mortuorum.—We shall now refer to the diptychs containing the names of the faithful dead. And here it will be obviously that the essence of the practice of a recital of names at all was the wish to maintain and alive the spirit of Christian brotherhood; when Christianity had taught men that, whether living or dead in the flesh, all faithful alike living members of Christ's Church, it is but natural to add the names of those who have gone before in the faith and fear of God. Soon this became complicated with the addition of prayers for the dead this is not the place to discuss.

As to the manner in which the diptychs of the dead are introduced in Greek liturgies, we find that of St. Mark, ὁ δὲ διάκονος τὰς θύρας ἀνοίξας (i. e. reads), and, similarly, in that of St. Chrysostom, ὁ διάκονος τῶν τε κεκοιμημένων καὶ ζώντων, ἐν βοῇ λέγει, μνημονεύετε. The prayer of the priest, which follows, runs in the former case thus, καὶ τούτων πάντων τὰς ψυχὰς ἀνάστασον, θέλοντάς Κύριε ὁ Θεὸς ἡμῶν, ἐν τῶν ἁγίων σου σκευαῖς. . . . This might be varied by the passage of Cyprian already referred to (Epist. l. 2): "Non est quod pro domine ejus apud vos fiat oblatio, aut deprecatio a nomine ejus in ecclesia frequentetur."

The commemoration of and prayer for the faithful dead is found in the Gregorian Sacramentary after the consecration, and thereupon is a prayer, entitled in the Sacramentary Diptycha (the Collectio post Nomina of the Gallican Missal), which we cite: "Memento etiam, Domine, famulorum famularumque tuorum Illi, qui nos praeceperunt cum signo fidei et dormiunt in somno pacis. Ipsis, Domine, et omnibus in Christo quiescentibus, locum refrigerii et laetiae et pacis ut indulgeas deprecamur."

Among others, the names of deceased emperors of undoubted orthodoxy were mentioned. Thus Pope Nicholas I. (ob. 867 A.D.), in a letter to the Emperor Michael III., refers to the mention of the names of Constantine, Constant, Theodosius the Great, Valentinian, and other emperors, "inter sacra mysteria" (Epist. 88, Patrol. cxi. 959).

The regulation of the Council of Merida, already referred to, ordains the mention of the names of special benefactors, after they have departed this life.

Thus far we have spoken merely of names of individuals inserted in the diptychs, but, besides these, a commemoration was made of the Four Oecumenical Councils, to which practice numerous references are made in the proceedings of the Council held at Constantinople in 536 A.D. under Mennas (See, e.g., Labbé, v. 85, 165, 185; the last of which passages furnishes us with a very interesting illustration of the practice, describing how, at the reading of the diptychs, the whole multitude flocked round the sanctuary to listen; and when only the titles of the Four Holy Synods were recited by the deacon, and the names of the archbishops Euphemius and Macedonius and Leo, of blessed memory, all cried with a loud voice, "Glory be to Thee, O Lord!"; and in those of the second Oecumenical Council of Constantinople (e.g. Collatio 2, Labbé, v. 432). There is also a reference to this in the Code of Justinian, in a letter of the emperor to Epiphanius, patriarch of Constantinople, in which he expresses his intention of resisting any attempts to abolish this practice (lib. i. tit. 1, § 7; tom. ii. pt. 1, p. 16, ed. Beck.). Theophanes records an instance of a daring attempt to break through this custom, when Euphrasius, patriarch of Antioch, omitted the Council of Chalcedon from his diptychs, and also the name of Pope Hormisdas (Theophanes, A.D. 513, p. 258).

5. A brief remark may be made here as to sundry variations in the time when the diptychs were recited according to various uses. The primary custom would seem to be, that they were read after the oblation of the bread and wine, and before the consecration. This may be seen, for example, from numerous references in the acts of the council under Mennas, spoken of above, which prove this to have been the custom of the Church of Constantinople (see esp. Labbé, v. 185, already quoted). It would appear also that in the Mozarabic Missal and in the ancient Gallican form, the diptychs originally held this place. The same also holds true for the representative of the diptychs in our own Liturgy, the prayer for the Church Militant. In the Liturgy of Chrysostom, however, the Mozarabic Missal, and not a few others, as we now have them, the diptychs follow consecration.

In the various forms of the Roman Liturgy, and in the Ambrosian, the commemoration of the living and dead enters into the canon of the Mass, that of the living before, and that of the dead after, consecration. It has been suggested, however, that this too is a modification of an earlier state of things, from a consideration of the wording in the Gelasian Sacramentary. [CANON OF THE LITURGY, p. 271.]

Sundry differences also exist as to the manner of reciting the names on the diptychs. (1) Sometimes they were read by the deacon, as is exemplified by the citations we have already given from the liturgies of St. Mark and St. Chrysostom, to which others might have been added. See also Jerome (in Ench. l. c.) and Maximus (l. c.). (2) In some churches it would appear that the subdeacon recited the names on the diptychs behind the altar. Thus, in an ancient Mass (Codex Rotaldi) published by Menard in his edition of the Gregorian Sacramentary, we find (p. 246), "Subdiaconi a retro altari, ubi memoriam vel nomina vivorum et mortuorum nominaverunt . . ." (3) Frequently the priest himself repeated the names. (4) A curious plan is that mentioned by Fulcun (De Gestis Abbatum Lobienensium, c. vii. in D'Achery's Spicilegium, vi. 551), where the subdeacon whispered the names to the priest. (5) We find even that in some cases the tablets were merely laid upon the altar, with the names of the offerers and benefactors, of whom the priest made general mention. Thus we find a form cited by Pamelius (Liturgy. Lat. ii. 180), "Memento . . . quorum nomina ad memorandum conscripimus, ac super sanctum altare tuum conscripta adesse videntur." The two last views, at any rate, however, are clearly quite late.

For some remarks on a plan whereby, in the church of Ravenna, a chasuble was made to serve the purpose of diptychs, see Ducange (s. v.).

The name of diptych was also given to registers in which were entered, as occasion required, the names of newly baptized persons, as then first becoming members of the Christian family (Dion. Areop. Hier. Ecl. c. 11). [REGISTER.]

6. Literature.—For the matter of the foregoing article we are mainly indebted to Martene, De Antiquis Ecclesiae Ritibus, i. 145, sqq. ed. Venice, 1783; Ducange's Glossaria, s. v. Diptycha, Διπτυχα; Bingham's Antiquities, xv. 3; and the Onomasticon (s. v.) appended to Rosweyde's Vitas Patrum. Reference may also be made to Salig, De Diptychis Veterum, tam profanis, quam sacris, Halae Magd. 1731; Donati, Dei dicitur degli antichi profani e sacri, Lucca, 1753; Gibbins, Protection on the Diptychs, Dublin, 1864. [R. S.]

DIPTYCHS, EXTERIOR ORNAMENTATION OF.—As the most ancient consular diptych now known is referred to Stilicho in 405 (see infra, and Gori, vol. i. p. 128, ed. fol. Flor. 1779), and only one purely ecclesiastical one is mentioned even as conjecturally earlier than the 5th century, it will be inferred that the interest of these relics is historical rather than artistic. Martigny gives a highly reduced copy of one from Donati's Dittica degli Antic. p. 149, attributed to a certain Arcobindus the Younger, consul, A.D. 506, in the eastern parts of the empire, 16th year of Anastasius (Baronius, ad An. 508). It is beautifully engraved in folio size in Gori, v. i. Its ornaments consist of two cornucopias, with the titles of the consul above them and baskets of fruit and flowers below; they are carved with leaves and connected by wreathed foliage in which the stiff conventional symmetry of Roman-Byzantine art begins to show itself. Gori calls it the Diptych of Lucca. The use of folding tablets in the services of the church seems to have been a matter of common convenience, like their use anywhere else. But many of these carvings remain, which have evidently been altered from profane uses to ecclesiastical, and still retain the original bas-reliefs with changes and adaptations. Others, again, like that of Rambona, are entirely Christian in their origin. The most ancient of the latter class is considered by Martigny to be the property of the Cathedral of Milan (Bugati, Memorie di S. Carlo in fin.), and is referred to the 4th century from the character of its sculptures. He cites others, whose coverings are lost or separated from them, whether they were of wood, ivory, or metal. That of Arcobindus bears the cross, as also the Greek diptych of Flavius Taurus Clementinus (Gori, tab. ix. and x., p. 260, vol. i.). The Rambona ivory, though only of the 9th century, is far the most interesting in existence. (See art. CRUCIFIX for a full description and woodcut; and Gori, Thes. Vet. Diptychorum, vol. iii.) It is stated by MS. Laurent. Iconographie de la Croix et du Crucifix, in Didron's Annales Archéologiques, xv. xxvi.-vii., to have been presented to the monastery of Rambona (March of Ancona) by Agiltrude, wife of Guy.

d. of Spoleto; and is of type more barbaric than the Lombard work of Verona, bearing great resemblance, in the large unmeaning faces and eyes of its figures, to many Irish and Saxon MSS. Many ancient diptychs have been used for bindings of more recent service-books; as a tablet which now covers a copy of the Gospels of St. Luke and St. John in the Vatican. Our Lord between two angels and the Magi before Herod can be traced in it. At the Cathedral of Vercelli, at St. Maximus in Trèves, and at Besançon, there are relics of this kind. Gori's Thesaurus, and Paciaudi's De Cultu S. Joannis Baptistae, contain many and most interesting records and illustrations, chiefly of Middle-Age works.

The Rambona ivory, with two others of greater antiquity, are described and represented in Buonarrotti's Vetri, p. 231. One of them is that of the Consul Basilus, in 541; the other, which Buonarrotti supposes to be more ancient, is called the Diptych of Romulus, and represents his apotheosis.

The Florentine edition of Gori's Thesaurus Veterum Diptychorum, 1755, contains a fine engraving of the half of the Diptych of Stilicho which remains in existence (see woodcut.) The consul is seated at the top, with the usual barbaric stolidity of expression, in toga picta, and curule chair: the amphitheatre and combats of wild beasts are represented below. That of Boethius, which succeeds, has standing figures of the consul, with a head of disproportioned size, but a countenance evidently studied with great care: he bears a sceptre, surmounted by an eagle, drawn with much spirit. Stilicho to all appearance, and Boethius undoubtedly, hold the mappa, the signal of beginning the games, in the right hand, as also the elder or prior Arcobindus. Gori, l. tab. vii., where the bestiarii and their opponents are of considerable merit. The curule chairs are evidently the originals of those represented in Saxon and early Norman MSS.

The Christian Diptychs of Milan, in use in the 12th century, and conjectured to belong to the 7th or 8th, are represented in Gori, vol. iii. p. 264, eqq. They represent the history of the New Testament; and in particular, the Nativity, the Transfiguration, and the Passion of our Lord. They must certainly be well within our allotted period of the first eight centuries. Those of Monza (Murray, Handbook N. Italy, p. 184) are referred to either Claudian, Ausonius, or Boethius. Another, bearing two consuls, surnamed David and Pope Gregory by later possessors of the diptych, is highly interesting. [R. St. J. T.]

DIRECTANEUS. Any psalm, hymn, or canticle, said in the service of the Church in monotone, without inflection, was called directaneus. It is probably to this monotone that Isidore refers when he says (De Eccl. Off. v. 5) that the primitive Church used a very simple kind of chant, more like mere recitation than singing. Aurelian (Regula, ad Virgines, c. 40) gives the following direction: "Ad Lucernarium, Directaneus parvulus, id est, 'Regina terrae,' 'Cantate Deo,' &c.;" and he further directs that at Nocturns the directaneus "Miserere mei Deus" should be said. Compare the Rule of Benedict, c. 17; and that of Caesarius of Arles, c. 31. [C.]

DISCIPLINA ARCANI, a term of post-Reformation controversy (it is used by Tentzel and Schelstrate in special dissertations A.D. 1683-5), is applied to designate a number of modes of procedure in teaching the Christian faith, akin to one another in kind, although differing considerably in character; which prevailed from about the middle of the 2nd century until the natural course of circumstances rendered any system which involved secrecy or reserve impossible. So far as these were defensible, they arose out of the principles, 1. of imparting knowledge of the truth by degrees, and in methods adapted to the capacity of the recipients, and 2. of cutting off occasion of profaneness or of more hardened unbelief by not proclaiming the truths and mysteries of the faith indiscriminately, or in plain words, or at once, to unbelievers. And these principles find their origin, and their defence, respectively in the apostle's distinction between "milk for babes" and "strong meat" for those "of full age" (Heb. v. 12-14), and again, between speaking to "carnal" and to "spiritual" hearers (1 Cor. iii. 1); and in our Lord's prohibition against "casting that which is holy to dogs," or "throwing pearls before swine," together with the habitual tone of His teaching, and in particular its parabolic character. Persecution also at first compelled to secrecy. Upon such grounds there arose, as the Church became systematized and settled, first, a distinction between catechumens and fidèles, and between different classes of catechumens, with respect to the kinds and amounts of knowledge to be imparted to each successively; and, secondly, a spirit, rather than a formal system, of habitual reticence upon the higher and more mysterious doctrines of the faith, in Christian writings or sermons likely to be read or heard by the heathen. But beyond these natural and reverent practices, the desire to meet the ancient philosophers on their own ground, and on the one hand to rationalize Christian doctrines, on the other to transcendentalize the theories of reason into anticipations and foreshadowings of the mysteries of the faith, assisted by the excess of the allegorizing principle of interpretation current in the Alexandrian Church, produced a special disciplina arcani, almost wholly at Alexandria, yet prevailing in a less degree elsewhere also, from the time of Clement of Alexandria and Origen; in which the doctrines and facts of Scripture were expounded esoterically to the initiated, who had the key to them in the true γνῶσις, while their real and deeper meaning was disguised and withheld by an "economy," or "accommodation," from others.

1. First, as regards catechumens, the earliest intimation of any system of secrecy is in Tertullian: "Omnibus mysteriis silentii fides adhibetur" (Apol. vii.); and again, speaking of heretics, "Quis catechumenus, quis fidelis, incertum est; pariter audiunt, pariter orant: etiam ethnici si supervenerint, sanctum canibus et porcis margaritæ, licet non veras, jactabunt" (Praescr. adv. Haeret. xli.). And the latter complaint, respecting catechumens, is repeated two centuries afterwards by Epiphanius (Haer. xlii. n. 3), and by St. Jerome (Comment. in Galat. vi.) with reference to the Marcionites. Later writers than Tertullian specify particulars, e.g. baptism, the eucharist, and the oil of chrism, ἀσὶς ἐκπορεύειν ἔστιν τοῖς ἀμύτοις (St. Basil. M., De Spir. S. xvii.); and St. Greg. Naz. (Orat. xi. De Bapt.), "Ἐχει τοῦ μυστηρίου τὰ ἑκφρα καὶ τοὺς τῶν πολλῶν ἁκούς οὐκ ἀπόρρητα, τὰ δὲ ἄλλα εἶσω μαθήσῃ; and St. Cyril of Jerusalem (Catech. vi. c. 30), Οὐδὲ τῶν μυστηρίων ἐνὶ κατηχομένων λευκὰς λαλοῦμεν, ἀλλὰ πολλὰ πολλὰς λέγομεν ἐπιμετανομήσαντες, ἵνα οἱ εἰδότες πιστοὶ σωθῶσι, καὶ οἱ μὴ εἰδότες μὴ βλαβῶσι. And the Apost. Canons (lxxv.) speak of αἱ δια-

ταγαλ . . . ὅς οὐ χρή δημοσιεύειν ἐπὶ πάντων διὰ τὰ ἐν αὐταῖς μυστικά. Similarly the proclamation in the Apost. Constit. (viii. 12) and in the Liturgies, Μὴ τις κατηχούμενον, μὴ τις ἀκροαμένον, μὴ τις τῶν ἀπίστων. And the phrase, "missa catechumenorum," used in St. Aug. Serm. xlix. A.D. 396, Conc. Carthag. IV. c. 84, A.D. 398, and Conc. Ilerd. A.D. 523, c. 4, and Jo. Cassian, Coenob. Institut. xi. 15, and Conc. Valent. A.D. 524, c. 1. So Conc. Arausic. I. A.D. 441, c. 19, "Ad baptisterium catechumeni numquam admittendi." And while Conc. Laodic. A.D. 365, c. 5, μὴ δεῖν τὰς χειροτονίας ἐπὶ παρουσία ἀκροαμένων γίνεσθαι may possibly refer to the consecration, as probably as to the election, of a bishop: St. Chrysostom certainly speaks of ordination (Hom. xviii. in 2 Cor.), when he refrains from detailing what takes place at a χειροτονία, "which the initiated know; for all may not be revealed to the uninitiated." The eucharist again was celebrated with closed doors (St. Chrys. Hom. in Matt. xxiii.), not to be opened to anybody, even one of the faithful, at the time of the Anaphora (Apost. Constit. viii. 11), and to be guarded by the deacons, lest any unbeliever or uninitiated person enter (ib. ii. 57). So again Pseudo-Augustin (Serm. ad Neophyt. i.), "Dimissis jam catechumenis, . . . quia specialiter de coelestibus mysteriis loquuturi sumus." And to the same effect, St. Ambrose (De His Qui mysteriis Initiantur, c. 1), Theodoret (Quaest. xv. in Num.), Gaudentius (Serm. II. ad Neophyt.), and above all the catechetical lectures of St. Cyril of Jerusalem, which are framed expressly upon this principle, and the preface to which forbids the communication of their more advanced contents to those who are without, if any such should ask what St. Cyril had said. See also the directions to widows in Apost. Constit. iii. 5. Lastly, and further still, besides this general and perpetually recurring distinction between initiated (μεμνημένοι) and uninitiated (ἀμύητοι), distinctions were made between the more and the less advanced of the latter themselves: the Lord's Prayer; Constit. Apostol. vii. 44; St. Aug. Enchirid. c. 71; Theodoret, Haeret. Fab. v. 28, and Epist. Div. Decret. c. xviii.; St. Chrys. Hom. xx. al. xix. in Matt.; the Creed; St. Ambrose, Ad Marcell. Epist. 33 (20 ed. Bened.); St. Jerome, Epist. xxxviii. Ad Pam-mach. (ed. Ben.); and the doctrine of the Holy Trinity (St. Cyril Hieros. Catech. vi. 30), being taught only to the competentes, the first, in St. Augustine's time, only eight days before baptism (St. Aug. Hom. xlii., Conc. Agath. c. 13), the second at some like period, and the last mentioned during the last forty days. Catechumens also were allowed to hear the sermon, but no further, in the African Church (Conc. Carthag. as above), in that of Gaul (from Conc. Arausic. I. A.D. 441, c. 18), and in that of Spain (from Conc. Valentin. A.D. 524, c. 1).

II. Apart from the special discipline of catechumens, the Christian fathers, from the 2nd to at least the 5th century, habitually refrain from speaking plainly of the deeper mysteries of the faith, in writings or sermons accessible to the heathen. Origen, e.g. (Cont. Cels. i. 7, Opp. i. 325), enumerating the doctrines that were not hidden, mentions the birth, crucifixion, and resurrection of our Lord, the resurrection of the dead, and the last judgment, but omits the doctrines of the Holy Trinity and of the Atonement (compare St. Paul's account of the elements of the faith in Heb. vi.). St. Cyril of Jerusalem (Lect. Catech. vi. 30; Op. i. 106, ed. 1720) tells us, that it is not permitted to speak to a heathen of the mystery of the Holy Trinity. Sozomen omits the Nicene creed from his history (i. 20), expressly because that work would probably be read by heathen readers. St. Chrysostom will not speak fully of baptism in a homily, because of the "uninitiated" among his hearers (Hom. xl. in 1 Cor.). St. Augustine reckons both sacraments among the "occulta" (in Ps. ciii.; see also Hom. xcvi. in Joann., and in Ps. cix.). Pope Innocent I. (Ad Decentium, c. 3) will not recite the words even of Confirmation, "ne magis prodere videar, quam ad consultationem responderem." The last words of the Apostolic Constitutions forbid the making these books public (bk. viii. in fin.): "preach of the mysteries contained in them." So St. Cyril of Alexandria (Cont. Julian. vii.), and many others; while the words of Theodoret (Quaest. xv. in Num.) may be taken as a summary: "We speak obscurely of the Divine mysteries on account of the uninitiated; but when these have withdrawn, we teach the initiated plainly." Such topics are to be mentioned to persons in general "in enigmas and shadows, mystically, not clearly." And any statement about them is repeatedly broken off with "the faithful," or "the initiated, know." Compare also the distinction drawn by St. Cyril of Jerusalem between περιχεῖσθαι and ἐπηχεῖσθαι. The reasons assigned for the practice are:—1. To avoid offence to the weak or to the heathen, οὐκ ἐπειδὴ ἀσθήνεια κατέγνωμεν τῶν τελουμένων, ἀλλ' ἐπειδὴ ἀτελέστερον οἱ πολλοὶ πρὸς αὐτὰ ἐκδιαικνύται (St. Chrys. Hom. in Matt. xliii. al. xxiv.), or again, more forcibly, οὐ χρή τὰ μυστήρια ἀμύητοις τραφεῖν, ἵνα μὴ ἔλθῃς μὲν ἀγνοοῦντες γελᾶσι, κατηχούμενοι δὲ περιέργοι γενόμενοι σκανδαλίζονται (Conc. Alexandr. ap. St. Athan. Apol. ii.). To which may be added the still more forcible words of St. Clem. Alex. (Strom. i. pp. 323, 324), who says that he suppressed some portions of the truth, not as grudging it, but fearing lest he should put a sword into the hand of a child. 2. Out of reverence: "Adhibuimus tam sanctis rebus atque Divinis honorem silentii" (St. Aug. Serm. i. inter. xl.). To which, 3. St. Augustine adds another of a more superficial kind, viz. the excitement of curiosity; saying to catechumens, "Si non excitat te festivitas (Paschae), ducat ipsa curiositas," and therefore, "da nomen ad baptismum" (De Verb. Dom. Hom. xli.).

It must be added, in order to complete the case, first, that such a principle of reticence is not to be looked for, for obvious reasons, in the earlier Apologists in persecuting times; e.g. there is no trace of it in Justin Martyr, Tatian, Athenagoras, Theophilus (Bingh. X. v. 2). In such cases, the desire to avoid scandal to the weak, and the feeling of reverence for the truth itself, must needs, and rightly, give way to the clear necessity of a plain statement of the whole truth. Next, that the reserve in question was simply (so to say) a temporary educational expedient; and was never practised towards the "faithful" themselves, to whom the whole truth was declared in plain words; and that there are no grounds interver for supposing the existence of an esoteric system of doctrine, not appearing at all in any of the writings or documents of the earlier church, but brought to light in subsequent centuries, although secretly held all along.

III. So far, there can be no question made of a defensibility of the principle of reserve, as applied; however plain it may be, that it has not speedily become impossible to maintain in the practice. It is obviously a perfectly fair proceeding, to withhold truths avowedly from one to whom it will do harm to declare them. The Alexandrian schools, however, seem to have stretched the casuistry of truthfulness to a point beyond this. Controversially, it is no doubt both allowable, and wise, to state the truth in terms acceptable to the views and prejudices of an opponent as sincerity will permit, but certainly further. To help a Platonist, e.g. to believe the doctrine of the Holy Trinity, by pointing out how far Platonism itself advances towards that doctrine, is plainly as consistent with honesty as it is with good sense; but so to speak to imply the identity of the two doctrines has actually proved to be a fruitful parent of error, and is distinctly not honest. So again is obviously fair to neutralize an opponent's objection by pointing out that it includes in its range that opponent's own erroneous or incomplete view as well as the orthodox faith; but only if the latter is not confounded with the former as though it were the same thing. An argumentum ad hominem, used as such avowedly, of course justifiable, so that it be not put forward as the arguer's own bona fide belief. The Alexandrian school, however, seem to have reconomized," in managing controversies, both fact and avowedly, in the extremest sense of the lines of argument thus suggested. St. Clement of Alexandria, for instance, lays down as a principle (Strom. vii. 9), that the true Gnostic, indeed, "bears on his tongue whatever he has in his mind," but it is "to those who are worthy to hear;" adding, that "he both thinks and speaks the truth, unless at any time, medicinally, as physician for the safety of the sick, he may or tell an untruth, as the Sophists say." ἵνα πρὸς ψεύδεται, καὶ ψεύδος λέγει, is the Platonic way of putting it.) So also (Strom. vi. 15), ὕσταται τῷ ἔντι οὐχ ὁ συμπεριφερόμενος δι' ἰστορίαν σωτηρίας, ἀλλ' οἱ εἰς τὰ κυριότατα παρίκτορες, καὶ ἀθετοῦντες μὲν τὸν Κύριον ἔσονται ἐν' αὐτοῖς, ἀποστεροῦντες δὲ τοῦ Κυρίου τὴν ἀληθῆ διδασκαλίαν. And Origen, as quoted St. Jerome (Adv. Rufin. Apol. i. c. 18), in like manner lays down a caution, implying a principle, that "homo cui incumbit necessitas mentiendi, diligenter attendat, ut sic utatur verbum mendacio, quomodo condimento atque dicamine, ut servet mensuram ejus: ex quo," adds, "perspicuum est, quod nisi ita mentitur, ut magnum nobis ex hoc aliquod quæsitur bonum, judicandi simus quasi inimici Ejus i ait, Ego sum veritas." Further, St. Clement appears to hold an esoteric traditional teaching; to have been delivered to St. Peter, St. James, John, and St. Paul (Strom. i. 1, vi. 7; and v. seeb. H. E. ii. 1); and Origen likewise (Cont. I. i. 7) speaks of an esoteric Christian teaching; but obviously means no more by the terms, least in this passage, than to affirm the distinction between elementary teaching and the deeper doctrines of the faith as taught successively to catechumens. On the other hand (Cont. Celso. vi.) he speaks of an oral traditional knowledge, ὡς παρατέταται τοῖς πολλοῖς, οὐδὲ ἔντι. But St. Clement's γνώσις was not a distinct inner system of doctrine differing from that which was to be taught to the πᾶσι, but rather a different mode of apprehending the same truths, viz. from a more intellectual and spiritual stand-point. In actual fact, we find, by way of instance, St. Gregory of Neo-Cæsarea, Origen's pupil, using language respecting the Holy Trinity that is confessedly erroneous, and defended by St. Basil (Epist. ccx. § 5) on the ground that he was "not teaching doctrine but arguing with an unbeliever," and that in such a case "he would rightly in some things concede to the feelings of the unbeliever, in order to gain him over to the cardinal points." The whole subject will be found ably and profoundly discussed in Newman's Arians, c. i. § iii. pp. 40-102 (3rd edition). How far the practice was borrowed from, or unconsciously furthered by, the undisguised principles and practice of Philo-Judaism on the subject, may be doubted. That writer certainly, both in actual exposition of Scripture and in avowed principle, assumes that duller souls must be taught "falsehoods by which they may be benefited, if they cannot be brought to a sound mind through the truth" (Quid Deus sit Immutabilis, Opp. i. 282, ed. Mangey). But there is no need for looking beyond Scripture itself for the germ and principle of a true and legitimate "oecumenism." The Alexandrian divines themselves are only responsible for pushing that principle to a degree which made it at least extremely dangerous, and sometimes barely honest. The application of esoteric meanings to Scripture facts by the same school is a parallel case of exaggerating a principle of the analogous sort, possessing a foundation of truth, into extremes that are utterly unjustifiable.

Christ. ante Constantin.* § xxxiv. pp. 302-310; and a special dissertation, De Accommodatione Christo imprimis et Apostolis tributa, by F. A. Carus (Lips. 1793, 4), is referred to.] [A. W. H.]

DISCIPLINE. (1.) From the earliest time the Church has endeavoured, in accordance with the Lord's commands, to maintain its own purity both in life and doctrine. In the earliest ages, the penalties for transgressing the laws of the Church, in whatever respect, were of course of a purely spiritual nature, and enforced by the authority of the Church itself, which had no jurisdiction in invitum. The means which the Church employed for the correction of offenders within her pale were admonition, withdrawal of privileges, the enjoining of acts of mortification, and, in the last resort, exclusion from the Church altogether [EXCOMMUNICATION]. From this constant effort of the ecclesiastical authorities to correct offences, and to purify the Church from scandals by its own power arose the system of Penitential Discipline [PENTENCE], which is common to all members of the Church, lay and clerical, secular and regular.

But besides the general duty of maintaining holy life and true doctrine, which is incumbent on all Christians, the clergy and the members of monastic orders voluntarily take upon themselves peculiar obligations, and the enforcing of these by the proper authorities constitutes a special subdivision of discipline. On the subject of Monastic and Canonical Discipline, see below.

What has been said applies to the Church in all ages, whether before or after its connection with the State. But from the time of Constantine, when the existence of Christianity in the empire was formally recognised, and the Church adopted as an institution guarded and respected by the State, we no longer find its disciplinary laws solely in its own canons and decrees, nor its punishments solely spiritual and over persons who give a voluntary submission. The several codes of the empire not only recognise generally the fact that its subjects are Christian, but frequently adopt and sanction laws enacted originally by purely ecclesiastical authority; and this in two ways. In some cases ecclesiastical laws and principles are simply adopted into the civil code, and enforced by civil tribunals and civil sanctions; in others the ecclesiastical authority [see APPEAL]—generally the BISHOP (p. 231)—is empowered to call in the secular arm to enforce its decisions; see, for instance, Justinian's Code, lib. 1, l. 25., De Episc. Audien. It is evident that this change in the relations of Church and State converted many acts, which had previously been disregarded by the civil power, into crimes, or offences against the sovereign authority, and gave a different aspect to many delicts which still remained in the cognizance of the Church. Discipline was henceforward enforced partly by the spiritual, partly by the secular arm; the State reinforced the Church with more or less vigour according to the disposition of the rulers for the time being; and the ecclesiastical authorities made constant efforts to withdraw the clergy from the jurisdiction of the civil courts altogether [IMMUNITIES OF THE CLERGY; JURISDICTION; and the articles on the several offences which have been subject to censure or punishment in the Church]. [C.]

(2.) Monastic Discipline.—Monastic punishments were of two kinds, corporal and spiritual, and, in each kind, more or less severe, according to the nature of the offence or the founder's ideas of discipline. Instances of both kinds occur very early in the history of monasticism. Thus Basil of Caesarea speaks of various degrees of excommunication—from joining in the chanting, from choir, and from meals (Serm. de Mon. Instit.), while about the same date Jerome and Rufinus make mention of fastings as a punishment (Hieron. Ep. ad Nepotian.; Rufin. De Verb. Sen. 29). Augustine speaks of offending monks (fratres) being anathematised, if incorrigible after reproofs, and of their excommunication by their superiors (præpositi) of higher or lower rank, the excommunication by the bishop being the severest punishment of all (De Corrupt. et Grat. ad Valent. c. 15). A passage in one of his letters implies his approval of flogging as a chastisement (Ep. ad Marcellin., 159). In the writings of Cassian, early in the 5th century, monastic discipline becomes more closely defined. For slighter offences, such as coming late to prayers or work, making a mistake in chanting, breaking anything, or speaking to any other monk than the one who shares the cell, the offender is to prostrate himself in the chapel during divine service or to make genuflections till allowed by the abbot to cease (Cassian, Inst. iv. c. 16). Cassian tells a story of an Egyptian monk doing public penance for having dropped three peas, while acting as cook for the week (Inst. iv. 20). For graver offences, as bad language or greediness, the punishment is flogging or expulsion (Inst. iv. c. 16). For lingering after nocturns instead of going at once to the cell, a monk is to be excommunicated (ii. 15); no one being allowed to pray with him till he has been publicly absolved (ii. 16). Cassian speaks of a slap or buffet, "alapa," as a punishment among monks (Coll. xix. 1. cf. Greg. M. Dialog. i. 2, ii. 4). Palladius, about the same date, in describing the monks of Nitria, relates that three whips or scourges hung from a pillar in a part of the church apparently corresponding to a chapter-house, one for the correction of robbers, one for unruly guests, one for the monks (Hist. Laus. 2). He speaks also of confinement in a cell (ib. cc. 32, 33). About half a century later the Council of Chalcedon pronounces anathema on a monk returning to the secular life (Conc. Chalced., c. 7). Being, as a rule, at that date still laics, monks thus offending were anathematised, not degraded. Dorotheus, an Archimandrite in Palestine, very early in the 7th century, speaks of fasting as a punishment for monks (Doctrina. c. 14, ap. Ducean. Auctuar. i. 743). One of the strongest instances of monastic severity in the East is in the Scala of Joannes Climacus, sometimes called Scholasticus,* of Mount Sinai, in the preceding century, who speaks of offenders being dragged by a rope through ashes, their hands bound behind their backs, and flogged till those who witnessed the punishment "howled;" afterwards they were to lie prostrate at the church-door till absolved after public confession (Scala, c. 4).

In the West, too, prior to the Benedictine rule, monastic discipline was very rigorous. Each monastery had its own code; but, probably, in Southern Europe Cassian's influence was felt largely. In the Regula Tarnatensis, the rule (c. 550 A.D.) of a monastery in south-eastern France, which Mabillon identifies with that of Tarnay, near Vienne (Annal., tom. i. App. ii. Disquis. 5), a monk who jests is to be chidden (c. 13; cf. Bas. Constit. Monast. c. 13, on scurrility). In the rule of Ferreolus, bishop of Uzes, in Languedoc, about the same date, a fast of three days is imposed for jesting during lectures (c. 24), and thirty days' silence for railing (c. 22). But the Regula Cujusdam Patris, supposed by Menard to be the rule of Columba (c. 561 A.D.), is stricter still, especially against the murmuring or refractory: even a thoughtless word is visited with imprisonment (c. 8). Columbanus, of Luxeuil and Bobbio (c. 590 A.D.), trod in the steps of his ascetic predecessor. Six blows were to be the penalty for such offences as speaking at refection, not responding to the grace, not being careful to avoid coughing in chanting, &c. For other similar transgressions the punishment was the "impositio" of Psalms to be learned by heart, or the "superpositio," complete silence for me (Reg. Columban. c. 10). Darker offences were visited with proportionate severity. Thus, a perjury the penalty was solitary confinement on bread and water for three years (Columb. De Penitent. Mensur. c. 32; cf. passim). The milder discipline of Benedict gradually ended itself, in the 6th and 7th centuries, in Italy even into parts of Europe already copied by other rules, as was France by that of Columbanus. He prescribed two reproofs in private, followed by one in public, before proceeding to severer remedies. If these were ineffectual, then ensued excommunication, or for those too young or otherwise disqualified for ritual censures, corporal punishment (Reg. c. 23). The incorrigible were to be flogged and prayed for; and, as a last resource, expelled (ibid. c. 28); if re-admitted, they were to be placed in the lowest grade (c. 29); cf. Greg. M. Lib. x. iv. Ep. 39; Lib. i. Ind. ix. Ep. 19. A sknag or waste was lightly regarded, unless confessed (c. 46); and the confession of secrets was to be made, not in public, but to the dean [DECANUS, § v.] (seniori suo, c. 46). For the contumacious, after four admonitions, was to be subject to the "disciplina regularis," consisting, with, probably, solitary confinement on bread and water (cc. 3, 65). Where not adopted as a whole, the Benedictine rule was frequently incorporated with other rules. Thus the rule of Isidore of Seville, in the first part of the 7th century, though more minute in its distinctions, resembles the Benedictine code of punishments (Isid. Reg. c. 17; cf. x. Ann. iii. 37, xii. 42). Donatus of Besançon, about the middle of this century, himself pupil of Columbanus, blended the two rules in his "disciplina" with him seems to mean flogging or solitary confinement (Don. Reg. ad g. c. 2); silence or fifty stripes is the penalty for idle words (c. 28). Later in the century, Cyprianus of Braga in Portugal, founder of the monastery of Alcala (Complutum) near Madrid, borrowed largely from Benedict (Fruct. c. 17; cf. Mab. Ann. iii. 37). The Council of Sens, near Paris, 755 A.D., speaks of a prison or flogging-room—"locus custodiae" or "alsatorium" (Conc. Vern. c. 6). The Harmony of Monastic Rules, compiled in the 9th century by the namesake of the founder of the Benedictines, contains a gradation of punishments, which is on the whole equitable, but too severe in the 11th century the influence of Petrus Damiani produced a rigour hitherto unknown within the walls of Monte Casino: each monk, after his session every Friday, was to be whipped, by self or by others, in cell, chapter, or oratory (Asset. vi. 4). In the famous monastery of St. Gall, in Switzerland, the whip for similar offences was suspended from a pillar in the prior-house (ib.).

Voluntary flagellations, or self-scourgings, as a recognised part of monastic discipline, began at the middle of the 11th century, at the suggestion of Petrus Damiani (Richard et Giraud, Hist. Sacr. s. v.), or according to Mabillon (SS. Ben. Praef., Saec. vi., l. a. 6), rather earlier (cf. Boileau, l'abbé, Hist. Flagell., 1700).

3.) Canonical Discipline.—Though the rule of the Canonici was easier than that of the Monachi, their code of punishments was severe. By Chrodegang's rule, any canon failing to make a full confession at stated times twice a year, was to be flogged or incarcerated (Chrom. Reg. c. 14). Any canon guilty of theft, murder, or any grave offence was liable to both these penalties; he was, besides, to do public penance by standing outside the chapel during the "hours," and by lying prostrate at the door as the others were going in and out, and to practise extraordinary abstinence, until absolved by the bishop (c. 15). Any canon speaking to one excommunicated incurred excommunication himself (c. 18). The refractory or contumacious were, after two reproofs, to do open penance by standing beside the cross; they were to be publicly excommunicated, or, if insensible to such a punishment, flogged (c. 17). Lesser offences, if confessed, were to be treated lightly; if detected, severely (c. 18). The measurement and apportionment of penalties was in the hands of the bishop (c. 19). But certain rules to guide the bishop's subordinates, "praesati inferiores" (perhaps—deacons), in the exercise of this discretionary power were laid down by the Council at Aachen, 816 A.D. Boys were to be beaten. Older members of the community were, for more venial faults, as neglecting the "hours," being careless at work or in chapel, late at meals, out without leave or beyond the proper time, after three private admonitions, to be admonished publicly, to stand apart in the choir, and to be kept on bread and water. For a graver fault, "culpa criminalis," unless atoned for by spontaneous penance, they were to be publicly excommunicated, "damnantur," by the bishop, and to be imprisoned, lest they should "taint the rest of the flock" (Conc. Aquisgr. c. 134). It is to be noted that it seems customary then to have a prison within the precincts of the monastery or canonry ("ut fit multis in monasteriis"), and that disobedience, rudeness, or quarrelling are not, as with monks, classed among things of a darker die (ib.). The same council, in a subsequent session, enacted a similar scale of punishment for nuns, "sanctimoniales," with the same climax of solitary confinement for the incorrigible (Conc. Aquisgr. lib. ii. c. 8). The rule was to be recited in chapter very frequently (cc. 69, 70).

For monastic and canonical discipline generally, see BENEDICTINE RULE, CANONICAL MONACHISM.

(4.) From the constant use of the rod or scourge in monastic discipline (see above, § 2) the word disciplina came itself to mean flogging. In the Liber Ordinis S. Victoris Paris., c. 33 (quoted by Ducange) is a full description of the manner in which a monk ought to take punishment (disciplinam accipere). Sometimes disciplina is used with a qualifying word, as "discip. flagelli" (Reg. S. Aurel. c. 41); "discip. corporalis" (Reg. Chrodegang. cc. 3, 4, 14; Capitul. A.D. 803, v. 1). [CORPORAL PUNISHMENT.] [C.]

DISCOFERAE. In convents of nuns the sisters who bring the dishes to table are sometimes called discoferae. Caesarius of Arles (Ad Oratorium Abbatissarum) gives the direction, "aequalia cibaria potionesque communes exhibent discoferae vel pincernae" (Ducange, s. v.). [C.]

council of Arles (c. 10), referring to the eleventh canon of the first council of Nicaea, condemns those who have fallen away under persecution to five years among the catechumens, and two "inter discommunicantes, ita ut communionem inter poenitentes non praesumant." The canon of Nicaea referred to has "δύο ἐτη χωρὶς προσφορᾶς κοινωνήσουσι τῷ λαῷ τῶν προσευχῶν." When all who offered communicated, this was equivalent to a sentence of exclusion for two years from the mysteries, though not from the preliminary prayers. [See COMMUNION, p. 415.] [C.]

DISPUTATIO. In some monastic Rules a discussion on Scripture, called Disputatio, is one of the exercises prescribed to the monks. For instance the Rule of Pachomius (c. 21) directs: "Disputatio autem Praepositis domorum tertio fiet." [Compare COLLATION.] [C.]

DIVINATION. It was all but inevitable in the nature of things that the ineradicable desire to penetrate the secrets of the future should show itself sooner or later in some form of superstition within the Christian Church. Jews and heathens had alike been accustomed to practices of which that desire had been the origin. The decay and disrepute of the older oracles, of which the legend that they ceased at the time of the Nativity of Christ was the representation, forced men back upon the more mysterious and recondite arts by which the secrets of the future were to be unveiled. The mind of the Church was, of course, from the first opposed to such attempts, and taught men to leave the future in the hands of God. But the laws and canons which meet us alike in East and West testify to the strength of the superstition against which the warfare was thus waged. It can hardly be said, looking at Christendom as a whole, to have succeeded in repressing it.

The revival within the Church of the arts of the old Chaldaean soothsayers has been noticed under ASTROLOGERS and CALCULATORES. But the elaborate system of divination which was officially recognised in the auguries of the Roman republic and empire, and which had a thousand ramifications in private and local superstitions, was even more difficult to cope with. As early as the Council of Elvira (c. 62) we find the augur named among those who were not to be admitted to Christian communion unless they renounced their calling.* The Fourth Council of Carthage (c. 59) excommunicated any who addicted themselves to practices that were so essentially heathen. That of Ancyra (c. 24) condemned the καταμαρτυρόμενοι to five years' penance. See also the 'Penitential' printed in Menard's Sacram. Greg. p. 467. The legislation of the emperors was even more stern in its severity; but the sharpness of the law was in this case due, like the old edicts of banishment against the Chaldaei under Tiberius, to the influence of suspicious fear. Diviners, who were consulted as to the length of the emperor's life might help to work out the fulfilment of their own predictions. So we find Constantius inflicting the penalty of death on all who were known to consult soothsayers or observe omens. Even the credulous peasants, to whom the cry of a weasel or a rat was a presage of evil, were hunted down and condemned (Cod. Theod. ix. tit. 16, leg. 4; Ammian. Marcell. xvi. p. 72). Valens, in like manner, half believing in what he sought to repress, having heard that it had been declared as the result of such divining arts (in this case νεκρομαντεία is named), that the name of his successor should begin with ΘΕΟΔ, not only enforced the law in its fullest severity against the diviner, but sought out and put to death all whom he could find whose names brought them within the range of his suspicion (Socrates, H. E. iv. 19). It is probable enough that the widespread belief thus engendered really helped to prepare the way for Theodosius.

It was comparatively easy to condemn arts that were manifestly heathen in their nature. It was more difficult when the practice came with Christian associations and appealed to men's reverence for the Sacred Books. The principle of casting lots was recognised in Scripture as an appeal from the ignorance of man to the Providence of God (Acts i. 26; Prov. xvi. 33; xviii. 18 et al.). What form of sortes could be more certain to direct men in the right path than an appeal to the Written Word? Here, too, both Jewish and heathen influences may have helped to foster the new form of superstition. The Jew had been in the habit of so dealing with the Law, opening it at random, taking the verse on which he lighted as an oracle from God. It was his substitute for the Urim and Thummim, and the utterance of a prophet's voice (Gemar. Hieros. Schabb. f. 8). The Roman, anticipating the mediaeval belief as to the poet's character, had looked to the Aeneid of Virgil as filling up the gap left by the dumbness of the oracles. The sortes Virgilianae were in repute as having predicted the power and character of Hadrian (Spartian. Vit. Had. p. 5), and Alexander Severus (Lamprid. Vit. Alex. p. 341). So in like manner the Bible, as a whole, or certain portions of it, came to be treated in the 4th century, if not earlier. It appears to have prevailed in the West rather than the East, but was never during the period with which we are concerned in any degree sanctioned by the Church or its leaders. Augustine, who had been consulted by Januarius as to its legitimacy, thought it a less evil than seeking knowledge from demons, but condemned it, as bringing down the Divine Word to base and trivial uses (Epist. ad Januarium, cxix. (aliter lv.) c. 37). The provincial Councils of Gaul in the 5th century condemned the "sortes divinationis," "sortes sanctorum," and threatened clergy or monks who practised them with severe penalties (C. Venetic.

* There is, however, the various reading of "auriga."

DIVINE SERVICE

6; Agathena. 42; Aurel. I. c. 30). The vice grew, however, in spite of the prohibition, with the increasing power of the Franks, Gregory of Tours (Hist. iv. 16) describes a service in which, with great solemnity, in the presence of bishops and priests in the celebration as at Dijon, the volumes of the Epistles and Gospels were thus opened in order to ascertain the fortunes of the son of Clothaire. [E. H. P.]

[VINE SERVICE. [COMMUNION, HOLY: 1: HOUSE OF PRAYER: OFFICE, THE DIVINE SERVICE.]

[VISIO APOSTOLORUM. [APOSTLES' VISIO, p. 87.]

[VISIO MENSURNA. The division of revenues of a church among the clergy seems not only to have been monthly; this monthly rent is called by Cyprian "divisio mensuraria," a suspension from this was equivalent to a suspension in later times was called suspension "a sacro," which did not necessarily imply suspension from ministerial functions (Cyprian, l. 34, c. 3). [OBLATIONS; PROPERTY OF CHURCH.] [C.]

DOCTOR. Besides the general sense of "teacher," this word early acquired certain special significations:—

Doctor Audientium, the officer of the church whom was committed the instruction of CATECHUMENS (p. 319). When we read in the Passio Perpetuae et Felice (c. 13; Ruinart, p. 99) Aspasius, "presbyter doctor," stood before the emperor, we ought probably to understand that as a presbyter who bore the office of Doctor Audientium. Cyprian, too, speaks (Epist. 29) of "presbyteri doctores," as well as of a reader who held the office of teacher of the catechumens.

Persons whose teaching was of special importance in the church were called Doctores. The Decretum (c. 1) of Celestinus (A.D. 422–432) contains those who set themselves up against the emperor, meaning apparently in this case more particularly St. Augustine (c. 2) and the bishops (c. 3). The same prohibition is repeated in the Capitulum Car. M. vii. c. 44.

The term legis doctor seems to have acquired a technical force at a comparatively early date. Adrevaldus (De Mirac. S. Bened. i. 25) speaks of a certain "legis doctor"—clearly a person who deferred judgment in consequence of having received a bribe; and a charter of the emperor, mayor of the palace (quoted by Ducange, Doctor Legis), speaks of things decided by the doctores nostri, vel Comites palatii nostri vel alii legis doctores, where the doctors are clearly persons who have an official right to interpret the law. [C.]

DOCTORS, CHRIST IN CONFERENCE WITH. This subject is represented in a fresco in the first cubiculum of the Callixtine Catacomb. See in Bottari, tavv. xv. and liv., also tav. 1. Both are conventionally arranged, our Lord seated on a lofty seat in the midst, with hands joined in the act of speaking; the doctors on the right and left, with some expression of respect on their countenances. The only sarcophagus besides that of Junius Bassus (Bottari, which indisputably contains this subject, cited by Martigny to be that in S. Ambrogio at Milan. (Allegrezza, Sacra Monna. Ant. de Milano, tav. iv.) See, however, Bottari, vol. i. tav. 33. All the surrounding figures are seated in this example, but our Lord is placed above them in a kind of stall or edicule, with two palm-trees at its sides. He holds a book or roll in His hand, which is partly unrolled, while the doctors have closed theirs. So also in Allegrezza, tav. i., a mosaic from St. Aquilinus of Milan. The Lord's elevated seat is placed on a rock, with the Divine Lamb below, probably in reference to Rev. v. as "able to open the Book." On the right and left, at His feet, are Joseph and Mary in the attitude of adoration.

Perret (l. pl. i.) gives a copy of a very skilful painting from the catacombs, which places two doctors on the Lord's right hand, who are expressing attention and wonder, and Joseph and Mary on the other, with looks of patient waiting on Him. The figure on the left is so evidently feminine, as to repel the idea that the four evangelists are intended.

The fine diptych of the 5th century at the Cathedral of Milan and that of Murano (Bugati, Mem. di S. Celso and Gori, Thes. Dipt. viii. tab. 8, see woodcut) also represent our Lord sitting, with the doctors standing before Him. These represent Him of more mature appearance and stature than the account in the Gospels quite warrants. The figure below our Lord's feet is supposed to represent Uranus or the Firmament of Heaven (Pa. xviii. 9). [R. St. J. T.]

DOLIUM. This seems to be the most convenient generic term for the various representations of casks and large vessels which occur frequently in early Christian art, and have symbolic meaning very generally attributed to them. (Boldetti, pp. 164–368; Perret, iii. 3; Bottari, tav. 155.) As they are generally found on tombs they are taken as empty, representing the body when the soul has fled from it. If the marriage of Cana (see s. v. CANA) can be supposed to be so frequently used on sarcophagi as a symbol of the Resurrection, the cask may be supposed to represent a water-vessel, and be a short-hand symbol of the Miracle. This seems altogether unlikely, and, moreover, in almost all cases the vessels represented are strictly "waterpots of stone" or hydrine. The close juncture of the staves of a cask has been taken to indicate Christian unity.

Martigny conjectures (quoting St. Cyprian, Ep. xvi. Ad Confess. Rom. "Vini vice sanguinem funditis") that the form of a cask has been given to certain small vessels for preserving the blood of martyrs (e.g. Boldetti, pp. 163-4), with allusion to the power of their self-sacrifice in holding the Church together. He concludes, however, on the whole, that the picture of the Dolium was very possibly only a play on words, from its resemblance in sound to doleo, and its inflections. This seems to be proved by his example from Mamachi (see woodcut)—two dolia, with the inscription IVLIO FILIO PATER DOLIO PATER DOLIENS. [R. St. J. T.]

DOLPHIN [see s. v. FISH]. As in the case of other Christian symbols, the dolphin is used from a very early date in two or more senses, representing either the Lord Himself, the individual Christian, or abstract qualities such as those of swiftness, brilliancy, conjugal affection, &c. In a painting given by De Rossi (vol. i. tav. viii.), two dolphins bear (apparently) vessels with the Sacramental loaves. It has been suggested, and is not improbable, that the Dolphin embracing the Anchor, so often found on gems, rings, &c. (Mamachi, Antiq. Christ. iii. 23; Lupi, Epitaph. Sever. M. 64, note 1), is an emblem of the Crucified Saviour, or, indeed, of the faithful follower. For its use as an emblem of swiftness, see Boldetti, p. 332, where is figured the handle of a pen found in a Christian sepulchre, fashioned into the dolphin-shape, which may indicate, as Martigny supposes, that the occupant was in life a scribe or short-hand writer.—Ps. xlv. 2. The fish with extended fins, or back bent, as if in the act of plunging forward, seems to be used to express speed in pressing forward for the prize of the Christian race. See Lupi, Epitaph. Sev. pp. 53 and 185. In the latter he is accompanied by a dove, and both are approaching a vase, which may signify the Living Waters of Baptism or of Truth. See Martigny, s. v. Dauphin. The dolphins (see woodcut), placed two close together on each side of the inscription over Baleria or Valeria Labotia, are thought to symbolize conjugal affection. [R. St. J. T.]

DOLUS MALUS. [FORGERY.]

DOME. (Commonly derived from DOMUS DEI, domes being at one time so invariable a part of churches as to usurp their name. Perhaps from doma.) A concave ceiling or cupola, either hemispherical or of any other curve, covering a circular or polygonal area; also a roof the exterior of which is of either of these forms (Parker's Gloss. s. v. CUPOLA).

The dome is not usual in churches of the basilica type, though it is sometimes found; in the church of Sta. Croce in Gerusalemme (for instance), we find a dome covering one of the chapels (the south-eastern) by which the apse is enclosed. [CHURCH, p. 370.]

In sepulchral or memorial churches, usually circular, sometimes polygonal in form, the dome, as might be expected, is of frequent occurrence. The church of Sta. Costanza is of this class, and there we find the dome supported on an interior peristyle. [CHURCH, p. 371.] The "Dome of the Rock" at Jerusalem, classed by some authorities among memorial churches, has a dome supported by four great piers. Other examples may be found in the church of St. George in Thessalonica, 5th cent., and the cathedral at Bosrah in the Hauran, of the date A.D. 512. [CHURCH, p. 372.]

The sepulchral chapel built by the empress Galla Placidia at Ravenna has a tower enclosing a small dome. [CHURCH, p. 372.] One of the most remarkable domes in the world is that of St. Sophia, both from its size and from the peculiar manner in which it is supported, not by piers or arches on every side but upon two semidomes, east and west, by which means a vast unencumbered space—200 ft. by 100 ft.—is obtained. [CHURCH, p. 373.] After the time of Justinian churches in the East were almost exclusively built after some modification of the plan of St. Sophia, in which the dome forms so important a feature. The germ of the nearly square ground-plan, with a dome covering the centre, is perhaps to be found in domed oratories or Kalybes of Syria. See woodcut, p. 347.

In the church of St. Vitalis at Ravenna, built between A.D. 526 and 547, there is a sort of clerestory, 20 ft. high, below the dome. And after the death of Justinian we find this construction, in which the dome itself is placed on a drum pierced with windows, frequent in the empire. The church of St. Clement, for instance, at Ancyra, belonging probably to the latter part of the 6th and beginning of the 7th century, had such a dome placed on a low drum. The church of St. Irene, at Constantinople (earlier part of the 8th century), has the dome on a drum of great height; and a similar dome is found in the church of St. Nicholas of Myra, which is perhaps of more modern date. [CHURCH, p. 378.] The Duomo Vecchio at Florence, by some assigned to the 7th century, by others to A.D. 774, is covered by a dome 65 ft. in internal diameter. [CHURCH, p. 380.] [C.]

DOMESTICUS, "belonging to the house or household," has several ecclesiastical senses:—

1. Domestici are all who belong to the "household of faith;" "omnibus congruus honor exhibetur, maxime tamen domesticis fidei" (Regula St. Bened. c. 53).

2. In the East, the principal dignitary in a church choir after the Protospathes. There was ch side of the choir, to lead the singers in al chanting (Codinus, De Offic. c. vi. § 3; ucholog. pp. 272, 278; Ducange, s. v.). vestitus Vestitoris, δ ἀποστεινός τῶν is chief door-keeper at Constantinople (De Off. c. i. § 43). [C.]

INICALIS or -LE. A fair linen cloth females at the time of the reception of arist. So far all authorities are agreed, a controverted point whether it was a il worn over the head, or a napkin in males received the Eucharist, which re forbidden to touch with the naked COMMUNION, HOLY, p. 416.] tter view is that which has the greatest , and can reckon among its supporters ghty liturgical authorities as Cardinal . Liturg. lib. ii. c. 17; Habert (Archie- . s. obs. viii.); Mabillon (de Liturg. Gall. s. r. xxv.); Macer (Hieroles., sub voc.); hes. Theol. de Symbol. Coen. Dom.), and It is chiefly based on two canons of cil of Auxerre, A.D. 578, one (can. 36) g women to receive the Eucharist bare hand; the other (can. 42) enact- every woman when she communicates ave her dominicalis or else postpone union. These two canons are inter- o refer to the same subject, and the lis has been thus identified with the cloth with which the hand was to be d the time of communion. This custom sly mentioned in a sermon printed ugustine's, but erroneously ascribed to which we read, "omnes quando com- siderant lavent manus, et omnes ntida exhibeant linteamenta ut Corpus icipiant." It will be observed that is this napkin expressly called dominicalis. tter view—that the dominicalis was a ring, a veil (cf. 1 Cor. xi. 13) is strongly d by Ducange (sub voce); Labbé (ad Com- mod.); and Baluzius (Not. in Gratian. iii. quaest. iii. c. 19), and is accepted by Bingham (bk. xv. ch. v. § 7). The pas- an ancient MS. Penitential given by "forbidding a woman to communicate as not her "dominicalis" on her head, er communicans dominicale suum super um non habuerit, &c.," is express for if it be correctly quoted. The canons Baluzius (apud Bingham, l. c.) from the of Mâcon, "in which the dominicalis is styled the veil which the women wore ir heads at the communion," do not a the acts of either the first or second of that name. This, however appears probable view. [L. V.]

INICUM. 1. One of the names of a (q. v.), Greek κυριακόν. Equivalent to Κυριακὸν δεῖπνον. Cyprian, 3; "Numquid ergo Dominicum post celebrare debemus?" And the martyrs, somewhat later, were accused of cele- collectant et Dominicum," the ordinary assembly and the Lord's Supper (Acta Procons. Saturnini, etc., c. 5; compare cc. 7 and 8). [C.]

DOMINUS or DOMNUS. 1. Equivalent to "Saint" as a title; as "Dominus Joannes" for St. John, in Cyprian's Life of Caesarius of Arles. Sometimes in the form Domnus; St. Martin, for instance, is called "Domnus Martinus" in the preface and in can. 13 of the first council of Tours. St. Peter is called "Domnus Petrus Apostolus" (Conc. Turon. II. c. 23); St. Paul, "Domnus Paulus Apostolus" (Gregory of Tours, Hist. Franc. ix. 41). The Mar of the Chaldaean Christians (as in "Mar Markos") is equivalent to Dominus.

2. Bishops are called Domini, without any further designation of their episcopal dignity. For instance, a bishop is described by Gregory the Great (Epist. iv. 27) as "Dominius Mixenatus ecclesiae." Dominus in this usage also is frequently shortened into Domnus, as, for instance, by Gregory of Tours and Gregory the Great (Ducange, s. v.). [C.]

3. Domnus was at first a title of the abbot (Reg. Benedict. 63), afterwards of his sub-officials, and, in the middle ages, of monks generally (Martene ad loc. citat.). The word was applied to saints (Sulpic. Sever., Epp. 2, 3; Mabill. Ann. O. S. B. xviii. 9), to bishops (Conc. Aurel. iii. Subscr.), and to the pope (Ducange, Glossar. Lat. s. v.). Hence the titles, "Dm," "Don," "Donna," &c. in the Romance, and, in modern French, "Dom," for monks (Ducange, Gloss. Lat. s. a. Alard. Gaz. Praef. Cusani (typ.)).

"Domna" was used similarly of nuns.

[I. G. S.]

DOMINUS VOBISCUM. 1. The versicle Dominus Vobiscum, with the response, et cum spiritu tuo, is found in the Gregorian Sacramentary immediately before the Signum Cordis, which introduces the CANON.

In the third of the ancient canons read and approved at the First Council of Braga, A.D. 563, (Brun's Canonica, ii. 35), it is provided that bishops and priests should not greet the people in different ways, but that both should use the form Dominus sit vobiscum (Ruth ii. 4), and the people respond Et cum spiritu tuo, the form handed down from the very Apostles, and retained by the whole Eastern Church. The latter assertion does not appear to be founded on fact, for the Eastern Church has constantly used the form "Peace be with you all." [PAX VOBISCUM.] The distinction which the canon notes and forbids between the priest's salutation and the bishop's, was probably that the former used the form Domnus vobiscum, the latter, as representing more completely the Lord Himself, the form Pax vobiscum. But see Krazer, De Liturgia, p. 399 f.

2. At Prime, in the Daily Office, Dominus vobiscum, with the usual response, is said before the Collect.

3. When the Breviarium Hippomenae (can. 1. ad 6) orders "ut lectores populum non salutent," the meaning probably is, that they were not permitted to use the form commonly appropriated to the higher orders, whether Dominus or Pax vobiscum. [C.]

DOMUS DEL. (1) Literally, the church as a material building (Optatus, c. Donat. iii. 17). Hence Ital. Duomo, and Germ. Dom.

(2) The Church, as the whole body of Christian people (Lucifer of Cagliari, Pro Athanasio, i. 22; Ducange, s. v.) [C.]

DONA, DONARIA. These words are not unfrequently used by Christian writers in the special sense of offerings placed in churches, particularly costly presents given as memorials of some great mercy received by the offerers (Jerome, Epist. 27, ad Eustoch.; Epist. 13, ad Paulin.; Sidonius Apoll. lib. iv. Ep. 18; Paulinus of Nola, Natal. S. Felicis, 6). The corresponding Greek word is ἑνδοχῆνα (Luke xxi. 5; 2 Maccab. ix. 16), which Suidas defines as τὰν τῶ ἀφιερωμένων ὁσέφ. See, for instance, the account of the offerings of Constantine to the Anastasis at Jerusalem (*Euseb. (5) Martyr at Caesarea in Cappadocia, with Polyeuctus and Victorius; commemorated May 21 (Mart. Adonis, Usuardi).

(6) Bishop and martyr at Aretium in Tuscany under Julian; commemorated Aug. 7 (Mart. Rom. Vet., Hieron., Bedae, Adonis, Usuardi).

(7) The presbyter and anchorite in a district on Mount Jura, in Belgic Gaul; commemorated Aug. 19 (Mart. Adonis, Usuardi).

(8) Martyr at Antioch, with Restitutius, Valerianus, Fructuosus, and twelve others; commemorated Aug. 23 (ib.).

(9) Martyr at Capua, with Quintus and Arconcius; commemorated Sept. 5 (Mart. Hieron., Adonis, Usuardi).

(10) Martyr with Hermogenes and twenty-two others; commemorated Dec. 12 (Mart. Usuardi). [W. F. G.]

DOOR (AS SYMBOL). See St. John x. 9. It seems most probable that in the various representations of sheep leaving or entering their fold or house, and so representing the Jewish or Gentile Church [BETHLEHEM; CHURCH], the door may be intended to recall the words "I am the door," to the spectator's mind. In Allegranza, Mon. di Milano, &c., tav. ii., the door is seen five times repeated, evidently with this symbolic reference, and on the porch or tympanum of the old basilica of St. Aquilinus in the same city the following verses occur:—

"Janua sum vitae; precor omnes intro venite;
Per me transibunt qui coeli gaudia quaerunt:
Virgine qui natus, nullo de patre creatus,
Intrantes salvet, redeuntes ipse gubernet."

Lupi, Diss. e Lett. i. p. 262 gives a bas-relief in gilded bronze, which contains a gate or door, with the Lamb under it bearing the Cross, and the words "Ego sum ostium, et ovile ovium." [R. St. J. T.]

DOORS OF CHURCHES. (Januae, portae, valvae; θύραι, πόλαι.)

1. The principal outer doors of a church seem to have been in ancient times at the west, if the church was so built that the altar was at the east end, or at any rate in the end facing the altar. In a basilican church of three aisles there were for the most part three western doors:

"Alma domus triplici patet ingreditibus arcu."
Paulinus of Nola, A.p. 32, ad Sev.

In Constantine's great "Church of the Saviour" at Jerusalem, the three doors faced the east [CHURCH, p. 369]. At these doors stood during service the "weepers" (προσκλαύστες). If there was a NARTHEX, the western doors gave entrance into this, and other doors again from the narthex into the nave. The nave was sometimes again itself divided into chorus and trapeza—the portions for the clerics and the people respectively—by a screen or partition having doors; but more frequently those who entered by the western doors saw before them at once the ICONOSTASIS, or screen enclosing the sanctuary, with its three doors.

2. The doors in the Iconostasis were known generally as καγκελλοθύρες, πόρται τοῦ ἁγίου

ers; the side doors distinctively as πλάγαι μεσότητες. The central doors were called the "Doors" (ἑγύαι θυράι) and sometimes the "Doors" (βασιλικαὶ θυράι).

The great western doors of the nave were the "Royal Gates" (βασιλικαὶ πύλαι); this term was also adopted by Latin writers, at "regiae" came to be used substantively these doors. Anastasius, for instance, says Pontiff. c. 119) that pope Honorius (A.D. 638) covered with silver plates the great—the so-called "Median"—doors at the entrance of a church (regias in ingressu ecclesiae res, quae appellantur medianae). When the church had a narthex, the western doors of this also sometimes called the "royal" gates. The great church of St. Sophia at Constantinople had nine doors between the narthex and nave. As these were covered with silver, they were called the "Silver Doors," the same term came to designate the doors of other churches which occupied the same position.

Another term, the application of which it is absolutely determined, is the "Benutiatas" (ἀμύαι πύλαι). These have been used to be the gates which separate the trapeza (Goar); those which separate the narthex (Ducange); or the outer gate of the narthex (Neale). The latter application is derived by the fact that the term is taken the "Beautiful Gate" of the temple, undoubtedly an outer gate.

The "Angelic Gate" (ἀγγελικὴ πύλη) was which allowed a person to enter the trapeza, to draw near the choir. Nothing farther own of it. It is not improbable that it was the same term.

The word θύρα is consistently used to denote a door within the building, and the word to designate the much larger "gates" which admitted the mass of the congregation without into the narthex or the nave. As the words like "royal" and "beautiful" are not used invariably with a special meaning, the "Holy Doors" are always the central of the Bema, and no other.

The Holy Doors were opened at the commencement of the Great Vespers, at all "cesses," whether at Vespers or in the Liturgy; at the end of the Liturgy, when the people invited to approach for the purpose of communicating (Neale, Eastern Church, Intro. pp. 200).

The doors of churches were frequently of material and workmanship. The outer of St. Sophia at Constantinople were of stone, with ornaments in relief (CHURCH, p. 10), and those of the iconostasis, as well as between the narthex and the nave, of wood. And elsewhere, as not unfrequently in the Libert Pontificalis, we read of doors of metal or of wood richly inlaid or carved. [C.]

DOORKEEPERS (φυλάκται, θυροποῖ, Ostiarii), inferior order of clergy mentioned by the St. Ignatius (Epist. Antioch.), by Eusebius E. vi. 43, and by Justinian (Novell. iii. 1). There is no mention of them in Tertullian or Augustine, from which Thomassin (Vet. et Nov. Discipl. l. i. 2, c. 30, § 8) infers that in early African church their duties were discharged by the laity. The council of Laodicea (c. 24), speaks of them among the inferior orders of clergy. At the ordination of a doorkeeper, after previous instruction by the archdeacon he was presented to the bishop who delivered to him the keys of the church, with the injunction to act as one who must render to God an account of the things which are opened by those keys (iv. Conc. Carth. c. 9). The 4th council of Toledo (c. 4) provides that a doorkeeper should keep the door of the church at the opening of councils. In the 2nd canon of another council of Toledo, held A.D. 587, it is ordered that a doorkeeper should be appointed by the priest to provide for the cleansing and lighting of the church and sanctuary (Brun's Canones, i. 220). In the Apostolic Constitutions (ii. 25) they are spoken of as belonging to that portion of the clergy which represents the Levites, but in the lowest grade. Their share of the Agapae was the same as that of a Lector or Cantor (Ibid. ii. 28); there is no mention of their ordination, and they are named among the clergy who were not permitted to baptize (Ibid. iii. 11). They were to stand during the time of service at the door of the part of the church allotted to the men (Ibid. ii. 57). They were allowed to marry (Ibid. vi. 17). [P. O.]

DORMITIO (κοίμησις), the "falling asleep," used to describe the state of those who "depart hence in the Lord" (Cyprian, Epist. i. c. 2). More especially it is used to designate the day of the departure or "Assumption" of the Virgin Mary [MARY, FESTIVALS OF]; Xanthopoulos, for instance (quoted by Ducange, s. v. Dormitio), uses the expression, κοίμησις ἑγνης, τὴν μετὰ σπασιν λέγουσιν. See Daniel's Codex Liturg., iv. 238; and Ménard's Sacram. Greg., pp. 411, 707. [C.]

DORMITORIUM. A garment for sleeping in; the "lebiton lineus" of Pachomius (Vita, c. 22). The gloss on the Rule of St. Benedict explains Dormitoria by the Greek word ἐγχαμνηθρα (Ducange, s. v.). [C.]

DORMITORY (Dormitorium). It was the primitive custom for monks to sleep all together in one large dormitory (Alteser, Aethiopic. ix. 8). Not till the 14th century (Ducange, Glossar. Lat. s. v.) was the custom introduced of using separate sleeping cells. By the rule of Benedict all were to sleep in one room, if possible (Bened. Reg. c. 22) with the abbot in their midst (cf. Magistr. Reg. c. 29; Bened. Reg. c. 22) or in larger monasteries ten or twenty together with a dean (Bened. Reg. c. 2; cf. Caesar. Arelat. Reg. ad Monach. c. 3; Rev. ad Virg. c. 7; Aureol. Reg. c. 6; Ferreol. Reg. cc. 16, 33). Only the aged, the infirm, the excommunicated were excepted from this arrangement (Cujas. Reg. c. 13). Each monk was to have a separate bed (Bened. Reg. v. s.; Caesar. Arelat. Reg. v. s.; Fructuos. Reg. c. 17). They were to sleep clothed and girded (Bened. Reg. v. s.; Mag. Reg. c. 11; Cujas. Reg. v. s.); the founder probably intending that the monk should sleep in one of the two suits ordered by his rule (Bened. Reg. c. 55); but in course of time the words were loosely interpreted as meaning only the woollen tunic (Martens, ad loc.

citat.) It was particularly enjoined, puerile as the caution sounds, by Benedict and others, that the monks were not to wear their knives in bed (Bened. Reg. c. 22; Magist. Reg. c. 11). A light was to be kept burning in the dormitory all night (Bened. Reg. v. s.; Mag. Reg. c. 29; Cujusd. Reg. v. s.). All the monks were to rise at a given signal (Regg. Monast. passim). The dormitory was to be kept under lock and key till morning (Mart. ad Bened. Reg. c. 48). The sleeping-room for stranger monks was usually close to the great dormitory, and not far from the chapel (Mart. ad Bened. Reg. c. 53; cf. Capitul. Aquisgr. 68).

In the first fervor of monastic zeal it was a common practice to sleep on the bare ground (χαμεινία; cf. Altes. Ascet. ix. 8; Vit. St. Anton. c. 6; Theodoret, Philoth. 1, &c.). Others slept on mats (ψαθία, mattae, stramenta; Cassian. Collat. i. 23; xviii. 11; Ruffin. Verb. Senior. ii. 29, 125); frequently these were made by themselves (Vit. Pachom. 43), and Augustine speaks of some strict Manicheans as "mattarii" (Cont. Faustin. v. 5). The rule of Benedict allows mattress (sagum), coverlet (laena or lina), and pillow (capitule, v. s.); but in Egypt the mattress was considered a luxury in the 4th century, not permissible except for guests (Cass. Coll. xix. 6). Some of the monks of Tabenna slept in their tunics, half sitting, half lying (Vita Pachonii, c. 14, in Rosweyde's Vit. Patr.).

The time allowed for sleep was for Egyptian monks in the commencement of monachism very short indeed (Cass. Instit. v. 20; Coll. xii. 15, xiii. 6). Arsenius is said to have contented himself with one hour only. Ruffinus speaks of others who allowed themselves four hours in the night for sleep, assigning four for prayer, four for work (Verb. Sen. c. 199). Even Benedict, though far more tolerant, forbade his disciples to retire to rest again after nocturns (Reg. c. 8; cf. Cass. Instit. ii. 12). But the rule was not adhered to strictly (Marten. ad Bened. Reg. l. c.).

The rules of the canonici in the 8th and 9th century were very similar to those of the monks. Chrodegang ordered all to sleep in one chamber, unless with the bishop's licence (Reg. c. 3). This was enforced on the canonici in their monasteries and on those dwelling under the bishop's roof, by the council of Tours, 813 A.D. (Conc. Turon. iii. cc. 23, 24). The council at Aachen, three years later, ordered bishops to see that the canonici slept in one dormitory (Conc. Aquisgr. cc. 11, 123); and in its second session repeated the decree of the council at Châlons 813 A.D., that all nuns, except the sick and infirm, should sleep in one dormitory on separate beds (Conc. Cabill. c. 59, cf. Conc. Mogunt. 813 A.D., c. 9, cf. Conc. Turon. ii. 567 A.D., c. 14). Grimlaic, in his rule for solitaries, orders that no fancy work is to be allowed on the coverlets.

DOVE (AS SYMBOL). Like the mystic fish and lamb, the dove has more than one meaning or train of meaning: it is used symbolically for the Divine Being and for the Christian worshipper; and is also represented simply in its own form on graves and the walls of catacombs. It is used very frequently (see woodcut) with Noah in the ark, in the literal sense; and in all representations of the Lord's baptism and elsewhere, the dove indicates the presence of the Holy Spirit. In one instance, an Orante surrounded by several doves is opposed on one medallion of the front of a sarcophagus to the Good Shepherd with His sheep on another.

This use of the dove is very frequent in the monuments of Southern Gaul; where, as in the catacombs, the birds which stand on each side of the monograms or crosses are often clearly intended for doves. See Leblant, Inscr. Chrétiennes de la Gaule méridionale au huitième siècle, Paris, 1856.

As an emblem of the Third Person of the Trinity, the carved or painted figure of the dove appeared from a very early period in all baptisteries (see Luke iii. 24). One of the earliest examples of this is the baptistery in the cemetery of St. Pontianus (Airinghi, ii. 275). The painting, though considered by Martigny as of later date than the building, is referred by him to the 8th century, and represents the Lord's baptism in Jordan. The rude and grim figures in this painting remind us of those of the Laurentine and other very early MSS. The symmetrical arrangement is also like early Byzantine work, so called; and the river is a winding trench, with a curious typical resemblance to the actual course of Jordan, which induces us to think the painter had visited it. So also in both baptisteries at Ravenna. The mosaic of St. Mark's preserves this likeness, with the addition of three adoring angels, a star above the dove, fish in the river, and the double axe laid to the root of a tree. This imagery is strictly followed in the wild and powerful painting of Tintoret, in the Scuola di S. Rocco, now scarcely intelligible (Ruskin, Modern Painters, vol. ii.). The Turin miniature is remarkable for its topographical accuracy as to two of the sources of Jordan, labelled respectively Fons YOR and

Fons DAD. Martigny also mentions figures of doves on a font or laver of very early date belonging to the church of Gondrecourt (Revue Archéologique, v. i. p. 129), where however only birds are said to be drinking from vases, and pecking at grapes. See also Paciaudi, De Cultu S. Joannis Baptiste, pp. 58, 69, where copies of a miniature from a MS. in the Royal Library at Turin, and of a mosaic in St. Mark's in Venice, are given, both containing the dove. A golden or silver dove was often suspended above the font in early times. [DOVE, THE EUCHARISTIC.] These sometimes contained the anointing oil used in baptism and extreme unction (Martigny, s. v.; and Airinghi, vol. ii. p. 326, c. 5). On lamps in form of doves, see Airinghi, ii. 325, l.

As a symbol of the believer, the dove of course has chief reference to two texts of H. S., belonging to different yet harmonious trains of thought. One in Matt. x. 16, "Be ye wise as serpents and harmless as doves;" the other, Ps. lv. 6, "O that I had wings like a dove, then would I flee away and be at rest." The passages in Cant. i. 15, ii. 14, v. 2, vi. 9, refer to the Church, and therefore may be taken as referring simply to all faithful souls. Martigny gives a drawing of a seal with a dove in the centre, surrounded by the words "Veni in xmas," is obvious reference to Cant. ii. 10. The dove with the olive or palm-branch, which so often accompanies it, is held equivalent to the form "In Pace." As with other birds, the flying or caged dove has reference to the deliverance of the soul from the flesh in death, or to its imprisoned state in life. [See BIRD.] Airinghi quotes St. Ambrose's sermon on St. Eusebius, "Altiora facilius penetrantur simplicitate mentis, quam levitate pennarum;" and St. Augustine on St. Matt. x. to the same purpose. In Airinghi, ii. p. 145, the dove is associated with the peacock; also, p. 139, in a vault of the Catacomb of St. Priscilla. In Bottari, tav. 181, it hovers with the olive-branch above the three holy children in the flames.

Twelve doves, representing the Twelve Apostles, occur in Bottari, i. p. 118, on a mosaic crucifix. See also Paulinus of Nola (Ep. ad Severum, xxxii. c. 10). He thus describes a mosaic (musivum opus) in his church. [CROSS.]

"Pleno coruscet Trinitas mysterio:
Stat Christus agnus: vox Patris coelo sonat:
Et per columbam Spiritus Sanctus fuit.

Quorum figura est in columbarum choro.

DOVE, THE EUCHARISTIC. Pyxes or receptacles for the reserved host were not unfrequently made of gold or silver in the shape of a dove, and suspended over the altar. Doves of the precious metals, emblematic of the Holy Spirit, were also suspended above the font in early churches. In the life of St. Basil by the Pseudo-Amphilochius, it is narrated that that father, after a vision that appeared to him while celebrating the Eucharist, divided the wafer into three parts, one of which he partook of with great awe, the second he preserved to be buried with him, and placed the third in a golden dove hanging over the altar. He afterwards sent for a goldsmith, and had a new golden dove made to contain the sacred morsel (Amphiloch. Vit. Basil., c. 6).

One of the charges brought against the Acephalian heretic Severus by the clergy of Antioch at the Council of Constantinople, A.D. 536, was that he removed and appropriated to his own use the gold and silver doves hanging over the sacred fonts and altars, χρυσῆς καὶ ἀργυρῆς περιτετρῆς κρεμασμένας ὑπερθεῶν τῶν ὁρίων κολυμβηθῶν καὶ θυσιαστηρίων . . . ἐσφατερίσαστο (Labbe, Concil. v. 159).

Such doves are mentioned by Anastasius in the Liber Pontificalis, e.g., St. Hilar. 70, "columbam auream pensan. libras 21;" Cf. Ducange, sub voc.; Durantus, De Ritu, lib. i. c. xvi. § 5; Paulin. Nolan. Ep. xxxii. Not. 154, p. 910. [E. V.]

DOWRY. [ARRHÆ: MARRIAGE.]

DOXOLOGY (Δοξολογία). The term doxology is usually confined (1) to the "Gloria in Excelsis," which is called the greater doxology, and also the Angelical Hymn, from its opening clause recorded by St. Luke as having been sung by the angels who announced the birth of Christ to the shepherds; and (2) to the "Gloria Patri," which is called the lesser doxology. The term is, however, sometimes given to the "Trisagion" (Holy, holy, holy, Lord God of Hosts, heaven and earth are full of Thy glory), called also the Seraphic hymn, in reference to the vision of the Seraphim described by Isaiah (c. vi.); and also to the word ALLELUIA (q. v.), when repeated again and again as a hymn of praise.

The exact periods of the origin of these doxologies are unknown, owing to the extreme scantiness of early Christian literature. But it may be safely conjectured that, in their earliest forms, they came into use soon after that circulation of the Gospel narratives which must have quickly become general among Christians in proportion to the cultivation of each local church, and its means for communicating with the general body of believers. The extent and rapidity of this circulation being involved in extreme obscurity, so far as contemporary history informs us, the positiveness with which later writers have spoken of the almost Apostolic origin of these hymns must be set down amongst those numerous assumptions which have clouded our real knowledge of primitive Christian life and devotions. The "Trisagion" in all probability is the most ancient of all, as it would be the natural expression of the adoration of the Jewish Christians, who were already in possession of the Old Testament, and who would have been familiar with the book of Isaiah before their conversion to Christianity. The use of the "Gloria in Excelsis," which originally consisted only of its opening sentence, would be equally natural, wherever the narrative of St. Luke was known; and the "Gloria Patri," which originally consisted only of its first clause, would be the result of a familiarity with the last verses of St. Matthew's Gospel.

The "Gloria in Excelsis" is unquestionably of Eastern origin. Liturgical speculators, indeed, have ingeniously discovered a reference to its existence in very early writers. It has been frequently assumed that it was in fact "the hymn," which Christians sang on all solemn occasions, including such as are referred to in Acts xvi. 25; 1 Cor. xiv. 26; and Col. iii. 16. When the author of the dialogue attributed to Lucian speaks of the Christians as watching all night for the purpose of singing hymns, it is supposed that their chief song was the "Gloria in Excelsis." It is also held to have been specially referred to in the famous passage in Pliny's letter to Trajan: "Affirmabant hanc fuisse summam vel culpæ suæ, vel erroris, quod essent soliti stato die ante lucem convenire, carmenque Christo quasi Deo dicere secum invicem." In reality, however, we first meet with this doxology, and in something very like its final form, in the book known as The Apostolical

CHRIST. ANT.

Constitutions (vii. 47). It is there described as the "morning prayer," and stands as follows: "Glory be to God on high, and on earth peace, good will towards men (ὁν ἀνθρώποις εὐδοκία). We praise Thee, we sing to Thee (ὕμνομεν σε), we bless Thee, we glorify Thee, we worship Thee, through the great High Priest; Thee the true God, the only unbegotten, whom no one can approach for the great glory. O Lord, heavenly king, God the Father Almighty, Lord God, the Father of Christ, the Lamb without spot, who taketh away the sin of the world, receive our prayer, thou that sittest upon the Cherubim! For thou only art holy, thou only, Lord Jesus, the Christ of God, the God of every created being, and our king; by whom unto Thee be glory, honour, and adoration." Unfortunately, the writer of the Constitutions was not exempt from the spirit of falsification, which was by no means rare among early religious writers. As it is impossible to believe him when he attributes a liturgy of palpably Oriental character to St. Clement, we cannot be sure that in this record of the great doxology he has not made alterations or interpolations of his own. In the mention of the doxology in the treatise De Virginitate (in Athanasius's Works) only the beginning is quoted, and even here it is not identical with that given by the author of the Constitutions. Giving directions to the virgins for their morning devotions, Athanasius says, "Early in the morning say this Psalm, 'O God, my God, early will I wake to Thee.' When it is light, say, 'Bless ye the Lord, all ye works of the Lord,' and 'Glory to God in the highest, and peace on earth, goodwill towards men. We sing to Thee, we bless Thee, we worship Thee,' and the rest (of the hymn)" (c. 20; tom. 2, p. 120, ed. Benedict.).

St. Chrysostom, on the other hand, in describing the morning devotions of those who led an austere life, says that they sang, as the angels did "Glory to God in the highest, and on earth peace, goodwill towards men"; making no mention of the subsequent additions (Hom. 69 in Matth.). How soon the use of the complete hymn became general in the Western Church it is impossible to say. The 4th council of Toledo, A.D. 633, treats of it in its completeness, defends it, as such, against certain rigorists who objected to its repetition on the ground that only its first sentence was of divine origin. "For the same reason," said the fathers of the council (can. 13), "they might have rejected the lesser doxology, 'Glory and honour be to the Father, and to the Son, and to the Holy Ghost,' which was composed by men; and also this greater doxology, part of which was sung by the angels at our Saviour's birth; 'Glory be to God on high, and on earth peace to men of goodwill;' but the rest that follows was composed and added to it by the doctors of the Church."

The period at which this doxology was generally introduced into the eucharistic office in the West is entirely a matter of conjecture. There is no foundation for the common idea that it formed a portion of the early liturgies. Justin Martyr (Apol. i. c. 65) in describing the eucharistic worship of his contemporaries, makes no mention of this hymn. St. Cyril of Jerusalem, in his 5th catechesis on St. Peter's 1st Epistle, while fixing certain details in the eucharistic service, such as the "Sursum corda," &c., gives no hint of its use. Nor is it found in any of the earliest liturgies, whether Western or Eastern, which are in existence. In the East, it is still used in the non-eucharistic morning services of the Church, being sung on Sundays and the greater festivals, and recited on ordinary days. It was first appointed (according to the Liber Pontif.) to be said in the Roman Liturgy by Pope Symmachus, who was raised to the Pontificate in 498, but only on Sundays and the festivals of martyrs, and apparently its recital was held to be a special privilege; for the Gregorian Sacramentary (p. 1) gives the following directions concerning it: "Item dicitur Gloria in Excelsis Deo, si episcopus fuerit, tantummodo die Dominico, sive diebus festis. A presbyteris autem minime dicitur, nisi in solo pascha. Quando vero letania agitur, neque Gloria in Excelsis Deo, neque Alleluia canitur." Pope Stephen the 3rd directed that on the highest festivals it should be sung only by bishops, at least in the Lateran Church. Pope Calixtus 2nd granted, as a privilege to the monks of Tournus* that they should use it on the Feast of the Annunciation; "pro reverentia B. Mariae semper Virginis, cujus nomine locus vester insignis est, in Annuntiatione Domini Salvatoris nostri hymnum Angelicum inter missarum solemniam abbati et fratribus pronunciare concedimus" (Calixti epist. ad Franconem Abbatem monasterii Trencorchensis). From the Mozarabic ritual it seems to have been about this time recited in Spain on Sundays and certain festivals, in the eucharistic office; but in the Gallican Church it appears even when introduced to have been for a long time only sung on public days of thanksgiving. Its ultimate gradual adoption throughout the Western Church was no doubt due to the increasing influence of the example of Rome. At the same time our modern desire for uniformity in religious worship was unknown in the early ages of Christianity, not merely because our ideas on disciplinary organization were as yet undeveloped, but because the facilities for communication, both personally and by letter, were comparatively slight, and local customs were preserved, as almost sacred in the eyes of those who had received them from their fathers. [GLORIA IN EXCELSIS.]

2. The origin and history of the "Gloria Patri," or lesser doxology, is even more obscure than that of the "Gloria in Excelsis," and in its present shape it is the result of the Arian controversies concerning the nature of Christ. It is quite impossible to trace its use to the three first centuries; if it was really known to the primitive Christians, it probably arose, as has been already suggested, from the juxtaposition of the three persons of the Trinity, in the command given by the Lord to his Apostles to teach and baptize all nations. For several centuries, the clause "As it was in the beginning, &c.," was certainly unknown in many parts of Christendom. The 4th council of Toledo, A.D. 633, makes no mention of this clause, and at the same time gives a version of the first portion which is not identical with that which subsequently became universal, reading it thus: "Glory and honour be to the Father, and to the Son, and to the Holy Ghost, world without end, Amen." In the old Spanish liturgy, known as the Mozarabic, supposed to be of a little later date, it occurs in the same form as in the decree of Toledo. In the treatise of Walafridus Strabo De rebus ecclesiasticis (c. 25), the different usages of different countries are particularly specified. "Dicendum," he says, "de hymno, qui ob honorem sanctae et unice Trinitatis officiis omnibus interseritur, eum à sanctis patribus aliter atque aliter ordinatum. Nam Hispani sicut superius commemoravimus, ita eum dici omnimodis voluerunt. Graeci autem, 'Gloria Patri, et Filio, et Spiritui Sancto, et nunc, et semper, et in saecula saeculorum. Amen.' Latini vero eodem ordine et eisdem verbis hunc hymnum decantant, addentes tantum in medio, 'Sicut erat in principio.'" The writer of the treatise De Virginitate which is often placed among the works of Athanasius, gives the "Gloria Patri," as "Glory be to the Father, and to the Son, and to the Holy Ghost, world without end, Amen."

* Tournus was an abbey in Burgundy, on the Saône, between Mâcon and Châlons; and the privilege granted by Stephen is remarkable as one of the earliest instances in which the bishop of Rome claimed a right over the public forms of prayer in local churches.

The addition of the second clause is enjoined in the year 529, by the 2nd council of Vaison, which at the same time asserts that it was already universal among the Greeks. "Quia non solum," says the council, "in Sede Apostolica, sed etiam per totum Orientem et totam Africam vel Italiam, propter haereticorum astutiam, quæ Dei Filium non semper cum Patre fuisse, sed a tempore fuisse blasphemant, in omnibus clausulis post Gloria, sicut erat in principio dicitur, etiam et nos in universis ecclesiis nostris hoc ita esse dicendum decrevimus." From which decree it appears certain that the use of the additional clause was at the least not general in Gaul at that time, though it is likely that it had gradually been introduced from Italy. It is remarkable, indeed, as the new addition was adopted with the direct object of repudiating the Arian doctrine, that it should not have spread more rapidly eastward, after the decisive action of the council of Nice in asserting the orthodox faith.

From the writers of the Arian period, again, it would seem that there were important variations in the traditional forms of the first clause, to which great significance was attached by the adherents of the opposing doctrines. One of these forms stood thus: "Glory be to the Father, and to the Son, with the Holy Ghost;" and another, "Glory be to the Father, in or by the Son, and by the Holy Ghost." Sozomen asserts (H. E. iii. 20) that the form "Glory be to the Father through the Son" was adopted by the Arians as distinctly implying the subordination of the Son to the Father; and Valesius believes that the ἀπορροσθέν which the Arians used in their chanting (Id. viii. 8), composed to support their own views (πρὸς τὴν αὐτῶν δόξαν), were doxologies. On the other hand, Philostorgius, himself an Arian, alleges that the ancient form was really that which the Arians preferred, and that Flavian of Antioch was the first person who introduced the form now used, every one before him having said either "Glory be to the Father by the Son," or "Glory be to the Father in the Son." It is to be noted, also, that St. Basil was accused of having introduced a novelty, when he said, "Glory be to the Father, and to the Son;" and that in his vindication of himself (De Spiritu Sancto, c. 29 [al. 70 ff.]) he declares that all the three forms were ancient and to be used in the Nicene sense. He says, too, that his own practice was that of Irenaeus, Clement of Rome, Dionysius of Rome, Eusebius of Caesarea, Dionysius of Alexandria, Origen, Athenogenes, Gregory Thaumaturgus, Firmilian, and Meletius. Each form indeed, was probably used indifferently, during the long period when the faith of the Church was left undefined, that is, until the council of Nice in the early part of the 4th century. How soon, in its present complete form, it was generally used in connection with the recitation of the Psalms, it is impossible to say. It is directed to be thus recited by St. Benedict (Regula, c. 18) where he writes, "In primis dicantur versus; 'Deus in adiutorium,' &c., 'Domine ad adjuvandum,' &c., et 'Gloria.'" But whether he was introducing a novelty, or merely sanctioning a practice already introduced, is a matter of mere conjecture. [See PSALMODY.] [J. M. C.]

DRACONARIUS. Strictly speaking this word denotes the bearer of the military standard, on which a dragon was represented, "vexillifer, qui fert vexillum ubi est draco depictus" (Ducange, s. v.).

When Constantine after his conversion placed the Christian symbol on the military ensigns instead of the dragon, the name outlived the change, and the standard-bearer was still called draconarius. Sometimes we find the ancient symbol joined to the new, the dragon being placed beneath the cross.

In the Christianized empire this name came to signify the official who carried a standard or banner in ecclesiastical processions; a transference which was facilitated by the fact that the official in question often carried, as the soldiers also did, the labarum with the cross, Constantine's chosen symbol.

Pellicia states (Polizia, ii. 113, ed. 1780) that in his time an object resembling almost exactly the ancient labarum, as depicted on coins, was still carried in supplications, and called "gonfalon" by the Italians.

The name Dracconarius seems also to have been sometimes given to the cross-bearer. [C.]

DRAGON (as SYMBOL). [See SERPENT.] Though the serpent from the earliest ages has been a symbol of both good and evil, the dragon, wherever he occurs in early Christian art, seems to represent the enemy of mankind, all his temptations, and the evil desires of mankind which combine with them. The images of the Apocalypse have much to do with this, of course, and the dragon appears in MSS. of that book, as in a Saxon one now in the Bodleian Library. The dragon-standards of cohorts, on the conversion of Constantine, had the Cross or monogram of Christ placed above the serpentine image; the name of the standard-bearer [DRACONARIUS] being applied in after times to bearers of banners in Church processions. The labarum is represented as planted on the body of a serpent, in a medal given by Ariaghi after Baronius (vol. ii. p. 705).

The fish or whale of Jonah is often represented in the catacombs as a sort of draconic nondescript (see Bottari lvi. and passim, De Rossi, &c.), perhaps with an idea of carrying out the symbolism of our Lord's passing under and out of the power of hell and of death. But the idea of a sea-monster seems always intended to be conveyed. The idea of the dragon as a winged crocodile or lizard may have been derived from remains of the Sauri: a skeleton of some animal of that family is mentioned by Mrs. Jameson as having been exhibited at Aix in a fossil state, as the frame of a dragon which had long devastated the neighbourhood. Prof. Kingsley calls attention to the fact that the pterodactyles of the lias were literally flying dragons to all intents and purposes. The GRIFFIN, as a minister of God's service, is quite distinct from the dragon (see s. v.).* For Daniel and the Apocryphal Dragon or Serpent see Bottari, v. 1, tav. xix. and woodcut.

The Gothic imagination, in later days, revelled in dragons; the seven-headed beast, with crowns and nimbes on all his heads except that "wounded to death" (Rev. xii.), is a type of such art; see Didron's Outline, &c., vol. i. p. 162, "from a 12th century Psalterium cum figuris," in the Bibliothèque Royale. In Constantine's Mosaic, (Euseb. de Vita Const. lit. iii. c. 3; see also Didron, Iconogr. Chrétienne, vol. i., art. Croix), the serpent or dragon is associated with the Cross as the conquered enemy of mankind. The serpent is placed at the foot of the Cross of Lorraine, and in the missal of Charles the Bald (Essay by Mons. G. St. Laurent, in Didron's Annales Archéologiques, vol. xxv. See SERPENT.) dragons are mentioned as occupying alternate panels of bas-relief with doves, drinking or pecking at grapes, on a font from the ancient church of Godrecoart, Revue Archéologique, vol. i. p. 129.

Gori's representation (Thesaurus Diplychorum v. ii.) of the ivory binding of the Codex Lauretanus consists in part of our Lord trampling on the lion and dragon, while the serpent is carved also near Him. [See SERPENT.] For the doves and tempting serpent on the Barberini gem see same article, and Gori, Ta. Diptych. vol. iii. p. 160. [R. St. J. T.]

DRAMAS, CHRISTIAN. As works of literature, dramas such as the Xpistovs naōxov ascribed to Gregory of Nazianzus, do not come within the scope of this Dictionary. Nor have we any sufficient evidence that sacred dramas were ever acted till after the time of Charlemagne, which forms the chronological limit of its archaeology. All that can be said, therefore, is to note the fact that there is no proof of the practice of dramatic representations of sacred history prior to that period, but that probably those which soon afterwards became very popular were not entirely novelties, and, as the present writer has noticed elsewhere (Dict. of the Bible, s. v. Magi), that names and descriptions like those which Bede gives of Gaspar, Melchior, and Balthasar (de Collectan.), appear to imply a dramatic as well as pictorial representation of the facts of the Nativity. [E. H. P.]

DREAMS. It does not appear that the attempt to foretell the future by the interpretation of ordinary dreams was condemned by the early Church; rather it was acknowledged that dreams might be made the vehicle of divine revelation. But some of the old heathen practices by which men sought to acquire supernatural knowledge in dreams, such as sleeping in an idol's temple wrapped in the skin of a sacrifice (Virgil, Æneid vii. 88), or under the boughs of a sacred tree, were distinctly condemned. Jerome (in loco) takes Isaiah lxx. 4 to refer to such practices. There was no impiety (he says) which Israel in those days did not perpetrate, "sitting or dwelling in sepulchres, and sleeping in the shrines of idols; where they used to pass the night (incubate) on skins of victims laid on the ground that they might learn the future by dreams, as the heathen do in certain temples even unto this day" (Wetzer and Welte, Kirchenlex. xi. 172). [C.]

DRESS. This article relates to the ordinary dress of Christians, and the dress of the clergy in civil life. For the ministerial dress, see VESTMENTS.

1. Dress of Christians generally.—In the earliest days of the Church Christians probably took little thought for raiment; yet even in the first century "gay clothing" was found in Christian assemblies (St. James ii. 2) as well as in kings' palaces. For Christians wore the ordinary dress of their station and country; neither in speech nor in manners did they differ from other men; whether in cities of the Greeks or cities of the barbarians they followed the customs of the place in dress and manner of life (Epist. ad Diognetum, c. 5; Tertullian, Apolog. c. 42). Here and there a convert adopted or retained—as Justin did—the napless cloak (χιτών) which was characteristic of the philosopher, and especially of the Cynic; but this did not distinguish him from the heathen, but from those who made no profession of philosophy or asceticism. There is no reason to doubt that those converts who had a professional dress—as civil and military officials—continued to wear it whenever duty required.

But if the Christian was not in early times distinguished from the heathen by his garb, there was always in the Church—as there could not fail to be—a strong feeling against luxury, display, and immodesty in apparel. Clement of Alexandria, who represents a somewhat ascetic tendency, condemns (Stromata, ii. 10, p. 232 ff.) all kinds of dye for that which is but the covering of man's shame, all gold and jewelry, all over-nice plaiting of the hair or decoration of the face; he seems even to imply that there is no reason why men's dress should differ from that of women, as in both cases it serves but the same purpose of covering and protecting from the cold. He will none of cloth of gold or India silk, the product of a poor worm turned to purposes of pride; still less of those fine materials which display what they seem to cover. Let the stuffs which Christians wear be of their natural colour, not dyed with hues fit only for a Bacchic procession. It is permissible to weave stuffs soft and pleasant to wear, not gaudy so as to attract the gaze. The long train which sweeps the ground and impedes the step is an abomination to him, as also the short immodest tunic of the Laconian damsel. In a word, he urges simplicity and modesty in all points.

Clement's invective probably implies that luxury in dress was not unknown among the faithful in his time; this is certainly the case with that of Tertullian, whose denunciations are expressly addressed to Christians. In his treatise on women's dress, he charges on the "sons of God," who lusted after the daughters of men, the invention of the adventitious aids of feminine beauty—the gold and jewels, the brilliant dyes, the black powder with which the eyelids were tinged, the unguent which gave colour to the cheek, the wash which changed the hair to the fashionable yellow, the towers of false tresses piled upon the head and neck (De Cultu Feminarum, i. 2, 6, 8; ii. 5, 6, 7). Why, he asks, should Christian women clothe themselves in gold and jewels and gorgeous dyes, when they never displayed their charms in processions, as the heathen did, and needed not to pass through the streets except when they went to church or to visit a sick brother—not occasions for gorgeous apparel (ib. ii. 11)? Why should they imitate the Apocalyptic woman that was "arrayed in purple and scarlet colour, and decked with gold and precious stones and pearls?" (ib. ii. 12). He does not object to seemly and becoming dress (cultus), and approves attention to the hair and skin, but he inveighs against such decoration (ornatus) as seems intended to attract notice (ib. i. 4; ii. 2). The wrist accustomed to a bracelet would hardly bear a chain, the leg adorned with an anklet would scarcely bear the fetter; some necks were so loaded with pearls and emeralds as hardly to afford room for the headman's sword (ib. ii. 13). Virgins ought always to cover their faces when they had occasion to go abroad (De Virginitate, passim).

Nor does the vehement African spare the men; he speaks with contempt of their foolish efforts to please the other sex by artistic clipping of the beard, by dressing the hair, by dyeing white locks, by singeing the down from the skin, even by using the feminine aids of paint and powder on the face (De Cultu Fem. ii. 8). To the same effect Cyprian speaks (De Habitu Virginitatis, c.

12 ff.), and so speaks the treatise De Bono Puditiciae (c. 12) attributed to him.

From such passages it is evident that Christians in the latter part of the second and the beginning of the third century, both men and women, followed the fashion of the world, though not without strong remonstrance from those who took a more serious view of their Christian calling. The only exception probably was in the case of some decoration which implied, or was thought to imply, participation in idolatry (Tertullian, De Idololatria, c. 18). It was indeed a part of the torture applied to Christians to compel them to put on garments distinctly indicative of such participation (Acts of Perpetua and Felicitas, c. 18, in Ruinart, p. 100, ed. 2). A series of passages in denunciation of luxury in dress might be produced from the early fathers; see, for instance, Cyril of Jerusalem, Catech. IV. p. 94, ed. 1641; Basil, Reg. fustius Tract. Interrog. 22; ii. 366, ed. Bened.

Some canonical decrees on the subject relate to the assumption by one sex of the dress of the other; since for women to wear the dress of men was sometimes represented as meritorious asceticism. Eustathius, for instance (quoted by Bingham, xvi. xi. 16) taught his female disciples to cut off their hair and to assume the habit of men. But the council of Gangra (A.D. 370), in canons 13 and 17, condemns both these practices in the following terms:—"If any woman, under pretence of leading an ascetic life, change her apparel, and instead of the accustomed habit of women take that of men, let her be anathema." And, "If any woman, on account of an ascetic life, cut off her hair, which God has given her as a memorial of subjection, let her be anathema, as one that annuls the decree of subjection." These decrees are manifestly founded upon Deut. xxii. 5 and 1 Cor. xi. 6 respectively. Cyprian (Ep. 2, c. 1, ad Eusebium) and Tertullian (de Spectac. c. 23), with other writers (see Prynne's Histromastix), apply the Mosaic prohibition to the interchange of clothing by men and women in stage plays, which they condemn for this reason among many others.

Under the Frankish emperors the Mosaic prohibition (Deut. xxii. 11) of wearing a garment of woollen and linen was re-enacted (Capitularium, vi. c. 46).

The civil code under the empire attempted to repress luxury by specific enactments (Codes Justiniani, lib. xi. tit. 8), which seem however to contemplate, at least in part, the preservation of an imperial monopoly and of the sanctity of the imperial insignia. [COMMERCE, p. 409.] It was utterly forbidden to manufacture cloth of gold or edgings (paragaudas) of silk and gold thread for male attire, except in the imperial factories (gynaeciaria); nor was any male to wear such decorations, except imperial officials. No woollen garments were to be dyed so as to imitate the imperial purple, the blood of the sacred murex. No one was to wear imperial insignia, nor to manufacture privately any silk tunics or pallia. There was probably a demand for silk and cloth of gold for male attire, when so strict laws were made against their use.

2. Civil Dress of the Clergy.—It is certain that during the first five Christian centuries the clergy in general were distinguished from the laity, in ordinary life, neither by the form nor the colour of their garments, but only by their sober and unobtrusive style (Thomassin, i. ii. 43). The lacerna, byrrus, and dalmatic which Cyprian took off before his martyrdom (Acta Procons. c. 5) seem to be the ordinary dress of a citizen of that period. So far were the clergy commonly from adopting a peculiar dress that pope Celestinus (A.D. 428) sharply blamed certain Gallican bishops who had chosen to make themselves conspicuous by a dress different from that of the laity about them (Epist. 2, in Binius' Concilia, i. 901). These bishops, it appears, had been monks before they were promoted to the episcopate, and retained as bishops the pallium and girdle of the monk, instead of taking the tunic and toga of the superior layman. Yet Constantinus (Vita Germani, in Surius, iv. 360) says that bishop Amator, when he ordained Germanus (†448), afterwards bishop of Auxerre, put upon him "habitum religionis," an expression which in all probability designates the monastic dress; and other ecclesiastics of special austerity no doubt wore the rough dress of the monk, as St. Martin did (Sulpicius Severus, Vita B. Martini, c. 10; Dialogus II. c. 1), but the very fact that this costume was specially noticed shows that it was not the common attire of the clergy.

Nor do the clergy of the East, more than those of the West, seem to have adopted a distinctive dress in early times, unless they were members of monastic bodies, or remarkably austere in life. If Heraclius (Euseb. H. E. vi. 19) wore the gown of the philosopher, this distinguished him not from the laity but from the unphilosophical, whether lay or clerical. The dress of the bishops whom Constantine assembled round his table (Euseb. Vita Constant. i. 42) seems to have had no distinctive character except simplicity. Sinenius, a Novatian bishop (Socrates, H. E. vi. 22), incurred the reproach of ostentation by wearing a white robe, which contrasted with the more usual sober colour of episcopal garments. But there are indications at a later date among the orthodox, that a somewhat splendid vesture was thought to become high station in the hierarchy. John Chrysostom, for instance, a short time before his death, adopted the more splendid attire suited to his position; and Gregory Nazianzen declares that his own simple life and mean dress was one of the reasons for his expulsion from Constantinople—implying that something more distinguished was looked for.

St. Augustine too (Sermo 50, De Diversis), apparently still a priest, says that a valuable byrrus might befit a bishop, which would by no means suit a poor man like Augustine. That the byrrus was the common, as opposed to the ascetic, dress of Christians, is shown by the 12th canon of the council of Gangra (A.D. 358), in which those who wore the ascetic gown (ἡσυχαστικὸν) are warned not to despise the wearers of the byrrus. Augustine objects only to wearing one more valuable than became his station.

The account also of Euthymius (Life, by Cyril, in Surius, Jan. 20) saluting Anastasius as Patriarch, shows that a dignitary of that eminence was generally distinguished by the splendour of his attire.

We conclude then generally that no especial style of dress was prescribed for the clergy within the first five centuries, but that during the latter part of that period it was usual for DROMIC. In the Oriental Church churches of the basilican form, i. e. parallelograms, with the length considerably exceeding the breadth, and terminating in a semicircular apse, were called "dromic" (δρομικαί), from the similarity of their plan to that of a δρομος or "stadium." The notion of Leo Allatius (de Templis Graec. Recent. Ep. ii. § 3), and Suicer (sub toc. vads, adopted by Bingham; Origines, bk. viii. ch. iii. § 1) that they were so styled from having "void spaces for deambulatoria" within their roofs on the upper side of the flat ceilings, is quite unfounded. Theod. Zygomalas apud Suicer correctly derives the name "dromic" from the form, the length much greater than the breadth, like a "narthex" or wand: δρομικὸν δίκην νάρθηκος πᾶν δρομικὸν νάρθηξ λέγεται. Of this plan was the original church of St. Sophia at Constantinople: ἐν τῇ μεγάλῃ ἐκκλησίᾳ τῆς ἁγίας Σοφίας δρομικῇ τὸ πρότερον ὄντι (Codin. Orig. Constantinopol. 72), and that of St. Anastasia in the same city: ὁ δὲ ναὸς τῆς ἁγίας Ἀναστασίας ἐστὶ δρομικός (Constant. de Admin. Imp. 29). Existing examples of dromic churches in the East are those of St. Demetrius at Thessalonica (Texier, Archit. Byzant. 137), St. Philip, and the Virgin of the Grand Monastery at Athens (Conchaud, pl. 2, 4), and St. Catherine on Mount Sinai, built by Justinian. [E. V.]

DRUNKENNESS. Of the prevalence of this vice in the Roman world in the early ages of Christianity it would be needless to speak. That it became peculiarly shameless about the very opening of the Christian era, we infer from Pliny's observation that under Tiberius men first began to drink fasting, jejuni (bk. xiv. c. xxviii.). The neighbouring races to the Roman empire were not more temperate than the Romans themselves. To the east, the same Pliny records that the Parthians were great drunkards. Of the Germans, Tacitus says that to drink through a whole day and night was considered no disgrace (De Mor. Germ. c. xxii.).

It is not necessary to go here into the denunciations of drunkenness contained both in the Old and New Testament. It will be enough to say that St. Paul expressly includes "drunkards" among those who shall not "inherit the kingdom of God" (1 Cor. vi. 10). Early Church writers follow the same line, see Clement ad Cor. Ep. i. c. 30; Apost. Const. ii. c. 25; v. c. 10; vii. c. 6; and particularly viii. c. 44. The Apostolical Constitutions there warn against giving relief to gluttons, drunkards, or idlers, as not being fit for the Church (bk. ii. c. 4). Drunken habits were to afford a presumption against a person accused before the Church Courts (ib. c. 49). The oblations of drunkards were not to be received (bk. iv. c. 6). The true rule of Christian temperance is given in one of the later constitutions (bk. viii. c. 44): "Not that they should not drink, for this is to condemn that which is made of God for cheerfulness, but that they should not drink to excess." The Apostolical Canons in like manner make drunkenness a ground of exclusion from communion for bishops, priests, deacons, subdeacons, readers or singers, and also for laymen (c. 35, otherwise numbered 41, 42, or 42, 43).

Still the vice flourished, as may be seen for instance from the injunctions of Jerome to Nepotianus "never to smell of wine," since "winebibbing priests are both condemned by the apostle and forbidden by the old law" (Ep. 2); or to Eustochium, that "the spouse of Christ should flee wine as poison." In some countries drunkenness was even made an accompaniment of the most solemn services of the Church. Augustine complains (ad Aur. Ep. 22, otherwise 64) that in Africa "revellings and drunkenness are deemed so allowable and lawful that they take place even in honour of the most blessed martyrs," even in the cemeteries [CELLA MEMORIAE], as appears from the sequel to the passage. And so rooted does he consider drunken habits to be in his flock that he advises them to be dealt with gently, rather by teaching than by command, rather by warning than by menace.

For a long time, however, clerical discipline in respect of this vice seems rather to have been enforced, or attempted to be enforced, through the well-known prohibition to clerics to enter taverns. [CAUPONA.] Except in the Apostolical Canons, the first distinct Church enactment against drunkenness appears to be that of the 1st Council of Tours, 461. "If any one serving God in whatever clerical office shall not abstain from drunkenness according to the order of his estate, let a fitting punishment be awarded to him" (c. 2). In Ivo the same canon appears in an altered form as directed especially against clerical tavern-keepers, who sold wine in their churches, so that where nought should be heard but orisons and the word of God and his praise, there revellings and drunkenness are found. Such excesses are forbidden, and the offending presbyter is ordered to be deposed, offending laymen to be excommunicated and expelled (see also c. 3, of same). No doubt the vice was highly prevalent in France, for a few years later we find the Council of Vannes also enacting that "above all things should drunkenness be avoided by clerics . . . therefore we decree that he who shall be ascertained to have been drunk, as the order suffers, shall be either excluded for thirty days from communion or given over to corporal punishment" (c. 13). The same canon was re-enacted by the Council of Agde in 506 (c. 41). Somewhat later in the century, the Constitutions of king Childebert, after ordering the abolishing of certain remains of idolatry, lament the sacrileges committed, when for instance all night long men spend the time in drunkenness, scurrility, and singing, even in the sacred days of Easter, Christmas, and the other feasts; and enacts for penalty 100 lashes for a servile person, but for a freeborn one strict imprisonment (districta inclusio) and penance, that at least by bodily torments they may be reduced to sanity of mind. In the East even, at the Council of Constantinople in 536, we find mention of a letter of the clergy of Apamea against one bishop Peter (deposed for reay) who used to make drunk persons coming baptism (see Labbe and Mansi's Councils, vol. . p. 1104).

The West, however, seems to have been the chief home of gluttony and drunkenness. A canon of the Council of Autun (A.D. 870 or thereabouts) enacted that no priest stuffed with food and rapacious with wine should touch the sacrifice, presume to say mass, under pain of losing his guilt. In a work of Theodore, archbishop of Canterbury, De Remediis Peccatorum (end of 7th century), it is laid down that a bishop or other ordained person who has the vice of habitual drunkenness must either amend himself or be deposed. The Council of Berkhamstead, in the 11th year of Withred king of Kent (A.D. 697), acts that if a priest be so drunk that he cannot fulfil his office, his ministry shall cease at the will of the bishop (c. 7). Gildas (De Penitentiis, c. 7), lays down that if any one through drunkenness cannot sing the psalms, he is to be excluded from communion. Some exacts from a certain "Book of David," supposed, as that of Gildas, to have been received by the Irish Church, make some curious distinctions. A priest drunk through ignorance is to be subject to 10 days' penance; if through negligence, to 40 days; if through contempt [of discipline?], to twice forty. He who for civility's sake (humanity's cause) compels another to get drunk is to have penance as for drunkenness. But he who through the effect of hatred or luxuriousness, that may shamefully confound or mock others, compels them to get drunk, if he has not sufficiently repented, is to do penance as a killer of souls (c. 1).

Gregory III. (731-41) in his Excerpts from the Fathers and the Canons, mentions the habitual drunkenness of a bishop, priest, or deacon being a ground of deposition, if he do not mend himself (c. 8). An epistle of Boniface himself to Cuthbert, archbishop of Canterbury, read at the Council of Cloveshoe, A.D. 747, bears further testimony to the prevalence of drunkenness in Britain: "It is said also that in your parishes drunkenness is a too common evil, so that not only do the bishops not forbid it, but themselves, drinking too much, become intoxicated, and compel others to become so, offering them larger alms." And the Canons of the Council bear that monks and clerics should not follow or mirror the evil of drunkenness, but should avoid it; "nor should they compel others to drink immoderately." If they have no infirmity, they could not before the third hour of the day indulge in potations after the manner of drunkards (c. 21). So again the Penitential of archbishop Cuthbert repeats, with slight variation of language, the canon of the Council of Vannes as to the inflicting of 30 days' excommunication or corporal punishment on the cleric proved to have been drunk (bk. ii. c. 9); increasing the punishment to three months on bread and water if the cleric or monk who is given to drunkenness (c. 10). And the canons of the same Council "the remedies for sin," reckon among capital crimes habitual drunkenness (c. 5), and impose three years' penance for it (c. 7),—such penance being apparently in addition to the three months' bread and water above referred to. A faithful layman making another drunk must have forty days' penance (c. 11). A definition is given of drunkenness, which is also found elsewhere: "when the state of the mind is changed, and the tongue falters, and the eyes are troubled, and there is distension and distention of the belly followed by pains." Clerics guilty of such excess must do 40 days' penance; a rule followed unintelligibly by the enjoining for the same offence of 4 weeks' penance for a deacon or priest, 5 for a bishop, 3 for a "prelate;" the penance to be without wine or flesh-meat (c. 12).

Drunkenness must have been widely spread over the Continent also in the 8th and 9th centuries. The same Boniface in a letter to Pope Zacharias (A.D. 741-51), complains, among other scandals of the contemporary Romish Church, of its drunkard deacons; and the pope in reply only says that he does not allow such deacons to fulfil sacred offices or touch the sacred mysteries. The 3rd canon of the Council of Friuli (A.D. 791) is severe against drunkenness, referring to the passages on the subject in Titus i., Rom. xiii., Eph. v., Luke xxi. The Capitularies of Theodulf, archbishop of Orleans, to his clergy (797) enjoin on these both to abstain themselves from drunkenness and to preach to their flocks that they should likewise abstain (l. c. 13); but reckons among minor sins the intoxicating others for the sake of mirth (ll.). The 26th of Charlemagne's Church Capitularies (810) directs in like manner the elder clergy to forbear the vice themselves and offer to the younger an example of good sobriety; the first capitulary of 802 contains repeated injunctions against drunkenness among monks (c. 17), nuns (c. 18), and canons (c. 22); the Council of Mayence (812), speaking of drunkenness as "a great evil, whence all vices are bred," directs all to be excommunicated who do not avoid it, until they amend their ways (c. 46); the 2nd Council of Rheims (same year) declares that the bishops and ministers of God should not be too much given to feasting (vinolentia; c. 18); the Edict of Charlemagne in 814 forbids clerics "nourishing" drunkenness and ordering others to become intoxicated (c. 14). See also the first capitulary of Aix-la-Chapelle of 802, c. 35; a capitulary of 803 (bk. vii. c. 218, and again at greater length, c. 270) repeating at the close the 15th canon of the Council of Vannes, but extending the period of suspension from communion to 40 days; the Additio Quarta to the capitularies, c. 46; the 3rd Council of Tours, A.D. 813, c. 48; and the 2nd Council of Chartres (same year), c. 10.

The above canons and rules relate chiefly, though not exclusively, to the clergy, or if to the faithful generally, only in respect to Church discipline. In the Carolingian era, however, civil penalties or disabilities began to be inflicted for drunkenness. In a capitulary of 803, added to the Salic law, it is enacted that no one while drunk may obtain his suit in the mall nor give witness; nor shall the count hold a plea unless before breaking his fast; nor may any one compel another to drink (cc. 15, 16; and see also General Collection, bk. iii. c. 38, and bk. vi. 232-3). The latter injunction is thus developed in a capitulary of 813: "That in the host none do pray his peer or any other man to drink. And whoever in the army shall have been found drunk, shall be so excommunicated that in drinking he use only water till he know himself to have acted evilly" (bk. iii. c. 72). Another capitulary, relating however to the clergy, enacts that priests who against the canons enter taverns and are not ashamed to minister to feastings and drunkenness, are to be severely coerced (bk. v. c. 325; see also c. 182, which however only pronounces excommunication).

The data for the above statements are taken, except in the first few centuries, exclusively from the legal records of the Church, or those of a period when it was almost identified with the state. They might be abundantly illustrated from contemporary writers, century by century. But they suffice to shew that the vice in question was never absent from the Church nor from its clergy, and that it attained enormous proportions among the latter in our own islands, and in the 8th and 9th centuries on the Continent also. DUCKS. It is quite uncertain why this bird is represented in early art, but it occurs repeatedly in the bas-reliefs of the Duomo at Ravenna, on the great piers at the east end, and in the church of St. Giovanni Evangelista in the same place. It is also drawn with great spirit and evident enjoyment by the monk Rabula, who twice indulges in an archivolt pattern of ducks and eggs (Assemani, Catalog. Bibl. Med. Tavv. xviii., xix.); besides single representations of various species. The bird may have been domesticated in monasteries, &c., and have been a favourite subject of illumination from its pretty colours. It occurs in the Lombard bas-reliefs at Verona. [R. St. J. T.]

DUEL (Duellum). The notion of deciding a matter in dispute, after ordinary means had failed, by a single combat between the parties or their champions, came into the empire with the Teutonic tribes, who were accustomed to settle by arms their private as well as public disputes.

The earliest formal recognition of the judicial combat as an institution seems to be in the laws of the Burgundians (Canciani, Leg. Barbar. iv. 25; A.D. 502), which provide (tit. 45) that a man who declines to clear himself by oath is not to be denied his right of challenge to combat. Afterwards the duel is referred to in many barbarian codes, as Leges Alemann. tit. 44, § 1; Baiuar. tit. 2, c. 2; Longobard. lib. i. tit. 9, § 39, &c.

It was only under the formal sanction of a court, and as a kind of appeal to a higher tribunal, that such combats were held to be legal.

The further development of the system, and the canonical precepts relating to it, belong to the Middle Ages (Selden, The Duello or Single Combat, in Works, vol. 3; Duange, s. v. Duellum). [C.]

DULA, martyr at Nicomedia; commemorated March 25 (Mart. Rom. Vet., Hieron., Bedae, Adonis, Usuardi). [W. F. G.]

DUMB. The 49th (otherwise 56th) of the Apostolical Canons enacts excommunication against any cleric who should make a mock of the deaf, dumb, or blind. By the 69th (otherwise 77th), the deaf, the dumb, and the blind were excluded from the episcopate, not as defiled, but that the proceedings of the Church should not be hindered.

The capacity of the dumb to receive the sacraments or accept a penance was the subject of some controversy. A whole work of Fulgentius (De Baptismo Aethiopis) is devoted to the question of the validity of the baptism of an Ethiop catechumen after the loss of his voice, and he concluded that it was entitled to the same validity as that of an infant. This view prevailed in the Church. Amongst other canonical authorities, the 1st Council of Orange, A.D. 441, enacted that a person suddenly losing his voice might be baptized or accept a penance, if his previous will thereto could be proved by the witness of others, or his actual will by his nod (c. 12). The 38th canon of the 2nd Council of Arles (452) is to the same effect as regards baptism.

According to one of Ulpian's Fragments (t. xi.) the dumb could not be a witness, nor make a testament, the reason assigned in the latter case being that he could not pronounce the "words of nuncupation" technically required for the purpose. And by a constitution of Justinian, A.D. 531 (Code, bk. vi. tit. xxii. l. 10) deaf-mutes were declared incapable of making a will or codicil, constituting a donation mortis causâ, or conferring a freedom, unless the infirmity should not be congenital, and they should have learned to write before it occurred, in which case they could exercise all these rights by writing under their own hand. The dumb were in all cases allowed to do so by such writing. It was, however, held by the old law that the dumb, as well as the deaf and blind, could lawfully contract marriage, and become subject to dotal obligations (Dig. bk. xxiii. tit. iii. l. 73). Deaf-mutes were held excused from civil honours, but not from civic charges (ibid. bk. l. tit. ii. l. 7). But the dumb might lawfully decline a guardian- or curatorship (Code, bk. v. t. lxvii.; Const. of Philip, A.D. 247). [J. M. L.]

EAGLE. It is probably an instance of careful exclusion of all Pagan emblems or forms which had been actual objects of idolatrous worship, while merely Gentile or human tokens and myths were freely admitted, that the form of the eagle appears so rarely in Christian ornaion, at least before the time of its adoption, the symbol of an evangelist. [EVANGELIUM.] Aringhi (vol. ii. p. 228, c. 2) speaks of the eagle as representing the Lord Himself; and is paralleled by a quotation of Mar- from a sermon of St. Ambrose, where he says (Pa. ciii. "Thy youth is renewed like eagle's") as foreshadowing the resurrection. (Inscr. Christianae de la Gaule, i. 147, 45), tradition gives a palm between two eagles, and a plate of a domed ceiling in the church of St. Priscilla, where two eagles on globes form part of the ornamentation. It refers evidently to some buried general or officer (vol. iii. tav. 160). Tri- chariots fill two of the side spaces, but the eagles can hardly be considered as emblems, though used by Christians.

EBRULFUS, abbot and confessor; commemorated Dec. 29 (Mart. Usuardi). [W. F. G.]

EBRULFUS, TOUCHING OF. 1. In Baptism. the influence of the Holy Spirit men's are opened to receive the wondrous things of a law, so there was a symbolic opening of the ears in the baptismal ceremony (Ambrose, Sermones, c. 1; Pseudo-Ambrosius, De Sacramentis, l. 1; Petrus Chrysologus, Sermo 52; see also ancient Expositio Evangeliorum in apertione in Martene, De Rit. Ant., l. 1). Thus in Magnus's directions for the ceremonies of baptism (Martene, u.s. art. 17), up by command of Charles the Great, we find the instruction in the Creed: "tandem aures et naves de sputo, et dicitur [Ephphatha], id est, aperire," in order that the ears may listen to the wholesome teaching of the Christian faith and reject the sophistical of the devil. Similarly in the ancient Ordines of Gemblours and of Rheims (l. 18).

2. Holy Communion, it seems to have been customary to touch the organs of sense (αισθη) with the moisture left on the lips after drinking the cup (Cyril of Jerusalem, Catech. r. 22; see COMMUNION, HOLY, p. 413).

EBRULFUS, PRAYER TOWARDS. Praying towards the east, as the quarter of the rising sun, the symbol of light, a natural symbolism common to all religions, was adopted by the Christian Church from its commencement, in accordance with the very wise rule which accepted all that was good and pure in the religious systems it sought to supplant, breathing into the old ceremonies a new and higher life. One of the earliest testimonies to the prevalence of this custom among Christians is that of Tertullian, c. 205 (p. c. xvi.; cont. Valent. c. iii.), who refers to the suspicions entertained by the heathen that Christians were sun worshippers "because they were known to turn to the East in prayer," "lovers of the radiant East, that figure Christ." The Apostolical Constitutions also state that the whole congregation "rise up with the sun, and looking to the east, pray to God eastward" (lib. ii. § vii. c. 57). The same rule is mentioned by Clemens Alexandrinus (Stromata, vii. 7), who says that "prayers are made looking towards the sunrise in the east." Basil, c. 374, testifies to the universality of the custom (De Sp. Sancto, c. 27), and Augustine speaks of it as a general usage (De Serm. in Monte, lib. ii. c. 5). To take one later instance out of many, Joannes Moschus, c. 600, records an anecdote of a certain abbot Zacchaeus of Jerusalem, who, when praying, "turned to the east and remained about two hours, without speaking, his arms stretched out to heaven" (Prat. Spirit. § 102). The chapter of Joannes Damascenus (De Orthodox. Fid. iv. 13) "concerning worshipping to the east," proves the prevalence of the custom.

The true reason for this custom is doubtless that already alluded to, that, to adopt the language of Clemens Alex., "the east is the image of the day of birth. For as the light which there first shone out of darkness waxes brighter, so, like the sun, the day of the knowledge of truth has dawned on those immersed in darkness" (Clem. Alex. u.s.) In close connection with this is the reference to Christ as the "Day-spring from on high," the ἀνατολή, the "Light of the World," which the early writers delight to recognise (Chrys. Homil. in Zach. vi. 12). Other reasons for, or more properly speaking, deductions from the practice, are given by other writers, one of the most frequent and beautiful of which is that in praying to the east the soul is seeking and sighing for its old home in Paradise, to which it hopes to be restored in Christ, the second Adam (Basil De Sp. Sancto, u.s., Const. Apost., u.s.; Greg. Nyss. Homil. V. de Orat. Domin.; Chrys. ad David. vi. 10; Gregorius Disputat. cum Herb. Jud. p. 217). Another cause assigned is that Christ when on the cross looked towards the west, so that in praying to the east we are looking towards Him (Joan. Damasc. u.s., Cassiod. ad Ps. lxxvii.), and that as He appeared in the east, and thence ascended into heaven, so He will there appear again at the last day, the coming of the Son of Man being like "the lightning that cometh out of the east and shineth even unto the west" (Matt. xxiv. 27), so that in prayer Christians are looking for their Lord's return (Hilar. in Ps. lxxvii.). We learn from St. Cyril of Jerusalem and others that the Catechumens at Baptism turned from the west, the place of darkness, to the east, the home of light, and to the site of Paradise which by that sacrament was reopened to him (Cyril Catech. xix. 9; Hieron. in Amos. vi. 14; Ambros. De Initiat. c. 2; Lactant. lib. ii. c. 10; Pseudo Justin. Quest. ad Orthodox. 118). (Bona De Divin. Psalm. c. vi. § 2; Bingham Orig. xi. 7. 4; xiii. 8. 15.) [K. V.]

EASTER-EVE. [EASTER, CEREMONIES OF.]

EASTER. The Teutonic name of the church feast of our Lord's resurrection (A.-S. eastre, Germ. ostern). Bede (De Temp. Rat. c. xv. De mensibus Anglorum), gives as the name of the fourth month, answering nearly to April, Eostur-monath, and adds: "Eostur-monath, qui nunc Paschalis mensis interpretatur, quondam a Dea illorum quae Eostre vocabatur, et cui in illis festa celebrabant, nomen habuit: a cujus nomine nunc Paschale tempus cognominant, consuetudo antiquae observationis vocabulo gaudia novae solennitatis vocantes."

The name of the festival in the Romance languages (Ital. Pasqua, Fr. Pâques), like the Latin Pascha, takes us back at once to the historic origin of the festival in the passover. In N. T. τὸ πάσχα, though in A. V. once (Acts xii. 4) translated "Easter," refers either to the Jews' passover, or (1 Cor. v. 7) to our Lord as its anti-type. The word πάσχα represents the Hebrew פֶּסַח. See Ex. xii. Thus the history of Easter of necessity starts from the passover.

The passover was kept on the 14th day of the month originally called Abib (Ex. xiii. 4), afterwards Nisan (Neh. ii. 1; Esth. iii. 7), which month was to be the first month of the year. On the 16th Nisan, a sheaf (or rather handful) of the new barley was presented before the Lord, as the firstfruits of the harvest (Lev. xxiii. 10; Joseph. Ant. iii. x. v.).

The above observance led, as a most important consequence, to the fixity of the seasons (considered in the average) in the Jewish year. It may be taken as established that the Jewish year was luni-solar, of twelve lunar months, which we may say, in general terms, consisted by turns of twenty-nine days and of thirty, with an occasional 13th intercalary month, by which a correspondence was kept up with the length of the solar year: and for the proper time of intercalating this month, it was only necessary to consider, at the time of the commencement of the month Nisan, whether the barley would be sufficiently ripe in sixteen days for the observance of the rite of the firstfruits, and if not, to intercalate a month, and thus postpone the ceremony. In this way, the seasons would continually be brought back to the same point.

Having regard to the astronomical element in later controversies, we now offer some further account of the astronomical data affecting the passover.

1. The relation of the passover to the moon. The night following the 14th Nisan was no doubt intended to be and usually was that of the full moon. We hear indeed in the institution of the passover, not of the full moon, but of the 14th day of the moon, and in the early church controversies as well as in the modern rule settled by Clavius, everything still depends technically upon the "14th day of the moon." But Philo tells us (Vit. Mos. iii. 686) that the passover is celebrated, μέλλοντος τοῦ σεληνιακοῦ κύκλου γίνεσθαι πλησιέστερος, and again (de Sept. et Fest. 1191), that it was so fixed that there might be no darkness on that day; and again, "That not only by day but also by night, the world may be full of all-beauteous light, inasmuch as sun and moon on that day succeed each other with no interval of darkness between." This last statement is extremely significant, and together with the lunar date, the 14th, very clearly marks the point of time. The first day of the moon means, in pre-astronomical times, not the day of the conjunction of the sun and moon, but the day on the evening of which the new moon first becomes visible as a thin streak of light to the left of the sun, just after sunset. This is possible in a fine climate, some eighteen hours after conjunction: if less time had elapsed, the first visible phase would be on the next day. Now an average synodic period of the moon, or lunation, is 29 d. 12 h. 44 m., and therefore the average interval between conjunction and full moon is 14 d. 18 h. 22 m. Taking the average length of phase and of interval, we should be brought for full moon to sunrise on the 15th day of the moon (inclusive), which would make the night succeeding the 14th day (inclusive) the night of full moon. Since the half-lunation may be prolonged or shortened in rare cases about twenty hours, and the length of phase is also variable, some exceptions must be allowed for, but the general correctness of the rule is apparent, and also that the night of the 14th will more frequently precede the full moon than follow it; in other words, the moon would rise a little before sunset, instead of rising, as it might do in the contrary case (a day later), nearly an hour after sunset. Thus Philo's statement that there was no interval of darkness, a fact of a nature to catch the attention, and about which there could be no mistake, leads us to believe that by calculating the time of full moon from the astronomical tables, we may assign the 15th Nisan with certainty in many cases, and with a high degree of probability in others. In some cases where it appears difficult to decide between two successive days, an examination of the time of the preceding new moon will help, though it will not always suffice, to remove the doubt.

2. We have next to notice the relation of the passover to the sun. This relation is apparent from the regulations as to the firstfruits on 16th Nisan. The season of the year depends on the equinox, and the general statement is that barley ears can be procured in a fitting state at or soon after the vernal equinox. But this relation is not a mere matter of inference. Josephus writes (Ant. iii. x. 5): "In the month of Xanthicus, which is by us called Nisan, and is the beginning of our year, on the 14th day of the lunar month, when the sun is in Aries . . . the law ordained that we should in every year slay that sacrifice . . . called the passover." And Philo (Vita Mos. iii.): "Τὴν ἀρχὴν τῆς ἐαρινῆς ἡμετέρας πρῶτον ἀναγράφει μῆνα Μωϋσῆς ἐν ταῖς τῶν ἐνιαυτῶν περιόδοις."

The first month of the Jewish year was then (as the best authorities hold), that month which contained the vernal equinox, although the beginning of the month might precede it. The Jews apparently had no rule about not keeping the passover before the equinox; at least if we may believe Epiphanius (Haeres. lxx. 11), and a definite instance given by St. Ambrose, A.D. 387, of the Jewish passover on Mar. 20 (Ad Aemil. Episc. 83). Moreover it is stated that the anterior limit of the Latins for the 14th of the moon, viz. Mar. 18, was derived from the Jews.

In after times, probably from the time of Dionysius, bishop of Alexandria, 247-264, it became one of the sharpest points of controversy: ὅτι μὴ ἄλλοτε ἢ μετὰ τὴν ἐαρινὴν ἡμετέραν προσήκει Πάσχα ἑορτὴν ἐπιτελεῖν (Eus. H. E. vii. 15).

Although, however, the time of the equinox became a point of critical discussion in after times, there was so little general knowledge of its true position, that very strange mistakes were made respecting it. The correct knowledge of the equinox was in fact nearly confined to the Alexandrian astronomers, and there are several misapprehensions which still prevail, as, for orthodox—that they had departed from the ancient custom,” &c. We subjoin the earlier part of the chapter which is here alluded to.

“For even from the earliest times various controversies and dissensions were in the church concerning this solemnity, which used yearly to bring laughter and mockery. For some, in a certain ardour of contention, began it before the week, some after the week, some at the beginning, some in the middle, some at the end. To say in a word, there was a wonderful and laborious confusion. Nor is it unknown to learned men, how often, at the various times of this feast, there have arisen from the observance of a different ecclesiastical discipline, tumults and contentions, especially in the time of Polycarp and Victor, when the Easterns and Westerns would receive no mutual letters of peace. Which also happened in other times, as in that of Alexander, bishop of Alexandria, and Crescentius, how they wrote against each other and bitterly fought. Which disputes began to be agitated from the very times of the bishops who had been converted to Christ from the circumcision and from the sect of the Jews, even to our own times, on which account those who had gathered from all sides to the Nicene council, the matter having been accurately known, with common agreement from all, and with fitting computation and calculation of times, order it to be kept.”

Eusebius (H. E. v. 24) gives in a letter of Irenaeus the following account, relating to the events about A.D. 160:

“When the blessed Polycarp was at Rome in the time of Anicetus, and they had also some little difference of opinion with regard to other points, they immediately came to a peaceable understanding respecting this one, for they had no love for mutual disputes. For neither could Anicetus persuade Polycarp not to observe (μὴ τηρεῖν, i.e. the 14th Nisan) inasmuch as he had always observed it with John the disciple of our Lord, and the other apostles with whom he had associated; nor could Polycarp persuade Anicetus to observe (τηρεῖν) for he said that he ought to follow the custom of the presbyters before him.”

Polycarp was bishop of Smyrna in Asia Minor, and there can be no doubt that he expressed in these words the custom of the Asiatic churches, which was τηρεῖν, whilst that of the Western was μὴ τηρεῖν. That we ought to supply after τηρεῖν, the 14th Nisan, we learn from c. 23 (referring to about A.D. 190).

“There was a considerable discussion raised about this time, in consequence of a difference of opinion respecting the observance of the paschal season. The churches of all Asia, guided by ancient tradition, thought that they were bound to keep the 14th day of the moon, on the occasion of the feast of the Saviour’s passover, that day on which the Jews had been commanded to kill the paschal lamb, it being necessary for them by all means to regulate the close of the fast by that day, on whatever day of the week it might happen to fall; while it was the custom of all the churches of all the rest of the world, which observed in this respect an apostolic tradition that has prevailed down to our own time, not to celebrate it in this manner, it being proper to close the fast on no other day than that of the resurrection of our Lord.”

“The bishops, however, of Asia” (he continues in the 24th chap.) “persevering in observing the custom handed down to them from their fathers, were headed by Polycrates. He, indeed, had also set forth the tradition handed down to them, in a letter which he addressed to Victor and the church of Rome. ‘We,’ said he, ‘therefore observe the genuine day: neither adding thereto, nor taking therefrom. For in Asia great lights have fallen asleep, which shall rise again in the day of the Lord’s appearing All these observed the 14th day of the passover according to the gospel, deviating in no respect, but following the rule of faith; so also do I, Polycrates, who am the least of all of you, according to the tradition of my relatives, some of whom I have followed. For there were seven of my relatives bishops, and I am the eighth; and my relatives always observed the day when the people (i.e. the Jews) threw away the leaven.’”

“Upon this, Victor, the bishop of the church of Rome, forthwith endeavoured to cut off the churches of all Asia, together with the neighbouring churches, as heterodox, from the common unity. And he publishes abroad by letters, and proclaims that all the brethren there are wholly excommunicated.”

Many bishops, however, remonstrated, amongst others Irenaeus, who wrote an epistle, in which he maintains the duty of celebrating the mystery of the resurrection of our Lord, only on the day of the Lord; but admonishes Victor not to cut off whole churches of God, who observed the tradition of an ancient custom.

In chap. xxv. Eusebius explains that the bishops of Palestine agreed with the decree, and stated that they observed the same day with the church of Alexandria, an important point, for Alexandria is to be looked on, along with the churches of Rome and Asia Minor, as the third, and ultimately the most important, influence in regulating Easter.

Considering how much has been written respecting the Asia Minor controversies in modern times, it is material to observe that the statements of Eusebius and the whole course of the controversy, leave no doubt of the observance of the 14th day of the moon. No other day comes into consideration. Thus the facts are settled; to judge of the motives from which the day was kept is, however, more difficult. Various reasons might easily be alleged for the observance of this day: those who thought that our Lord died on the 14th Nisan, might keep it (as we believe) as the anniversary of our Lord’s death, or even if they desired to keep the anniversary of the last supper, knowing that that supper, which was by intention a passover, was only anticipated in point of time by necessity, might revert to its legal time of celebration, whilst those who thought that our Lord died on the 15th Nisan, might yet keep the 14th (as Baur and Hilgenfeld allege) in memory of the supper.

That St. John found at Ephesus a festival on the 14th and joined in it, and gave it the weight of his authority, in no way militates, then, against his authorship of the gospel, that fixes the 14th Nisan for the crucifixion, even though it were true that the other chronology had originally prevailed there.

The argument of Baur, and all the members of the Tübingen school, is as follows:—The Asiatics celebrated the 14th Nisan by an adration of the Lord's supper, in commemoration of the passover which Jesus had on the same day, immediately before his death, with his disciples. The Asiatic church, however, believed that Jesus ate on the evening of the 14th, and that he died on the 15th, and believed this, according to unimpeachable authority, on the authority of the apostle John. Now, what says the 4th gospel? According to the celebration of the last supper by our Lord took place, not upon the 14th Nisan, but the evening of the day previous, the 13th, Jesus dies upon the cross upon the 14th, therefore before the passover of the law have been partaken of. The conclusion is obvious. The apostle who is the great authority for the Asiatic, cannot possibly be the author of the gospel, which speaks unmistakably of the western practice.

There is a simplicity and coherence in the general theory, as expanded at length in Hilgenfeld's Paschastreit der alten Kirche, which has taken a very strong hold upon the mind. But it is upon more than one untenable assumption that it assumes that the Asiatic Christians observed the 14th evening as the anniversary of the supper. There is not, however, any hint of this in the most important narratives of the New Testament, and the plain natural view is that the 14th Nisan was observed in Asia by fasting in memory of the death of Jesus; while a common feast in the evening commemorated a speedy redemption. The fact of the fasting, which both Irenaeus and Eusebius bear witness to as a testimony that it was the memory of the death of our Lord that was observed. Fasting in anticipation of the feast, belongs altogether to a later period, fully observed in Steitz's article in Herzog's Encyclopädie. [COMMUNION, HOLY, p. 417.] Between these controversies, that of Anicetus and Polycarp (about 160 A.D.), and that of Melito and Polycrates (190 A.D.), there occurred a controversy in Laodicea (between 170 A.D. and 177 A.D.) which has become of late the very turning-point of the whole discussion, but about which we afford us no further information than follows (H. E. iv. 26). "Of Melito, there are two works on the passover . . . In the one on the passover he shews the time in which he wrote it, beginning with these words: 'When Servilius Paulus was proconsul of Asia at which time Sagaris suffered martyrdom there was much discussion in Laodicea concerning the passover, which occurred at that time in its proper season, and in which also these works were written.' This work is also mentioned by Clement of Alexandria, in his own work on the passover, which, he says, he wrote in imitation of Melito's work (ἐξ αὐτῆς τῆς τοῦ Μελίτου ὑποθέσεως)."

With this dispute are connected, probably, the two following fragments of Apollinarius, bishop of Hierapolis, given in the Chronicon Paschale:

There are some who now, through ignorance, to raise controversy about these things being guilty in this of a pardonable error for ignorance does not so much deserve as need instruction. And they say that on the 14th the Lord ate the lamb with his disciples, but that He himself suffered on the great day of unleavened bread; and they interpret Matthew as favouring their view, from which it appears that their sentiments are not in harmony with the law, and that the gospels seem, according to them, to be at variance."

Again, "The 14th is the true passover of the Lord, the great sacrifice, instead of the lamb the Son of God, . . . who was lifted up upon the horns of the unicorn, and was pierced in his sacred side, who shed out of his side the two cleansing elements, water and blood, word and spirit, and who was buried on the day of the passover, the stone having been placed upon his tomb."

We know very little of Apollinarius. Eusebius tells us that he was the author of an Apology for the Christians, addressed to the emperor, and that he was an eloquent writer against the Phrygian, Cataphrygian, and other Montanists, and wrote two works against the Jews: but we are left to conjecture who those opponents were against whom he was arguing in the work from which these fragments are taken.

With these fragments are associated quotations from Hippolytus and Clement of Alexandria:—

"Hippolytus, the witness of religion, who was bishop of the so-called Portus, near Rome, has written literally thus in his Treatise against all the Heresies: 'I therefore see that there is a contentiousness in this affair. For he (i.e. the adversary, the Quarto-deciman) says thus: Christ celebrated the passover on that very day, and suffered: I therefore must also do as the Lord did.' But he is wrong from not knowing that, when Christ suffered, he did not eat the passover according to the law. For He was the passover that had been foretold, and which was accomplished on the day appointed."

And again the same (Hippolytus) says in the Treatise on the Passover: 'He did not eat the passover, but he suffered (i.e. as the passover) ὁὐκ ἔφαγεν, ἀλλ' ἔωσεν.'"

Another passage from Clement of Alexandria, in his work concerning the passover: "In the preceding years then the Lord keeping the passover ate that which was slain by the Jews: but when he proclaimed himself to be the passover, the Lamb of God, led as a sheep to the slaughter, immediately he taught his disciples the mystery of the type on the 13th, on which also they ask of him, Where wilt thou that we make ready to eat the passover, . . . but the Saviour suffered on the next day, being himself the passover . . ." See also Philosophumena, 274-5.

These fragments are given because they offer almost the entire evidence on which we have to fix the place of the Laodicean interlude. Hilgenfeld views Apollinarius as a representative of the West, through whom Western influence has gained a footing in the heart of Asia. His opponent is directly Melito, but Melito as the representative of the whole body of Asiatic Christians.

Now that Apollinarius is in the greatest harmony with the Roman and Alexandrian writers whose fragments are associated with him in the Chronicon Paschale, is manifest: there is great probability also in the conjecture that he, like Clement, wrote on the occasion of Melito's work, and the absence of his name from the list of Polycrates suggests some discordance between his views and those of Polycrates. But he writes against certain persons who are creating a disturbance, not against the quietly existing ancient custom, nearly universal around him: he seems to observe the 14th himself, and when we notice the characteristics of his writings as directed against the Phrygians, Cataphrygians, and other Montanists, and against the Jews (Euseb. H. E. iv. 27), we may see ground for suspecting that his real antagonist was such a man as Blastus (perhaps the very man) who, about 180, carried Montanism from Asia Minor to Rome and there provoked the opposition of the church, which is extremely likely to have stirred up Victor's crusade against the customs of Asia Minor. We know that Hippolytus, as well as Irenaeus, wrote against Blastus, and although Melito's work may have occasioned that of Apollinaris, Eusebius would hardly have noticed them together, as he does, as fellow-helpers in the church, if they occupied so marked an antagonistic position as has been supposed.

We have already seen from Epiphanius that a diversity of usages continued to prevail until the Nicene council. At that council the Western usage may be said to have established its victory, and those who still persisted in the Asiatic practice fell into the position of heretics. We find in the letter of the emperor Constantine to the churches after that council (Socr. H. E. i. 9): "There also the question having been considered relative to the most holy day of Easter, it was determined by common consent that it would be proper that all should celebrate it on one and the same day everywhere." Also that "it seemed very unsuitable in the celebration of this sacred feast, that we should follow the custom of the Jews," . . . who, labouring under a judicial blindness, "even in this particular do not perceive the truth, so that they, constantly erring in the utmost degree, celebrate the feast of passover a second time in the same year." This of course refers to the error of celebrating before the equinox. "Consider how grievous and indecorous it is, that on the same days some should be observant of fasts, while others are celebrating feasts; and especially that this should be the case on the days immediately after Easter. On this account, therefore, Divine Providence directed that an appropriate correction should be effected, and uniformity of practice established, as I suppose you are all aware." (This refers to the determination of the equinox, which was settled to be on the 21st March, although, as we have shown above, the 20th was the proper day, as it only happened once in four years on the 21st, and then at 2 A.M.) "And since the order is a becoming one, which is observed by all the churches of the western, southern, and northern parts, and by some also in the eastern: from these considerations all have on the present occasion thought it to be expedient, and I pledged myself that it would be satisfactory to your prudent penetration, that what is observed with such general unanimity of sentiment in the city of Rome, throughout Italy, Africa, all Egypt, Spain, France, Britain, Libya, the whole of Greece, and the dioceses of Asia, Pontus and Cilicia, your intelligence would also concur in." The epistle of the synod to the church of Alexandria speaks in the like terms (see Socr. i. 9): "We have also gratifying intelligence to communicate to you relative to unity of judgment on the subject of the most holy feast of Easter: for this point also has been happily settled through your prayers; so that all the brethren in the East who have heretofore kept this festival when the Jews did, will henceforth conform to the Romans and to us, and to all who from the earliest time have observed our period of celebrating Easter." (See also Euseb. Life of Constantine.)

It is to be noted that no rule is here given for determining Easter; the churches are referred to the ancient rule of the West.

It has been often stated that the council established a particular cycle, that of nineteen years, but this is a mistake.

Epiphanius mentions three different sets of so-called heretics, who persisted in the Quarto-deciman usage, viz. the Audiani (Haeres. lxx.), the Alogi (li.), and the Quarto-decimans (li.), the last being orthodox in all respects except this.

It is unnecessary to follow out further the history of the decline of the Quarto-decimans.

We must now give some brief account of what is known respecting the various astronomical cycles employed for the determination of Easter.

The use of cycles was very familiar to the ancient astronomers. It arose out of the necessity, when lunar months were in use (as at Athens) of linking together in some manner the changes of the moon and the sun. They all rested upon the mean motions of the moon, which was not only all that could be exactly calculated in the state of their astronomical knowledge, but which is in fact all that can be used with advantage for the arrangement of ceremonies and festival-days. The object was to find a period which should contain an exact number of lunations and also of tropical years—the former consisting of 29 d. 5305887 or 29 d. 12 h. 44 m. 2s. 865.

1. The most ancient cycle was the Octaëteris, or cycle of 8 years. It depends on the fact, that 8 tropical years are nearly equal to 99 lunations. The 99 months contained 2922 days, three of the 8 years having embolisms or intercalary months, as follows. The first year of the period seems to have been variously taken: I. being the arrangement given by Geminus; II. by Epiphanius; whilst III. is that adopted in Scaliger's account of this cycle, the letter E denoting the embolism.

1	2	3	4	5	6	7	8

1	2	3	4	5	6	7	8

III.

1	2	3	4	5	6	7	8

The months were full (30 days) and hollow (29) by turns, except the intercalary, which were always full. This is exactly 8 years of 365½ days. But neither the lunation nor the year is here taken at its true value, and the 8 years really fall short of 99 lunations by 1 d. 14 h. 10 m.—an error which would soon accumulate and make the cycle useless.

Cleostratus, Eratosthenes, and others made various changes for the correction of this cycle, which still however remained imperfect.

2. A great improvement upon this was the cle of 19 years ascribed by Geminus to Eucta-na, but generally to Meton, about 432 B.C. is rests on the extremely close relation between the length of 19 years and 235 lunations, i.e.

$$\begin{aligned} 19 \text{ years} &= 6939.60256 \text{ days,} \\ 235 \text{ lunat.} &= 6939.686348 \text{ days,} \end{aligned}$$ difference of about 2 h. 3 m. The actual arrangement was that out of 235 months 110 were flow, making 6940 days, being in excess of 235 lunations by 7½ hours. In the course of 4 Me-nic periods the accumulation of errors would be 30 hours, and accordingly Calippus proposed en to leave out 1 more day. There was then excess of 6 h. only in 76 years or of 1 day in 10 years. This period of 76 years is called the Calippic period.

The first Paschal cycle in use seems to have been the Octaëteris. Epiphanius refers to it (Hæc.
v.), and appeals to it in his argument with the Audiani in such a manner as to imply that they were right in holding this to be the ancient church cycle: on which account he would rather rest his argument upon it than upon the superior cle of 19 years, which must have been familiar him. Eusebius also mentions (vii. 20) that Dionysius, bishop of Alexandria, in one of his paschal letters gives a canon for 8 years, seeming to imply the use of the Octaëteris (about 400 A.D.).

The Paschal cycle of 112 years of St. Hippolytus attained some celebrity and was inscribed on the chair of his statue, discovered at Rome in 1511, and now in the Vatican. It was based on a cycle of 16 years, repeated 7 times: Hippolytus having observed that by using 16 years, instead of 8, the week-days recurred in succession, though in their natural order reversed. It extends from A.D. 222 to A.D. 333, and was evidently constructed about 222 A.D. and was based upon the period of years 215 to 2 A.D. for which period it is correct. Beyond its defective nature soon appears, and after other period it would be found to be worthless.

may be seen in Fabricius's Hippolytus. See also Ideler, ii. 222, and Ordo Saeculorum, p. 477.
The Paschal canon of St. Cyprian, called the epistola Paschalis, which is extant, but without a table, was a repeat of St. Hippolytus, with a new start from A.D. 242, based on the 16 years from 228 to 243.

3. When the Western church discovered the defective nature of the Octaëteris, they look up perhaps returned to a cycle of 84 years, which was employed by, according to Epiphanius and Cyril's Prologue in Bucherius, the Jews (perhaps after the fall of Jerusalem), then probably by the Quarto-decimans, and also by some Latins.
Cyril in his Prologue implies that the 84 years cycle was forsaken for that of Hippolytus, saying, "pejus aliquid addiderunt."

The 84 years cycle may be regarded as consisting of a Calippic period of 76 years (with the retraction of 1 day) and a single Octaëteris: and their errors are in opposite directions, it has a small error in 84 years than the Octaëteris had in Both Epiphanius and Cyril ascribe it to the Jews, and the fact that, 84 being a multiple of 7, the Calendar moons would recur on the same days of the week in each period, would naturally give it a value in their eyes. However this may be, it became undoubtedly the great cycle of the Latin church, for more than two centuries, till it was superseded by the cycle of Victorius of 532 years, published in the year

457. An 84-year Easter-table of the Latin church may be seen in Ideler, ii. 249, constructed from a "Fasti Consulares," discovered by Cardinal Noris, and beginning with the year 298. Muratori published another in his Accursata ex Ambrosianis Bibliothecae Codicibus. In both these it appears that the Epacts and weekdays of the 1st January were employed for the determination of Easter. Bucherius also gives "The Latin or Prosper's cycle of 84 Years," beginning at 382. Since 84 Julian years contain 30681 days, and 1039 lunations 30682 d. 6 h.
48 m., the 84-year cycle gives at its conclusion the new moon 30 hours too early.

It may be right here to mention the fact that Epiphanius, believing that the Jews had this 84 years cycle at the time of our Saviour's crucifixion (for which there is no evidence in Jewish writers), argues at length (Hæc. li.) that, this cycle being shorter than the moon's true cycle (he means probably the Alexandrian) the Jews anticipated the proper time of the pasover by two days in the year of the Passion, and Bucherius believes that he is in the main right, and reasons quite correctly from his premises that, if the Alexandrian cycle and 84-year cycle started together B.C. 161, the latter was 3 days in advance of the moon and the former 1 day.
And Bucherius holds, in agreement with Peta-vius, that there was a division amongst the Jews as to these two calculations, the Pharisees and priests keeping the pasover one day later than our Lord and his disciples and a great part of the nation.

There is, however, a great fallacy in these calculations. The cycles give, of necessity, not the true moon of the heavens, but the mean moon, and it does not at all follow that, because on the whole they give a good representation of the mean moon, that therefore they give the true mean moon in any particular year. On the contrary, they all go by fits and starts, according as the embolism has just taken place or not; and it requires not a general calculation, but an exact knowledge of the state of the cycle, starting from some absolutely certain date, before we can argue with any certainty from such cycles. We have above expressed the belief that the Jews, having been for many centuries accustomed to the feasts of the New Moon, did not allow any cycle to carry them away from a close adherence to the actual phase of the moon. And we may add that having examined the three best attested dates—that of the taking of Jerusalem by Pompey, B.C. 64, on the day of the Fast (10 Tiari) according to Josephus, and according to Dion Cassius, on a Sabbath;
the setting of the Temple on fire, the 9th Ab or Lous A.D. 70, a Sabbath; and the taking of Jerusalem by Titus on the 8th Gorpiaens, or Elul, according to Josephus—again a Sabbath, according to Dion Cassius, we find that the phase of the moon gives in each case, without any ambiguity and without any doubt, these very days, viz. B.C. 64, Oct. 4, Saturday; Aug. 4, A.D. 70, Saturday, and September 1, A.D. 70, Saturday.
The investigation of a few such cases creates a vivid impression that we are on firm ground.
A number of other cases, of a more conjectural character, may be seen in Browne's Ordo Saeculorum, p. 538.

The following results are taken from the 84-year cycle in Ideler, ii. 249, already referred to.

1	2	3	4	5
A.D.	Easter Day.	Tabular Age of Moon.	A.D.	Real Age of Moon (by Phase) on Friday.
448	4 Apr.	XVI	28	XIX
449	27 Mar.	XIX	29	XXI
450	16 Apr.	XX	30	XXII
451	1 Apr.	XVI	31	XVIII
452	23 Mar.	XVIII	32	XX
453	12 Apr.	XIX	37	XXII

Thus whilst the 3rd column is correct for the years A.D. 448-453, it is erroneous by 4 or 5 days for A.D. 28-33. It is remarkable that it gives Mar. 25 for Good Friday A.D. 29, like Hippolytus's cycle.

We have now to trace the history of the 19-years or Metonic cycle in the church, and its final triumph.

The Metonic cycle and the Calippic period had long been known to the Alexandrians, and had been in use in Syria and adjacent countries, so that it is remarkable that we hear of the Octaëteris rather than this cycle as having been first in use, even at Alexandria.

Anatolius, bishop of Laodicea about 284, by birth an Alexandrian, enjoys the credit, on the authority of Eusebius (vii. 32) of having been the first to arrange the 19-years cycle for ecclesiastical purposes. But the passage has greatly perplexed the commentators, and has called forth elaborate attempts at explanation or emendation from Petavius and others. For Anatolius declares that the sun "is not entering the first segment (of the zodiac) on the 22nd March, where he places the New Moon of the 1st year of the cycle, but is already on the fourth day passing through it. But this segment they generally call the first dodecatemurion, and the equinox, and the beginning of the months, &c." Unless we are to reject all that is said about Anatolius's knowledge and ability, we must take him to mean that the equinox fell on the 22nd, but that the sun was not then at the beginning of the zodiacal sign, but four days advanced in it. This is quite in consonance with the statements of Pliny (xviii. c. 25) and Columella (ix. 13), who after Eudoxus place the equinoxes and solstices at the 8th part of the signs. But the account respecting Anatolius is further complicated by the existence of a Canon Paschalis attributed to him, which exercised great influence in the British church, but which, if it is identical with that given in Bucherius, was certainly forged. It is strange, too, that so little is heard of the cycle for some time afterwards. But the 19-year cycle probably gradually made its way at Alexandria, only it was found that something more than a cycle was wanted to insure uniformity. An actual catalogue of results was necessary. So Theophilus, bishop of Alexandria (385-412) framed at the command of Theodosius a cycle (or actual calendar) of 418 years (19×22), which St. Cyril, who succeeded him in that see in 412, shortened into a cycle of 95 years (19×5) for convenience's sake. Part only of St. Cyril's Computus Paschalis remains, but his Prologue survives in a Latin translation (in Bucherius). Theophilus had laid down distinctly the rule that when the xiv of the moon falls on Sunday, Easter-day is the Sunday after; and Cyril states distinctly that Easter may fall on any of the 35 days from March 22 to April 25, on our modern mode. In fact, the two chief sources of discrepancy after the Nicene council were these: the Latins often celebrated on the Sunday on which the xiv fell, while the Alexandrians waited a week; and the Latins made the 18th March the first day on which the xiv could fall, whilst the Alexandrians made their limit the 21st March. They both agreed that as the passover was to be kept in the first month, Easter was to follow the same rule; but the Latins made (as Bucherius, &c. think the Jews did) the 5th March the earliest possible day of the 1st month, whilst the Alexandrians, holding firmly the doctrine that the xiv must not fall before the equinox, that is, according to their rules, the 21st March, made the 8th March the 1st possible day of the month. The Alexandrian rules, as we shall see, ultimately prevailed.

It seems to be now the time to explain the actual method employed by the Alexandrians.

The years of the cycle of 19 years being numbered in order, the number of any given year was called the Golden Number. So also the letters A B C D E F G being written against all the days of the year in succession, the letter A being placed against the first of January, the same letter will stand against any given weekday throughout the year, except in Leap-year, when a change will take place after the intercalary day. The letter which stands against all the Sundays is called the Sunday Letter.

Again, the day on which the 14th of the equinox moon falls is called the Easter Term. As the Easter Terms recur every 19 years, the knowledge of the Golden Number gives the Easter Term, and if we know the Sunday Letter we can pass on from the Easter Term, its letter being known, to the next Sunday, which will be Easter Day.

Rule 1. To find the Golden Number. Add 1 to the numeral of the year, and divide by 19. The remainder is the Golden Number; when there is no remainder, 19 is the Golden Number.

Rule 2. To find the Sunday Letter. To the numeral of the year, add its quotient on dividing by 4, and also the number 4; divide the sum by 7, and subtract the remainder from 7. This will designate the place of the Sunday Letter in the alphabet. Ex.: $325 + 81 + 4 = 410$; $410 \div 7$ leaves remainder 4; the 3rd letter C is the Sunday Letter. In Leap-year the earlier two months of the year have the letter next succeeding.

must not be supposed, however, that the act was always regarded from this simple point of view. It was approached with old traditional notions, so that the 19 years was spoken of as made up of 8 and 11—and the years were thought of as lunar years with embolisms—and happened that the Latins began their cycles much later than the Alexandrians, and so introduced embolisms in different years, this again a cause of discrepancy.

1 2 3 4 5 6 7 8 9 10 11 12 13 14 15 16 17 18 19

Western cycle:

x x x x x x x x x x x x x x x x x x

We give at the same time the order of the years of Victorius:

1 2 3 4 5 6 7 8 9 10 11 12 13 14 15 16 17 18 19 20 21 22 23 24 25 26 27 28 29 30 31 32 33 34 35 36 37 38 39 40 41 42 43 44 45 46 47 48 49 50 51 52 53 54 55 56 57 58 59 60 61 62 63 64 65 66 67 68 69 70 71 72 73 74 75 76 77 78 79 80 81 82 83 84 85 86 87 88 89 90 91 92 93 94 95 96 97 98 99 100

During the papedom of Leo the Great doubts were raised, in the year 444 A.D., and 455 A.D., as to the proper day of celebrating Easter. Leo wrote St. Cyril to enquire respecting 444, who answered that the day was April 23, propter annum embolismi anni (not 26 March, as the Latins made it). It was 8 of the lunar cycle of the Alexandrians, 18 of Victorius' cycle. Leo dissented.

In 455 the contention was greater. Here it was not a question of a month, but of a week. The Latins by the 84-year cycle made it April 24, the Alexandrians April 24.

Leo then wrote to Martian, emperor of the East, and to Eudocia Augusta, in which he asked them to interfere that the Alexandrians may not change April 24, alleging that the viii. kal. Martii was the ancient limit. The emperor made inquiry of certain eastern bishops and of the Alexandrians, and Leo finally yielded for the sake of peace. In the matter of these limits the Alexandrians were always firm, allowing the 14th of the moon to range from March 21 to April 18, Easter-day from March 22 to April 25; while the Westerns had shown much vacillation. Their 14th day limits were March 18 and April 21, and the council of Caesarea (A.D. 383) laid down the limits of Easter-day March 22 and April 25, alleging that the crucifixion was on March 22. The authority, together with that of the Nicene council, ordering that Easter should not be kept before the equinox, led the Latins to yield the limit; then Leo extended the 2nd limit two days, by understanding April 21 of the crucifixion, thus getting March 22 to April 23, 33 A.D. Finally the Latins had to yield 2 days more. But the Latins would only keep Easter on the 16th to the 22nd of the moon, so that the passion might be on the 14th, whereas the Alexandrians often kept Easter on the 15th. In the year 463 Victorius (or Victorinus) of Aquitaine, an abbot at Rome, was employed by pope Gregory to correct the calendar, and he was the real author of the cycle of 532 years, found by multiplying together 19, the cycle of the moon, and 28, the cycle of the sun. Thus, on the supposition of the perfect accuracy of the 19-years cycle, all full moons, days of the week, &c., would recur in the same order from cycle to cycle, for ever. The cycle is given in Boucherius: begins at A.D. 239 and ends 770. Some days are marked, as differently taken by the Alexandrians and Latins, for Victorius commenced the cycle at the 11th year of the Alexandrian cycle, and also still adhered to the above-mentioned Latin rules.

There were many errors in his tables, and the revision of it by Dionysius Exiguus obtained for it the name of the Dionysian cycle, transferring to Dionysius most of the merit which belonged to Victorius.

But what Dionysius really did was to continue the 95-year cycle of St. Cyril, and he also induced the Italians to accept fully the Alexandrian rules. He also abandoned the era of Diocletian, and was the first to introduce the modern Christian era, reckoning from the supposed date of the birth of Christ. Victorius had made his cycle begin from the baptism, A.D. 28.

But the Easter table of Victorius long held its ground in Gaul. In the council of Orleans (541) it was ordered that all should observe Easter according to the lateralis Victorii, and Gregory of Tours says of A.D. 577: "In that year there was a doubt about Easter. In Gaul we, with many other cities, celebrated Easter on the 14th Calends of May: others with the Spaniards on the 12th Calends of April. The former was Victorius's date: the Alexandrians kept Easter a week later, the Spaniards four weeks earlier." It is only at the end of the 8th century that traces of such differences disappear in Gaul. (Ideler, iii. 294.)

The 84-years cycle lasted longer in Britain than elsewhere: and the bitter controversies which were carried on for a long time between the new English church, founded by the mission of Augustine, and the ancient British church were entirely due to the persistence of the British clergy in clinging to the old cycle of 84 years (see the letter of Althelmus Anglus Episcopus, about 700 A.D. in Boucherius) and old traditional maxims respecting the paschal limits.

They kept the festival from the 14th of the moon to the 20th: they placed the equinox on the 25th March, and would keep no festival before it, and they used as the later limit of the festival the old limit of the Latins, the 21st April.

For these rules they appealed to tradition and the example of St. John, and also repeatedly to the authority of Anatolius. The discussion almost always turns in Bede's narrative, and in the letters preserved, on this point:—Is the festival to be kept from the 14th to the 20th of the moon (with the British church), or from the 15th to the 21st (with the Roman)? And as the battle turned so largely on the 14th of the moon, the partisans of the Roman use tried to fix on the British clergy the name of Quartodecimani, and so the stigma of heresy. But they were in no real sense Quartodecimani. They observed the Easter festival on a Sunday and kept the Friday before it, not keeping, as did the Christians of Asia Minor, the 14th of the moon, fall when it might: nor is there any ground for connecting them, on the supposition of their being Quartodecimani, with Asia Minor. As we have mentioned before, the spurious canon of Anatolius, given in Boucherius, was perhaps designed to support the cause of the British Christians. And there is some ground for supposing that the lateralis of 100 years, given in Boucherius, may have belonged to the British church, as it falls in with their principles.

Frequently as the differences respecting Easter are mentioned in Bede (Ecc. Hist.), there are unfortunately no dates given which can throw further light on these discrepancies; but the statement respecting Queen Eanfleda and her followers as still fasting and keeping Palm Sunday, when King Oswy had done fasting and was keeping his Easter, must refer to some year not far from 651; and the xiv of the moon fell on Sunday in 645, 647, 648, and 651.

The Roman use finally prevailed in England. Archbishop Theodore, A.D. 669, is believed to have arranged everything according to Roman customs, and from that time general uniformity existed. Nothing further of importance occurred respecting Easter until the Gregorian reformation of the calendar, by which time the accumulated errors arising from the 1½ hrs. excess of the 19-years cycle made the calendar moon about four days later than the real moon. [L. H.]

EASTER, CEREMONIES OF. The season of Easter, as the epoch of the great redemptive acts by which the salvation of mankind was consummated, was from a very early period observed with special solemnity by the Christian church. The Paschal season originally extended over fifteen days, of which Easter Day was the central point, commencing with Palm Sunday and terminating with Low Sunday. The first week was known as πένθα σταυρώσιμον, the second week as πένθα ἀναστάσιμον (Suicer, sub voc.). Leaving to other articles the solemnities of the former period [PALM SUNDAY: GOOD FRIDAY] we propose to speak of those of the period of Easter, properly so called.

Easter Eve.—This day was known by a variety of titles in the early church—τὸ μέγα σάββατον, τὸ ἕγιον σάββατον, νύξ ἀγγελικὴ (Pallad.), Sabbatum Magnum, Dies Vigilantium Paschae. (Hieron.), ἡμέρα τῆς δοξαστῆς τοῦ πένθα παννυχίδος (Euseb. vi. 34). It had a double character, penitential and jubilant; as the conclusion of the great Lenten Fast, and as the prelude of the Festival of the Resurrection. This was the only Sabbath in the whole year on which fasting was permitted (Apostol. Constit. vii. 23). The fast of Easter Eve was of the strictest character, and was prolonged at least till midnight, Good Friday and Easter Eve being a continuous fast, in supposed obedience to our Lord's words (Matt. ix. 15). The Apostolical Constitutions enjoin fasting till cockcrow (Ap. Const. v. 18). The synod of Auxerre, A.D. 578 (Can. xi.) forbids the breaking of the fast till the second hour of the night. The 89th Trullan canon (Concil. Quinisext. Labbe, vi. 1180) limits the fasting at midnight. Jerome assigns as a reason for the congregation not being dismissed on Easter Eve till after midnight, that even as the Paschal deliverance of Israel took place at midnight (Exod. xii. 29) it was the expectation of the church, according to apostolical tradition, that Christ would return to accomplish the redemption of His church and triumph over her enemies at the same hour. That hour being passed, the awe with which the Lord's coming was anticipated being relieved, the Easter Feast was celebrated with universal joy (Hieron. In Matt. xxv. 6). The same belief is mentioned by Lactantius (Div. Inst. vii. 19), when he speaks of the night being passed in watchfulness on account of the coming of our King and God. We have evidence that in Tertullian's time it was spent in public worship, when he speaks of the difficulty which would be caused by the absence of a Christian wife from her heathen husband during the whole night at the time of the paschal solemnities (Tert. ad Uxor. ii. 4). As the night advanced and Easter drew nearer all sign of mourning was laid aside for the highest festal jubilee. One special solemnity indicating the festival character of this night was the lighting of lamps and candles, a custom which is repeatedly referred to by writers from the 4th century downwards. Cyril of Jerusalem, in his introductory Catechetical lecture (§ 15), speaks of "that night, that darkness that shows like day," and Eusebius records (De Vit. Const. iv. 22) that Constantine observed Easter Eve with such pomp that "he turned the sacred or mystical vigil into the light of day" by means of lamps suspended in every part, and setting up huge waxen tapers as big as columns (κηροὺ κίονας ὕψηλοτάτους), through the whole city. We find a reference to the same custom in Gregory Nazianzen (Orat. xlii. De Pasch.), who speaks of persons of all ranks, even magistrates and men and ladies of rank, carrying lamps, and setting up tapers, both at home and in the churches, thus turning night into day; and again (Orat. xliii.) describes this λέπα νύξ, as a "torch-bearing" (ὀφθαλμολα), being as it were a πρόδρομος or forerunner of the rising of the great light, Christ. Gregory Nyssen also describes the brilliancy of the illumination as a cloud of fire mingling with the dawning rays of the sun, and making the eve and the festival one continuous day without any interval of darkness (In Christ. Resurr. Orat. v.) From the poem of Prudentius (Hymn. v. ad Incensum coram Paschalis, 141-148) we learn that the church was illuminated with lamps depending from the roof, reminding the spectator of the starry firmament. In later times one special wax taper of large size was solemnly blessed, as a type of Christ's rising from the dead to give light to the world. The institution of this custom was attributed to pope Zosimus A.D. 417 [PASCHAL TAPER].

The latter hours of the evening and the night were spent by the assembled congregations in united prayer and supplication, the singing of psalms and hymns, reading the Scriptures, and in hearkening to the exhortations of the bishop and presbyters (Apost. Constit. v. 19; Greg. Nyss. Orat. iv. in Christ. Resurrect.).

Easter Eve was the chief time for the baptism of catechumens. The first seventeen catechetical lectures of St. Cyril were delivered during the weeks before Easter to those who were preparing for baptism at the ensuing Easter Eve, on which day the eighteenth was pronounced (Catech. xvii. 20, xviii. 32, 33). The nineteenth, on Easter Monday, explains "the deep meaning of what was done on the evening of their baptism" (xix. 1). On the Easter Eve which succeeded Chrysostom's deposition, no fewer than three thousand catechumens

* The earliest instance of the use of this designation for Easter Eve is in the letter of the church of Smyrna detailing the martyrdom of Polycarp (Euseb. iv. 15. 12). The day on which Polycarp was apprehended is described as "the Great Sabbath"—ὁ πένθος σαββάτον μεγάλου. The term is evidently borrowed from John xix. 31. Ἐν γὰρ μεγάλη ἡ ἡμέρα ἀδείη τοῦ σαββάτου.

awaited baptism at Constantinople, who were dispersed by a body of soldiers bursting into the baptistery, many of the female catechumens being driven out only half dressed, having laid aside their outer garments in preparation for the sacred rite. The sacrament, thus brutally interrupted, was resumed in the Baths of Constantine, where the scattered congregation reassembled (Chrysost. Ep. ad Innoc. i.; Pallad. Vit. Chrys. c. 9). The rite of baptism was preceded by the solemn benediction of the water (Apost. Constit. vii. 43; Tertull. De Bapt. c. 4; Cyprian, Epist. 70 (69)). [BAPTISM.]

We find in Rabanus Maurus, c. 847 (De Clericor. Institut. ii. 28) a detailed account of the mode of observing Easter Eve which would not differ much from that of the preceding centuries. All the congregation remained in perfect silence and tranquillity awaiting the hour of the Resurrection, uniting from time to time in prayer and psalmody. Towards nightfall the ceremonies of the Nox Domini began with the benediction by the archdeacon of the paschal taper. This ceremony was followed by lections from the Old Testament and prayers, succeeded by the litanies of the saints. Then followed the administration of baptism. The white-robed neophytes ascended from the font—"ascendit grex dealbatorum de lavacro"—and the celebration of the eucharist commenced, of which all were bound to partake but the excommunicate.

Complaints of disorders consequent on these nocturnal assemblies are found as early as the 6th century. These scandals led first to the limitation of the hours of the vigil, and ultimately to the transference of the observance to the daytime.

Easter-Day.—Although nothing could exceed the honour paid to the Feast of the Resurrection by the early church, by which it was justly regarded as the chief festival of the whole year, there is very little to say respecting the mode in which was observed. The high-sounding titles with which the early fathers delighted to decorate it—"the queen of days," "the feast of feasts, and assembly of assemblies" (Greg. Nys. Orat. xix.; Ibid. xliii.), "the desirable festival of our salvation" (Chrysost. Homil. lxxv. de Pasch.), "the crown and head of all festivals," and the like—are mere rhetorical flourishes which never obtained general currency, and need not therefore be further dwelt upon. It was commonly known as ἡ μεγάλη κυριακή. "Dominica gaudii" seems also to have been a familiar appellation (Bingham, Orig. xx. 5, 5). As a religious observance Easter Day was not distinguished from other Sundays except by the vastness of its congregations, and the general splendour and dignity of its services. Indeed it was ordained by pope Vigilius in the 6th century (537-555) that the mass on Easter Day should be the same as that on other days, "ordine consueto," with the exception of the addition of "singula capitula diebus apta" (Epist. ad Euth. § 5; Labbe, v. 313). By one of the so-called Trullan canons, A.D. 692 (Can. 90; Labbe, vi. 1180) it was forbidden to kneel in prayer from the entrance of the priests to the altar on the evening of Easter Eve till the evening of Easter Day, the two days being combined in one continuous celebration of the Resurrection, ἡς ἐν ἀποκλήσει ἐνταύθεν νυχθήμερον πασηγυρίζου ἡμᾶς τὴν ἡμέραν. Gregory Nyssen draws a vivid picture of the joyous crowds who, by their dress and their devout attendance at church, sought to do honour to the festival. All labour ceased, all trades were suspended, the husbandman threw down his spade and plough and put on his holiday attire, the very tavern-keepers left their gains. The roads were empty of travellers, the sea of sailors. The mother came to church with the whole band of her children and domestics, her husband and the whole family rejoicing with her. All Christians assembled everywhere as members of one family. The poor man dressed like the rich, and the rich wore his gayest attire; those who had none of their own borrowed of their neighbours; the very children were made to share in the joy of the feast by putting on new clothes (Greg. Nyssen, Orat. iii. in Christ. Resurrect.). Evangelical lections were read to the assembled congregations, so arranged that the whole history of the Resurrection was gone through on successive days (Aug. Serm. de Temp. 137, 140), and sermons preached instructing the people how to keep the feast duly, δεύοντες ἐσπράξαι (Athanas. Epist. ad Dracont. ad fin.). When the empire became Christian, the emperors, beginning with Valentinian, A.D. 367, testified to the universal joy by throwing open the prisons, and granting a general pardon (Cod. Theod. lib. ix. tit. 38, leg. 3, 6, 7, 8; Cod. Justin. lib. i. tit. 4, leg. 3; Cassiod. xi. Epist. ult.; Ambrose Ep. 33 (14)), debtors were forgiven, slaves manumitted, all actions at law were suspended except in some special cases (Cod. Justin. lib. iii. tit. 12, leg. 8; Cod. Theod. lib. ii. tit. 8, leg. 2; lib. ix. tit. 35, leg. 7), and liberal alms given to the poor. In the words of Gregory Nyssen (u.s.) "every kind of sorrow is put to rest to-day, nor is there any one so overwhelmed with grief as not to find relief from the magnificence of this feast. Now the prisoner is loosed, the debtor is forgiven, the slave is set free, and he who continues a slave derives benefit." All games or public spectacles were prohibited as being inconsistent with the sanctity of the season (Can. Trull. 86; Labbe, vi. 1171; Cod. Theod. lib. xv. tit. 5, leg. 5). What has been said of Easter Day may be extended to the week following, which, together with that which went before, was considered to partake in the sacredness of the festival. The Apostolical Constitutions ordain that slaves should be allowed to rest from their work "all the great week" (Holy Week), "and that which follows it" (Ap. Const. viii. 33). The purpose of this rest was religious edification. St. Chrysostom states (Homil. 34 De Resurrect. Christ.) that for seven days sacred assemblies were held and sermons preached. The council of Macon A.D. 585 (Can. ii.; Labbe, v. 981) also forbids all servile work for six days, during which all are to assemble three times a day for worship, singing paschal hymns, and offering their daily sacrifices. The Trullan canons (Can. 86; Labbe, vi. 1171) also lay down that the faithful ought to spend their time through the whole week in church, devoting themselves to psalmody, reading the Scriptures, and the celebration of the holy mysteries.

The Easter season—Octo dies neophytorum (August. Epist. xix. ad Januar. c. 17)—closed with the following Sunday (Low Sunday with us), known by the titles of ἀντίδοχα, ἡ καὶ κυριακή, ἀνακαινισμός, Dominica in Octavis Paschae, Pascha Clausura; also with reference to the white dresses of the newly baptised, ἡ κυριακή ἐν λευκοῖς, Dies Neophytorum, Dominica in Albis. The appellation Quasi modo geniti, derived from the introit (1 Pet. ii. 2), is of later origin. In the Greek church it has been known as the κυριακή Θωμᾶ, and ἡμέρα ἀποστόλων, with reference to the gospel for the day (John xx. 19-23), and the appearance of Christ to Thomas on this day (v. 26-29). The special solemnity of this Sunday was the laying aside by the newly baptised of their white baptismal robes, to be deposited in the sacristy of the church. St. Augustine refers to the appearance of the neophytes in church in their white robes (Serm. de Temp. 162; Dominic. in Octav. Paschae): "Hodie vitali lavacro resurgens Dei populus ad instar Resurrectionis ecclesiam nostram splendore nivei candoris illuminat." The white bands that were wrapped round the heads of the newly baptised infants were also removed on this day, which from this custom sometimes bore the name of octavae infantium: "infantes vocantur et habent octavas hodie recludenda enim sunt capita eorum" (Aug. Serm. de Temp. 160). We learn from Rabanus Maurus (De Cleric. Inst. ii. 38) that in his time the seven days after Easter Day were known as Dies Albae, because those who had been baptised on the holy night wore their albs and assisted at the holy mysteries in that dress, till the following Sunday, when the bishop's hand was laid upon them in confirmation. Gregory of Tours mentions processions—rogationes—being made every year at Easter tide (Greg. Turon. Vit. Patr. c. vi. p. 1175). [E. V.]

ECCDICI ('Εκδικοί or ἐκκλησιέκδικοι), certain officers appointed, in consequence of the legal disabilities of clergy and monks, to represent the church in civil affairs; see ADVOCATE OF THE CHURCH, DEFENSOR. The place where they met officially was called ἐκδικεῖον. [C.]

ECONOMUS. [OECONOMUS.]

ECPHONESIS ('Εκφώνησις) denotes that portion of an office which is said audibly, in contrast with that said secrete (μυστικῶς); especially the doxology, with which the secret prayers generally conclude. [C.]

ECTENE or ECTENIA ('Εκτενήs or ἐκτενία). Omitting from consideration certain preparatory prayers, the liturgies of St. Basil and St. Chrysostom begin with a litany, known as Ectene, Synapte, Diacronicæ, or Eirenicæ. The name Ectene may refer to the length or (more probably) to the earnestness of the supplication. Litanies of a similar form are also found in the Hour-offices. See further under LITANY. [C.]

ECTHESIS ('Εκθεσις), a doctrinal formula, or "setting forth" of a CREED. Thus Theodoret (Hist. Eccl. ii. 17) speaks of the statement of doctrine put forth by the "conciliabulum" of Rimini as an ekthesis. The same word is again used by the same historian in speaking of the creed of Eunomius (H. E. ii. 23). [C.]

ECTYPOMATA. [DONA: VOTIVE OFFERINGS.]

ECUMENICAL COUNCILS. [COUNCILS.]

ECCLESIA ('Εκκλησία). The principal senses of the word Ecclesia with which we are concerned are the following:—

I. The congregation or gathering together of the faithful. "Ecclesia est convocatus populus per ministros ecclesiae ab eo qui facit unanimes habitare in domo. Ipsa domus vocatur Ecclesia, quia Ecclesiam continet" (Amalarium, De Eccl. Off. iii. 2).

II. As indicated in the extract above from Amalarium, the word came to designate the building used for the Christian assembly [CHURCH]; as in 1 Cor. xi. 18: "Appellamus Ecclesiam basilicam quā continetur populus" (Augustine, Epist. 157). The principal designations of churches of different kinds are the following:—

1. Ἡ ἐκκλησία is used absolutely to designate the principal church or "cathedral" of a city; as by Procopius (De Bello Persico, ii. 9), to designate the cathedral of Antioch.

2. Ecclesia Baptismalis, a parish church—to use the modern term—in which baptisms are celebrated. Walafrid Strabo (De Reb. Eccl. c. 30) speaks of "presbyteri plebium qui baptismales ecclesias tenent et minoribus presbyteris praesunt." [Compare PARISH.]

3. Ecclesia Cardinalis. This was also a designation of parish churches. [CARDINAL.]

4. Ecclesia Cathedralis, a church in which a bishop set up his throne. [CATHEDRA: CATHEDRAL.]

5. Ecclesia Catholica. [CATHOLIC.]

6. E. Diocesana (Leges Wisigoth., lib. iv., tit. 5, c. 6) is equivalent to parochialis. [DIOCESE: PARISH.]

7. E. Mater, Matricialis, Matrix, Matricula, may designate either a cathedral, as distinguished from its subordinate churches; or a parish church, as distinguished from mere oratories.

8. Ecclesia Plebalis or Plebeiana, the church of a Plebs, or community; that is, a parish church. See the quotation above (II. 2), and Ducange's Glossary, s. v. Plebs.

9. Ecclesia Principalis, a cathedral (Leg. Wisigoth. iv. 5, c. 6).

10. Ecclesiae Patriarchales, in the Roman church, are those subject to the immediate authority of the pope.

11. Ecclesia per se, a church having its own priest, and not dependent (as an oratory would have been) upon another church (Hincmar, Epist. ed. Labbe, quoted by Ducange). [C.]

ECCLESIAE MATRICULA. [MATRICULA.]

ECCLESIAARCH ('Εκκλησιάρχης), in the Eastern church, was the sacrist, who had general charge of the church and its contents, and summoned the people to service by the bells or other means of giving notice. The minor officials of the church were under his authority. The Typicum of Sabas (c. 1) represents the Ecclesiarch as giving a rubrical direction in the same way that the deacon commonly does: ἐλθα ἄρχεται ὁ ἐκκλησιάρχης, Δεῦτε, προσκυνήσωμεν (Suicer's Thesaurus, s. v.; Daniel's Codex Lit. iv. 700). [C.]

ECCLESIASTICAE LITERAE. [COMMENDATORY LETTERS: DIMISSORY LETTERS.]

ECCLESIASTICAE RES. 1. The term res ecclesiasticae is used, in a wide sense, to denote all matters belonging to the church, as opposed to res seculares, terrenae, matters belonging to the world. Things ecclesiastical are again divided into res spirituales, functions or objects which belong solely to the priesthood, as the sacraments and the altars; and res temporales, which contribute to the welfare rather of the body than the soul (Ambrose, Epist. 33, ad Marcellinum).

Again, of res spirituales some are immaterial (incorporales), some material (corporales). To the former belong the invisible gifts and graces bestowed on the soul by God; to the latter, the outward acts or objects connected with such gifts or graces, that is, the sacraments; certain "res sanctae, sacrae, sacrosanctae," as churches, the vessels used in the eucharistic or other rites of the church, and the vestments of its ministers; and certain "res religiosas," such as foundations or institutions for purposes of piety and beneficence over which the church claims jurisdiction. The molestation or injury of ecclesiastical things is SACRILEGE.

2. In a narrower sense, the term res ecclesiasticas designates the PROPERTY OF THE CHURCH. (Lancelotti Instit. Juris Canon. ii. 1; Jacobson in Herzog's Real-Encyclop. s. v. Kirchensachen.) [C.]

ECCLESIASTICAL COURTS. [BISHOP: DISCIPLINE: JURISDICTION.]

ECCLESIASTICAL LANGUAGE. [LITURGICAL LANGUAGE.]

ECCLESIASTICAL LAW. [CANON LAW.]

ECCLESIASTICALS. 1. A member of the Catholic church, as opposed to a heretic or schismatic (Jerome, Epist. 62, c. 1; in Ruffinum, ii. 4).

2. Any person in orders, whether major or minor. Thus the first council of Vasa (c. 3) desires presbyters not to send for the chrism by the hands of any servant of the church (per quemcunque ecclesiasticum), but by the hands of a subdeacon at least. The word is similarly used in the Theodosian code.

3. Isidore of Seville (De Eccl. Off. ii. 3) speaks of a clerk occupying his due position in the hierarchy as "clericus ecclesiasticus," in contradistinction from acephali, or irregular clerks.

4. Those who were in any way the "men" of a church, so as to be unable to leave its territories or its service, were called in a special sense "homines" or "viri ecclesiastici" (Car. Mag. Capitul. iv. 3). "Homines ecclesiastici seu fiscalini" are mentioned, and their duties to their lord prescribed, in Car. Mag. Capitul. v. 303. They are distinguished from servi (Conc. Suevion. ii. c. 12). [C.]

EDESSA. The translation of the Holy Icon (or picture) of Christ from Edessa is commemorated Aug. 18 (Cal. Byzant.). A great festival (Daniel's Codex, iv. 244). [C.]

EDUCATION. [SCHOOLA.]

EGARA, COUNCIL OF (Egarane concilium), held A.D. 615 at Egara, now Terrasa, in Catalonia: to confirm what had been enacted at Oca or Huesca seventeen years before. Twelve bishops, whose sees are not given, and a presbyter and deacon representing two more, subscribed to it (Mansl, x. 531). [E. S. Ff.]

EGDUNUS, presbyter, martyr at Nicomedia with seven others; commemorated March 12 (Mart. Adonis, Usuardi). [W. F. G.]

EGESIPPUS. [HEGESIPPUS.]

EGYPT. The entrance of Christ into Egypt is commemorated Ginbot 24 = May 19 (Cal. Ethiop.); the flight of Christ from Melita to Roskuama in Egypt, Hedar 6 = Nov. 2 (Cal. Ethiop.). [C.]

EGYPT, FLIGHT INTO. It is difficult, if not impossible, to name any earlier representation of this event than the bronze casting on the doors of St. Zenone at Verona, which is at all events one of the earliest known of Christian works in metal, and may date from the original fabric of the 9th century. [R. St. J. T.]

EGG. There seems some diversity of opinion as to the use of the egg as a Christian symbol. Boldetti (p. 519) speaks of marble eggs found in the tombs of St. Theodora, St. Balbina, and others; these were of the size of hen's eggs. Eggshells are occasionally found in the loculi of martyrs, and Raoul Rochette refers them to the agapae so frequently celebrated there. [See EUCHARIST.] But Martigny, with the Abbé Cavedori (Ragguaglio crit. dei Monum. della Arti Crist.) is inclined to think that the egg signified the immature hope of the resurrection. "Restat spes, quae quantum mihi videtur, ovo comparatur; spes enim nondum pervenit ad rem" (Augustine, Serm. cv. 8, Opp. t. v. 379). The use of eggs at Easter has no doubt reference to this idea; but whether the idea was really attached to the object or not, in a generally symbolic sense, seems still a dubious matter. For Eggs and Ducks see the Medici MSS. in Asseman. Catalog. Bibl. Med. [R. St. J. T.]

EILETON (Εἰλετόν). After the ecphronesis of the prayer of the catechumens, and immediately before the deacon warns the catechumens to depart (Lit. Chrysos., Daniel iv. 349) the priest unfolds the eileton, or CORPORAL, on which the chalice and paten are afterwards placed. What this signifies is explained by Germanus of Constantinople (Theoria Myst. p. 153, ed. Paris, 1560) thus: "The eileton represents the linen cloth in which the body of Christ was wrapped when it was taken down from the cross and laid in the tomb" (Suicer's Theaurus, s. v.). [C.]

EIRENICA (Εἰρηνικά). (1) The earlier clauses of the great litany in the Greek liturgies are frequently called eipnικά, as being for the most part prayers for peace. Thus the great litany in the liturgy of St. Chrysostom (c. 14, p. 340, Daniel) begins with "Let us beseech the Lord in peace; for the peace which is from above; . . . for the peace of the whole world . . ." (2) See PACIFICAE. [C.]

EISODOS. [ENTRANCE.]

ELASIPPUS, martyr at Ferrara, with Speusippus and Melasippus, under Aurelian; commemorated Jan. 17 (Mart. Adonis, Usuardi). [W. F. G.]

ELDERS (Seniores). There are some traces of elders recognised in the church, yet distinct from the clergy. Augustine addresses his epistle to the church at Hippo (Epist. 137) to the clergy, the elders, (senioribus), and all the people. In another place (Contra Crescon. iii. c. 29), he mentions bishops, presbyters, deacons, and elders, (seniores). Optatus (l. c. 41) says, that when Mensurius, bishop of Carthage, was forced to leave his diocese in the persecution under Diocletian, he committed the ornaments and utensils belonging to the church to the faithful elders (fidelibus senioribus). These appear in some cases to have been merely the leading men of the congregation. Thus the council of Carthage, A.D. 419, committed the office of meeting the leaders of the Donatists to the magistrates and elders of the several districts (Cod. Eccl. Afric. c. 91). But there also appear to have been others who had a special position, and probably special duties, in the church. Thus, in the Gesta Purgat. Caecil. et Felic. (p. 263, in Optatus, ed. Paris, 1676) it is said, that in the business of enquiring into certain disputes there were associated with the bishop and clergy certain elders of the people, who were also officers of the church (seniores plebis, ecclesiasticos viros). Compare ECCLESIASTICUS. In the same tract mention is made in one place of the clergy and elders, and in another of bishops, priests, deacons, and elders. In the decrees of the council of Carthage, A.D. 419, mention is made of certain elders, who appear to have been sent as delegates to the council (Cod. Eccl. Afric. cc. 85, 100). Compare CHURCHWARDENS: ELECTORAL COLLEGES.

[P. O.]

ELEAZAR, teacher of the Maccabees, commemorated Aug. 1 (Cal. Byzant.); July 29 (Cal. Armen.). [W. F. G.]

ELEAZARIUS, martyr at Lyons, with his eight children and Minervius; commemorated Aug. 23 (Mart. Adonis, Usuardi). [W. F. G.]

ELEEMOSYNARIUS. 1. See ALMS, p. 52. 2. The word is occasionally used to designate the distributor for pious uses of the effects of a person deceased, i.e. the "executor" of his will. Thus Gregory of Tours (De Vitis Patrum, c. 8) speaks of one from whose executors (elemosynarii) no small sums were received in honour of a saint (Ducange, s.v.). [C.]

ELECTI. Some writers (as Bona, De Reb. Lit. l. xvi. 4) consider the CATECHUMENS [p. 317] to be divided into the four classes of Audientes, Substrati or Genuflectentes, Competentes, and Electi; the latter being those whose names were actually inscribed in the church-list with a view to baptism. Bingham (Antiq. X. ii. 1) considers the Electi to be identical with the Competentes, though he also makes four classes by adding one of ἐκκλησιαστικοί. But both these classifications are of doubtful authority. (See Martene, De Rit. Ant. l. i. 6.) [C.]

ELECTION OF CLERGY. The first recorded election of clergy is in the Acts of the Apostles, where Matthias was chosen by casting lots. But this example does not appear to have been followed.

Clemens Romanus (Epist. Cor. i. c. 42) says that in the early days of the church the apostles appointed their first-fruits, proving them by the Spirit, bishops and deacons of those who should join the faith; and that afterwards the ministers were appointed by other men of consideration (ἀνδρῶν ἀλλοτρίων) with the consent of the whole church (c. 44). Compare Pseudo-Clemens (Epist. ad Jacob. i. c. 3). Clemens Alexandrinus (Kuseb. H. E. iii. c. 23, § 6) says that St. John ordained such clergy as were pointed out by the Spirit.

It appears to have been sometimes held that the bishop had the right of selecting the inferior clergy. Cyprian (Ep. 29, ed. Hartel) says that he had appointed Saturus as a lector and Optatus as a subdeacon, insisting that he has not acted arbitrarily, but carried out the wishes of the church in general. Ambrose (Epist. 82 ad Vercell.) speaks of bishops as admitting other clergy to orders and benefices, and (Offic. i. c. 18) of a certain person who was refused admission into the clerical order (in clerum), by himself. Jerome (Comm. in Tit. i. 5) speaks of bishops as having power to appoint (constituenti) priests in every city, and again (Epist. ad Nepot.) of their selecting (eligendi) priests, and (ibid.) of their being entrusted with the power of placing in office whom they would. Philostorgius (H. E. iii. 17) speaks of Leontius bishop of Alexandria appointing Aetius as a deacon. In the Life of John Damascene, it is said that the bishop of Jerusalem, acting by divine inspiration, sent for him and ordained him to the priesthood (Vita Joann. Damascen. per Ioann. Episcop. Hierosolym. inter opp. Joan. Damas.). Gregory the Great, while strenuously asserting the right of the clergy and people to the free election of bishops, was equally firm in reserving to the bishops the power of selecting parish priests and deacons, on the ground that in choosing a bishop, the clergy and people transferred to him all rights of election to the inferior offices (Thomassin, Vet. et Nov. Eccl. Discip. ii. 7, c. 34, § 10). The council of Laodicea (c. 13) forbids the election to the priesthood (eis ιερωσύνην) to be entrusted to the multitude (τοῖς ὄχλοις). But this is sometimes referred to the election of bishops. The 4th council of Carthage (c. 22) provides that a bishop shall not ordain any without the advice of his clergy, and shall also seek not only the testimony, but the assent (consentientiam), of the people. A decree of the council of Merida (Conc. Emerit. c. 19) speaks of a parish priest as having been put in charge of his church, by the appointment (per ordinationem) of his bishop. Another decree of the same council (c. 18) ordains that all parish priests shall provide a supply of inferior clergy from the household (familia) of the church. The 6th canon of Theophilus of Alexandria associates the clergy with the bishop, providing that at every ordination all the clergy shall exercise the power not only of assent, but of choice (consentiat et eligat), and that the candidate selected by the clergy shall be ordained in presence of the people, and that the bishop shall enquire of them whether they also can bear testimony to his fitness.

In these instances it appears that the right of election rested with the bishop, or with the bishop and clergy, and that the people only consented. There is evidence, however, that in many cases the people not only bore witness to the fitness of the candidates, but had themselves a share in the election. Cyprian (Ep. 67, cc. 3 and 4) speaks of the people as having the greatest power of choosing worthy bishops, since by their presence the merits of the candidates will be known, and the election be just and legitimate as confirmed by the general suffrage and assent. He adds that this was the apostolic rule not only in the election of bishops and priests, but also in that of deacons. Jerome (Epist. ad Rusticum) appears to assert that either the bishop or the people had power to elect the candidates for ordination, "vel populus vel pontifex elegerit." And, in another place (Comm. in Ezek. c. 33, v. 6) speaks of either a bishop or a priest being a watchman, "speculator," of the church, because of his election by the people, "quia a populo electus est." Siricius (Epist. i. ad Himerum Taracoon. c. 10) speaks of elevation to the office of priest or bishop as depending on the choice (electio) of the clergy and people. Chrysostom (περὶ ἱερός. iv. c. 2, § 376, 379) speaks of the electors to the office of the priesthood (τοὺς ἐκλεκτοὺς) as quite distinct from the bishop who ordains. Of these electors he speaks as being the elders (τῶν πατέρων, ibid. i. c. 3 § 29) or the leading (μεγάλους) members of the congregation (ibid. i. c. 14 § 39). He also speaks of the election as being decided by a majority of votes (ibid. iii. c. 4 § 171). Sometimes indeed the people appear to have brought a candidate to the bishop and insisted on his immediate ordination, as is said to have been the case with St. Augustine (Possid. Vita Augustini, c. 4).

The 1st council of Orange (c. 10), provides that when a bishop is the founder of a church in another diocese, he may select the clergy to officiate in it. Justinian (Novell. 123 c. 18) allows the founders of private oratories to select their clergy, but if any unworthy were chosen, the bishop was to have the power of selecting those whom he thought fit. [P. O.]

ELECTORAL COLLEGES. The evils of a popular election of bishops and other clergy in a great city, such as Constantinople, were so manifest (Chrysostom de Sacerdotio, iii. 15), that attempts were sometimes made to commit the choice of ministers to a select body or committee. We find perhaps a trace of this in the earliest times, when Clement of Rome (ad Cor. i. 44) speaks of the successors of the apostles being chosen by men of consideration (οἱ ἀλλοτρίων ἀνδρῶν) with the assent of the church. The council of Laodicea (c. 13) clearly desires that the clergy should be chosen by some definitely organized body, and not by a mere mass-meeting (οἱς ὅχλοις) [ELECTION OF CLERGY]. In spite of this ordinance, however, there are only too many instances in later times of the choice of clergy by meetings which can only be called mobs. (See Augustine, Epist. 155; Synesius, Epist. 87; Baronius, an. 303, § 22 ff.; Baluze, Miscell. ii. 102 ff.) Yet, generally, the influence of the principal men in a city could not be ignored, and when Justinian (Novell. cxiii. c. 1; see BISHOP, p. 216) definitely enjoined that the clergy and chief men of a city (πρότεροι τῆς πόλεως) should nominate three for a vacant see, he probably did but confirm an existing practice. From the three thus nominated, one was to be chosen by the consecrator (τοῦ χειροτονούντος), generally the metropolitan.

If the "chief men" had been defined, we should have had here an "Electoral College" of clergy and notables; as they were not, this system generally led to a struggle between the clergy and the civil government. [C.]

ELEMENTS. The two parts of the outward and visible sign in the Sacrament of the Lord's Supper.

I. Names.—The Latin word elementa does not appear to have been used in this technical sense in the early ages of the church, though it is a very natural word to express the component parts of any thing. Possibly the use arose from the analogy of baptism, where the outward sign would naturally be spoken of as the "element" of water, as, for instance, in the following passage from St. Augustine, where, in speaking of baptism, he says, "Take away the word, and what is the water but water? The word is added to the element, and it becomes a sacrament, itself as it were a visible word" (accedit verbum ad elementum et fit sacramentum. Augustin in Joan. XV. 1-3, Tract. lxxx. 3). Gregory of Tours (De Vita Patrum, c. 15) uses the word of both bread and water, "Nam esus illi panis tantum hordenceus erat et aqua, de utrisque elementis libras singulas per dies singulos sumens." Words denoting sacrifice or offering were constantly used of the Elements; τὰ ἅγια βῆμα, as in the Liturgy of St. James, ὁ ἱερεὺς ἐκδύνατο τὰ ἅγια βῆμα; or simply τὰ ἅγια, as in the Liturgy of St. Chrysostom and elsewhere; so the Latin Sancta,* as in Ordo Rom. II. c. 8 (see Mabillon, Comment. Præf. p. xxvi.); or again, simply τὰ βῆμα. Προσφορά was also generally used for the Elements placed on the altar. So the Latin oblato and oblata as in the Ordo Romanus II. (c. 9), "Archidiaconus suscipit oblatas duas de oblationario... et ponit [calicem] super altare juxta oblationes pontificis." The word Hostia, "the Victim," expresses a somewhat different aspect of the sacrificial conception.^b

The unconsecrated Elements on the altar are called in Eastern liturgies "the Mysteries;" the bread alone the "Seal" (σφραγίς), from its being divided by lines in the form of a cross (see below).

In certain Arabic rubrics (Renaudot, Lit. Orient. ii. 62) the Elements are called Barochus, a corruption of the Greek ἀραρχή.

In Syriac they bear the name of Ἀκρωβόνα, corresponding nearly to the Greek βῆμα and προσφορά and the Latin oblata; the bread is simply "Bread of the Sacraments," or "of the Mysteries."

When the Elements have been placed on the altar, they acquire other names having more distinct reference to sacrifice, as "the Lamb," or "the First-born." The Syrians too call the portion impressed with a cross "the Seal." Other names are given to the various particles after division (Ren. u. s. i. 189; ii. 62) [FRACTION.]

Again, the Elements were called σέμβολα, εἴκονες, formae aspectabiles, as outward representations of inward and spiritual grace. The word species, often supposed to have the same force, probably in its origin meant no more than "fruits of the earth"—a sense which it is well known to bear in later latinity, especially with the jurists (Ducange, s. v.).

* By the Sancta, however, we ought probably here to understand the consecrated Host reserved from a previous celebration.

^b See on these names the essay on sacrificial terms in Memoriale of the Rev. Wharton B. Marriott (London, 1813).

II. What were the Elements?

Throughout the universal church bread and wine have always been the recognised elements in the eucharist, with but few and slight exceptions which may be described in a few words. There was an obscure sect called the Artotyritae who added cheese to the bread. St. Augustin (de Haeres. c. xlviii.) says "the Artotyrites are so called from their oblation, for they offer bread and cheese, saying that the first oblations which were offered by men, in the infancy of the world, were of the fruits of the earth and of sheep." There were also sects which used no wine but water alone, and some who did not use wine in their morning services, though they did in the evening (see below, § VI.)

III. Composition of the Bread.

With regard to the element of bread, whatever may have been the practice of certain sects, there is entire agreement in the church that it should be made of wheat-flour. The mystical allusions to the superiority of wheat in Clement of Alexandria (Strom. vi. 11, p. 787) and Origen (Hom. in Gen. xii. c. 5, p. 247, Wirceburg, 1780) strongly indicate, what indeed there is no reason to doubt, that wheaten bread and (ordinarily) no other, was used in the mysteries. Alcuin (Epist. 90) speaks specially of the "grana tritici," from the flour of which the bread is to be made. The great controversy in the matter has been: Should the bread be leavened or unleavened?

A. The principal evidences bearing on this question are the following:

1. It has generally been assumed in the West that the Last Supper was eaten at the feast of the Passover, and that therefore the bread used was the unleavened bread which the Jews were alone allowed to eat at that time. But it is contended by some writers of the Greek church that the Last Supper was held on the 13th Nisan, when leavened bread was still used; and there is no direct statement either in the New Testament or in the writings of the Early Fathers to indicate that azyme, or unleavened bread, was used; on the contrary, the fact that only "bread" was mentioned would lead to the inference that only common bread was meant. The Acts of the Apostles simply speaks of "breaking bread" as a solemn rite, or meeting together to "break bread." Justin Martyr simply speaks of bread, and as he is giving a particular description of the Christian rites, it seems most probable that he would have mentioned the fact had any particular kind of bread been used.

2. It is said that as the element of bread was taken in the early ages from the offerings of the people [OBLATION], which served also for the support of the ministers and dependents of the church, it must have been ordinary, that is, leavened bread. But this argument is by no means so conclusive as at first sight it appears; it is good for the age of Justin Martyr; but in later times there are evident traces of a double offering; one of ordinary food, for the use of the dependents of the church, and one of bread and wine for the altar. The council of Nantes (c. 9, quoted by Martene) clearly distinguished between the oblaciones which were intended for consecration, and the panes, or loaves, offered for the use of the church [EULOGIAE]. So Hincmar (Capitul.

i. 16). And when such a separation was made between the offerings for the ministers and the offerings for the altar, the latter were probably specially prepared, whether leavened or not. The woman who smiled when Gregory the Great (Joannes Diac. Vita Greg. ii. 41) offered her in the eucharist that which she had herself prepared, need not be supposed of course to have taken the oblation from her household loaf.

3. Epiphanius (Haeres. 30, c. 18) says that the Ebionites, in imitation of the saints in the church, celebrate mysteries yearly in the church with unleavened cakes (ἄζυμων), using water for the other element in the sacrament. Here the azymes seem to be mentioned, like the water, as a departure from Catholic practice; but Epiphanius does not in terms reckon the use of azymes among the heretical practices of the Ebionites, so that it is possible that their departure from orthodoxy may have consisted in their annual, instead of more frequent, celebration, and in their use of water for wine.

4. The words of the Pseudo-Ambrosius (De Sacram. iv. 4), "tu forte dicis, meus panis est usitatus; sed panis iste panis est ante verba sacramentorum; ubi accesserit consecratio, de pane fit caro Christi," are generally thought to imply that the bread used for consecration was leavened. But the opposition in the writer's mind is between "common bread" and "the Body of Christ," not between "common" and "leavened" bread, nor is such an expression as "panis usitatus" absolutely conclusive, though it is in the highest degree probable that it designates leavened bread, such as was everywhere most commonly used.

5. A custom of the Roman church, mentioned by the Liber Pontificalis (cc. 33, 55) in the lives of Melchiades and Siricius, is thus referred to by Innocent I. (Epist. ad Decentium, c. 5). Writing to the bishop of Gubbio, he says that his correspondent had no need to consult him about the "fermentum" which on Sundays he (Innocent) sent to the parish churches (titulos), because that was a custom confined to the city of Rome, intended to prevent the parish priests [see CARDINAL], who were detained in their own churches by their proper duties, from feeling themselves cut off from communion with the mother church [EULOGIAE]. Even in Rome it was only sent to the "tituli" proper, not to the presbyters of other churches. It has been supposed (e. g. by Bona) that the eucharistic bread which was sent by the pope was called "fermentum" as being made of leavened bread; but, unless the bread commonly consecrated in the churches was unleavened, this supposition does not furnish a reason why these particular oblates should be called "fermentum" by way of distinction, as they certainly appear to be; and the conjecture of Sirmond (adopted by Mabillon) seems by no means improbable, that this "fermentum" was so called as being intended to leaven the whole mass of the Roman church. Certainly the expressions used in the Lives of Melchiades and Siricius, "quod declaratur, quod nominatur, fermentum," seem to imply that the term is used in an improper, not a strict, sense.

6. The sixth canon of the 16th council of Toledo (A.D. 693) is to this effect. It having been brought to the notice of the council that in some parts of Spain priests do not offer on the table of the Lord clean loaves, specially prepared (panes mundos et studio praeeparatos), but take of a piece to form a round disc (crustulam in rotunditatem) from loaves prepared for their own use, and offer it upon the altar with the wine and water; a thing contrary to all precedent; . . . the council decides unanimously, that no other kind of bread be placed on the altar of the Lord, to be hallowed by priestly benediction, but such as is whole and clean and specially prepared (panis integer et nitidus qui ex studio herit praeeparatus); nor is anything of large size to be offered, but only cakes of moderate size, according to ecclesiastical custom (neque grande aliquid, sed modica tantum oblata, secundum quod ecclesiastica consuetudo retentat).

This canon has been claimed by the advocates both of the leaven and of the azymes; but in fact it is not conclusive for either. It is decisive as to the fact that in the Western church in the 7th century oblates were specially prepared, and were not portions of a loaf, but "integers;" but it does not prove that the words "nitidus" and "mundus" necessarily imply the absence of leaven.

7. The tenth canon of the council of Chelsea (Conc. Calcuth. A.D. 787; Haddan and Stubbs, i. 452) enjoins that the oblations be cakes or loaves, not pieces of bread (panis, non crusta). Probably the same distinction is intended as that laid down by the 16th council of Toledo, between whole cakes prepared for the purpose, and a piece taken from a loaf. The passage determines nothing as to the use of leaven, for "panis" may be used either of leavened or unleavened bread, as in "panes azymi et crustula absque fermento" (Exod. xxix. 2).

8. Another point of which much has been made in the discussion is this: that Photius of Constantinople (A.D. 867) never mentioned the use of unleavened bread in the eucharist as one of the Latin errors, while Michael Caerularius, 1st patriarch of Constantinople (A.D. 1054), gave it a prominent place; it has thence been inferred that the use of unleavened eucharistic bread was introduced between the years 867 and 1054. This is however by no means a certain inference; Photius may have omitted to mention azymes among the points of difference between the Greek and the Latin churches, because he was content to leave the question of leaven or no leaven undetermined, like the Greeks of a later age at the council of Florence. All that can be certainly inferred from the silence of Photius is, that either the use of unleavened bread was unknown to him, or he regarded it as a thing indifferent. It is extremely difficult to suppose that Leo IX. would have written so strongly as he did to Michael Caerularius (Epist. ii. 24; vi.), as to the immemorial use of azymes among the Latins, if that use had arisen since the time of Photius; i. e. not more than a century before his own birth.

There is in fact positive evidence—if the documents be genuine—as to the use of unleavened bread in the eucharist in the Western church before that date.

9. Cyprian (Epist. 63, c. 13) says, that, as the chalice is composed, not of wine alone, nor of water alone, but of the union of the two: so the body cannot be meal alone, nor water alone, but the union of the two into one loaf. This is repeated in almost the same words by Isidore of Seville (De Dio. Off. i. 18). It is difficult to imagine that Cyprian, and Isidore after him, omitted all mention of so significant an ingredient as leaven, if it was used in the eucharistic loaf. Moreover, Alcuin (Epist. 90 [al. 69] ad Fratres Lugdunenses, p. 107) writing about A.D. 790, uses the very same expression as to the composition of the bread, "ex aqua et farina panis fit qui consecratur in corpus Christi," and adds, that it should be perfectly pure from leaven or "ferment" of whatever kind (absque fermento ullius alterius infectionis debet esse mundissimum). Somewhat later, A.D. 819, Rabanus Maurus (De Cleric. Institut. i. 31, § p. 319, Migne) lays it down that the eucharistic bread should be unleavened, after the manner of the Hebrew offerings (Lev. viii. 2), and holds that the bread which the Lord blessed in the Last Supper was undoubtedly unleavened.

10. John Maro (quoted by Martene), writing at any rate before the Trullan council, says that those who made the eucharistic offering in leavened bread reproached the Western churches, the Armenians, and the Maronites, with offering azymes, which were not bread at all; a clear proof that the Western churches generally, in the 7th century, were thought to agree with the Maronites and the Armenians in this respect.

11. Again, allusions to "common" or "leavened" bread would scarcely have been introduced into the CANON OF THE LITURGY [p. 272], as is done, for instance, in the liturgies of James Baradaï and Mathew the Pastor, if the compilers had not known of some who used unleavened bread.

12. On the whole, then, there is distinct evidence that unleavened bread was used in the eucharist by the Latins, and by some Eastern sects, in the 7th and 8th centuries; and there is probable evidence that it was used in the 3rd. In the orthodox Eastern church, there can be no doubt that leavened bread has been used from a very early period indeed; if not from the very first, at any rate from the time when Judaizing sects insisted on using unleavened cakes, like those of the Passover, in the Lord's Supper.

B. Mixture of Oil and Salt.—The Syrian Christians, besides the leaven which is common to almost all oriental communions, mix with the bread a little oil and salt—a practice which they defend by many mystical reasons (Renaudot, Lit. Orient. i. 191). The mixture of oil—perhaps taken from Lev. ii. 4, etc.; compare Justin Martyr, Dial. v. Trypho, c. 41—was probably always a singularity of a small sect; that of salt was more general and more hotly defended. Thus Alcuin (Epist. 90 [al. 69] ad Fratres Lugdunenses) reprehends certain persons in Spain for insisting, against the custom of Rome and the church in general, that salt should be put into the eucharistic bread; and adds mystical reasons why three things only, flour, water, and wine should be offered in the Mass. The modern Greeks eagerly defend the mixture of salt, which (they say) represents the life, so that a sacrifice

* The genuineness of this treatise is doubted by Renaudot. See Cave, Hist. Lit. s. v. Isidore.

* There seems no reason to doubt (with Bona, De Bib. Lit. i. xxiii. 7) the genuineness of this passage.

without salt is but a dead sacrifice; and one of the reproaches commonly directed against the Armenians was, that they used oblates containing neither salt nor leaven (Martene, A. R. I. iii. 7, § 1).

IV. Preparation of the Bread.

The more minute directions for the preparation of the eucharistic bread belong to a later age than that with which we are concerned. Those which fall within our period are principally these.

The canon already quoted of the 16th council of Toledo makes it certain that special preparation of the eucharistic bread was enjoined in the 7th century. So long as people actually offered, they probably themselves prepared the oblates for the altar. Thus the emperor Valens is said to have prepared with his own hands the gifts^a which he offered for the altar (Gregory Nazianz, Funeral Oration on St. Basil, c. 52, p. 809); and the Roman matron mentioned by Joannes Diaconus (u. s.)—probably a person of rank, or she would not have received the bread from the pope—had herself prepared that which she received. And it seems that not unfrequently noble ladies undertook the preparation of the oblates as a meritorious work; Candida, wife of Trajan, a prefect, prepared bread for oblation from flour which she had ground with her own hands (Martene, A. R. I. iii. vii. 24); so did St. Rodegund († 587), distributing the oblates to different churches (Life by Fortunatus, in Acta SS. Bened. i. 320). And this task was not unfrequently undertaken by nuns. Theodulph of Orleans, however (c. A. D. 797), desired that duty to be discharged by the presbyters themselves or their "boys"^b in their presence, in the following terms: "panes quos Deo in sacrificio offertis aut vobis ipsis aut a vestris pueris coram vobis nitide et studiose fiant" (Capitul. 5). And since that time the oblates have generally been prepared by priests or "religious" persons. See BETHLEHEM. For further particulars of the preparation of the sacramental bread in various places, see Martene, A. R. I. iii. 7, §§ 23–25; Renaudot, Litt. Orient. i. 189; ii. 63 ff. ed. 1718.

V. Form of the Bread.

The loaf used by the Jews of Palestine seems commonly to have been round, somewhat less than an inch thick, and six or eight inches in diameter. In order that it might be more readily broken, it was scored with lines, frequently two lines at right angles to each other, so as to form a cross, dividing the loaf into four portions (Ariughi, Roma Subterr. II. v. 9, p. 278, quoted by Probst, Sakramente, p. 201). And such was probably the form of the eucharistic loaf in the early Christian church (see woodcut). The Liber Pontificalis (p. 98a, ed. Muratori) attributes to Zephyrinus (pope 197–217) the order, that presbyters should distribute round cakes (coronas) blessed by the bishop—a statement probably of no great authority. In the 4th century Epiphanus (Anacrotus, c. 57) and Caesarius, brother of Gregory Nazianzen (Dial. iii. quæst. 169), speak of the bread as round. Gregory the Great (Dialogus, iv. 55) speaks of a certain presbyter bringing "duas oblationum coronas," then the usual form of oblation. These are explained by Joannes Diaconus (in Martene, A. R. I. iii. vii. 26) to be cakes made of a handful of fine flour, and in form like a crown (ex pugillo similæ et ad speciem coronæ); that is, round, whatever else may be intended by the comparison. And the evidence of pictorial representations agrees with this so far as it goes. Whenever in ancient representations the form of the bread is distinguishable, it is round. See CANISTER, p. 264; EUCCHARIST, p. 627.

A passage quoted by Martene (u. s.) from a treatise of Ildephonso, a Spanish bishop, describes the form and composition of the eucharistic bread in the beginning of the 9th century (thus: "mensura trium digitorum anguli et rotundum panis azymi sic composita est;" i. e. the azymes for the eucharist were made in the form of a circle of three "fingers" radius.) The same authority mentions that the oblate from which the priest was to communicate was larger than those intended for the people.

That it is an ancient custom to impress the oblates with a cross is probable from the words of Chrysostom (Quod Christus sit Deus, 571 A, ed. Ben.), where he says, "on the Table is the Cross . . . in the mystic Supper the Cross of Christ shines forth with the Body of Christ." The woodcuts represent the forms of the Greek and Greek Oblates.

Coptic oblates, which may probably be of considerable antiquity. The former bears the inscription "IO XC [Ἰησοῦς Χριστός] ὡς ἡμεῖς;" the latter, "Ἰησους, ὁ υἱος, ὁ υἱος, κύριος Ἰησους."

It is evident from what has been said above, that from a comparatively early age a strong

He says: ter is to follow (c. 13): "Thus d, water cannot wine be offered ad by itself the rithout us, and

If the water be alone the people begins to be without Christ."

The third council of Carthage (c. 24) orders, "that in the sacrament of the body and blood of the Lord, nothing else be offered but what the Lord himself commanded, that is bread, and wine mixed with water." The African code, both Greek and Latin, has this same canon, with further directions added (Cod. Can. African. c. 37). All the ancient liturgies either contain a direction for mixing water with the wine, or else in the canon the mixing is alluded to. Thus in the Clementine Liturgy (Const. Apost. viii. 12, § 16), in reciting the words of Institution the priest says: "Likewise also mixing the cup of wine and water (ἐκ οἴνου καὶ ὕδατος) and blessing it, He gave it to them." The Liturgies of St. James and St. Mark contain like words, while the Liturgies of St. Basil and St. Chrysostom order the deacon to put wine and water into the cup before the priest places it on the altar. In like manner, in some form or another, the mixing is mentioned in the Liturgies of Ethiopia, Nestorius, Severus, of the Roman and the Gallican churches. In most liturgies, when the water is mixed with the wine, some reference is made to the blood and water which flowed from the Lord's side; as (e.g.) in the Ambrosian rite: "De latera Christi exivit sanguis et aqua pariter." Similarly the Mozarabic and the Roman.

A peculiar rite of the Byzantine church is the mingling of hot water with the wine. In the Liturgy of St. Chrysostom (c. 34), after the fraction of the oblate, the deacon, taking up the vessel of boiling water (τὸ βόρ), says to the priest: "Sir, bless the boiling water;" the priest then says: "Blessed be the fervency (ζέως) of thy saints for ever, now and always, and for ages of ages;" then the deacon pours a small quantity of the boiling water into the chalice, saying, "The fervency of faith, full of the Holy Spirit. Amen."

Various mystical reasons have been given for the mixture of water with the wine. That of Cyprian has been already quoted. Gennadius (De Eccl. Dogmat. c. 75), besides the fact that our Lord used the mixed cup at the first institution, alleges as a further reason that blood and water flowed from His pierced side. The same reason is given by the Pseudo-Ambrosius (De Sacram. v. 1), and generally by the liturgies. In the comment on St. Mark, ascribed to Jerome, another is given; that by one we might be purged from sin, by the other redeemed from punishment (On Mark XIV.). Alcuin (Epist. 90) finds in the three things, water, flour, and wine, which may be placed on the altar, a mystical resemblance to the Three Heavenly Witnesses.

The principal deviations from the received practice of the church in this matter have been the opposite usages of the Aquarians, who used no wine at all in the eucharist, and of the Armenians, who mixed no water with the wine, claiming the authority of John Chrysostom. Both these are censured by the council in Trullo (c. 32). These Aquarians or Hydroporastatae probably abstained from wine as a bad thing in itself, like the Ebionites and the Tatianists or Encratites described by Epiphanius (Haer. 33, 16; 46, 2; 47, 1); but others in early times, though they partook of the mixed cup in the evening, used water only in the morning, lest the smell of wine should bring scandal upon them, and betray their celebration of the mysteries to heathen persecutors. This practice is noticed and reprehended by Cyprian (Epist. 63, c. 16).

Some in the 7th century offered milk for wine in the eucharist; others communicated the people not with wine pressed from grapes, but with the grapes themselves (oblatis uvis) (Conc. Bracar. iii. c. 1); errors severely censured by the ecclesiastical authorities, who constantly insisted on the offering of wine, water, and bread only.

A peculiar instance of an addition to the cup is the dropping of milk and honey into it, according to the Roman rite, on Easter-Eve (Martene, A. R. IV. xxiv. 32), the great day of baptism. [BAPTISM, p. 164.]

The Colour of the Wine.

The wine in use in the church has in general been red, apparently from a desire to symbolise as much as possible the blood of our Lord. According to the Talmud red wine was offered at the Passover. Irenaeus indeed (Haeres. bk. i. c. 13, § 2) says that Marcus (a heretic) claimed to perform the eucharistic ceremony over certain mixed chalices, and to make them appear red and purple, which would lead to the supposition that the wine had been originally white. But Cyprian (Ep. 63, c. 7) speaks as if the Eucharistic wine was blood-red; and Chrysostom (Hom. 82 in Matt. xvi. 34, 35) speaks of the tongue being empurpled with the blood of Christ in the eucharist. Later in the history of the church many of the synods have ordered red wine to be used; and although there is no necessity in the matter, it certainly seems the most appropriate.

ELEVATIO (in a Liturgical sense).

(1). Eastern Church.—In all early Oriental liturgies an elevation of the bread by the celebrating priest is prescribed contemporaneously with the proclamation ἅγια ἄγιοις, and before the Fraction. Thus, in the liturgy of St. Chrysostom "the priest, elevating the holy bread, exclaims 'Holy things for holy persons;'" of St. James: "then he elevates the gifts, and saith 'Holy things,' &c.;" of St. Basil, "the priest, elevating the holy bread, exclaims 'Holy things,' &c.;" the Armenian, "the priest lifts up the sacrifice before his eyes, and saith 'the Holy of holies.'" The original intention of this rite was clearly not that the host might be adored by the people, for it took place within the Bema, the doors of which being closed and the curtains drawn, it could be only seen by the attendant ministers. This is acknowledged by Goar; "Non ita tamen ut a populo conspiciatur Dominicum corpus elevat Graecus sacerdos" (Eucholog. p. 145, note 158, cf. pp. 84, 151); he adds that there is no allusion to eucharistic adoration in the earlier ritualists: "De majoris hostiae, a populo, completa consecratione, per elevationem conspiciendae, nihil apud antiquos rituum expositores." The authority of St. Basil, τὰ τῆς ἐπικλήσεως ῥήματα ἐπὶ τῆς ἀναδείξεως τοῦ ἁγίου τῆς εὐχαριστίας τῆς τῶν ἁγίων ἐγγράφως ἡμῶν καταλέλοιπεν; (De Sp. Sanct. c. 27), is erroneously urged by Bellarmine (De Eucharist. ii. 15), Schelstrate (De Concil. Antioch. p. 219), and Bona (Rer. Liturg. lib. ii. c. 13, § 2), in support of the later practice of elevating the eucharist to show it to the people. For the word ἀνάδειξις has been abundantly proved by Albertinus, quoted by Bingham (Orig. Eccl. lib. xv. c. 5, § 4), and is acknowledged by Renaudot (i. 270), to be used here in its classical sense of "dedication," "consecration," not that of "displaying." The authorities alleged in support of the early introduction of the practice of displaying the eucharist to the people prove very weak on examination. The Pseudo-Dionysius, whose writings cannot be placed earlier than the 5th or 6th century, when speaking of the priest "showing the gifts," (τὰς δυνάμεις τῶν θεωρημάτων ἀποδείξας), before proceeding to communion (De Eccl. Hierarch. c. iii. § 11) does not in any way assert that it was to the people that he showed them. The example of St. Euthymius, adduced by Martene (p. 423), is little more to the point. All that is said is, that after the anaphora, "stretching forth his hands to heaven, and as it were displaying to them the mystery administered for the sake of our salvation," (καὶ ὥσπερ αὐτοῖς ὑποδεικνὺς τὸ οἰκονομῆθαι τῆς σωτηρίας χάριν τῆς ἡμετέρας μυστηρίου), "he cried with a loud voice, τὰ ἅγια τοῖς ἁγίοις" (Cyril Scythopol. Vita S. Euthym. apud Coteler. Eccl. Graec. Monum. vol. ii. p. 268, § 81). The passage quoted from Germanus, and accepted by Bingham as coming from the patriarch of Constantinople of that name, A.D. 715, is from a work, Theoria Rerum Dicinarum, correctly assigned by Cave to his namesake and successor five centuries later, A.D. 1222. The most apposite passage is that given by Renaudot (i. 287) from James bishop of Edessa, c. 651, which, if correctly quoted, prescribes that the priest, after uttering the ἅγια ἄγιοις, "shall lift the sacraments and show them to the whole people as for a witness," "tum elevat et ostendit sacramenta universo populo tanquam in testimonium."

(2) Western Church.—Obscure and vague as is the date of the introduction of the elevation of the eucharist in the Oriental church, there is still greater uncertainty when it became the practice of the West. Goar humbly confesses his ignorance (Eucholog. p. 146, § 158), and Bona acknowledges the same (Rev. Liturg. lib. ii. c. 13, § 2), and professes his inability to discover any trace of the practice in the ancient sacramentaries or the codices of the Ordo Romanus, or in any of the ancient ritual writers, Alcuin, Amalarius, Walafrid, &c. Indeed there is little doubt, as is acknowledged by all learned and candid Romanists, that the elevation owes its introduction to the spread of the tenets of Berengarius, c. 1050, against which it was regarded as a public protest (Muratori, Liturg. Romana Vetus, i. 227). This practice was the natural consequence of the mediæval doctrine of Transubstantiation, though it had little or no authoritative sanction before the 13th century. Although from its late date the Latin practice does not belong to the period embraced in this Dictionary, we may mention that the position of the elevation in the Roman canon differs essentially from that of the Greek church, not taking place until after the fraction and consecration instead of before it.

ELVIRA, COUNCIL OF (Eliberitanum or Iliberitanum concilium), held at Elvira in Granada. There was another Elvira in Catalonia. The date assigned to it in its own acts is Era CCCLXII = A.D. 324. But it has been referred to A.D. 305, 313, and even 335 by moderns. As

Honus of Corduba is placed second of the nineteen bishops attending it, its date cannot well have been earlier than 313, nor later than 324. And, in either case, its canons about the lapsed would find their counterpart in those of Ancyra or Nicea. Perhaps the later date, besides being that of its own acts, would accord best with the reference to it by Hosius himself in the 11th Sardican canon, which Baluze points out its own canons, all on discipline, seem to have amounted to fourscore and one; but Gratian and others cite several more not now found in its acts. Among the former, absence from church for three consecutive Sundays is punished by the 21st. Superstitious fasts—on which see Bingham xxi. i. 25—to be observed in all other months, are relaxed in July and August by the 23rd. Bishops, priests, and deacons cohabiting with their wives are threatened with deprivation in the 33rd, lights in cemeteries are forbidden during the day by the 34th, and pictures in churches by the 36th. A huge dissertation on this council, in three books, addressed to Clement VIII. by Mendoza, may be read in Mansi, li. 58 and seq. [E. S. F.]

EMANCIPATIO, in a special sense, is the setting free of a monk, chosen to an ecclesiastical dignity, from the obedience which he owes to his superior. This was done by letters under the hand of the abbat, called emancipatorie literæ. A form of such letters is given by Petit in his edition of Theodore's Penitential, p. 143. (Du-cange, s. v.) [C.]

EMBALMING. There are many testimonies to the observance of this custom among the Christians of the early centuries. That it was practised in the case of martyrs appears from the instance of Tharacus (Acta Tharaci, ap. Baron. an. 290, n. 21), to whom it was denied by his persecutor Maximus, and his body sentenced to burning, in contempt of the doctrine of the resurrection. But embalming was not confined to martyrs; it was a reproach cast upon Christians generally by the heathen interlocutor in Minucius Felix (Octav. c. 12, § 6), that "using no perfumes for their bodies in life, they required all costly ointments for their funerals." Tertullian also (Apol. c. 42) is a witness to the general observance of the custom: "Let the Sabæans know that more of their costly wares is spent in the burial of Christians than in offering incense (funigandis) to their gods."

The practice was doubtless derived from the Jews. In the Old Testament the only recorded examples are those of Jacob and Joseph (Gen. i. 2, 26) in conformity with Egyptian usage; but it would seem to have been observed more or less generally during their later history; and in St. John's description of our Lord's burial, we read that Joseph of Arimathea and Nicodemus "took the body of Jesus and wound it in linen clothes with the spices, as the manner of the Jews is to bury." Our Lord's interpretation of the pious offering of Mary to His person (Mark xiv. 8), "She hath anointed my body to the burial" (ἡνθαπύοντο) implies the use of unction as a recognized practice. Various spices were employed for the embalming, especially myrrh; see Prudentius (Cathemerin. hym. 4)—

"Asperasque myrras Salmo Corpus medicamine a-trat."

Although the custom of embalming was common to Christians and heathens, there was an essential difference in the purpose for which it was practised. As a pagan ceremony it was intended to facilitate cremation; with the Christians, on the contrary, to whom "the old irreverence of burning" was always abhorrent, its object was to preserve the body from corruption. It was doubtless the expression of that reverential feeling for the body, as having been the temple of the Holy Ghost, and as destined for restoration to an imperishable existence, by which the Christian faith was exclusively characterised among all the religions of the world. [D. B.]

EMBER DAYS (jejunia quatuor temporum). From the Latin title has been derived the name of these seasons in most European languages, whether by translation [e. g. the French les Quatre-Temps, or the Swedish de fyra fastetider], or by a corruption of the original [e. g. the German Quatember, Dutch Quatertemper, or Danish Kvatemper]. Hence too, if we consider the wide-spread use of the expression is a probable derivation of the English Ember; though two others have been proposed, one connecting it with embers in the sense of ashes, for which little can be said, and the other identifying it with the Anglo-Saxon Ymbren, a revolution or circuit, to which it has been objected that all church seasons are necessarily recurrent. [In favour of this last view, however, may be cited the phrases ymbren dagas, etc., and such notices as the canon of the English council of Aenham, given below.] On the supposition that the derivation from the Latin is the true one, it is interesting to note the Danish form Tamperdag, as marking an intermediate stage between that of the German and of the English. An exception to the above rule is the Welsh name, Wythnos y Cydgoriau, week of the united choirs or processions.

Whatever may have been the origin of the solemnity of the Ember Fasts, we find them at an early period associated with the invoking of God's blessing on each of the four seasons as it came round in its turn, and the special striving by prayers and fasting to merit such blessings. Still, on the earliest occasion on which we meet with a mention of these fasts, this idea does not seem to have been present to the mind of the writer. The passage in question occurs in the treatise de Haeresibus of Philastrius, bishop of Brixia, in the middle of the 4th century. As the passage is of some importance, we think it well to quote it at length. After citing Zech. viii. 19, as referring to the subject, he proceeds ". . . ut mysteria Christianitatis ipsis quatuor jejuniis nuntiata cognoscemus. Nam per annum quatuor jejunia in ecclesia celebrantur; in Natali primum, deinde in Pascha, tertium in Epiphania, quartum in Pentecoste. Nam in Natali Salvatoris Domini jejunandum est, deinde in Paschae Quadragesima, atque in Ascensione itidem in caelum post Pascha die quadragesimo, inde usque ad Pentecosten diebus decem: id quod postea fecerunt beati Apostoli post Ascensionem jejuniis et orationibus insistentes." (Haeres. 119, in Patrol. xii. 1286.) It seems certain here, whatever the explanation may be, whether of a false reading in the text, or of an unusual meaning of the word, that, as Fabricius (not. in loc.) suggests, the fast in Epiphania refers to the season of the Ascension, both from the position assigned to it between Easter and Pentecost, and from the subsequent reference to the Ascension.

We now pass on to the first definite mention of these fasts as associated with the beginnings of the four seasons. Among the works of Leo I., are found numerous sermons for each of the fasts, which are spoken of as the fast decimi mensis (Serm. 12-20), the fast in Quadragesima (Serm. 39-50), the fast in Pentecoste (Serm. 78-80), and the fast septimi mensis (Serm. 86-94) respectively: and in one passage (Serm. 19, c. 2; vol. i. p. 59, ed. Ballerini), he thus associates the fasts with the seasons they introduce, "jejunium vernum in Quadragesima, aestivum in Pentecoste, autumnale in mense septimo, hiemale autem in hoc qui est decimus celebramus." Further, he appears to speak of this practice as resting on apostolical authority (Serm. 80, c. 1; p. 316), meaning, probably, that resting on the authority of his church, they claimed the respect due to apostolic ordinances. The autumnal fast does not seem to be mentioned before the time of Leo I., for it will have been observed that the arrangement in Philastrius is different. Perhaps, however, Leo or some of his predecessors may have added to three existing ancient fasts this fourth one, and then associated the four seasons of the year with these four regularly recurring fasts.

The particular days on which it was incumbent to fast at the Ember seasons according to the Roman rule were Wednesday, Friday, and Saturday; thus Leo (Serm. 80, c. 4, p. 320) enjoins "Quarta et sexta feria jejunemus, Sabbato autem apud beatissimum Petrum Apostolum vigilias celebremus." Augustine (Epist. 36, ad Casulanum, c. 8; vol. ii. 105, ed. Gaume) seems to speak simply of the particular days of the week on which the local Roman church fasted in its ordinary practice.

It has been said that Leo (Serm. 18, c. 2; p. 57), asserts that the fasts of the four seasons were celebrated "in universa ecclesia;" but an examination of the passage will show that he is referring to the institution of fasts generally. Indeed, there can be little doubt that the fasts of the four seasons were at first only observed in that part of the church in immediate dependence on Rome. The language of Augustine will not allow us to suppose that the same state of things prevailed in Africa; the church in north Italy differed, at any rate in not making Saturday a fast. (Ambrose apud August., Epist. 86 ad Casulanum c. 32; ed. cit. 120).^a

In the eastern church there is no trace whatever of an observance of the Ember seasons. The passage of Athanasius, which some have quoted in support of a different conclusion (Apol. de fuga, c. 6; vol. i. p. 323, ed. Bened.), merely proves the existence of a fast at Pentecost. With this may be compared an allusion in the Apostolic Constitutions (lib. v. c. 20).

Not only is there thus a lack of evidence to establish the existence of the usage in early times as aught but a local Roman custom, but we find Jerome protesting against the multiply-

g of obligatory fasts, and clearly recognizing fast but Lent as of universal obligation (Epist. ad Marcellam c. 2; vol. i. 189, ed. Vallarsi; vi. 750).

Nor if we take illustrations from a somewhat later period shall we find the practice uniformly established. Thus the rule of St. Benedict (ob. ca. 542 A.D.), carefully specifies the fasts which he order was to observe, but ignores the Ember seasons altogether, and indeed, his rule is hardly compatible with the existence of the latter (Regula S. Bened. c. 41; p. 88, ed. Venice, 1723).

Later still Isidore of Seville (ob. 636, A.D.), speaks of the four fasts which are to be observed by the church, "secundum Scripturas sacras," mentioning those in Lent, Pentecost, the seventh month, and [on the authority of Jeremiah xvi. 9], the Calends of November (de off. Eccl. cc. 36 sqq.). He afterwards mentions in addition to these four, that on the Calends of January and others.

As regards the Gallican church, the Ember seasons do not seem to have been established much before the time of Charlemagne. The second council of Tours (567 A.D.) in prescribing the fasts to be observed by monks, makes no mention whatever of the fasts of the four seasons—the various Gallican Liturgies published by Mabillon equally ignore them; and the language of the council of Mainz [813 A.D.], in ordering their observance, seems to imply a recently established institution, "Constituimus ut quatuor tempora anni ab omnibus cum jejuniis observentur, hoc est in mense Martio hebdomada prima, et feria quarta, et sexta, et Sabbato. . . . militet in mense Junio hebdomada secunda, in mense Septembris hebdomada tertia, in mense Decembris hebdomada prima, quas fuerit plena ante vigiliam Nativitatis Domini sicut est in omnia Ecclesia traditum." (Concil. Mogunt. iii. 34; Labbe vii. 1249). We also meet with capitularies of the Carolingian kings to the same effect (see e. g. lib. v. 151; vol. i. p. 54, ed. Baluzius. See also one of 769 A.D., c. p. 192).

To return now to the Roman church properly called, it will be seen that there is reason to doubt whether even there the spring fast was at first really Lent itself, and not the three special days. It is pointed out by Muratori (see above) c. 3, that while Leo in his sermons on the summer, autumn, and winter fasts, alludes to the three days Wednesday, Friday, and Saturday; yet in his sermons on the spring fast in no way refers to them, and indeed it is difficult in any case to see the meaning of a fast within the limits of another fast, except it were meant to be of a more rigorous kind, of which in the present case we have no evidence.

Some would attempt to solve this difficulty by supposing that the Ember seasons were originally instituted as times for ordination, but it certainly appears that this theory cannot be borne out by facts (see e. g. Amalarius Fortunatus, de Eccl. off. ii. 2, and cf. Muratori c. 3). Everything points to the conclusion that the solemnity attaching to the seasons led to their being chosen as fitting times for the rite. The theory of Muratori seems very probable, that the spring fast is really Lent itself, and that the fixing of the three days is due to a later development.

Among other evidence referred to by him is the fact that in some ancient Roman sacramentaries, when notice is appointed to be given of the fasts of the fourth, seventh, and tenth months, no mention is made of the spring fast, Lent being assumed to be known from other sources. (For instances of this see Cardinal Bona, Ancient Liturgy, lib. ii. c. 16; vol. ii. p. 343, ed. Aug. Taur. 1753; and Thomasius, Codices Sacramentorum, lib. i. c. 82; p. 113.) We may further refer to the rule of the English council of Cloveshoe (747 A.D.), which orders that no one should neglect "jejuniorum tempora, id est, quarti, septimi et decimi mensis," and that due notice should always be given of each (Council Cloveshoe, can. 18; Labbe vi. 1578). It is interesting to add here that the introduction of the fasts of the four seasons is referred by a later English council (that of Aethelred [1009 A.D.], the locality of which appears to be unknown,) to Gregory the Great, "et jejunia quatuor temporum, quae Inbren vocant et caetera omnia prout sanctus Gregorius imposuit genti Anglorum, conservanter" (Concil. Aethelred, can. 16; Labbe ix. 792).

Among other evidence in favour of this theory may be mentioned an epistle in the Falsae Decretals bearing the name of pope Callistus (ob. 223 A.D.), which orders that to the three already existing fasts, a fourth should be added. Now it may be reasonably argued that the author, Isidore, put the matter in accordance with what he himself believed to be the state of the case, and that thus we obtain an insight into the tradition existing in his time (circa 800 A.D.). A similar remark as to Callistus, occurs in a MS. of Anastasius Bibliothecarius, in the Ambrosian library. Although the statement is of course false, still the origin of the forgery may have been that the writer wished to embody what he himself believed to be the fact, namely, that the fourth (spring) fast was added on later. A capitulary also of Ahyto or Atto, bishop of Vercellae about 945 A.D., mentions the three fasts in a similar way (Patrol. cxxxiv. 43).

Not only does this doubt exist as to the origin of the spring fast, but there seems much reason for supposing that at one time it did not necessarily fall in Lent at all, but was fixed in the first week in March, though afterwards as a matter of convenience it was fixed within Lent always; also the summer fast was at one time placed in the second week of June, and therefore did not necessarily fall at Pentecost. The council of Mainz, it will have been observed, speaks of the fast as occurring in the first week of March, Lent not being mentioned at all; similarly also for the summer fast. So too the Ordo Romanus, "in primo mense (i.e. March) quarta et sexta feria et Sabbato in prima hebdomada ipsius mensis primum jejunium celebratur. Secundum in quarto mense (i.e. June) in secunda hebdomada ipsius mensis. Tertium jejunium septimi mensis, id est Septembris, tertia hebdomada ipsius mensis. Quartum decimi mensis, id est Decembris, quarta hebdomada ante Natalem Domini" (i. 33, ed. Hittorp; cf. also Rabanus Maurus de Inst. Cler. ii. 24; and Amalarius de Eccl. off. ii. 1). Again in many ancient sacramentaries we have many things pointing to the same result; e.g. in the Gelasian Sacramentary, we find a notice "Istae orationes quae sequuntur primo Sabbato in mense primo sunt dicendae" (Patrol. lxxiv. 1069, and cf. others cited by Muratori, p. 261). One more example may suffice: the council of Aix la Chapelle (817 A.D.), orders that no fast should be in the week of Pentecost, "nisi statuti fuerint dies jejunii" (Conc. Aquisgran. can. 51; Labbe vii. 1511). Consequently, while the summer fast might fall in the week of Pentecost, it did not necessarily do so. It seems therefore not unreasonable to infer that at one time the church celebrated the fasts of the four seasons according to this rule, a change being subsequently made to the present plan.

We must now refer to the Ember seasons as times specially fixed for the ordinations of the clergy. We have before said that they were in all probability fixed at these times from the solemnity attaching to them, and it is noticeable that we find no trace of such a connexion earlier than the time of Gelasius, who enjoins "ordinationes etiam presbyterorum et diaconorum nisi certis temporibus et diebus exercere non debent, id est quarti mensis jejunio, septimi et decimi, sed et etiam Quadragesimalis initii ac mediana Quadragesimae die sabbati jejunio circa vespeream noverint celebrandas" (Epist. 9 ad Episcopos Lucaniae et Bruttiorum, c. 11; Patrol. lix. 52). It will be observed that two periods in Lent are specified here, a piece of evidence in favour of Muratori's view that the spring fast is Lent itself.

The Gelasian Sacramentary also furnishes a form for this ordinance, which is headed, "Ordo qualiter in Romana sedis apostolicae ecclesiae presbyteri, diaconi vel subdiaconi eligendi sint, mensis i. iv. vii. et x. Sabbatorum die in xii. lectionibus . . ." (Patrol. lxxiv. 1069). Again, the Gregorian Sacramentary enjoins that the greater orders are to be conferred only "in Sabbatis duodecim lectionum per quatuor tempora" (Greg. Sac. 219, and cf. Menard's note). The same order is laid down in the Pontifical of Egbert, archbishop of York from 732-766 A.D. (p. 8, ed. Surtees Society).

The irregularity as to the time of the Ember seasons evidently continued down to a late period. Thus the plan laid down by the council of Mainz is repeated two hundred and fifty years after (1072 A.D.), by a council of Ronen (Concil. Rothom. can. 9; Labbe ix. 1227); and the frequency with which conciliar rules occur on the subject prove how unsettled the matter was. (See e.g. the regulations of the council of Seligenstadt [1022 A.D., can. 2; Labbe ix. 845], of those of Placentia [1095 A.D., can. 14; ib. x. 504], and Clermont [can. 27; ib. 508], and even of Oxford [1222 A.D., can. 8; ib. xi. 274], in the very last of which we still meet with the mention of Martii prima hebdomada.) The system followed in later centuries is ordinarily referred to the rule as laid down in the councils of Placentia and Clermont.

It may be well very briefly to sum up our results. The observance of the Ember seasons is purely a western institution, there being no certain trace of it whatever in the eastern church. It was doubtless at first a rite merely of the local Roman church, whence it gradually spread throughout the west, and established itself in Gaul and Spain by the eighth century, and in England possibly earlier, through its special connection with Gregory.

CHRIST. ANT.

It is perhaps not impossible that the development of the practice in the Roman church may have been something to this effect. Fasts at the times of Lent, Pentecost, and the Nativity, are certainly very ancient; the periods of these would roughly correspond with three of the four seasons, and thus some bishop of Rome, Leo or one of his predecessors, may have conceived the idea of making them symbolize the return of the seasons, and so added the one necessary to complete the four. It would soon come to pass then that they would be spoken of as originally ordained with that view. The length of each fast having been more or less settled, and the fasts being now more specially associated with the seasons, the spring and summer fasts would come more and more to be viewed independently of Lent and Pentecost, and hence they would fall occasionally outside these seasons. Finally, the inconveniences arising from such irregularities may have caused the ultimate settlement of the matter in its present form.

For the matter of the foregoing article, I am especially indebted to Muratori's De iv. Tempor. jejuniis disquisitio (in his Anecdota, vol. i. 246-266; Mediolani 1697); also to Bingham's Antiquities of the Church, book xxi. ch. 2, and Binterim's Denkwürdigkeiten der Christ-Katholischen Kirche, vol. v. part 2, 133 sqq. EMBLEM. [SYMBOL.]

EMBOLISMUS, also EMBOLIS, EMBO-LUM, (1) an inserted or intercalated prayer; the name given to the prayer which in almost all ancient liturgies follows the Lord's Prayer, founded on one or both of the two last petitions. It is so called because it is interposed here, and what had been already asked in the Lord's Prayer is expanded, and it is more clearly expressed what evils we seek to be delivered from, viz. past, present, and future, together with the saints by whose intercession we strengthen our prayer, viz. the B. V. Mary, St. Peter, St. Paul, and St. Andrew (Bona, Rer. Liturg. ii. c. 15 § 2). Amalarius (A.D. 810) says of it, "in consummatione orationis venit clausula universas petitiones et preces nostras collecta brevitate concludens" (Amalar. De Eccl. Offic. iii. 29). The Embolismus was usually repeated by the priest in a low voice, symbolizing the silence during the period that our Lord lay in the grave; but in the Ambrosian rite it was always pronounced aloud (Macri, Hierolex. s. v.). This practice, which has left very faint traces in the Western church, being reduced in the Roman and Ambrosian rites to "Libera nos quaesumus Domine ab omni malo," holds a more important place in Oriental liturgies. The Embolismus is not, however, found in the liturgies of St. Chrysostom and St. Basil, but appears in those of St. James, St. Mark, and Theodore the Interpreter, as well as in the Armenian, Mozarabic, and Coptic St. Basil. As examples of the shorter Embolismus we give that of the church of Jerusalem, "And lead us not into temptation, O Lord, the Lord of Hosts, who knowest our infirmity; but deliver us from the Evil One, and his works, and every assault and will of his, for the sake of Thy Holy name which is called upon our lowliness" (Asseman. vol. v. p. 51), and the Syriac St. James,

"O Lord our God, lead us not into temptation which we devoid of strength are not able to bear, but also with the temptation make a way of escape, that we may be able to bear it, and deliver us from evil through Jesus Christ," &c. (Renaud. vol. ii. p. 40).

(2) Embolismus also designates the excess of the solar year over twelve lunar months, commonly called the EPACT. See Durandus, Rationale, viii. 10. (Ducange, s. v.) [C.]

EMBOLOS. A covered portico or cloister; in ecclesiastical language a cloister surrounding the external walls of a church, serving as an ambulatory in hot, rainy, and dirty weather, and also affording a convenient passage for the priests and ministers of the church from the bema and diaconicum to the narthex, used at Constantinople by the patriarch when he proceeded to wash feet in the narthex. Codinus speaks of these cloisters being vaulted, and Goar of their walls being ornamented with mosaic pictures. Such porticos ran along the N. and S. sides of the church of St. Sophia at Constantinople (Ducange, Constan. Christian. lib. iii. c. 18), and surrounded the churches of St. Michael at Anaplis, and the Deipara at Jerusalem, on all sides but the east (Procop. de Aedific. lib. i. c. 8, lib. v. c. 6). It was in "the right embolos" of St. Sophia—that the summary of the proceedings of the so-called eighth general council, that of Constantinople in 879, were drawn up (Labbe, Concil. viii. 1421). In Moschus (Prot. Spiritual. § 66 apud Coteler. Ecol. Græc. Monum. ii. 390) we read of an archimandrite named George, who buried in "the right embolos" of a church he was erecting, the body of an ascetic who had appeared to him in a dream and warned him where he would find his corpse.

EMPHOTION (Ἐμφότιον) is one of the names for the white robe (δραβμάριον) with which persons were invested at baptism. The name is no doubt derived from the "enlightening" attributed to the baptismal ceremony. See BAPTISM, pp. 156, 163. [C.]

EMPHYTEUSIS (Ἐμφυτεύσις), a manner of letting real property, at first confined to waste lands requiring much outlay to bring them under cultivation, but afterwards applied to any real property.

Emphyteusis is a contract by which the beneficial ownership of real property (res immobilis) is transferred by the proprietor to another, either for a term of not less than ten years, or for a life or lives, or in perpetuity, in consideration of an annual payment. It differs from mere letting (locatio), in that by emphyteusis beneficial ownership is transferred for the term, while by letting only the use and enjoyment of produce is transferred; in that its use is confined to real property; and in that it cannot be for a less term than ten years. It differs from feudal tenure (feodum), in that it requires periodical payments, not personal service, to be given to the lord or proprietor.

Emphyteusis is either ecclesiastical or lay. Ecclesiastical emphyteusis is a contract by which property belonging to a church, monastery, or other religious foundation, is granted. This differs from lay emphyteusis [See SMITH'S DICTIONARY OF GREEK AND ROMAN ANTIQ. s. v.] principally in that it requires the assent of the bishop, and must clearly be for the benefit of the church or foundation which grants it; a provision no doubt intended to check the alienation of church property by ecclesiastical persons. ENAFOTA, ENAFODIA (Ἐναφόδια). In the Liber Pontificalis, we read that pope Paschal gave to a church "canistra enafota ex argento duo, pens. lib. x." two coronas of nine lights, weighing ten pounds. And Valentine II. gave "canistra enafodia duo pens. lib. xv." Compare CANISTER, CORONA, EXAFOTA. (Ducange, s. v.) [C.]

ENCAENIA. [DEDICATION-FESTIVAL.]

ENCHANTMENT. [MAGIC.]

ENCHEIRION (Ἐνχειρίδιον), the asphion with which the priest wipes his hands, worn at the girdle. Towards the end of the letter of Nicephorus of Constantinople to pope Leo (in the Acta Conc. Ephes. p. 313, ed. Commelin, 1591), we read of a stole and an encheirion embroidered with gold. It is described by Germanus of Constantinople (Theoria Myst. p. 150, ed. Parm. 1560) thus: "The encheirion, which hangs to the girdle, is the napkin which wipes his hands; and to have a napkin at the girdle is typical of him who washed his hands and said, 'I am innocent' (Matt. xvii. 24)." (Sulzer's Theaurus, s. v.) [C.]

ENCOLPION (Ἐγκόλιον, that which is worn on the breast), the name anciently given to small caskets worn round the necks of the faithful, containing usually either relics or a copy of the Gospels.

The use of these portable reliquaries is of the highest antiquity; Chrysostom (Quod Christus sit Deus, p. 571 E, ed. Ben.) speaks of particles of the true Cross being suspended from the necks both of men and women, enclosed in gold.

In 1571 two such reliquaries, made of gold, were found in tombs belonging to the ancient cemetery of the Vatican; they are square in form, and are furnished with rings which indicate their use; on one side they bear the monogram of Christ, between the A and Ω (see woodcut). These probably date from the 4th century.

The pectoral cross worn by bishops was also called encolpion. The oldest specimen now existing is one which was found not long since upon the breast of a corpse in the basilica of St. Laurence, outside the walls. It came to light in clearing the interior of that church, and we are indebted to De Rossi for a careful drawing of it (Bulletino, Apr. 1863). On one side it bears the inscription, ΕΜΜΑΝΟΥΗΛ [Emmanuel] ΝΟΒΙΣΧΜ ΔΕΥΣ; on the other, the following words, addressed apparently to Satan: ΟΥΧ ΕΣΤΙ ΒΙΤΑ ΜΗΔΕ ΜΟΡΟΣ ΙΝΙΜΙΚΩ ΤΗΒΙ; a cavity closed by a screw appears to have been intended for relics. Reliquaries in the form of a cross are first mentioned by Gregory the Great. He sent one of them to queen Theodelinda with a fragment of the true cross; this still exists at Monza, and is used by the provost of the ancient church in that city when he officiates pontifically. An engraving of it may be found in Fries's Memorie della Chiesa Monzese (p. 52). Two amulets given to this princess by the same pontiff for the use of her children are still preserved among the celebrated treasures of Monza, one of which contains a piece of the true cross, the other a fragment of the Gospels (Greg. Magn. Epist. xiv. 12). Engravings of these objects are given by Moxzoni (Tavole cron. della stor. eccl. vol. vii. p. 79). The same volume of the same work also contains (pp. 77 and 84) drawings of other reliquaries of the highest interest—namely, some of the vases in which oil from the sacred lamps of the tombs of the martyrs had been sent by Gregory to Theodelinda. [AMPULLA.]

From the same pope we also learn (Epist. i. 36; vii. 26) that filings from St. Peter's chains were sometimes enclosed in small golden keys. He himself had sent one of these consecrated keys to Childebert, king of the Franks, to wear hung from his neck "as a protection from all evils"—"Claves sancti Petri, in quibus de vinculis catenarum ejus inclusum est, excellentiae vestrae direximus quae collo vestro suspensae a malis vos omnibus teneantur" (Epist. vi. 6). An illustrious Gaul named Dynamius also received, from the same pontiff, a small cross of gold, containing a similar relic (Epist. iii. 33)—"Transmisimus autem B. Petri apostoli benedictionem crucem parvulam, cui de catenis ejus beneficia sunt inserta." [EULOGIAE.]

Nicephorus, patriarch of Constantinople († 828), speaks of an encolpion set in gold, one side of which was formed of crystal, the other of enamel (ἡλικονισμένη δὲ ἐνκαύστωρ); containing another encolpion, in which fragments of the true cross were arranged in a pattern (ὑπερσυνωμνύου) (Acta Conc. Ephes., pp. 312, 313, ed. Commelin, 1591).

The whole subject of these reliquaries might receive abundant illustration from the records and the remains of mediaeval antiquity, were that period within the scope of the present work. [See AMULET.]

ENCYCICAL LETTERS

(Ἐπιστολαὶ ἐγκύκλιαι, γράμματα ἐγκύκλια). Letters of a circular nature, not addressed to a particular person or community; as, the Catholic Epistles (Oecumenius on St. James i.). The letters in which the members of a council signified their conclusions to all the churches were called encyclical; and Nicephorus Callisti (Hist. xvi. 3) speaks of the encyclical letters (ἐγκύκλια γράμματα) which the emperor Basiliscus wrote against the fourth council (Chalcedon, A.D.

451), addressed to all the bishops of the church. The same writer (c. 4) speaks of divine and apostolic encyclicals (ἐγκύκλια). The circulars of Basiliscus just referred to are styled by Evagrius (H.E. iii. 4) ἐγκύκλιοι συλλαβαί; an encyclical letter of Photius is mentioned (ib. v. 2).

It is to be observed, that the phrase ἐγκύκλια γράμματα sometimes (as Euseb. H.E. vi. 18) denotes those subjects which the Greeks included in the "circle of the sciences," or cyclopaedia. (Suicer's Theaurus, s. v. Ἐγκύκλιος.) [C.]

ENDOWMENT. The property given by the founder of a church for the maintenance of the edifice and of the clerks who served it was called dos ecclesiae or endowment. Justinian (Novel 67), compelled those who built churches also to endow them; and without a competent provision for their maintenance, no clerks were to be ordained to any church (Conc. Epom., A.D. 517, c. 25); whoever desired to have a parish church (diocessim) on his estate was to set apart a sufficient landed endowment for its clerks (Conc. Aurel. iv., A.D. 541, c. 33); a bishop was not to consecrate a church until the endowment of it had been regularly secured by a deed or charter (Conc. Bragar. ii. [iii.], A.D. 572, c. 5); founders of churches were to understand, that they had no further authority over property which they had given to the church, but that both the church and its endowment were at the disposition of the bishop, to be employed according to the canons (Conc. Tolet. iv., A.D. 633, c. 33).

In the ninth council of Toledo, A.D. 655, a special provision was made (c. 5), that a bishop was not to confer on any monastic church which he might found within his diocese more than a fiftieth part of the funds at his disposal; nor on any non-monastic church, or church destined for his own burial-place, more than one hundredth part of the revenues of the diocese.

If one who held a "fiscus," or fief, from the king, built and endowed churches, the bishop was desired to procure the royal confirmation of the gift (Conc. Tolet. iii., A.D. 589, c. 15).

See ALMS; BENEFICE; CHURCHES; MAINTENANCE OF, p. 388; PROPERTY OF THE CHURCH.

During the period with which we are concerned, the BISHOP [p. 233], with the advice and assistance of his presbytery, took charge of church endowments.

ENERGUMENI. [DEMONIACS.]

ENOCH, the patriarch, translation of; commemorated Ter 27 = Jan. 22 (Cal. Ethiop.); July 19 (Cal. Copt.). [W. F. G.]

ENTALMA (Ἐνταλμα, ἐνταλτήριον γράμμα), the document by which a bishop confers on a monk the privilege of hearing confessions (Daniel, Codes, iv. 568). The form of such a letter is given by Goar, Eucholog. p. 300. [C.]

ENTHRONIZATION. 1. The solemn placing of a bishop on his throne. See BISHOP, p. 224.

2. The word ἐθρονισμός is also used to designate the placing or "enthroning" of relics of the saints in the altar of a church on consecration [CONSECRATION OF CHURCHES]. Hence πάδος ἐθρονισμῶν designates a regularly consecrated church and not a mere oratory. Thus Germanus (in Daniel's Codes, iv. 701) speaks of a church as dedicated in the name of martyrs and consecrated over (or by virtue of) their holy relics (ἐν τοῖς ἁγίοις αὐτῶν ἀνδράσι ἐθρονισμός).

3. The word ἐθρονισμός is perhaps sometimes used to designate the installation of a presbyter in his church (Reiske on Constant. Porphyring. De Caerim. 617). [C.]

ENTHUSIASTAE (ἐθουσιασταί). Those who pretended to prophesy by the motion of an indwelling daemon which they thought to be the Holy Spirit (see Theodoret, Hist. Eccl. iv. 11; Suidas, sub voce ἐθουσι; Bingham, Ant. 16, 5, 4).

In A.D. 428 Theodosius and Valentinian ordained that these heretics (with many others) "nusquam in Romano solo conveniendi orandique habeant facultatem." This constitution was inserted in the Theodosian Code (16, 5, 25), and in that of Justinian (1, 5, 5), but with the reading (if it be the correct one) "nusquam in Romano loco conveniendi orandique habeant facultatem." The same exclusion is decreed in general terms by Justinian in his 37th Novel, "nulla omnino haeresis domum aut locum orationis habeto." [I. B.]

ENTRANCE (Ἐσόδος). Two of the most remarkable ceremonies of Eastern liturgies are the Lesser and the Greater Entrance—that of the Word and that of the Sacrament.

1. The Lesser Entrance is the bearing in of the book of the gospels in solemn procession in the Liturgy of St. Chrysostom (c. 17, p. 343, Daniel) after the prayer of the third antiphon (our 'Prayer of St. Chrysostom') the rubric runs: "Then the priest and the deacon, standing before the Holy Table, make three genuflections (προσκυφήματα): Then the priest, taking the Holy Book of the Gospels gives it to the deacon; and so, going out by the north side, with light going before them, they make the Lesser Entrance." That is, the deacon and priest pass from the sanctuary into the chapel of the prothesis, which is to the north of it, and so out into the body of the church, where, by a devious path, they return to the Holy Doors, which are open; the volume, often decorated with great magnificence, is laid on the Holy Table, whence it is again taken to the ambo when the gospel is to be read.

The rubric in St. Mark's liturgy (Dan. iv. 142) is simply, "καὶ γίγνεται ἡ εἰσόδος τοῦ εὐαγγελίου."

This "Entrance" corresponds to the carrying of the gospel by the deacon to the ambo or rood-loft in the Western church, once a rite of great importance; for the book was preceded not only by tapers but by a crucifix (Durandus, Ration de, iv. 24, 16). Compare ALLELUIA, GRADUAL.

In the Coptic St. Basil, the Greater Entrance precedes the Lesser. See below.

2. The Greater Entrance.—This ceremony has probably, like others, been developed from simple beginnings into very great prominence and magnificence.

The liturgy of St. James (c. 17, Daniel iv. 88) simply alludes in passing to the bringing in of the elements: "the priest bringing in the Holy Gifts says the following prayer." St. Mark (c. 10, Dan. iv. 148) is even more vague: "the Holy Things (τὰ ἁγία) are brought into the sanctuary, and the priest prays as follows." Similarly the Mozarabic (Dan. i. 67), "while the choir chants Aleluia, the priest offers [i.e. places on the altar] the Host and Chalice, with the prayers following." In the Armenian rite (Dan. iv. 460) the celebrant lies prostrate before the altar while the Great Entrance is made; in this rite (anomalously) the elements are spoken of as the body and blood of Christ before consecration (Neale, East. Ch. Int. 428).

In the much more developed rite of Constantinople (Lit. Chrysost. Neale, n. s. 373), after the chanting of the Cherubic Hymn, the ceremony proceeds as follows. During the previous part of the eucharistic office, the elements have remained on the table in the chapel of the prothesis. At the proper point, the deacon censes the altar and the sanctuary, and then goes before the priest into the prothesis. The priest then lifts the "aer," or covering, from the chalice and paten, and lays it on the deacon's shoulder, and then places upon it the paten, covered with the ASTERISK and veil. The deacon takes hold of these with his left hand, bearing the censer in his right; the priest takes the chalice and follows the deacon, and so, preceded by taper, they move round to the Holy Doors, as in the Lesser Entrance. In great churches, where there are dignified clergy and many attendants, this procession is one of great magnificence. Where there is but a single priest and no deacon, he bears the paten on his shoulder, supporting it by his left hand, and the chalice in his right hand before his breast.

In the Coptic St. Basil, the Great Entrance is made at the very beginning of the liturgy; the directions for it are very curious and minute. "The priest goes to the Takaddemet [Prothesis] from which he shall take the lamb [ELEMENTA, p. 600], looking attentively that there be no flaw in it. . . . When he hath all that he needs, the lamb, the wine, and the incense, . . . he takes the lamb in his hand and wipes it lightly, as Christ the Lord was first washed with water before He was presented to Simeon the priest; then he shall bear it round to the altar in his hands, as Simeon bare Him round the Temple. At last the priest shall lay it down on the altar and shall place it on the paten, which signifies the cradle; and shall cover it with a linen cloth, as the Virgin did at His Nativity" (Renaudot, Lit. Orient. i. 186). A deacon seems to have borne the cruet.

ENTRY INTO JERUSALEM. This event in our Lord's life is very frequently represented in the earlier art of the Christian Church, occurring on some of the first sarcophagi, though not, as far as the present writer knows, in fresco or mosaic in the catacombs or elsewhere, excepting in an ancient mosaic of the Vatican (Bianchini Demonstr. hist. Sac. Saec. i. tav. 2, No. 17), and one from the basilica at Bethlehem, reproduced by Martigny (p. 331) from Count de Vogué (Les Eglises de la Terre Ste. pl. v.). The earliest MS. representation of it is probably that in the Rabula or Laurentian Evangelary. The treatment is almost always the same; the Lord is mounted on the ass, sometimes accompanied by her foal, and the multitude with their palm-branches follow, or lay their garments before Him (Airinghi t. i. pp. 277-329; ii. p. 159 and passim; Bottari, tav. xxi.). His right hand is generally raised in the act of blessing. The multitude frequently raise their hands in thanksgiving. In one of the oldest MSS. of the New Testament in existence, the Gregorian Evangelary of St. Cuthbert (Palaographia Sacra) the Lord is represented mounted on an ass, and bearing a large whip—evidently with reference to the scourge of small cords used in the expulsion of buyers and sellers from the temple. There is a certain variety in the examples taken from different carvings. In Bottari (i. tavv. xvi. xxi. xxxi.) Zaccheus is represented in the "fig or sycomore tree" behind the Lord, as if to call attention to the beginning of His last journey at Jericho. In the last example the sycomore and palm branches are carefully and well cut. In i. tav. 40, garments are being strewn before the Lord (as in the others). See also vol. ii. tavv. 88, 89; iii. tav. 133. In one instance, without Zaccheus, the colt accompanies the ass (iii. 134). The small stature of Zaccheus is often dwelt on. Or the figure may represent a person in the act of cutting down branches. [R. St. J. T.]

ENVY—HOW CENSURED. Envy was always reckoned a diabolical sin, and one of the first magnitude (Chrys. Hom. 41 in Matth.; Cyprian, De Zelo et Livore, p. 225); but there are no distinctive penalties attached to it, inasmuch as before it could bring a man under public discipline, it required to be displayed in some outward and vicious action, which received its appropriate punishment (Bingham, Anf. 18, 14, 1; Thom. Aq. Summa 2, 2, qn. 36). [I. B.]

EPACT, ἐπακτῆς, sc. ἡμέρας; Lat. epactas; in Mediaeval writers, adjectiones Lunae; the number of days required to make up the lunar year to the solar:—and so the numeral of the moon's age on the 1st January. Or we may say, with Scaliger, on the 1st March, which comes to the same thing, and has the advantage of escaping the ambiguity of Leap year. In the Easter canon of Dionysius Exiguus, the epact meant the numeral of the moon's age on the 22nd March.

The old Latin cycles of 84 years, of which we have an example in Ideler, ii. 249, indicated Easter by means of the epacts of the 1st January, and the day of the week on which the 1st January fell.

The method of determining the months (lunar), was as follows. For the first month of the year that month was taken, whose age was expressed by the epact. The day of December on which it commenced is found by subtracting the epact (when more than one) from thirty-three. The first month was always counted full, then hollow and full succeeded by turns, so that the last month in the year in a common lunar year was hollow, in an intercalary year full. From the last begins the new moon of the following year.

The Easter new moon being found, Easter-day was, according to the Latin rules, that Sunday which fell on or next after the 18th of the moon, not therefore later than the 22nd of the moon. The choice of the month was determined thus. New moon must not be earlier than the 5th March, and full moon not later than the 21st; the first of these rules sometimes having to give way, to save the violation of the latter.

The following rule is given for the 1st January epact, viz., multiply the Golden Number by eleven, and divide the product by thirty, the remainder is the epact. But this rule will not give the epacts mentioned above, which were constructed as we have just described—with a saltus lunæ, or addition of twelve after the 18th year of the cycle, &c.

For the determination of Easter according to the Alexandrian rules, with which the later Roman rules agreed, see under EASTER.

The elaborate system of epacts afterwards devised by Lilius, and Clavius, belongs to the system of the Gregorian calendar. [L. H.]

EPAON, COUNCIL OF (Epaonense concilium), held A.D. 517 at a town in Burgundy, whose name is thought to have been preserved in the modern village of Lens on the Rhone. It was attended by twenty-five bishops at the joint summons of Avitus, bishop of Vienne, and Viventius, bishop of Lyons, who presided. Forty canons on discipline are given to it in its acts; but two more, called canons of Epaon by Egbert of York, and by Gratian, are not among these. By the 4th of them, bishops priests and deacons are forbidden to keep hawks or dogs for hunting. By the 8th, no abbot may preside over two monasteries. By the 26th no altar, not of stone, may be consecrated with chrism. By the 38th slaves, taking sanctuary, that have committed heinous crimes, are only to be let off corporal punishment. Most of these regulations had previously become law elsewhere (Mansi, viii. 555 and seq.). [E. S. Ff.]

EPENDYTES (ἐπενδυτής). The ependytes, the "fisher's coat" of St. Peter (John xxi. 7), was a kind of cloak used especially by monks, and, as the etymology would seem to indicate, worn over another garment. Thus e.g. in the Graeco-Latin Glossary cited by Ducange (s. v. epidocen), the Greek word is rendered instata (leg. instrata or instila) haec superaria. Also Augustine naturally enough speaks of ἐπενδυμα as equivalent to superindumentum (Quaest. in Jud. 41; iii. 938, ed. Gaume). Suidas also observes this distinction (ἐπενδυτὴν τὸ ἐσθρῆπον ὑδρίων, ἐπενδυτὴν δὲ τὸ ἐσθρῆπον). It is thus surprising that some should have taken it to mean an under-garment, as e.g. the Lexicon of Zonaras (col. 788, ed. Tittmann), which defines it as τὸ ἐσθρῆπον ὑδρίων, δὲ καὶ ἐπενδυμασ λείγεται. Athanasius mentions this dress as worn by St. Antony (Vita S. Anton., c. 46; i. 831, ed. Bened.), and Jerome refers to it in the case of Hilarion (Vita S. Hilar. c. 4; ii. 15, ed. Vallarsi). It appears, at any rate in the east, to have been made of skins; thus the μασώτης of St. Antony is frequently mentioned, and Jerome describes that of Hilarion as pelliceus. For other references to the dress, see Pseudo-Athanas. de Virginitate, c. 11 (ii. 116), and Basil of Seleucia, De vita S. Theolæ, l. 62 (Patrol. Gr. lxxxv. 516).

The ependytes would appear to be the dress worn by the two figures (ANDON AND SENNES, victims of the Decian persecution) who are being crowned by the Saviour in a fresco in the cemetery of Pontianus, on the Via Portuensis, near Rome. [See p. 8.] [R. S.]

EPHEMERIS. [CALENDAR, p. 258.]

EPHESUS (COUNCILS OF).—(1) A.D. 197, under Polycrates its bishop, on the Easter question. His letter to Victor and the Roman church is in part preserved by Eusebius (v. 24), shewing that it had been customary there, down from the days of St. John the Apostle, to keep Easter day on the 14th of the moon (Mansi, i. 719-24). The interest of this fragment is enhanced from its having been translated by Rufinus and St. Jerome.

(2) A.D. 245, otherwise called Asiatic, against the errors of Noëtus (Mansi, i. 789-90).

(3) A.D. 431, the third general, held in the church there dedicated to St. Mary, soon after the feast of Pentecost in the month of June, to sit in judgment on Nestorius patriarch of Constantinople, who contended that while the blessed Virgin might with propriety be styled the mother of Christ, she could not and ought not to be styled the mother of God (Theotocus). In other words he looked upon Christ as a compound of two persons, as well as two natures, instead of two natures, the Divine and Human, hypostatically joined together in the single Person of the Son of God. The controversy on this point culminated in the celebrated letter addressed by St. Cyril in synod to Nestorius, ending with twelve anathemas, to which he is called upon to subscribe (Mansi, iv. 1067-84), and the twelve counter anathemas which formed his only reply to it (ib. p. 1099).

To end the dispute, the emperors Theodosius the Younger and Valentinian issued orders for the meeting of a general council, to which the letter summoning St. Cyril himself is still extant. It is dated Nov. 19, A.D. 430, and directs him to repair to Ephesus by the Feast of Pentecost ensuing. It forbids the introduction of any innovation privately till then, and directs that all the disputes that have produced so much strife shall be there settled canonically. Copies of this letter had been sent to all metropolitans. The council met accordingly for its first session June 22, as is stated in its sentence deposing Nestorius (comp. Bev. ii. 103) which was the first thing done: St. Cyril heading the list of the bishops present, as bishop of Alexandria first, and then as vice-gerent of the archbishop of Rome, Celestine: Juvenal bishop of Jerusalem came next: Memnon of Ephesus followed. About 160 were there when they commenced: 198 subscribed.

It met for its sixth session, July 22, to publish what it had defined on doctrine. First it recited the Nicene Creed; secondly, those passages from the fathers which had been quoted in its first session; and lastly, its own definitive sentence, that no other profession of faith but that of Nicaea should be framed or propounded to any desirous of coming over to the communion of the church from Paganism, Judaism, or any heresy whatsoever. Bishops and clergy framing or propounding any other were deposed, and laymen anathematised. What induced the council "to define" this, was a case just then brought under its consideration by Charisius, steward and priest of the church of Philadelphia, shewing that two priests who had come thither from Constantinople had been procuring subscriptions to a formula purporting to be the doctrine of the church, but in many respects heterodox. The council condemned all who approved of it. At the seventh and last session, held August 31st, on the petition of Rheginus, bishop of Constantia in Cyprus, and two of his suffragans, complaining of attempts made by the bishop of Antioch to ordain in their island, contrary to the canons and established custom, a no less stringent rule was laid down on discipline; "that no bishop may act in any province which has not always been subject to him. . ." [BISHOP, p. 234: DIOCESE.] In most of the Greek collections eight canons are attributed to this council; but only seven by Photius and John Scholasticus, and none at all in the Latin collections. Beveridge shews conclusively (ii. 104) that they were not in fact published as separate canons. The first six, as he points out, form part of a synodical letter addressed by the council to all bishops, presbyters, deacons, and laymen, on the defection of John of Antioch, and were caused by it; being directed against all deserters or despisers of the council, whether favourers of Nestorius, or Celestius the Pelagian, and upholding all who had been deposed by them. Where this letter should come in the acts he omits to explain. It is placed by Mansi without comment at the end of them (iv. 1469-74). Its proper place doubtless is at the end of the fifth session, to the final proceedings of which (ib.

1323) it is in effect a corollary. Then the business of the sixth session led to the "definition," since termed improperly the seventh canon; and that of the seventh session to the decree since termed with less impropriety the eighth canon. Most of the principal documents relating to this council are to be found in Mansi, iv. 577 to the end, and v. to p. 1046, too numerous to be specified. Some few more are supplied by Marius Mercator Opp. P. ii. (Patrol. xlviii. p. 699 and seq. ed. Migne) Cassian de Incarn. (ib. l. p. 10 and seq.) Soc. vii. 29-34. Evag. i. 2-7, with Garnier's five Diss. on Theodoret (Patrol. lxxxiv. 89-864).

(4) A.D. 440, under Basil: reversing the appointment of Bassianus to a distant see by Memnon his own predecessor, and giving him episcopal honour and rank at home (Mansi, v. 1199-1204).

(5) A.D. 447 under Dioscorus of Alexandria, when Bassianus its bishop was deposed and Stephen appointed in his room. The council of Chalcedon, however, on considering their case, decided that neither had been canonically consecrated, Oct. 30, A.D. 451 (Mansi, vi. 493-4, and then vii. 271-94).

(6) A.D. 449, Aug. 10, under Dioscorus bishop of Alexandria, convened by the Emperor Theodosius like the last general council, and held in the same church of St. Mary where the last had been; but its acts having been reversed in the first session of the council of Chalcedon, where they are recited at length, it was designated the "robbers' meeting" (Latrocinialis, see the title to c. 9, B. i. of Evagrius) and abandoned. It was inspired throughout by the eunuch Chrysaphius, who patronised Eutyches and was hostile to Flavian. There are three letters from the emperor to Dioscorus in reference to its composition. First he was to bring with him ten of his own metropolitans, and ten other bishops distinguished for their learning and orthodoxy, but not more; others having received their summons from the emperor himself similarly. Next he was told that Theodoret had received orders not to appear there, unless invited unanimously by the council when assembled. Another letter bade him admit the archimandrite Barsumas to sit in it as representing all the eastern archimandrites. A third letter assigned him the first place in it, with the archbishops of Jerusalem and Caesarea to support him. St. Leo was likewise summoned from Rome, and sent three representatives, one of whom Julius, bishop of Puteoli, seems to have sat next after Dioscorus. Altogether 128 bishops were present, but several confessed to subscribing through others as being unable to write. Eutyches having been introduced, made profession of his faith, and complained of the treatment he had received from Flavian in the council of Constantinople condemning him. The acts of this council, as well as of the council held five months afterwards to reconsider its sentence, were read out next; his acquittal and restoration followed. Afterwards a petition was received from some monks of his begging that his deposer might be deposed. On this the acts of the sixth session of the third general council were recited, and both Eusebius of Dorylaeum and Flavian of Constantinople deposed, as having contravened the definition respecting the creed that was laid down there.

Flavian who was present said at once that he appealed from their sentence. Hilary, the deacon from Rome, "contradicted" it; others accepted it only through misapprehension, as they affirmed at Chalcedon on recanting. Ibas of Edessa, Theodoret of Cyrus, Domnus of Antioch, and several more, were similarly deprived of their sees, as we learn from Eragrius. Liberatus adds (Brev. 12) that great intimidation was practised by the soldiers and monks present, that Eusebius and Flavian were both given into custody, and that the latter died of the injuries which he there received (Mansi, vi. 503-8, and then 587-836). EPICLISIS ('Επίκλησις) = "invocation" generally; but specially the invocation of the Holy Spirit to sanctify the elements displayed on the Holy Table, occurring in Eastern liturgies after the recitation of the Words of Institution.

The evidence of Irenaeus in the second, Firmilian in the third, and of Cyril of Jerusalem and Basil in the fourth century, as to the practice of the church with regard to the Epiclesis, has been already quoted [CANON OF THE LITURGY, p. 269]. To this may be added Chrysostom, Hom. In Coemeterio (Opp. II. 401, ed. Ben.), where is described the priest standing before the table, invoking (καλῶν) the Holy Spirit to descend and touch the elements.

Of the liturgical forms, we may take the Clementine (Const. Apost. viii. 13, § 17) as an early example. The priest beseeches God to send down His Holy Spirit upon the sacrifice, "that He may declare [or make] (ἀποφῆν) this bread the Body of Thy Christ, and this cup the Blood of Thy Christ, in order that they who partake of it may be confirmed in piety, obtain remission of their sins, be delivered from the devil and his deceits, be filled with the Holy Spirit, be made worthy of Thy Christ, obtain eternal life, Thou being reconciled unto them, O Lord Almighty." Compare the liturgy of St. James, c. 32.

The Epiclesis in the Byzantine liturgy (Chrys. c. 30; Daniel, Codex Lit. iv. 359, 360), after praying God to send down the Holy Spirit on the gifts and the worshippers, proceeds, "and make (ποιῆσον) this Bread the precious Body of Thy Christ, and that which is in this cup the precious Blood of Thy Christ, changing them (μεταβαλὼν) by Thy Holy Spirit."

* Neale (Tetralogia, p. xv.) compares, for this sense of the word, Plato's Protag. 349 A. See also von Drey, Ueber die Constit. Apostol. p. 110; and Hefele, Beiträge zur Archäol. II. 44.

St. Mark (c. 17; Dan. iv. 162) has: "Send forth . . . Thy Holy Spirit upon us, and upon these loaves, and upon these cups, that He may sanctify and consecrate (ἁγιασθῇ) them, as God Almighty; and may make (ποιῆσθαι) the bread the Body and the cup the Blood of the New Covenant, of the very Lord and God and Saviour, our Almighty King, Jesus Christ."

Several of the Mozarabic Post Secreta contain similar invocations of the Holy Spirit; for instance, that for the second Sunday after Epiphany (Neale, Eastern Ch., Introd. 499) has the following: "We thy servants beseech Thee, that thou wouldest sanctify this oblation by the permixture of Thy Holy Spirit, and wouldest conform it, with full transformation, to the Body and Blood of our Lord Jesus Christ, that we may merit to be cleansed from the pollution of our sins by this sacrifice, whereby we know that we were redeemed."

"The Syrian churches postponed the oblation until after the Invocation of the Holy Spirit; while in the Jerusalem, Alexandrian, and Constantinopolitan offices it precedes that prayer." (Neale, u.s. 500.)

The question, whether the consecration is complete without the Epiclesis, has been much debated in modern times; but for our purpose it is sufficient to observe that an Epiclesis is universal in Oriental liturgies, and common in liturgies influenced by the East, as the Mozarabic; while in liturgies of the Roman type it is altogether wanting. EPICTETUS, and companions, martyrs at Rome, A.D. 296; commemorated Aug. 22 (Mart. Rom. Vet., Hieron., Adonis, Usuardi). [W. F. G.]

EPIGONATION (ἐπιγονάτιον; also γονάτιον, ὀστρογονάτιον). This ornament, peculiar to the Eastern church, consists of a lozenge-shaped piece of some stiff material, hanging from the girdle on the right side as low as the knee, whence its name. It seems to have been at first, like the maniple in the West, merely a handkerchief, and it apparently continued in this form in the patriarchate of Antioch, as late as the 11th century (Ducange, Glossarium, s. v. ὀστρογονάτιον), and in the Armenian church it has remained thus to the present day (Neale, Eastern Church, Introd. p. 311). Writers who delight in finding symbolical reasons for the use of vestments, have connected it either with the towel with which our Lord girded Himself, or more generally with the sword and Christ's victory over death; in connection with which latter idea, Psalm xlv. 3, 4, is repeated on assuming this ornament (Liturgia S. Chrysostomi; Goar, Euchologion, pp. 59, 60). The epigonation is properly part of the episcopal dress, but is allowed by the rubric in this place to be worn by other ecclesiastics of a certain rank . . . εἰ ἐστὶν κρυπτοσύγκελλος τῆς μεγάλης ἐκκλησίας ἢ ἄλλας τις ἔχων ἀξιώτητα τῶν (Goar, l. c., and see his note, p. 112; cf. also the rule as laid down at a much later period by Symeon Thessalonicensis in the 15th century, where the wearing of the epigonation by priests is spoken of as granted κατὰ παλαιὰ ἀρχιερατικὴν; Marriott, Vestiarium Christianum, p. 171). In one form given by Goar of the consecration of a bishop in the Greek church, we find a mention of this ornament as given to him immediately after a declaration of his faith and the subsequent benediction by the presiding bishop (Goar, p. 310). [R. S.]

EPILEPTICS. The 11th council of Toledo (A.D. 675), after mentioning the case of those possessed with demons [DEMONIACS], who are excluded altogether from the service of the altar, speaks separately (c. 13) of the case of those who sometimes fall to the earth from bodily disease, who are excluded from ministering until they can show that they have passed a whole year without such attacks; and desires (c. 14) that persons liable to such attacks should (if possible) not be left alone in the performance of divine offices. These provisions clearly refer to the case of those who are afflicted with epilepsy or (to use the old English name) "falling sickness." [C.]

EPIPHANY, FESTIVAL OF (ἡ ἐπιφάνεια, τὰ ἐπιφάνια, ἡ θεοφάνεια, τὰ θεοφάνια; τὰ φῶτα, ἡμέρα τῶν φῶτων, τὰ ἅγια φῶτα τῶν ἐπισκόπων; τὰ φαιφάνια:—Epiphania, Theophania, Apparitio, Manifestatio, Aceptio, festum trium regum [magorum, sapientum], festum stellae; dies luminum; festum lavicri; Bethphania, dies natalis virtutum Domini. The names of this festival in European languages are mainly either (1) as in the case of those of Latin derivation and others, mere reproductions of the Latin name or renderings of it; or (2) refer to the manifestation to the Magi as the three kings, as the Dutch Drie-koningen-dag, the Danish Helligtre-kongersdag, and an equivalent form in Breton; also the Welsh Ystyryll, if, as is not improbable, it is a corruption of the Latin stella; or (3) indicate it as the final day of the Christmas festivity, as in the familiar English Twelfth-day, the old German der Zwelfte, Dreizehnde, or the Swedish Trettonde-dagen).

1. History of Festival.—It has already been shown in a previous article [CHRISTMAS] that the festival of the Epiphany was originally viewed in the Eastern church as a commemoration of our Saviour's manifestation to the world in a wide sense; including, that is, His Nativity, or His manifestation in the flesh, together with the manifestation of the Trinity at His baptism. In the Western church, on the other hand, so far as the matter can be traced back, the Nativity appears to have been always celebrated as a separate festival, and in their commemoration of the Epiphany it is the manifestation to the Magi that is mostly dwelt on: and further, Christ's manifestation in yet another sense is associated with these, His Divine power and goodness, as shown in His miracles; primarily the turning of water into wine at Cana of Galilee, and sometimes the feeding of the five thousand. Thus there are, besides the Nativity itself, three manifestations commemorated, variously dwelt on and variously combined in different branches of the church.

In the Eastern church till nearly the end of the 4th century, we find, as has been said, a combined celebration of Christ's Nativity and Baptism on January 6.^a The date of the severance of the two can be approximately fixed, for Chrysostom refers to it as a matter of merely a few years' standing, in a sermon probably delivered on the Christmas day of 386 A.D. How far back we are to refer the origin of this two-fold festival it is not easy to determine, the earliest mention of any kind being the allusion by Clement of Alexandria to the annual commemoration of Christ's baptism by the Basilidians (Stromata, lib. i. c. 21).^b At any rate by the latter part of the 4th century the Epiphany had become one of the most important and venerable festivals in the Eastern church.

It may not unreasonably be assumed that the festival of the Epiphany first took its rise in the east and then passed into the west. This may be argued (1) from the comparatively very early date at which we find a trace of it in the east; (2) from the Greek name by which the Western church as well as the Eastern knows it, while Christmas is designated there by a Latin name; (3) from the nature of the earliest allusions to the existence of a festival of the Epiphany in the west. These it may be well to state somewhat fully.^c

The earliest instance of all is the reference by Ammianus Marcellinus to the emperor Julian's visit when at Vienne in Gaul to a church, "feriarum die quem celebrantes mense Januario Christiani Epiphania dicitant" (lib. xxi. c. 2); and we find Zonaras, apparently alluding to the same event, speak of it as happening τῆς γενεθλίου Σατῆρος ἡμέρας ἐφεστῆκυίας (Annal. xiii. 11). Now if it is remembered that this took place in Gaul, where the church had close affinities with the east, we are perhaps not claiming too much in assuming that the Gallican church at this time celebrated Epiphany and Nativity together on January 6; and we shall subsequently find a confirmation of this view from an examination of the Gallican liturgy, where it is rather the manifestation at the Baptism than that to the Magi that is dwelt on. Again we find a mention of the emperor Valens, in the course of his futile attempt to overawe Basil of Caesarea, entering the church in that place with a great train on the festival of the Epiphany (Greg. Naz. Orat. xliii. 52). Another early allusion may be mentioned: Augustine (Serm. ccii. § 2; vol. v. 1328, ed. Gaume) speaks of the Donatists as refusing to join in the celebration of the Epiphany, "quia nec unitatem amant, nec orientali ecclesiae . . . communicant," obviously pointing to an eastern origin of the festival. We may take this opportunity of remarking that there is no mention of the Epiphany in the Calendar of Becherius, but in the Cal. Carthaginense we find vis. Id. Jan. Sanctum Epiphania (Patrol. xlii. 1227).

^a In a passage in one of the spurious sermons once wrongly ascribed to Chrysostom is a mention of the Epiphany as celebrated on the 13th day of the 4th month, κατὰ Ἀσιασμοῦ (Opp. vol. vii. App. p. 278). It is not stated who these Asiatics were, but the explanation of the reckoning may probably be found in a comparison with that given by Epiphanius (Haer. li. 24).

^b Neander (Church History, i. 346, trans. Rose) considers it probable that this Gnostic sect derived the practice from the Judæo-Christian churches in Palestine.

^c Besides the instances given above, an early allusion to the Epiphany is found in the Acta of Philip, bishop of Hieraclea (in Ruinart's Acta Primorum Martyrum), who suffered early in the 4th century. It would be unsafe, however, to argue from a passage in a document itself of doubtful date.

On these grounds we think it probable that while on the one hand the Eastern church, at first commemorating Nativity and Epiphany as one festival, afterwards in compliance with western, or perhaps, more strictly speaking, Roman, usage, fixed the former on a separate day; so too, the Western church, at first celebrating the Nativity alone, afterwards brought in from the east the further commemoration of the Epiphany, but with the special reference somewhat altered. For the early history of the Epiphany in the Eastern church, and the gradual severance from it of the Nativity, we must again refer to the discussion already given [CHRISTMAS], and it may now be desirable briefly to review further historical notices, arranging them according to the special manifestation of Christ to which they mainly refer.

a. Manifestation at the Baptism.—This manifestation of our Saviour as Messiah and as God is the prevailing idea dwelt upon throughout the Eastern church, though in the Western church as a rule this commemoration has been quite secondary to the manifestation to the Magi. References are continually met with in the writings of Chrysostom and others of and after his time to this idea of the festival. Thus Chrysostom, in a homily apparently delivered on December 20, 386 A.D., and therefore after the western plan of celebrating Christmas separately had been introduced, speaks of the Nativity as in a certain sense the parent of all the other great festivals, for, to take the case of the Epiphany, had He not been born—ὅχι δὲ ἐβάρλοθῃ, ἔπερ δὲ τὸν τὰ θεοφάνεια (Hom. 8 in B. Philoponium, c. 3; i. 497, ed. Montfaucon). So also in a homily probably delivered on the following Epiphany, 387 A.D. (Hom. de Baptismo Christi, c. 2; ii. 369). In another place (Hom. de Sancta Pentecoste, c. 1; ii. 458) he says, τοῦτον ἡμεῖς τοῦ ἐπὶ τῇ σφύρῃ (i.e. in the order of the year) τὰ θεοφάνεια, where Montfaucon (Monitum in Hom.) gives the probable explanation that Chrysostom is speaking according to the old-fashioned way. Reference may also be made to an oration of Gregory of Nazianzum, spoken apparently on the Epiphany of 381 A.D. (Oratio 39 in Sancta Lumina, c. 1; i. 677, ed. Bened.), and to one of Gregory of Nyssa (Orat. in Bapt. Christi, iii. 577; ed. Migne).

From this view of the Epiphany it naturally became one of the three great seasons for baptism, and on this day was the solemn consecration of water for the rite (infra). Hence the origin of the names for the day, τὰ φῶτα, ἡμέρα τῶν φῶτων, referring to the spiritual illumination of baptism. It is needless to say that to explain the name by a reference to the free employment of lighted candles in the solemnities of the day in the Greek church, is a simple inversion of cause and effect. For the strange mistake of some writers who have supposed that "the day of lights" is to be interpreted of Candlemas day, see Suicer's Theaurus (s. v. φῶς, § 12) and Bingham's Antiquities (xx. 4, 7).

In the west also, this manifestation of Christ, though not the one most dwelt on, is still occasionally referred to, as by Maximus Taurinensis (Hom. 22, 23, 29, 32, 33, &c., where see the prefatory remarks in the Roman edition), and Jerome, "quintam autem diem mensis adjungit, ut significet baptismum, in quo aperti sunt Christo caeli, et Epiphaniarum dies hucusque venerabilis est, non ut quidam putant, Natalis in carne, tunc enim absconditus est et non apparuit" (Hom. in Ezech., lib. i. c. 1, v. 3; v. 6, ed. Vallarsi). To the allusions in the Gallican liturgy already mentioned we shall again refer, and it will be remembered that our own church makes the Baptism of our Lord the subject for the second lesson on the evening of the Epiphany.

Further, the association of this day with the administration of baptism occurred also in the west, for we find Himerius, a bishop of Tarraco, in Spain, complaining to pope Damasus (ob. 384 A.D.) of the practice of baptizing on the Epiphany; and the latter having died, his successor, Siricius (ob. 389 A.D.), enters his prohibition against it and restricts baptism as a rule to Easter and Pentecost (Epist. i. ad Himerium Tarracensem Episcopum, c. 2; Patrol. xiii. 1134); and somewhat later, Leo I. speaks of it as "irrationabilis novitas" (Epist. 16, ad Siciliacensis episcopos, c. 1; i. 715, ed. Ballerini). The same prohibition was laid down at a still later period (517 A.D.) by the Spanish council of Gerunda (can. 4; Labbe iv. 1588). See also Codex veterum can. Eccl. Hispaniae, lib. iv., tit. 26 in Cajetan Cenni's De antiqua Eccl. Hisp. i., xlviii., where reference is made to Leo's injunctions. Further, Victor Vitensis alludes to this as the practice in the African church (de persecutione Vandalica, lib. ii. c. 17; Patrol. lviii. 216). See also Pamelius's note to Tertullian de Baptismo, c. 19.

B. Manifestation to the Magi.—It has been on this idea that the Western church has specially dwelt, with the exceptions mentioned above; but even in these, save perhaps in the Gallican liturgy, the manifestations at the Baptism and at Cans of Galilee are brought in as subsidiary to the main topic. Hence has arisen one common western name for the day, festum trans regum, in accordance with the legend by which the wise Magi of the east became exalted into kings and their number restricted to three. We shall speak briefly hereafter of the origin and growth of this wide-spread legend (below, § 3). We have numerous homilies of the Latin fathers, dwelling mainly, or exclusively (as e.g. eight by Leo I.), on this aspect of the day.

γ. Manifestation at the Marriage in Cans of Galilee.—The manifestation of Christ's Divine power by His first miracle of turning the water into wine is not unfrequently dwelt on in documents of the Western church. Thus Maximus Taurinensis, to whom we have already referred, associates this with the two previous manifestations. See e.g. Hom. 29, "ferunt enim hodie Christum Dominum nostrum vel stella duce a gentibus adoratum, vel invitatum ad nuptias aquas in vino vertisse, vel suscepto a Joanne baptisinate consecrasse fluentes Jordanis." Hence he speaks of the day as virtutum (Domini) natalis. From this cause comes the later name Bethphania (see Ducange, s. v.). Cf. also Gregory of Tours (de miraculis S. Martini, ii. 26).

We find in the Eastern church too traces of an association of the miracle at Cana with this season, for Epiphanius (Haeresis li. c. 30; i. 451, ed. Petavius) speaks of it as happening about Tybi 11 (= Jan. 6), and adds, doubtlessly in perfect good faith, that sundry fountains and rivers (e.g. the Nile) were changed into wine on the anniversary of the miracle.

8. Manifestation at the Feeding of the Five Thousand.—Less frequently met with than any of the preceding is the commemoration of the above act of miraculous feeding, which may be specially associated with the one preceding. Under this point of view the day was known as φαιφάνια. We have mentioned below a reference to this in the Gallican use.

The first three of these manifestations are all referred to by Isidore of Seville (de off. eccl. ii. 26), and the Ordo Romanus also adds the fourth. We may also mention here a passage in a sermon once attributed to Augustine, but palpably not his, in which all the four manifestations are alluded to (Serm. 136 in Append.; v. 2702, ed. Gaume).

For the special association of the festival of the Innocents with that of the Epiphany reference may be made to the article on the former.

Before we proceed to speak briefly of the various liturgical forms for this day, we may remark that it was usual to give notice on the Epiphany of the day on which the Easter of the ensuing year would fall. Letters were sent about this time by metropolitans to their provincial bishops (epistolae Paschales, heortasticae), in which at the end of a discourse of a more general kind was given the requisite information. An allusion to the existence of this practice in Egypt is found in Cassian, "Intra Aegypti regionem rmos iste antiqua traditione servatur, ut peracto Epiphaniarum die . . . epistolae pontificis Alexandrini per universas dirigantur ecclesias, quibus initium Quadragesimae et dies Paschae . . . significantur" (Coll. x. 2; Patrol. xlix. 820). Instances of such letters are those by Dionysius of Alexandria (referred to by Eusebius, Hist. Eccles. vii. 20), Athanasius (fragments of whose once numerous series were first brought to light in a Syriac version by Mai, Nova Bibliotheca Patrum, vi. 1-168), Theophilus of Alexandria (three of which were translated into Latin by Jerome, and are included among his works, Epp. 96, 98, 100, ed. Migne), and Cyril, no less than thirty of whose are still extant (vol. v. part 2, ed. Aubert); and besides these purely Egyptian examples may be further cited those of Innocent I. (Ep. 14 de ratione Paschali; Patrol. xx. 517), and Leo I. (Ep. 138 ad episcopos Gall. et Hispan. i. 1283, ed. Ballerini). We find traces of the custom as existing in Spain, but there the notice was to be given on Christmas day, according to the third council of Braga, 578 A.D. (Conc. Bracar. iii. can. 9; Labbe v. 898).

This duty is insisted on by several early councils (e.g. Conc. Arelat. i. can. 1; Conc. Carth. iii. cann. 1, 41; Conc. Carth. v. can. 7; Labbe, i. 1427; ii. 1167, 1173, 1216), and we cite especially the fourth council of Orleans (541 A.D.), which after enjoining that Easter is to be kept uniformly according to the Paschal table of Victorius, adds "quae festivitatis annis singulis ab episcopo Epiphaniarum die in ecclesia populis denuntietur" (Conc. Aurel. iv. can. 1; Labbe, v. 381. See also Conc. Antissiod. [578 A.D.], can. 2, op. cit. 957). The form of the announcement as given in the Ambrosian liturgy, under the Epiphany, runs thus: "Noverit charitas vestra, fratres charissimi, quod annuente Dei et Domini nostri Jesu Christi misericordia, die tali mensis talis Pascha Domini celebrabimus" (Pamelius, Liturgy. Lat. ii. 314).

2. Liturgical Notices.—It need hardly be said that the festival of the Epiphany is recognised in some form or other in all liturgies both of the west and the east. The earliest form of the Roman liturgy, the Leonine, is defective for this part of the year, but it cannot be doubted that a service for the Epiphany entered into it; the more so that no less than eight homilies for this festival are found in the works of Leo. In the next form, the Gelasian, we find a mass both for the festival of the Epiphany itself, and for the vigil. Throughout the service for both days the only Manifestation of our Lord referred to is that to the Magi (Patrol. lxxiv. 1062).

In the Gregorian Sacramentary we find the further addition of a form for the Octave, though it should be added that both this and that for the vigil are wanting in some MSS., as the Codez Rodradi (Greg. Sac. 15), and the same remark is true for the Liber Antiphonarius (p. 660). In this last-named book the seventy-second psalm is largely used, and very probably the poetic imagery of this psalm suggested the special form of the legend of the festum trium regum (Ps. lxxii. 10). In this Sacramentary also, from which, it may be remarked, the collect for the day in our own prayer-book is derived, the reference is solely to the manifestation to the Magi; except in the solemn eucharistic benediction, where a mention of the manifestation both at the baptism and at the marriage in Cana of Galilee is added, ". . . qui super Unigenitum suum Spiritum Sanctum demonstrare voluit per columbam, eaque virtute mentes vestrae exercentur ad intelligenda divinae Legis arcana, qua in Cana Galilaeae lympa est in vinum conversa" (ib. 16), and see also the Liber Responsalis (ib. 751). The Ordo Romanus prescribes three lessons for the vigil from the prophet Isaiah (lv., lx., lxi. 10-lxiv. 4), as well as some homilies.

The Ambrosian liturgy contains forms for the vigil and the festival; the manifestation to the Magi is the only one dwelt on, except in the prefaces for the two days, in the former of which the three manifestations are alluded to, and the latter of which refers solely to the baptism, mentioning also the solemn consecration of the water; "susceperunt hodie fontes benedictionem tuam et abstulerunt maledictionem nostram" (Missa Ambros. in Pamelius' Liturgy. Lat. i. 315).

ready alluded in passing to the title of festum trium regum given in the Western church to the festival of the Epiphany, viewed as a commemoration of the visit of the three Magi to the infant Saviour. Whence then has tradition invested them with royalty, and why has their number been fixed as three? The idea that the Magi were kings, probably first suggested by an arbitrary interpretation of Psalm lxxii. 10 and similar passages, was early believed in. Thus Tertullian, after alluding to the above-mentioned psalm, adds: "Nam et Magos reges fere habuit Oriens" (adv. Judaeos, c. 9), though curiously enough the apocryphal Gospel of the Infancy, which gives a somewhat lengthy account of the visit of the Magi, is silent as to this point. The number three is not improbably due to the number of the recorded gifts, though early patristic writers have thought it to symbolise other special reasons. Thus some believed that under this number was implied the doctrine of the Trinity, and others saw in it an allusion to the threefold division of the human race, an idea which is also referred to in sundry early representations of the Magi. See e.g. Bede's Collectanea, if indeed the work is really his, where this point seems referred to (Patrol. xciv. 541). Not only did early tradition fix the number of the Magi, but it also assigned them names. These are variously given, but the generally received forms are Caspar, Melchior, Baltazar, which are apparently first met with in the passage of Bede referred to above. These names point, Mr. King thinks, to a Mithraic origin, from the apparent reference in their etymology to the sun (Gnostics and their Remains, pp. 50, 133).

Merely to fix the names, however, was not sufficient, and accordingly we find that bodies, firmly believed at the time to be those of the Magi, were brought by the empress Helena to Constantinople, where they were received with great honours. These remains were subsequently transferred to Milan through the influence of Eustorgius, bishop of that see; and in 1162 A.D. they were again removed by the emperor Frederick Barbarossa to Cologne, where they still remain, and hence has arisen the appellation by which they are so commonly known, the Three Kings of Cologne. A further discussion of this legend is beyond our present scope, and reference may be made to the 'Bible Dictionary,' s.v. MAGI, and besides the authorities there mentioned, a vast mass of information on the whole subject may be found in Crompton's Primitive Gentium seu Historia SS. trium regum magorum. Colon. Agr. 1654.

EPISTLE. Lectons from Holy Scripture form part of every known liturgy. These lections, as we learn from Justin Martyr, were originally taken from the Old as well as from the New Testament. The Apostolical Constitutions speak of "the reading of the Law and the Prophets, and of the Epistles, and Acts and Gospels" (Ap. Const. viii. 5; ii. 57). Tertullian mentions that the African church united the reading of the Law and the Prophets with that of the writings of the evangelists and apostles (De Praescript. 36). St. Augustine repeatedly refers to the first of the lections being taken from the Prophets: "primam lectionem Isaiae prophetae" (Serm. 45, ed. Bened. vol. v. p. 218), "lectio prima prophetica" (Serm. 47, v. 268), though, as we shall see, this was not universally the case. In comparatively early times the Old Testament lection in many places dropt out of use on ordinary occasions, and the first Scripture lection in the liturgy was that generally known as the Epistle. The most ancient designation was the Apostle, the lections being almost universally taken from the writings of St. Paul. Thus we find, "Apostolum audivimus, Psalmum audivimus, Evangelium audivimus" (Aug. Serm. de Verb. Apost. 176, vol. v. p. 796), "sequitur apostolus" (Sacram. Gregor. Menard, p. 2); ἀναγινώσκειται ἀπόστολος (Liturg. Chrys.); "in quibusdam Hispaniarum ecclesiis laudes post apostolum decantantur" (Concil. Tolet. iv., A.D. 633, can. xii.; Labbe v. 1700); "Statim post Apostolum id est post Epistolam" (Hincmar, Opusc. vii. vol. ii. p. 149); κατέκρινεν . . . ψαλτήριον διδᾶναι με καὶ τὸν ἀπόστολον (Cyrill. Scythop. Vit. S. Sabae).

In all ancient Sacramentaries of the Western church the Epistle succeeds the Collect. This is not the case in the Eastern liturgies. In the liturgy of St. Chrysostom we find a PROKIMENON (προκείμενον), or short anthem preceding the Epistle as its epitome, consisting of a verse and response, generally, but not always, taken from the Psalms. Before the epistle the deacon imposed silence (εὐχόμενος, attendamus), "not," observes St. Chrysostom, "as doing honour to the reader but to Him who speaks to all through Him," Homil. III. i. 2 Thesa. After the Epistle is read, the priest says, "Peace be to thee," which is technically called εὐχόμενος τῇ ἐπιστολῇ. Instead of this "Thanks be to God" follows in the Mozarabic liturgy. In the Western church the anthem epitomizing the Epistle, taken from the Psalms, followed instead of preceding it. From being sung on the steps of the ambo, it was called the Gradual [ALLELUIA: GRADUAL]. St. Augustine frequently alludes to its position between the Epistle and Gospel, e.g. "Primum lectionem audivimus apostoli.... deinde cantavimus psalmum.... posthac evangelica lectio" (Aug. Serm. de Verb. Apost. 176; Serm. 45, v. 49, u.s.). Neither in the Eastern nor the Western church was the Epistle always selected from the writings of the apostles. We find it sometimes taken from the Acts and the Revelation, and in the Western, but never in the Eastern church, even from the Old Testament. Several of the Oriental liturgies present more than one lection in the place of the Epistle. In the Coptic liturgy of St. Basil there is first a lection from an epistle of St. Paul, then the Catholicon,^a i. e. a lection from one of the Catholic epistles, then a lection from the Acts, each followed by an appropriate prayer; a psalm is then sung, and the Gospel is read (Renaudot, i. pp. 5-8). The Liturgia Communis Aethiopum gives the same five lections in the same order (Ib. pp. 507-510), in which they also stand in the Syriac liturgies (Ib. ii. p. 66). Canons of the Coptic church ordaining these five lections—the psalm being counted as one—are given by Renaudot (Ib. i. p. 203). The last lection is always the Gospel.

The origin and date of the arrangement of these Scripture lections will be more properly discussed when the early lectionaries are treated of [LECTIONARY]. Binterim carries them back as early as the 3rd century (Denkwürdigkeit. iv. 1. 228-230; 2. 323). If the ancient Lectionarium of the Roman church, known by the title of Comes [COMES], in which we find the epistles and gospels very much as they stand in the English liturgy at the present day, were really drawn up, as is asserted, by Jerome, we should have certain evidence of their arrangement at least as early as the 5th century. But the authorship of the Comes rests only on the authority of writers of the 11th and 12th centuries, and though accepted by Bona (Rer. Liturg. lib. iii. c. 8, p. 824) and Binterim (u.s.), must be regarded as exceedingly questionable. The fact, however, that the same lections were employed by the fathers of the 4th and 5th centuries as the subjects of their homilies proves the very early date of their assignment to particular days (cf. the examples given by Augusti, Handbuch d. Christ. Arch. bk. vi. c. 8, vol. ii. p. 239).

^a "Catholicon. Ita vocantur apud orientales Epistolae Jacobi, Petri, Joannis et Judae, quae Catholicae appellantur, quia ad omnes scriptae sunt, ex quibus unum volumen conficitur quod Catholicon dicitur. Itaque cum Theologi laudent aliquam ex istis Epistolis sententiam dicunt Jacobus in Catholico, Petrus, &c." Renaudot, i. 210. [CATHOLICON].

According to the Eastern ritual the Epistle was read by the Reader, standing at the Royal Doors. In the Western church it was read in the 8th century from the ambo by the subdeacon standing on the second step, the Gospel being subsequently read by the deacon from the third step. Amalarius (De Offic. Eccl. lib. ii. c. 11) expresses his surprise that this office is assigned to the subdeacon, since it is not mentioned in the commission at his ordination; but the 4th canon of the council of Rheims, A.D. 813, after directing that "the Apostle" should be read by the subdeacon, all sitting, adds "qualiter subdiaconi ministerium est apostolum legere" (Augusti, Hübner; Binterim, Denkwürdigk.; Bingham, Orig.; Bona, Rer. Liturg.; Martene, de Eccl. Rit.). [F. V.]

ERA. A succession of years, reckoned on some common principle from a specified event, or date, called its epoch. The terms era and epoch are frequently used as synonymous.

The Julian Period.—1. To compare dates belonging to different eras, there is no method more useful than to refer them all to the Julian period, a period introduced or revived by Scaliger. It consists of 7980 years, that number being formed by multiplying together $28 \times 19 \times 15$, the respective periods of the cycle of the sun, of the cycle of the moon, and of the indictions, the last being a period used in the administration of the Roman empire. It is the great cycle in which the solar, lunar, and indictional cycles synchronise, after the completion of 285 cycles of the sun, 420 of the moon, and 532 of the indictions. The great cycle then recurs as before. No two years in the same period agree in all the three numerals of the subordinate cycles, so that by naming them all, the year is completely designated.

2. The first year of the current Julian period, in which each of the subordinate cycles had the numeral one, was the year 4713 A.C., and the noon of 1st January of that year, for the meridian of Alexandria, is its chronological epoch.

The years are Julian years, i.e., of 365 days in common years, 366 in leap year, which is every fourth year, that year in fact whose date-numeral being divided by four, leaves the remainder one.

3. To find the place of any specified year of the Julian period.—Divide its numeral by the respective divisors 28, 19, 15. The respective remainders give the years in the several cycles. The remainder 0 is to be construed 28, 19, 15.

4. To determine the year of the Julian period from the numerals of the three cycles.—Multiply the numeral of the solar cycle by 4845, that of the lunar by 4200, and that of the indictions by 6916, and divide the sum of these products by 7980. The remainder is the year sought.

5. To find the day current of the Julian period of any date in the Julian period.—Subtract one from the numeral of the year-day, and divide the remainder by four, calling Q the integer quotient, R the remainder. Then will Q be the number of entire quadriennia of 1461 days each, and R the residual years, the first of which is always a leap year. Convert Q into days by taking the right multiple of 1461, and R by using the annexed table; then add the days for the current day of the given year, remembering February 29th in leap year.

Day . . .	0	366	731	1096

6. To convert a year of the Julian period into the year B.C., or A.D.—If the numeral be less than 4714, subtract it from that number, the difference will be the year B.C. If the numeral be greater than 4713, take that number from the numeral, and the difference will be the year A.D.

The Olympiads.—1. The era used in Greece, instituted in 776 B.C. (3938 J. P.) consisting of four years. July 1st A.D., is considered to correspond with the commencement of the first year of the 195th Olympiad.

2. To reduce any given year of an Olympiad to the Christian era, multiply the Olympiad immediately preceding the one in question by four, and add to the product the number of years of the given Olympiad. If before Christ, subtract the amount from 777; if after Christ, subtract 776 from the amount, and the remainder will be the beginning of the year required, commencing from July.

3. For an exact calculation of days tables are required, showing the order of the months in the different years of the Metonic cycle. These may be found in Ideler i. 386.

4. The fathers of the Greek church and the ecclesiastical historians, as Eusebius and Socrates, use the era of the Olympiads in a peculiar manner. It would have been natural to begin them with the commencement of their civil year, September 1st, or ten months too early, but they really commence them a year earlier still, or nearly two years too early. The same reckoning is used in the Chronicon Paschale. It is necessary to add one year and ten months to their date to make them accord with the common era of the Olympiads.

Era of the Building of Rome.—Amongst the variety of dates assigned to this event, the Varronian epoch is adopted, being April 22nd, B.C. 753, or 3961, J. P. The consular year began on the 1st January.

To reduce the year of Rome, to the year before or after Christ.—If the year of Rome be less than 754, deduct its numeral from 754; the difference is the year before Christ. If the year of Rome be not less than 754, deduct 753 from it, and the remainder will be the year after Christ.

Era of the Seleucidae.—The era of the Seleucidae, also called the era of the Greeks, was widely used in Syria, and by the Jews from the time of the Maccabees. It is used in the book of the Maccabees. It is still used by the Arabs. Its epoch is October 1st, B.C. 312, or 4402 J. P.

Julian Reformation of the Calendar.—This took place 707 U.C., or January 1st B.C. 45. 4689 J. P.

The Christian Era.—The Christian era was first introduced by Dionysius Exiguus, a Scythian abbot in Rome, in the 6th century, and gradually superseded the era of Diocletian, which had been used till then. It was first used in France in the 7th century, but was not universally established there till the 8th century, after which time it became general. Great diversity, however, long subsisted as to the day on which the year should be considered to commence.

It commenced on the 1st day of January, in the middle of the 4th year of the 194th Olympiad, the 753rd U.C., and the 4714th of the Julian period. It is now generally acknowledged not to be the true year of the Saviour's birth, but its use as a chronological epoch does not allow of its being altered.

The era of Diocletian.—This era was prevalent till the adoption of the Christian era; its epoch was 29th August, A.D. 284. It was introduced in Egypt by Diocletian, after the siege of Alexandria, and gave the Egyptians, for the first time, the advantage of a fixed year. The first Thoth, the beginning of the Egyptian year, was August 31st, and it is supposed that a change was made from a moveable to a fixed year, after the lapse of five years. This era is still used by the Copts. To reduce this era to the Christian era add 283 years and 240 days, and as the intercalation was made at the end of the year, in the Diocletian year next after leap year, add one day, from the 29th August to the end of the ensuing February.

The era of Constantinople.—The era of Constantinople, or the Byzantine era, first appears in the Chronicon Paschale. It fixed the creation of the world in the 5508th year before Christ, so that A.D. 1, fell in the 5509th year of this era. The Russians followed this calculation till the time of Peter the Great, having received it from the Greek church, by whom it is still used. The year began on the equinox, March 21st. It was afterwards made to begin, for civil purposes, on September 1st.

The Alexandrians had used an era of the creation, fixed at 5502 years before Christ; but in A.D. 285, they reduced the date by ten years.

To pass from the year of our Lord to the era of Constantinople, or conversely, add or subtract 5508 from January to August, and 5509 for the rest of the year.

The Jewish era.—The Jews now reckon by the year of the world, and they place the creation 3761 B.C.

By adding 952 to the numeral of the Jewish year we get its date in the Julian period; and by subtracting 952 from the year of the Julian period we get the Jewish date.

For the Christian era we must subtract 3761, and add the same for the converse process. The Jewish year begins in the autumn.

The following results are selected from a Table in Sir J. Herschel's 'Outlines of Astronomy.'

ERENAEUS. [IRENÆUS.]

ERENACH, or HERENACH, a term applied to a class of officials who appear prominently in the annals of the Irish church prior to its reconstitution in the 12th century, after which time the word was used to denote an ecclesiastic having a position akin to that of archdeacon.

In its earliest use the Erenach, or Airchinneach, appears to have been hereditary steward and tenant of the lands granted by temporal chiefs to the church-founding abbots of Ireland; his duties being to superintend the farmers or tenants of the church or monastery—according to Colgan, "Omnium colonorum certi districtus praepositus seu praefectus." [J. S.—r.]

ESICHIUS or ESICIUS. [HESYCHIUS.]

ESPOUSALS. [ARRHAE: BENEDICTION, NUPTIAL: BETROTHAL: MARRIAGE.]

ETHELDREDA or EDILTRUDIS, virgin-queen, martyr in Britain; commemorated June 23 (Mart. Bedae, Adonis, Usuardi). [W. F. G.]

ETHERIUS, bishop; deposition at Auxerre July 27 (Mart. Usuardi). [W. F. G.]

ETHIOPIAN MONKS. Monasticism spread rapidly from Egypt into Ethiopia, and gained as strong a hold there as in Egypt or Syria, if not a stronger. Helyot (Histoire des Ordres Monastiques, i. xi.) speaks of all the monasteries in Ethiopia as professing to obey the so-called "Rule of Antony," but with different observances. An attempt at reformation, such as invariably recur in the life of a monastic order, was made in the 7th century; Tecla-Haimanot, as Helyot writes, it being the second founder or Benedict of Ethiopian monasticism. He endeavoured to consolidate the system under a Superior-General, second in ecclesiastical rank only to the Patriarch of Ethiopia, who was to visit and inspect the monasteries personally or by proxy. Several of them, however, preferred to retain their independence, like congregationalists. Monks swarmed in Ethiopia, according to Helyot, long after the first fervour of asceticism; and the constitution of the Ethiopian church was monastic (Robertson, Church Hist. i. 300). The story of a military order of monks, like the knight-templars, originating in the 4th century is purely fabulous (Helyot, u. s. i. xiii.) [I. G. S.]

EUCCHARIST (Εὐχαριστία). This article treats of the use of the word Eucharistia. For the nature of the offices accompanying the sacrament, see LITURGY, and the several articles of its component parts, especially CANON OF THE LITURGY and COMMUNION, HOLY.

I. The primary meaning of the word εὐχαριστία seems to be a feeling of thankfulness or gratitude (2 Mac. ii. 27; Sirac. xxxvii. 11; Acts xxiv. 3).

II. The expression of the feeling of gratitude 1. In words = thanksgiving; 2. In act = thank-offering.

1. Εὐχαριστία, in the sense of thanksgiving, occurs frequently in the New Testament; it is used for the thanksgiving in public worship (1 Cor. xiv. 16; 2 Cor. iv. 15, etc.), and for the expression of thankfulness generally.

2. Philo uses εὐχαριστία in a wider sense.

He speaks, for instance (De Victimis, c. 9), of εὐχαριστία as including hymns, prayers, and sacrifices; of τὰς διὰ θυσιῶν εὐχαριστίας (Ib. c. 4); and of giving thanks (or thank-offering, εὐχαριστῆσαι τὴν εὐχαριστίαν) to God for the creation of the world—a phrase noteworthy as suggesting one of the aspects of the Christian eucharist (Irenaeus, Haeres. iv. 18, 4). The word does not occur in the LXX. though it is used by Aquila.

III. We have to consider the application of the word εὐχαριστία to the Supper of the Lord, or the elements used in it.

1. The verb εὐχαριστεῖν, like the corresponding substantive, means both to feel thankfulness and to express it. The use of the word εὐχαριστήσθαι, in 2 Cor. i. 11, implies further that εὐχαριστεῖν might be used with an accusative of the object for which thanks are given.

The Lord in the Last Supper gave thanks after taking the Cup (δεξιμενος ποτήριον εὐχαριστήσας εἶπεν, Luke xii. 17; λαβὼν ποτήριον καὶ εὐχαριστήσας, Matt. xxvi. 27); and before breaking the Bread (εὐχαριστήσας ἐλάσεν, 1 Cor. xi. 24; Luke xxii. 19). Compare Matt. xv. 36; Mark viii. 6; John vi. 11, 23. So the disciples of the 2nd century gave thanks over the Bread and the Cup in the Sacrament of the Lord's Supper, as we see from the description of it in Justin Martyr.

2. From this uttering of thanksgiving over the elements of Bread and Wine in the Sacrament, the word εὐχαριστεῖν came to mean, to bless, hallow, or consecrate by the utterance of the proper form of thanksgiving (Grimm, Lexicon Novi Test. s. v.). Thus Justin Martyr (Apol. i. 65) speaks of the Bread and Wine and Water which had been made eucharistic (εὐχαριστήθηεν ἔργου καὶ οἴνου καὶ ὕδατος), immediately after mentioning the thanksgiving (εὐχαριστίαν) of the president for God's mercy in granting us the blessings of creation and redemption. And again (c. 66), he speaks of τὴν δι' εὐχῆς λόγου τοῦ πατρὸς εὐχαριστηθεῖσαν τροφήν [CANON OF THE LITURGY, p. 268]. Compare "panem in quo gratiae actae sint" (Irenaeus, Haeres. iv. 18, 4).

By an easy transition the εὐχαριστηθεῖσα τροφή or consecrated elements came to be called simply εὐχαριστία (Ib. c. 66). Similarly in the Ignatian letter ad Smyrn. 7. Irenaeus (Haeres. iv. 18, 5) says that the Bread after the EPICLESIS is no longer common bread, but eucharistia, consisting of two parts, an earthly and a heavenly.

3. But the conception of thank-offering is also found in the word eucharistia and its corresponding verb, when applied to the Sacrament of the Body and Blood of Christ. Clement of Alexandria (Strom. iv. § 132, p. 623) speaks of the martyr's blood poured out as a thank-offering (εὐχαριστήθηεντος αἵματος [Dindorf's text: vulg. εὐχαρισθέντος]); and we might interpret Justin's εὐχαριστηθεῖσα τροφή in the same way were it not for its close connexion with εὐχαριστία, where the latter evidently means thanksgiving. In the Dialogue with Trypho (c. 117), when Justin speaks of the Christian sacrifice which takes place (he says) ἐν τῇ εὐχαριστίᾳ τοῦ ἔργου καὶ τοῦ ποτηρίου, it is evident that he regards the Bread and the Cup as being themselves made a thank-offering or eucharistia. And again, when (c. 41) he refers to the leper's offering of fine flour as a type of the eucharistic bread (τοῦ ἔργου τῆς εὐχαριστίας) which the Lord commanded us to offer (ποιεῖν) in thanksgiving (ἵνα εὐχαριστῶμεν) for the blessings of creation and redemption, he regards the elements as themselves an expression of thankfulness; i. e. as a thank-offering. When Celsus objected to the Christians that they were ungrateful in not paying due thank-offerings (χαριστήρια) to the local deities, Origen replied (c. Celsus, viii. 57; pp. 415, 416, Spencer) that the bread called eucharistia (ἔργον εὐχαριστίας καλούμενος) was the symbol or outward token of thankfulness towards God (τῆς πρὸς τὸν Θεὸν εὐχαριστίας); that is, he regards the bread itself as of the nature of a thank-offering.

4. Whether the original meaning was, "that over which thanks have been given," or "that which has been made a thank-offering," the word eucharistia came to be simply equivalent to "the consecrated elements of bread and wine," or sometimes of bread alone. Thus Clement of Alexandria (Strom. i. § 5, p. 318) speaks of the ministers distributing the eucharist (τὴν εὐχαριστίαν διανεμάντες), i. e. the elements, to the communicants; and the epistle to Victor (Euseb. H. E. v. 24, § 15) of sending the eucharist to neighbouring churches. [Compare EULOGIAE.] Cyprian (Epist. xv. c. 1) explains eucharistia by the words, "id est, Sanctum Domini Corpus."

5. The eucharist (i. e. the consecrated bread) was employed in the following ways, besides that of ordinary administration. It was taken home and preserved in a casket [ARCA]; it was sent by bishops to other churches as a token of Christian brotherhood [EULOGIAE]; it was borne before the pope at a pontifical mass (Ordo Rom. i. c. 8; see Martene, R. A. I. iv. 2, § 2); it was reserved in churches [DOVE: RESERVATION]; it was enclosed in altars at consecration [CONSECRATION OF CHURCHES]; it was carried on a journey (Ambrose De Obitu Satyri, iii. 19); Gregory the Great De Off. iii. 36; Dial. c. 37); it was sometimes worn suspended from the neck in an EXCOLPION (Giraldus Cambren. Topograph. Hibern. Dist. ii. c. 19); it was used in the cure of disease (Augustine, c. Julian. iii. 162); it was placed in the mouth of the dead [BURIAL OF THE DEAD]; and the administration of the eucharist was one of the forms of ordeal (Martene, De Rit. Antiq. i. v. 4).

IV. The Greeks interpret the εὐχαριστίας of 1 Tim. ii. 1 to be hymns or canticles sung to the honour and glory of God (Daniel, Coder Liturg. iv. 406). [C.*]

EUCHARIST (IN CHRISTIAN ART). The earliest eucharistic representations, as may be expected, seem to refer principally to the agapae, or suppers which preceded the actual eucharistic breaking of the bread in the earliest times (1 Cor. xi. 20.) It is to be presumed at least that the order of the Lord's Supper itself was followed, and that the celebration, or symbolic breaking of the bread, took place after, or towards the end of, the meal. (St. John xiii. 2-4.) In the earliest days of persecution they naturally began to be celebrated in the catacombs or near the tombs of martyrs. [CELLA MEMORIAE.] It is not the business of the present writer to enquire into the connexion of the arrangements for public celebration of the eucharist and Christian rites in general with the ancient usages of funeral rites. But those usages were so familiar to the early church, that it is not to be wondered at that the agape at least is so frequently represented and the eucharist so distinctly implied in the various catacomb paintings. Dr. Mommsen (Contemp. Review, May 1871, 184 and 171) mentions an agape with bread and fish in that very ancient crypt of Domitilla on the Ardestine Way, which De Rossi refers to Flavia the granddaughter of Vespasian.* The bread and fish occur again repeatedly in the Callixtine catacomb, with a man in the act of blessing the bread; seven, eight, or more baskets of bread are placed near a table at which seven persons are sitting. The table is round, and fishes are also placed on it. The use of the vine is frequent in the oldest work, as in the Domitilla vault, where boys are gathering the grapes, and the art is quite of the Augustan age, and probably executed by Pagan hands. A parallel work in mosaic, of later though still very early date, exists in the church of Sta. Constantia at Rome [VINE]. (Parker, Ancient Mosaics at Rome and Ravenna.) A connexion must always have existed in the Christian mind between the last supper at Jerusalem, the bread and wine, and the last repast of the Lord with His disciples, the bread and fish by the sea of Galilee (John xxi.). And His words on the former occasion cannot have been unconnected with this discourse of Himself the bread of life in St. John vi. 58 &c. But the earlier representations of a memorial banquet seem to point rather to the agape or commemorative repast, than to the breaking of the bread and pouring forth of the wine in commemorative sacrifice. A sense of mystery and treated by M. Raoul Rochette (Mém. de l'Institut. des Inscrip. et Belles Lettres, t. xiii. 775, &c.). They may, he thinks, account for the relics of cups and platters, knife-handles, and egg-shells [see Egg] found in the Christian sepulchres (Boldetti, lib. ii. xiv. tav. 5, 59 and 60, and passim), though there can be no doubt, as he implies, that old Etruscan (or indeed human) custom or instinct, made survivors bury many objects used in life along with their dead.

One of the earliest known representations of the eucharistic offering is that of the mosaic in St. Vitale at Ravenna, dating from the 6th century. (See woodcut.) On one side Abel is represented as standing with hands raised in prayer, clad in cloak and short tunic, and just issued from a house; it is possible that this, with the streaked sky of the mosaic, may indicate a morning or evening sacrifice. At all events the presence of Abel connects the other figure of the priest and king Melchisedech, with the idea of the sacrifice of the lamb, and therein of the death of the Lord. Melchisedech is standing before an oblong altar-table, on which is a chalice and two loaves of bread; his hands are raised in prayer, not in the act of blessing, and he is clad in the peplos or cloak over a long tunic and girdle.

awe, a pious reticence, which appears for the present almost erased from the Christian consciousness, seems to have prevented representation of the Lord's act of typical sacrifice of Himself; as representation of His actual death by crucifixion was also long delayed. [CRUCIFIX.]

The subject of the agape, and the disorders to which they sometimes gave occasion, is admirably

This mosaic is an important illustration of the fundamental principle of Christian symbolic ornament, which appears to have been from the earliest times devoted, as a central object, to displaying the fulfilment of the Old Testament by the New. In the Laurentian MS., A.D. 556, our Lord is represented as administering a small rounded object, evidently bread, to one of eleven standing figures. (See woodcut.)

The frequent introduction of the fish in the various representations of eucharistic repasts, which are found particularly in the Callixtine catacomb, is connected of course with the anagrammatic meaning of the word ixθys, as well as with the miracles of the bread and fish, or the Lord's words in John vi. The connexion of the last repast by the sea of Galilee with the last supper is expressed in the words of Bede, In Joann. xxi. "Piscis assus, greatest antiquity for our Lord, and that it associates itself naturally in the mind with the two miracles, the repast of Tiberias, &c., it should not be forgotten that the anagram is not a scriptural emblem. Our Lord never likened Himself to fish as to bread, and His own use of the fish in parable makes them represent mankind and not Himself. Nevertheless, His act of blessing and breaking the fish on three distinct occasions must always connect them in our minds with the eucharistic banquet.^b (See woodcut.)

From the Cemetery of St. Priscilla.

"Christus passus." It is no part of our duty to pursue it here, except in its frequent illustrations on the walls of St. Callistus. These will be found in De Rossi's Roma Sotterranea, and the author refers them, from the beauty of their execution, to an early period of the 3rd century. It cannot be denied, however, that a certain uncertainty and suspicion of repainting attaches more particularly to this catacomb in the minds of many antiquarians. Nevertheless, if, as Mr. Parker thinks, the most extensive paintings and repaintings took place in the time of St. Paulinus of Nola, a highly respectable antiquity still belongs to these subjects. We have given a woodcut [CANISTER, p. 284], of the most important of these paintings. Its subject is the mystic fish bearing loaves on his back; they are not decussated or crossed, as is most frequently the case where they are represented [ELEMENTS, p. 603], but bear a central mark, which, as Martigny thinks, connects them with Eastern and Jewish offerings of cakes made from first-fruits of corn (called mamphul or Syrian bread). The fish bears them in a basket, which has in it besides another object. This is supposed to represent a vessel of wine, but, as he admits, it is not very easy to decipher in the original, and the lithograph in De Rossi is somewhat of a restoration. What it is like in the actual fresco must be very difficult to determine. But his reference to St. Jerome (Ep. ad Rustic. c. xx.), "Nihil illo ditius qui corpus Domini canistro vimineo, sanguinem portat in vitro," corresponds with great exactness and very impressively with this painting. In any case there can be no doubt whatever that it represents the Lord offering the bread of life to mankind. These paintings are in the crypt named from St. Cornelia; another represents seven persons at a table with bread and fish, with seven baskets of decussated loaves at hand, referring, of course, to the Lord's miraculous reproduction of them. Without disputing the anagrammatic fish as a symbol of the Representations of other events or objects symbolic of the body of the Lord, or anyhow to be connected with Him as the bread of life, have of course a relation to the eucharist. The decussated loaves are offered to Daniel by Habbacuc, on a sarcophagus found near the altar of St. Paul without the walls of Rome (Martigny, Art. Sarcophages, with woodcut), and the author refers to the custom of sending a portion of the eucharist round to imprisoned confessors in time of persecution. The manna and the rock cloven for the life of the people are naturally connected with John vi. 59. [ROCK.] The latter is frequently in bas-relief; the former appears to occur only in one unmistakable example, though those in Bottari, tav. 164, from the cemetery of St. Priscilla, and tav. 57 from the Callistine, are probably connected with it.

The miracle of Cana has been held in art to possess an eucharistic signification, at all events since Giotto's fresco in the Arena chapel at Padua. Ruskin, in Arundel Society's account of that building. But in the earliest examples, very frequent as they are on the bas-reliefs, the Saviour does not raise his hand in the act of blessing, as the artist might be expected to represent him, had he designed to connect the miracle with the last supper. Nor is He so depicted on the tablet of the Duomo at Ravenna (Bandini In trib. eburneam. Florent., 1746), nor on the beautiful silver urceolus supposed by Blanchini (Not. in Anastas. in Vit. St. Urbani) to be of the 4th century. [CANA, MIRACLE OF.]

In treating of representations of the eucharist in Christian art, it is not necessary for our purpose to consider anything beyond their expressed meaning—that is to say, beyond the meaning which the artist or inspirer of the work distinctly meant to convey. The further ideas he may have suggested to fervent imaginations, or to minds predetermined to read meanings of their own into his work, are not his or our affair, though they may often be ingenious and beautiful, and even right and true as matter of spiritual thought. EUCHOLOGION. The most comprehensive and important Service-Book of the Eastern church corresponding to the Western Sacramentarius, and Liber officiorum of the Latins. In its simplest state the Euchologion includes the liturgies of Chrysostom and Basil, and that of the Presanctified, which for no very certain reason bears the name of Gregory the Great. To these are usually added the offices of administration of the other sacraments and other forms of prayer, and benedictions. It cannot be affirmed with any certainty that the present Euchologion existed previous to A.D. 800, though the Eastern church cannot fail to have had an office book, or books more or less corresponding to it. The edition of the Euchologion with learned notes by James Goar, Paris, 1645, frequently reprinted, is the standard authority on the subject. EULOGETARIA (Εὐλογητάρια) are certain antiphons occurring in the Greek Morning Office, so called from the frequent repetition in them of the words εὐλόγητος εἰ, Κύριε. (Daniel, Codex Lit. 304, 703; Neale, Eastern Church, introd. 919). [C.]

EULOGIAE in an eucharistic sense.

(1) Eulogia was used down to the middle of the 5th century as synonymous with εὐχαριστία for the sacrament of the Lord's Supper. This signification was naturally derived from St. Paul's words, τὸ ποτήριον τῆς εὐλογίας ὃ εὐλογοῦμεν (1 Cor. x. 16). In commenting on this passage Chrysostom's language shows that the word was beginning to be used in this restricted sense, εὐλογία ὅταν εἴπω πάντα ἀνατίσσω τὸν τῆς εὐεργεσίας τοῦ Θεοῦ ὅσον αὐτῶν, κ.τ.λ. (Chrys. Homil. xxiv. in 1 Cor. x. 16), in which it is of constant occurrence in the writings of Cyril of Alexandria, sometimes by itself (Lib. iv. c. 2 in Joanna, vi. p. 260; ib. 364; Catech. ad Joann. iii. 27, p. 343, &c.); sometimes with a qualifying epithet, μυστικὴ εὐλογία (lib. Glaphyr. in Levit. pp. 351, 367; in Deut. p. 414; de Adorat. lib. ii. p. 80); εὐλ. πνευματικὴ (ib. lib. vi. p. 177); εὐλ. ζωοποιος (ib. lib. vii. p. 231). To this we may add "tunc eulogia, non alogia celebratur" (Aug. Ep. 68 Casul. presb.).

(2) Eulogia then came to be used specifically for that portion of the eucharist, ἡ εὐχαρισθεῖσα τροφή (Just. Mart. Apol. § 67), which was conveyed in the primitive church by the hands of the deacons to those who were absent as well as for that sent by the bishops, notably those of Rome, to their daughter churches, and to foreign bishops and churches, as a symbol of Christian love and brotherhood. Irenaeus is the earliest authority for this practice, which he speaks of as long established. In his letter to Victor bishop of Rome, at the end of the 2nd century, in which he entreats him not to make a difference as to the time of the celebration of Easter a ground for breach of communion, he refers to the example of his predecessors, who, notwithstanding this difference, were in the habit of sending the eucharist to the presbyters of other dioceses who observed the Oriental rule (Iren. apud Euseb. H. E. v. 24). With the increased reverence for the material eucharist this practice dropt into disfavour, and was distinctly forbidden by the 14th canon of the council of Laodicea, A.D. 365. This canon prohibits "the sending of the holy things into other dioceses, at the feast of Easter, by way of eulogiae" (eis λόγους ἐὺλογίας). Easter seems to be specially mentioned as the chief period for this interchange of pledges of communion, the prohibition itself being general. The 32nd canon of the same council, which forbids the reception of the eulogiae of heretics, which is also prohibited by the second council of Braga, A.D. 572, probably refers to the eulogiae of unconsecrated, but blessed bread (see below).

Forbidden in the East, the practice lingered considerably longer in the West. Sirmond, indeed, the learned Jesuit, affirms that the custom of sending the eucharist round to other churches and congregations arose subsequently to the times of Cyprian and Tertullian, since in their writings there is no allusion to it, and all Christians who were present at divine service had the opportunity of communicating, and were bound to avail themselves of it, and that the eulogiae distributed consisted of bread blessed but not consecrated (de Azymo, iv. 527 sq.). But the passages adduced cannot be satisfactorily interpreted on any other hypothesis. Suicer undoubtedly states the case correctly when he says, "εὐλόγια istae quae mittebantur per paroecias ipsissimae erant Eucharistiae sive panis εὐχαριστήτος, ex quo communicatio data fuerat praesentibus, particulae, quae absentibus Presbyteris per paroecias Dioecesis mittebantur. Sic enim perfecta ex eodem pane sanctificato communicatio inter omnes illas paroecias unius dioecesis institui videbatur" (Thes. sub voc. εὐλόγια). After the church had been invaded by heresy, the eucharist was distributed to the orthodox presbyters by the bishop as a pledge of their adhesion to the true faith, as is shewn by the ordinances relating to the fermentum of Melchisedech, A.D. 311, and Siricius, A.D. 385. The letter of Innocent I. to Decentius, c. 410, informing him of the custom of sending the "fermentum" to the presbyters of the "tituli," on Sundays as a token of communion, and expressing his disapprobation of carrying the leaven through a whole diocese, "quia nec longe portanda sunt sacramenta," illustrates the same practice [FERMENTUM]. A practice very nearly allied to this of which we have seen speaking, was that which prevailed among the faithful in the first ages of the church, of carrying home themselves and transmitting to others a portion of the consecrated bread to be consumed hereafter. Thus Tertullian speaks of Christian women being accustomed "secretly before all other food" to partake of the eucharist (Tert. ad Uxor. ii. 5), and answers the objection of some against receiving the eucharist on a day of abstinence lest they should break their fast, by the suggestion that they could "take the body of the Lord and reserve it till the fast was over" (id. de Orat. 19). Cyprian tells of a woman who had lapsed being terrified by the sudden outburst of flame when she opened her chest [ARCA] in which "the holy thing of the Lord" (Domini sanctum) was kept (Cyp. de Lapsis, p. 132). Satyrus, the brother of Ambrose, when fearing to be lost by shipwreck obtained "that divine sacrament of the faithful" from some of his fellow-passengers (Ambros. de Obiit. Fratris, iii. 19). Gregory Nazianzen speaks of his sister Gorgonia "treasuring up with her hand the antitypes of the precious Body and Blood" (Greg. Naz. Orat. xi. p. 187). We learn from Basil that it was the almost universal custom at Alexandria and in Egypt for the laity to have "the communion" in their houses; that solitaries did the same, where there was no priest near; and that it was generally customary in times of persecution (Basil, Epist. 93). Jerome speaks of some who scrupled to receive the eucharist at church, but were not afraid to take it at home (Hieron. Epist. ad Pammach.), and of those who "carried the Lord's Body in a wicker basket and His Blood in a glass vessel" (id. Epist. ad Rusticum, 95). But universal as this practice seems to have been, its natural tendency to degenerate into irreverence and superstition gave rise to evils which led the church to discountenance and ultimately to suppress it. There is no trace of its general observance after the 4th century (Scudamore, Notitia Eucharistica, p. 793).

(3) With the cessation of the practice of sending the consecrated eucharist to persons who were not present grew up as a substitute that of distributing the unconsecrated remains of the oblations among those who had not received under the name of eulogia, or in still later times of antidoron or substitute for the δῶρον, or eucharist proper. According to the rule laid down in the Apostolical Constitutions (lib. viii. c. 31) these remains (τὰς περισσεύσας ἐν τοῖς μυστικοῖς εὐλογίας), were distributed by the deacons, at the pleasure of the bishops or presbyters, to the clergy in proportion to their rank. The rule prescribed by Theophilus bishop of Alexandria, A.D. 385, permits "the faithful brethren" to share them with the clergy, but prohibits a catechumen to partake of them. That the catechumens, however, in the time of Augustine partook of some kind of sacrament is plain from his words (de Peccator. Meritis, ii. 26), "quod acceperunt (catechumeni) quamvis non sit corpus Christi, sanctum tamen est et sanctius quam cibi quibus alimur, quoniam sacramentum est." As the first love of the church grew cold and non-communicating attendance became common, the unconsecrated remains began to be regularly distributed among those who had not received, that they might not depart without a semblance of a blessing. The Greek names for this practice, εὐλόγια, antidoron, sufficiently indicate where it originated. The word occurs in Sozomen's account of Chrysanthus, the bishop of the Novatians at Constantinople in the 5th century, who declined to receive anything from his churches but "two loaves of the eulogiae every Lord's Day," δὺς ἑκατὸς εὐλογίων (Socr. H. E. vii. 12). In the liturgies of Chrysostom and Basil the distribution of the antidoron by the priest is prescribed—μετὰ τῆς εὐχῆς ἐξέρχεται ὁ ἱερεὺς καὶ οὐδὲν ἐν τῇ αὐτῇ τράπεζῃ δίδωσι τὸ ἀντιδωρον (Goar, Eucholog. 85, § 190). But this is evidently an addition of late though uncertain date. Balsamon deduces it from a desire to evade the force of the threat of the second canon of Antioch against non-communicating attendance, so that even those who were not able to receive the undefiled mysteries might take the eulogia of the hallowed fragment from the hand of the celebrant. But if its original be Greek, the earliest certain notice of it is found in Latin writers, and not earlier than the 9th century. The decree of Pius I. A.D. 156 (Labbe, i. 578), which prescribes it, is an undoubted forgery, as is acknowledged by Card. Bona (Rev. Liturg. lib. i. cap. 23). This decree appears nearly verbatim both in the Capitula of Hincmar, A.D. 853, c. 7 and c. 16 (Labbe, viii. 570), and in the canons of Nantes, c. A.D. 896 (Labbe, ix. 470, canon ix.). It runs: "ut de oblationibus quae offeruntur a populo et consecrationis superfluum, vel de panibus quos deferunt fideles ad Ecclesiam, vel certe de suis, Presbyter convenientes partes incisas habeat in vase nitido et convenienti, et post missarum solemnia qui communicare non fuerint parati: Eulogias omni die Dominico, et in omnibus festis exinde accipiant, quae cum benedictione prius faciat." This canon prescribes a form of prayer to be used in the benediction (c. 7). Leo IV. (847-855) also commanded that "the eulogiae be distributed to the people after the Masses on Feastsdays" (Labbe, viii. 37). We should be transgressing our assigned limits still further if we traced the custom any later.*

(4) When the custom of sending the suchariat to one another as a symbol of Christian communion had ceased among Christians, the practice arose of distributing cakes of bread, which had received a special benediction, as a token of mutual love. We have a reference to this practice in the writings of St. Gregory Nazianzen (Orat. xix. p. 306) when relating a dream of his sister Gorgonia when sick. "She thought that I . . . suddenly stood by her in the night with a basket and loaves of the purest flour, and having prayed over them and signed them as our wont is, fed her." During the disputes which succeeded the council of Ephesus, the bishops and presbyters of Cilicia and Isauria sent Eulogias to John of Antioch, in token of communion (Baluz., Nov. Coll. Concil. 867). The writings of Paulinus, bishop of Nola, contain many notices of these eulogiae, sometimes under the name of benedictiones, which were interchanged between him and Augustine and others. The latter writes to Paulinus, "the bread we have sent will become a richer blessing, for the love of your benignity in accepting it" (Aug. Epist. xxiiv.). The compliment is returned by Paulinus. "The single loaf which we have sent to your charity, as a token of unanimity, we beg that you will bless (sc. make a true eulogia) by accepting it" (Paulin. Epist.

iv. p. 16). Paulinus also sends a trifled loaf to Alpius, "panem unum . . . in quo Trinitatis soliditas continetur," which he will turn into a eulogia by his kindness in receiving it, (ib. iii. p. 12). He sends five loaves to Romanus and Licius (ib. vii. p. 27). To Severus he sends "a Campanian loaf from his cell," a eulogia, "together with a boxwood casket, and begs him, as before, by accepting the loaf in the name of the Lord to convert it into a eulogia" (ib. v. § 21, p. 30). The large number of stories in Gregory of Tours in which the expressions eulogias accipere, dare, flagitare, ministrare, petere, porrigere, postulare, &c. occur, prove how common the practice was as a token of Christian communion and a symbol of episcopal benediction in the 6th century (Greg. Turon. Hist. iv. 18 v. 14, 20; x. 16; de Glor. Confess. 31). From some of these passages we learn that to drink a cup of wine, and to partake of a morsel of bread blessed by him in a bishop's house was considered equivalent to receiving his benediction, (see also) (id. Hist. vi. 51; viii. 2). Duclange (supra) affords a very large number of later references. Forms of litterae salutatoriae to accompany eulogiae sent by a bishop to a king or to another bishop, and of acknowledgment, are contained in the Exemplaria of Marculfus, lib. ii. 42, 44, 45, 46.

(5) This was not the only form which eulogiae assumed. We have seen Paulinus sending a wooden box as a eulogia. The presents sent by Cyril of Alexandria to Pulcheria and the ladies of the court to induce them to forward his interests in his disputes with John of Antioch and the Oriental bishops were delicately described as " blessings," "eulogiae." This use of the word is borrowed from Holy Scripture, where a gift is not unfrequently styled a blessing, in the LXX. εὐλογία; see Jud. i. 15; 1 Sam. xiv. 27; xxx. 26; 2 Kin. v. 15; 2 Cor. ix. 5; Rom. xv. 29. We find Gregory the Great using this term of some relics of saints ("eulogias S. Marci") sent him by Eulogius, patriarch of Alexandria; and " benedictio" of a small cross [ENCOPLION], containing some filings of the apostles' chains (Greg. Mag. Epist. lib. xiii. ep. 42). Some of Augustine's opuscula were brought to the abbot Valentinus under this title (August. Ep. 256). Even sweetmeats, nuts, and dry figs were included under this title, when blessed by the sender. Some curious stories illustrative of the custom are recorded in the Vitae Patrum. Thus some bellaria (sweetmeats) brought to the monastery where Valens was a monk by some guest and distributed by the abbot Macarius to each cell, were indignantly rejected by Valens, who beat the bearer and sent him back with the message, "Go and tell Macarius that I am as good as he. What right then has he to send me a benediction?" (Pallad. Hist. Laus. c. 31). They were withheld from those who were under excommunication, and excommunicated bishops were forbidden to send them to others (Greg. Turon. Hist. viii. c. 20). Thus the abbot Arsenius took umbrage at some dry figs not being sent him, and regarding himself as excommunicated refused to attend divine service with his brethren until the ban was taken off (de Vit. Patr. lib. v. Migne, lxxiii. p. 953). The eulogia was refused to the king Merwig, who had apostatized (Greg. Turon. Hist. v. 14). (Bingham, Orig. Eccl. xv.

* Those who wish to follow up this practice to more modern times will find the materials in Scudamore's Nobilia Eucharistica, ch. xvi. § 2, pp. 774-780.

(6) Eulogiae in monasteries. In the Benedictine rule monks are forbidden to receive "litteras, eulogias, vel quaelibet munuscula" without the abbat's leave (Reg. Bened. c. 54, cf. Reg. Donat. c. 53). Here probably the word is used in its widest sense, for any offering or token of esteem (Martene ad loc. citing Reg. Comment.), or, more particularly, for bread sent with a blessing. See (4) and (5) above.

In some monasteries, e. g. that of Fulda (Mabill. Ann. O.S.B. Praef. Saec. III. vii.), eulogiae were distributed daily to the monks, who had not already received, in the refectory before their meal; in others this was done only on Sundays and holy-days (cf. Reg. Bened. Comment. c. 54). In the life of Eligius, in the 7th century, it is related that he used to beg these "eulogiae" or pieces of blessed bread from the monks of Solignac (Mabill. Ann. O.S.B. XII. xxii.). When the abbess who succeeded Rade-gunde in the convent of Ste. Croix at Poitiers was accused of feasting she replied that the alleged feasting was only the partaking of the "eulogiae" (Ib. VII. liii. 589 A.D.). "Eulogiae," in this sense, were sometimes given by a bishop to an excommunicated person in token of reconciliation (Ib. III. 1.) The other spelling, "eulogium," is condemned by Menard (Conc. Regul. Bened. Anian. c. 61). [I. G. S.]

EUNUCHS, not to be ordained. The feeling that one devoted to the sacred ministry should be un mutilated was strong in the ancient church. Hence, the council of Nicea (c. 1) enacted that if any one, being in health (ὕγιανον) dismembered himself, after ordination, he should be deposed from the ministry, or, being a layman, he should not be admitted to Holy Orders; and in the Apostolical Canons (c. 21) the reason for such exclusion is added, viz., that the offender is a self-murderer (αὐτοφονεύτης ἑαυτοῦ) and an enemy of the workmanship of God. These canons, and a later one in the 2nd council of Arles (c. 7), were aimed against that perverted notion of piety, originating in the misinterpretation of our Lord's saying (Matt. xix. 12), by which Origen, among others, was misled, and their observance was so carefully enforced in later times, that not more than one or two instances of the practice which they condemn are noticed by the historian. The case was different if a man was born a eunuch, or had suffered mutilation at the hands of persecutors: an instance of the former, Dorotheus, presbyter of Antioch, is mentioned by Eusebius (H. E. vii. c. 32); of the latter, Tigris, presbyter of Constantinople, is referred to both by Socrates (H. E. vi. 15) and Sozomen (H. E. vi. 24) as the victim of a barbarian master (Bingham, Antiq. iv. iii. 9). [D. B.]

EVANGELIARIUM, EVANGELISTARIUM (Εὐαγγελιστήριον), the book containing the passages of the gospels to be read in the liturgy. [GOSPEL: LITURGICAL BOOKS.] [C.]

EVANGELIARY. [LITURGICAL BOOKS.]

EVANGELIST. The deacon is called "Evangelist" in his capacity of reader of the gospel in the liturgy of Chrysostom (c. 19, p. 347, Daniel) the deacon prays the priest, "Bless, sir, the evangelist (εὐαγγελιστὴν) of the holy apostle and gospel." [C.]

EVANGELISTS. The Four Evangelists are commemorated Oct. 19 (Cal. Armen.). [C.]

EVANGELISTS, symbolic representations of. We find from Airinghi (ii. 285) that the four symbolic creatures are (as might be expected) not the original emblems of the four evangelists. The FOUR RIVERS of paradise are perhaps intended to represent the gospel, and the distinct channels of its diffusion throughout the world (Gen. ii.). These are found in some of the earliest specimens of unquestionably authentic Christian decoration, as in the Lateran cross [Cross, p. 496], where the lamb and stag are introduced. The four books or rolls are also found in early work, Ciampini (V. M. i. 67 tab.; Buonarrotti, xiv. 2). In some instances, as in the baptism of our Lord in the cemetery of St. Pontianus (Airinghi, 275, 2, also at end of Bottari), the animals are introduced drinking in the Jordan. In this case, either the mystic river is identified with the four rivers of paradise, and made to accompany the ornamented cross below, representing the gospel, as in the Lateran cross (see s. v.), or the cross in St. Pontianus, below the baptism-picture, represents the Lord's death and baptism therein. Mr. Parker gives an admirably clear photograph of the present condition of this important work, which he dates from A.D. 772. The Lateran relic is supposed to be similar to the crosses of the time of Constantine.

The adoption of the four creatures of the Apocalypse (iv. 6) as images of the evangelists, does not seem to have taken place generally, or is not recorded on Christian monuments, before the 5th century. It involves, of course, a peculiarly impressive connexion between the beginning of the visions of Ezekiel, and the unveiling of heaven to the eyes of St. John. This is unmistakable; although in the prophet's vision the living creatures were not only four in number, but each was fourfold in shape. "They four had the face of a man, and the face of a lion, on the right side; and they four had the face of an ox on the left side; they four also had the face of an eagle." While in the Apocalypse, "The first beast was like a lion, the second like a calf, the third had the face of a man, and the fourth beast was like a flying eagle." This connexion is said by Mrs. Jamieson, (Sacred and Legendary Art, 79) to have been noticed as early as the 2nd century, though no representations are found till the 5th. Nor was it till long after the four creatures had been taken as prefiguring the four evangelists, that a special application was made of each symbol to each writer. This may be referred to St. Jerome on Ezekiel i. St. Matthew has the man, as beginning his gospel with the Lord's human genealogy: St. Mark the lion, as testifying the Lord's royal dignity, or as containing the terrible condemnation of unbelievers at the end of his gospel: St. Luke the ox, as he dwells on the priesthood and sacrifice of Christ: St. John the eagle, as contemplating the Lord's divine nature. Ingenuity and devotion have done their utmost on this subject for centuries with little result. An ivory diptych of the 5th century, given by Bugati (Memorie di S. Celso in fin.) is the earliest known representation of this emblem, which does not occur in the glass devices recorded by Garrucci or Buonarrotti. The well-known representation of the four creature-symbols in the great mosaic of the church of St. Pudenziana at Rome, must we think be left out of reckoning altogether as an historic document. (See Mr. J. E. Parker's photographs, and the articles thereon in his Antiquities of Rome, by the author of the present paper; also Messrs. Crowe and Cavalcaselle's Early Italian Art, vol. i. chap. i.) The symbols are placed above a 7th century cross, and on close inspection of the photographs, appear to have been repaired in fresco, or by painting of some kind. The appearance of the whole mosaic in fact is that of a quantity of material of different ages, some doubtless very ancient and of great merit, combined as a whole

by a painter and mosaicist of the greatest skill and power in the 16th century. However, the use of the quadruple symbols is universal, in east and west, and throughout the Christian world, in every kind of situation, and by use of all vehicles and methods. They are very frequently placed on crosses of the 7th century, about the same time as that in which the change took place from the lamb at the intersection of the limbs of the cross to the human form crucified. They occur on the cross of Velitrae, and on some ancient German crosses mentioned under CRUCIFIX, as the station cross of Planig, &c. But the most interesting 6th century representation of them known to us is the quaintly but most grandly-conceived tetramorph of the Rabula MS., which represents the Lord at the ascension, mounting a chariot of many wings and cherubic form. It shows that the Syrian miniaturist had a most vivid imagination, and the highest power of realising his conceptions, as appears in so many parts of that extraordinary work. The wheels of the chariot, as well as the cherubic forms, connect the vision of Ezekiel with the griffins of Lombard Church-art as at Verona. Mrs. Jameson gives a very interesting tetramorph or cherubic form bearing the evangelic symbols, from a Greek mosaic. This symbol is certainly not of the age of the earlier catacomb paintings, and occurs first with frequency in the tessellated apses and tribunes of Byzantine churches, and is of course specially worthy of note as explaining the connexion between the vision of Ezekiel and that of St. John. The four animals separately represented occur passim, both in Eastern and Western Church-work. (See Ciampini, Vet. Mon. i. tab. 48.) There are grand examples in the spandrels of the dome of Galla Placidia's chapel in Ravenna, as in St. Apollinaris in Classe, and particularly in the chapel of St. Satyrus at Milan. [For a singular specimen of Carolingian grotesques of them see MINIATURE.] (The woodcuts, p. 633, are from the latter.) The eagle given below is taken from the Evangelary of Louis le Debonnaire; but the Hours of that emperor and the MS. of St. Medard of Soissons, also contain whole page emblems of the four evangelists.

In St. Vitale at Ravenna the symbols of the evangelists accompany their sitting figures. St. Matthew has the man, St. Mark the (wingless) lion; the calf, also wingless, belongs to St. Luke, and the eagle to St. John. The nimbus is sometimes added, and sometimes the creatures bear the rolls or books of the gospel (Ciampini, V. M. II. xv; in St. Cosmas and Damian. See also ibid. II. xxiv. for St. Apollinaris in Classe, temp. Felix IV. about 530).

There is a very strange missal painting referred to by Martigny, where the human forms of the evangelists in apostolic robes are surmounted by the heads of the creatures. This occurs also, he says, in an ancient church of Aquileia (Bartoli, Le Antichità di Aquileia, 404). Two examples are given in woodcut by Mrs. Jameson, Sacred and Legendary Art, 83. One is by Fra Angelico, and the hands, feet, and drapery of the other, which is not dated, seem too skilfully done to be of early date.

But the four creatures occur alike in bas-reliefs on altars, on sacred vessels and vestments, and even on bronze medals. See Paciaudi de Cultu S. Joann. Bapt. p. 163, for a bronze coin with the man and the eagle on one side, the lion and calf on the other, lettered respectively NAΘEOC (sic), IOHANNIS, NAPOC, LYCAS. Nothing is known of the history of this relic. It may be supposed that where the Lord is surrounded by saints and apostles the bearers of books are intended for the evangelists, especially if they are four in number, though on the sarcophagus in Bottari cxxxi. t. only three are represented, probably St. Matthew and St. John, with St. Mark as companion and interpreter of St. Peter. Four figures in the baptistery at Ravenna holding books, and placed in niches of mosaic arabesques, are considered of doubtful meaning by Ciampini (V. M. i. tab. 72); but Martigny is perfectly satisfied that the evangelists are intended by them (Martigny, Dictionnaire a. v. Evangelistes). [R. St. J. T.]

EVE. [VIGIL.]

EVENING HYMN. In the vespers of the Eastern church, after certain fixed psalms, concluding with Ps. cxliii., expressive of intense expectation, followed by the "Entrance," so called, of the Gospels considered as enshrining Christ Himself, with an exhortation to the acknowledgment and hearing of Him as there present ("Wisdom, stand up")—the Evening Hymn is appropriately sung; the triumphant "Hymn of the Evening Light," at once giving thanks for the gift of artificial light, and praising the true "Light that shineth in darkness, in Whom is Life, and the Life is the Light of men"—hence called by St. Basil ἐπιλύχνος εὐχαριστία. "Joyful Light of the holy glory of the immortal Father, the heavenly, the holy, the blessed Jesu Christ, we having come to the Setting of the Sun and beholding the Evening light, praise God, Father, Son, and Holy Ghost. It is meet at all times that Thou shouldst be hymned with auspicious voices, Son of God, Giver of Life: wherefore the world glorifieth thee."

There is reference to the "Evening Psalm"

(τὸν ἐπιλόχριον ψαλμὸν; i. e. Ps. cxli.) in the Apostolical Constitutions, which may be considered to represent the Eastern system of the 3rd or 4th century (lib. viii. c. 35).

So in the West, Hilary (in Ps. lxiv.) writes—
 "The day is begun with prayers, and the day is closed with hymns to God."

EVENTIUS, presbyter and martyr at Rome with Alexander the pope and Theodulus the presbyter, under Trajan; commemorated May 3 (Mart. Bedne, Mart. Rom. Vet., Hieron., Adonis, Usuardi, Cal. Frontonis). [W. F. G.]

EVIGILATOR (Ἀφυσιαστής), an officer in Greek monasteries whose duty it was to waken the monks for nocturnal and matutinal services. Another officer of the kind was the "excitator," who had to waken a monk asleep in church (Ducange, Gloss. Lat. et Gr. s. vv.). [I. G. S.]

EVILASIUS, martyr at Cyzicus with Fausta the Virgin, under Maximian; commemorated Sept. 20 (Mart. Rom. Vet. Bedae, Adonis, Usuardi).

EVIL SPIRITS. [DEMON: DEMONIACS:
EXORCISM.]

EVODIUS. (1) Martyr at Syracuse, with Hermogenes; commemorated April 25 (Mart. Usuardi).

(2) Bishop, and martyr at Antioch; commemorated May 6 (Mart. Rom. Vet., Adonis, Usuardi).

(3) Martyr at Nicaea, with Theodota his mother and her two other children, under Diocletian; commemorated Aug. 2 (Ib., Mart. Bedae).

EVOVAE is an artificial word made out of the vowels in the words "seculorum Amen," which occur at the end of the Gloria Patri. Its object was to serve as a kind of memoria technica to enable singers to render the several Gregorian chants properly; each letter in Evovae standing for the syllable from which it is extracted. It must be borne in mind that psalms, &c., were sung under antiphons, and that the music of the antiphon, being constructed in a particular 'mode' or 'scale,' such as Dorian, Phrygian, and the like, the chant or 'tone' (i. q. 'tune') to the psalm, being not intended to represent a full stop or close, might (and usually did) not end on the final belonging to the mode, leaving that for the concluding antiphon: thus different forms of the same mode or tone would arise, and these were called Evovae and sometimes differentiæ, finitiones, conclusiones, and species seculorum. This only applies to the latter half (cadence) of the chant, as in the 'mediation' (at the middle of the verse of a psalm) scarcely any variety was admitted, except such as arose from local use. Thus in the various works on the subject, and in service books, varieties of endings are to be found of greater or less antiquity. Gerbert mentions the fact that in some cases the peculiar distinctive marks of the tones had become confused, notably in the 1st and 6th; and the only possible distinction would seem to be in the assignment of accents. It does not appear however that accent, in the modern musical sense of the word, was recognised to any extent by the ancients, ACCENTUS being equivalent to what we should now call infection. [ACCENTUS ECCLESIASTICUS.] For the first few centuries of the Christian era rhythm was regulated by quantity, which gradually gave place to accent; and it seems to the writer that musical accentuation remained in a very uncertain state until the 17th century. Still the Evovæ must be regarded as containing the germ of the present accepted views respecting accent, as may be seen by comparing the following forms.

(1) Full form of the 1st tone, which is in the Dorian mode; the dominant or reciting note being a, and the final note D.

Sic - ut erat in principio, et nunc, et sem - per:

et in secula seculorum. Amen. . . .

This ending would be written thus:

E V O V A E

The accents are supplied by the writer. Before the invention of notes the same would be expressed thus:

a a G F G a G F E D
E V O V A E

(2) A shortened form of the 1st tone, which does not end on the proper final D, leaving that correct cadence to be supplied by the antiphon.

Sic - ut erat in principio, et nunc, et sem - per :

et in secula secu - lo - rum. A - men.

The accents are as before, and the Evovae thus :

E V O V A E

(3) Sixth tone, in the Hypolydian mode; dominant a, final F.

Sic - ut erat in principio, et nunc, et sem - per :

et in secula secu - lo - rum. A - men.

The Ervæe would be expressed thus (accents being supplied):

E V O V A B

Any one acquainted with music can see how nearly identical, so far as notes are concerned, these two last forms are, and that the only difference of character they can assume is by reason of different accentuation.

From the uncertainty of accent already mentioned, it will easily be seen that in different cases the same tone, and the same ending of it, would receive different accentuations according to the feeling of the compiler of the Psalter of the church in question; and this gives authority for the different versions that will be found in the modern books of Gregorian tones which are very accessible, and to which the reader is referred, as for example the following ending of the sixth tone (the one most commonly heard) compared with the one given above:

ever (Ep. 181), speaks of an examination conducted by presbyters and deacons, and then referred to the chorepiscopi. The canon too of Theophilus, already quoted, mentions the orthodox clergy of the district as having the right of examination in certain cases. Thomassin (Vet. et Nov. Eccl. Discip. ii. 1, c. 32, § 11-12), thinks it probable that the task of examining candidates was delegated in the first place to the cathedral clergy, and afterwards, in the provinces, to the priests and deacons.

The examination in these cases appears to have been chiefly an enquiry into the moral character and general fitness of the candidates. The fourth council of Carthage (c. 1), directs that every bishop should be examined before ordination, as to his personal qualities, such as prudence, morality, and learning, both profane and sacred, and also as to his holding the right faith as contained in the creeds. It is not said by whom the examination was to be conducted. The council of Narbonne (c. 11), forbids any bishop to ordain either a priest or deacon who is utterly unlearned. This appears to imply a previous examination into literary as well as moral qualifications. [P. O.]

EXARCH. Generically the word "Ἐπαρχος" is applied to any one who takes the lead. Hence it is used of one who is chief in any department or undertaking. So Plutarch in his life of Numa has "Ἐπαρχος τῶν ἱερῶν" in the sense of sacrorum princeps, or summus pontifex.^a In its specific ecclesiastical application it has more than one sense.

1. It is perhaps most commonly and most strictly applied to the great prelates who presided over the 'dioceses' (Διοικήσεις, see DIOCESE), as they were called, which were formed in imitation of the civil dioceses of Constantine. Each of these 'dioceses' comprehended several 'provinces' (ἐπαρχίαι), and the metropolitans of these latter were subordinated to the exarchs of the former. The 9th and 17th canons of the council of Chalcedon recognise, or give,^b a right of appeal from the decision of the metropolitan to the exarch. The word therefore became nearly synonymous with patriarch. Accordingly, in the Novels of Justinian, when imperial sanction is given to the principle expressed in the canons of Chalcedon, the word exarch is turned into patriarch.^c Yet though every patriarch had the power of an exarch, every exarch was not, properly speaking, a patriarch, the latter name being given only to the heads of the more eminent dioceses. Thus in the 'Notitia' given in Bingham, book ix. ch. 1, § 6, which seems to represent the state of things at the end of the 4th century, we find the patriarchs of Antioch and Alexandria, but the exarchs of Asia, Pontus, Thrace, Macedonia, Dacia, and others.^d [NOTITIA.]

^b "Utrum omnes exarchi hanc potestatem ante hoc concilium exercuerint necne, incertum est: Hoc tamen certum, eam ab hoc concilio illis primò confirmatam esse." Beveridge, Pandect. Annot. in Canon. Concil. Chalced. p. 115.

^c "Si vero contra metropolitanum talis addito fiat ab episcopo, aut clero, aut aliâ quâcumque personâ, diocesanos illius beatissimus patriarcha simili modo causam judicet."—Novel 123, c. 22.

^d Beveridge thinks that Balsamon and Morinus are in error in speaking of a kind of metropolitans set over whole dioceses, and yet not patriarchs. May they not have meant such as the exarchs of Asia and Pontus? (See Bev. Pandect. Can. Annot. in Conc. Chalced. p. 121.) Valens (Obs. on Socrates' Hist. Eccles. lib. 3, cap. 9) calls these exarchs "minores patriarchas," and says "Patriarchae nomen interdum usurpant."

2. The word is also sometimes used in reference to metropolitans. For we find the phrase exarch of the province (Ἐπαρχος τῆς ἐπαρχίας) as well as exarch of the diocese (Ἐπαρχος τῆς διοικήσεως). It is used, for instance, in the 6th canon of the council of Sardica, where the sense seems beyond doubt.^e But the word is here probably used in its general sense of chief, rather than in any technical signification.

3. In later times the name exarch was also applied to certain legates of the patriarch of Constantinople, who appear to have been charged by him with the general maintenance of his rights and authority, and also entrusted with the visitation of monasteries subject to him. The name is also given to ecclesiastics deputed by him to collect the tribute payable by him to the Turkish government. These legates appear to have had large powers, and might even excommunicate, depose, or absolve in the name of the patriarch. (See Beveridge, Pandectae Canonum, Annotations on the Canons of Chalcedon, pp. 120, 121.)

EXCAECATIO. To deprive of sight was not a mode of punishment sanctioned by the Benedictine rules. But in the 8th century some abbats had recourse to this barbarity in the case of contumacious monks. It was forbidden by Charles the Great (Capitul. A.D. 789, c. 16) and by the council of Frankfort (A.D. 794, c. 18); and abbats were strictly ordered to confine themselves to the infliction of punishments prescribed in their rule (cf. Reg. Bened. Comment. c. 25; Mabillon, Ann. Ord. Bened. Saec. IV. Praef. i. 139). [I. G. S.]

EXCEPTOR. (1) The word excipere was used in later Latinity to express the "taking-down" of a person's words. Thus Augustine (Epist. 110), "a notariis ecclesiae excipiuntur quae dicimus." Hence a reporter of judicial acts and sentences—as in the case of Christian martyrs—was called exceptor. A gloss on Prudentius (apud Ducange) speaks of "exceptores" who took down the dicta of the judge and the answers of the martyr. Compare NOTARY. (Ducange's Gloss. s. v.; Bingham's Antiq. III. xiii. 5.)

(2) The word is occasionally used as equivalent to ἀνδραγωγός [SPONSOR], for which "exceptor" is more commonly employed. [C.]

EXCLUSION FROM COMMUNION. [COMMUNION, HOLY: EXCOMMUNICATION.]

EXCLUSIVA designates, in modern times, the right claimed by certain Roman Catholic error in speaking of a kind of metropolitans set over whole dioceses, and yet not patriarchs. May they not have meant such as the exarchs of Asia and Pontus? (See Bev. Pandect. Can. Annot. in Conc. Chalced. p. 121.) Valens (Obs. on Socrates' Hist. Eccles. lib. 3, cap. 9) calls these exarchs "minores patriarchas," and says "Patriarchae nomen interdum usurpant."

The present form of this right is of course modern, and arises from the political circumstances of the age in Europe; but traces of the very decided influence exerted by princes in restraining the liberty of papal elections are found at a comparatively early date. The emperor Honorius, for instance, in the case of the double election and consecration of Eulalius and Boniface, decided (A.D. 418) in favour of Eulalius, afterwards drove him from the city, and (A.D. 419) ordered the installation of Boniface (Auctarium Symmachianum, Epiat. 19-31; Baronius, an. 419, §§ 2 and 11, etc.). The same emperor, at the request of Boniface, made an ordinance that for the future, in case two candidates disputed the papal chair, neither should be pope but a fresh election should be held (Corpus Juris Canon. Dist. xcvi., cc. 1 and 2; Hardouin, Concil. i. 1237). Nor was the influence of the temporal power diminished when Germans ruled in Italy. Odoacer (A.D. 483) desired that no papal election should take place without his concurrence (sine nostris consultatione), and little heed was paid by subsequent princes to the canon of a Roman synod under pope Symmachus (A.D. 502) condemning such interference of the secular arm (Hardouin, ii. 877; C. J. C. Dist. xcvi. c. 1, § 7). Theodoric repeated the enactment of Odoacer. On the reconquest of Italy under Justinian the confirmation of the papal election fell into the hands of the emperors, who exacted considerable sums in consideration of it, until the fee was given up by Constantine Pogonatus in the year 678 (Liber Pontif., in Agatho; C. J. C. Dist. lxxiii. c. 21). Somewhat later, in the case of Benedict II. (A.D. 684) the claim to confirm the pope was also resigned by the same emperor. This, however, led to so much disorder, that it was found necessary again to invoke the co-operation of the civil power; and the fact of the necessity of the emperor's concurrence is recognised in the Liber Dignus Pontif. Rom. (c. ii. lib. 3; see also Garnier's Dissertation in his edition of the Lib. Dign.), probably of the end of the seventh or the beginning of the eighth century. The necessity for the confirmation of the emperor continued when the Frankish chiefs acquired the imperial dignity. Compare POPE. (Jacobson in Herzog's Real-Encyclop. iv. 280.) [C.]

EXCOMMUNICATION (Abstentio, Anathema, Excommunicatio, ἀνάθεμα, ἀποκρίσις). The partial or total, temporary or perpetual, exclusion of a member from the privileges of the church.

I. ORDINARY EXCOMMUNICATION.

Excommunication belongs to the class of corrective or medicinal penalties (poenae medicales or censurae), not to the vindictive (poenae vindictivae). Augustine (Serm. 351, c. 12), distinguishes between "prohibitio medicinalis," and "prohibitio mortalis," meaning (apparently) by the one, exclusion from the mysteries, by the other, exclusion from the church and Christian fellowship altogether. The canon law (Corpus J., c. 37, can. xxiv. qu. iii.), lays down generally that excommunication is "disciplina, non eradicatio;" the excommunicated person is capable of being restored to his privileges, upon repentance [PENITENCE].

EXCOMMUNICATION

The exclusion of peccant members from social privileges is a right inherent in all societies; it was in practice among the Jews at the Christian era, and was incorporated by our Lord into the constitution of His church. It is no part of our purpose to discuss the theological bearing of the language in which our Saviour conveyed this power (St. Matt. xviii. 15-18, xvi. 19), nor to investigate the traces which the New Testament contains of the use to which the apostles put it (Rom. xvi. 17; 2 Cor. vi. 14, 17; Gal. i. 8, 9; 2 Thess. iii. 6, 14; Tit. iii. 10; 2 John 10, 11) (See Art. Excommunication in Dict. of the Bible). It is sufficient to note that a power of cutting off offenders was conferred on the apostles as rulers of the church, and was by them made a systematic part of church government. There are however two instances of direct excommunication by St. Paul, which must be noticed in more detail, because they supplied at once the language and the model after which the church framed in subsequent ages her censures. The apostle by a formal judgment delivered the incestuous Corinthian "to Satan, for the destruction of the flesh" (1 Cor. v. 5); a sentence which cannot signify less than this—that the man was thrust outside the Christian fold. When St. Paul wrote his second epistle, some six or nine months later, the man on his repentance was readmitted into the church. A similar sentence, but producing no similar penitence, was delivered against Hymenaeus and Alexander (1 Tim. i. 20). Hymenaeus is mentioned in 2 Tim. ii. 17, 18, as a teacher of heresy. His case therefore formed a precedent for excommunication for heretical opinion, as that of the Corinthian for immorality. The authority for the use of the formula, ANATHEMA, (ἀνάθεμα), so common afterwards in the Penitential Canons, is to be found in 1 Cor. xvi. 22; Gal. i. 8, 9.

The proofs that the church has always claimed and exercised the power of excommunication, are everywhere patent. Fathers (e.g., Irenaeus, Haeres. iii. 3; Cyprian, De Orat. Dom. c. 18, Epist. 41, c. 2; 59 cc. 1, 9, 10, 11; Basil, Epist. 61, ad Athanas.; Leo the Great, Epist. 32, ad Flavianum; Ambrose, Epist. 40, ad Theodos.), and councils (e.g., Cann. Apost. c. 8, &c.; iv. Carth. c. 73; ii. Aries, c. 8; Venet. c. 3, Toledo, cc. 15, 16, 18), all claim the power of excommunication, of greater or less severity and duration, in the case of offenders, whether against morality or against orthodoxy. The PENITENTIAL BOOKS mention numberless cases in which excommunication is the penalty. See for instance the Penitential of archbishop Theodore (Haddan and Stubbs, Councils and Documents, iii. 173).

Persons subject to Excommunication.—The power of excommunicating was held to be in some measure correlative to that of baptising; those who could admit into the church could also exclude. The unbaptised were never excommunicated, though catechumens might be, and were, put back into a lower grade, and their baptism postponed. Children were not excommunicated, nor (commonly) reigning princes or large sections of the church. With these exceptions all Christian people, men or women, might be cut off from communion with the faithful. But the sentence was invariably a personal one for personal offences; the innocent were not punished with the guilty. Such a process as laying a whole nation under an interdict for some supposed offence of the people or their rulers was not known in the early ages, nor before the 12th century.

According to the Apostolical Constitutions (ii. cc. 37, 38, 39) the course of discipline was that if any offender did not voluntarily come forward and acknowledge his guilt he was to be summoned by the bishop, first in privacy, then in the presence of two or three witnesses; then if he would not yield, the case was to be told to the church, and if he was still obdurate, sentence would proceed against him. No one was to be excommunicated before he had been several times admonished, according to the apostolic injunction, "him that is an heretic, after the first or second admonition, reject." Nor could any offender be excommunicated in his absence, nor without legal conviction either by his own admission or by credible witnesses. On this safeguard against abuse of power, Van Espen quotes a passage from St. Augustine, "We cannot reject any from our communion unless they have either voluntarily confessed or been charged and convicted before some secular or ecclesiastical tribunal" (St. Aug. Serm. 351 de Poenitent.). One witness was not received as sufficient evidence of guilt, even though the one was a bishop. No one could incur excommunication for anything temporal; such matters were left to the civil courts, and excommunication in the early ages was a spiritual weapon, cutting off from spiritual privileges. Gregory the Great, writing to some bishop whose name has been lost, severely rebukes him for using for his own private ends, power conferred upon him for the good of the souls of his flock (Epist. ii. 34). It was forbidden also to excommunicate for sins of infirmity and frailty. "There are some sins," says St. Ambrose (in exhort. ad Poenit.), "which may be daily pardoned by mere supplication to God, in that petition 'forgive us our trespasses, as we forgive them that trespass against us.'" And it was necessary that the offence should be public; for it was always a maxim "De occultis non judicat Ecclesia." So St. Cyprian, "We so far as it is committed to us to see and judge, look only at the face (the conduct) of each one, his heart and his conscience we cannot investigate" (Cypr. Epist. 55).

It would be impossible within reasonable limits to enumerate the graver crimes for which the church cut off her unworthy members. They may in general be reduced under one of the three heads of uncleanness, idolatry, bloodshed. Upon the treatment which men guilty of these crimes should receive, many of the early controversies on discipling hinged. There were, moreover, many breaches of each of the commandments which rendered the offender subject to the highest censure of the church, which cannot be brought under this classification. Of these it will be sufficient to point out a few which were peculiar to the times, or which the opinion of the present day would deal with more leniently. The principle underlying the whole system of ecclesiastical censures, was the preservation of sound members of the Christian body from the evil example and contagion of the unsound. Hence, heresy was ever reckoned among the gravest sins. Hardly less dangerous, and hardly less rigorously punished in times of persecution, or during the barbarian invasions, was apostasy either to heathenism or to Judaism. Any tampering with idolatry was rigidly prohibited. A Christian was forbidden to be a public actor, or to be present at any theatrical representation, which commonly in that age ministered to lasciviousness; or to frequent the circus, for it was regarded as an appendage of false worship, and detrimental to the majesty of God; or to use divination or astrology, for that was to put destiny in the place of divine providence; or to follow any trade, such for example as the training of gladiators, which in its nature was scandalous; or to be a talebearer, a gambler, or a vagrant. See Gregory Nyssen's canonical epistle to Letoitus bishop of Melitina, which contains an elaborate classification of sins, and the penalties to be allotted to them.

Degrees of Excommunication.—Morinus distinguishes three degrees of excommunication: 1st. All those who were guilty of lighter sins were punished by exclusion from the offering of the oblations and partaking of the communion; 2nd. Those who sinned more grievously were not only altogether shut out from partaking of the communion, but also from being present at that service, and were moreover "delivered unto Satan," i.e. to certain bodily austerities and mortifications; 3rd. Those who persisted in offending, or fell into deadly sin, were expelled alike from all share in the sacred mysteries, and from the very building of the church. (Morin. de Poenitent., lib. 4, c. 11.) Van Espen considers that there were two degrees only, one of which was called "medicinalis," the other "mortalis," (Aug. Hom. lib. 1.), or more commonly, "Anathema" (Van Espen Jus Eccl. Pars iii. Tit. xi. c. iv.); Bingham also discovers two degrees, lesser and greater excommunication (ἀποκρίσις, ἀποκρίσις πᾶντλης). The former, which corresponds with the first two classes of Morinus, excluded offenders from the eucharist, and the prayers of the faithful, but did not exclude them from the church, for still they might stay to hear psalms and the reading of the scripture, and sermon and prayer of catechumens and penitents, and depart when the service of catechumens ended. Greater excommunication was a rejection not only from the eucharist but from any presence in church whatever, and any association with Christian men (Bingham, Antiq. lib. xvi. c. 11). There remains a still more terrible form of censure, which undoubtedly was sometimes imposed, and which was an absolute and final excision from the church. St. Cyprian (Epist. 55 ad Anton.) speaks of some of his predecessors who closed the door for ever against adulterers, but adds, that other bishops admitted similar offenders after a period of penitence to the grace of the church. There are various canons in the council of Elvira (circa 305 A.D.), which utterly debar offenders from communion with the faithful for the remainder of their lives, "nec in fine communionem accipere" (Con. Elvir. cc. 1, 12, 13, 71, 73). Can. 46 declares that if any persist in sin after having been already punished, he should be totally cast out, "penitus ab ecclesia abjiciatur." The council of Ancyra (cc. 9, 16; circa 315 A.D.) fixes a limit to the penalty attached to those very crimes for which that at Eliberis had decreed final excision. It would appear therefore that total and irremediable exclusion was at no time a universal practice, but nevertheless, at certain periods, and in certain localities, where possibly the magnitude of offences required to be dealt with by a penalty of equal magnitude, it was unhesitatingly employed. The practice of excommunicating the dead had no existence in the early centuries, or if here and there it existed, was supported by no canonical authority. The second council of Constantinople (553 A.D.), first introduced it into the Eastern church, and about 100 years later it crept into the Western (Morin. de Poenitent. lib. x. c. 9).

Effect of Sentence.—The punishment inflicted by a sentence of excommunication varied not only with the gravity of the offence, but with the discretion of the bishop, the customs of the diocese or province, and still more with the age of the church in which the offender lived. In the early centuries the church was ruled with a gentler discipline than was possible when her ranks were filled up promiscuously from the multitude. The incestuous man, whom St. Paul expelled from among his Corinthian converts with such solemn denunciation, was received again on his repentance, probably within a few months, certainly within the year. And up to the time of Montanus, punishments even for grave breaches of the law of the gospel were equally lenient. The term of the penalty was left to the discretion of the bishop. Through the whole of Tertullian's Treatise de Poenitentia, and in the Apostolic Canons, with one exception, there is no mention of any time for the duration of the censure. And even in the increasing severity which prevailed for the next hundred years, punishments scarcely ever exceeded one or two years (Morin. de Poenitent. lib. iv. c. 9). Thenceforward, years would not suffice where weeks or months had been deemed sufficient before. Ten, fifteen, twenty years, were no uncommon penalties. St. Basil excludes a murderer from the church for twenty years (can. 56). The council of Ancyra decrees that a murderer should be a penitent for the rest of his life, and be received back into communion only at the hour of death (can. 22). For murder combined with other great crimes the council of Elvira (can. 11), forbids communion even in death. But at no period did any hard and fast law prevail; if an offender voluntarily confessed his guilt, a shorter term of exclusion was measured out to him; if on the other hand, a man who had before caused scandal was further rebellious and obdurate, his sentence was doubly severe. The lesser excommunication carried with it only an exclusion from communion, and from the inner mysteries and privileges of the faith. Three weeks of this separation was the punishment assigned by the council of Elvira to those who wilfully absented themselves from church for three successive Sundays; a year for some more venial forms of unchastity; another period for eating food in company with a Jew (Conc. Elvira. cc. 21, 14, 50). And when the term expired they were received again to all the privileges of full communion, without being called upon to submit to public penance. Very different from this was the punishment attending the greater excommunication, anathema. For the first 300 years the punishment was exclusively spiritual, laid upon the souls, not the bodies of men, depriving them of spiritual blessings, and in no way interfering with their political relations. Heresiarchs however, and dangerous heretical teachers, were at all periods treated with exceptional severity; the church was forbidden to hold any intercourse with them, to receive them into their houses, or to bid them God speed. It was only gradually, after the empire became Christian, that the weapons of the church's warfare began to be more carnal, and the secular power was invoked to uphold the ecclesiastical. At no time before Theodosius, who declared apostates either to Judaism or heathenism incapable of making wills or receiving bequests, and whose Codex de Hæreticis attaches other pains and penalties to heretics, were any civil disabilities imposed upon those whom the church had cast off. Whatever rights a man had from the laws of God or man, as father, master, magistrate, these he retained after the door of the church was closed against him. Yet in the primitive ages, when the congregations of Christians were comparatively small and the members known to each other, and the spiritual censure was followed by an immediate and literal banishment from all sacred offices, from the society of their brethren in the faith, from all association whatever with holy men and holy things, the sentence fell with overwhelming severity. All the man most valued was taken from him. He was looked upon as under the ban of God's wrath; he was cut off from the kingdom of God on earth; like the leprous man among the Jews, he had the visible plague-spot of sin upon him; there had been passed upon him what was regarded as a presage of the future judgment, for what God had by his ministers bound on earth, he would certainly, it was believed, unless the man repented, bind in heaven. The Apostolic Canons (c. 11) forbid any one even to pray in a house with a man under anathema. The first council of Toledo (400 A.D.), ordered (c. 15), that "if any layman is under excommunication, let no clergyman nor religious person come near him nor his house. Also if a clergyman is excommunicated, let him be avoided, and if any is found to converse or to eat with him, let him also be excommunicated." His name was erased from the DIPTYCHS, [p. 561]; and there are instances of the erasure having been made after the man had died, and his sins had not come to light while he lived. His oblations were not received at the altar, and even gifts which he had presented to the church were rejected with him. His books might not be read, nor might any intermarry with him. And when his end came he was refused all sacred offices on his deathbed, and no Christian man might attend his funeral, and no Christian rite be performed at it, unless he had given proof of repentance and passed away before being formally absolved. Nor could any one hope to avoid judgment by a voluntary exile, for notice was sent to other congregations, and in the discipline of the early church, a stranger was not admitted into communion unless he brought with him COMMENDATORY LETTERS from his own diocese. A man once excommunicated was never ordained, or if it was discovered after his ordination, that he had been previously censured, he was removed from the ministry (Conc. Elvira. can. 30; Conc.

Nic. 10). This latter strictness was not invariably enforced, but the axiom "Poenitentes ordinari non debent," became universal in the Western church, although not always in practice in the Eastern.

Excommunication of Clergy.—In some cases the clergy, for offences for which laymen were excommunicated, were suspended and reduced to lay communion [DEGRADATION]; but they might incur both degradation and excommunication. The clergy were brought to trial with more legal formalities than the laity, because if found guilty they were deprived not only of spiritual privileges but of office and emolument. The Apostolic Canons (30) decree that any bishop, priest, or deacon guilty of simony shall be cut off from all communion whatever. Mention is also made of reducing clergy to "peregrina communio," communion of strangers, which would seem to signify that they were to be treated as strangers who came without commendatory letters, allowed a mere subsistence from the offerings, but denied communion [COMMUNION, HOLY, p. 417]. By the council of Chalcedon (451 A.D.) monks were subject to the same discipline as laity.

Form or Rite.—Judgment was delivered in the indicative mood, inasmuch as it decreed a punishment then and there inflicted. It was declared after the reading of the gospel, the bishop standing on the ambo. There is no record of any ceremony attending the delivery of the sentence in the early ages; but Martene publishes a MS. of about the year 1190 which prescribes that twelve priests ought to stand round the bishop with lamps or torches in their hands, and that after the conclusion of the sentence they should cast them on the ground and stamp out the light beneath their feet, and that the bishop should then explain to the people the meaning and effect of the ceremony they had witnessed. No recognised rite of excommunication was in general use before the 9th or 10th century. The formula ordinarily employed was founded on our Lord's words, "Let him be as an heathen man and a publican." The council of Ephesus degraded Nestorius in these terms. "Wherefore our Lord Jesus Christ, whose majesty he by his blasphemous words has assailed, pronounces Nestorius, through this sacred synod, deprived of his episcopal rank and degraded from the fellowship and office of the priesthood throughout the world." The sentence of excommunication of Andronicus, governor of Ptolemais, by his bishop, Synesius (410 A.D.), gives a more detailed account of the penalties involved in the sentence. "The church of Ptolemais makes this injunction to all her sister churches throughout the world. Let no church of God be open to Andronicus and his accomplices; but let every sacred temple and sanctuary be shut against them. The devil has no part in paradise; though he privily creep in he is driven out again. I therefore admonish both private men and magistrates neither to receive them under their roof nor to their table: and priests more especially, that they neither converse with them when living nor attend their funerals when dead. And if any one despise this church as being only a small city, and receive those that are excommunicated by her, let them know that they divide the church by schism. And whosoever does so, whether levite, presbyter, or bishop, shall be ranked in the same class with Andronicus. We will neither give them the right hand of fellowship, nor eat at the same table with them, and much less will we communicate in sacred mysteries with those who choose to take part with Andronicus" (Synes. Epist. 58). [See PENITENCE.]

CHRIST. ANT.

The following, from an Anglican Pontifical preserved at Gemblours, considered by Martene (De lit. Ant. ii. 322; ed. Venet. 1783) to have been written in the 8th century, may serve as a specimen of the later forms. The bishop, denouncing certain persons who, not having the fear of God before their eyes, had plundered the property of the church, and who, after being thrice summoned, contumaciously refused to appear, proceeds: "These therefore we, by the authority conferred upon us by God . . . and the statutes of the canons, excommunicate and cut off from the bounds of the Holy Church of God, and expel from the congregation of Christian men; and unless they speedily come to a better mind and make satisfaction to us, we condemn them with eternal malediction and condemn with perpetual anathema. May they incur the wrath of the heavenly judge; may they be deprived of the inheritance of God and His elect; may they neither in this present life have communion with Christians, nor in the life to come obtain part with God and His saints; but may they be numbered with the devil and his servants, and receive the punishment of avenging flame with everlasting mourning. In heaven and earth may they be abominable, and be tortured for ever with the pains of hell. Cursed be they in the house, cursed in the field; cursed be their food and their fruit; cursed be all that they possess, from the dog that barks for them to the cock that crows for them. May they have their portion with Dathan and Abiram, whom hell swallowed up quick, and with Ananias and Sapphira, who lied unto the apostles of the Lord and fell down dead, and with Pilate, and Judas who betrayed the Lord; may they be buried with the burial of an ass, and so may their light be quenched in the midst of darkness. Amen."

Minister of Excommunication.—The officer entrusted with the power of excommunication was the bishop of the diocese to which the offender belonged. [BISHOP, p. 231.] The administration of discipline was originally entirely in his hands; it was he who bound and he who loosed. As the church increased, the infliction of other forms of penance was delegated to the inferior clergy, but the great sentence of excommunication was a weapon which the bishop kept exclusively in the power of his own order. Within his diocese his jurisdiction was supreme; he might mitigate or increase censure at his discretion. In the exercise of this authority he was independent of his presbytery; he sat indeed with it to hear confessions which might criminate others, or to receive accusations against the brethren, or to decide rights and causes brought before him, and offences might then be divulged which would expose the offender to excommunication, but when once guilt was established, either by confession, or conviction, or notoriety, the bishop alone imposed the sentence. Instances also abound of bishops consulting with one another in special emergencies, and deciding amongst themselves the period of penitence to be allotted to special sins, but such advice or support put no limitation on each bishop's original jurisdiction. The council of Nice (can. 5) forbids any one bishop to receive delinquents cut off by another bishop, which clearly points to each bishop possessing the power to act alone. The end of the same canon decrees that a synod of bishops shall be held in each province twice a year, before Lent and in the autumn (compare Apost. Can. 38), to examine into the cases of excommunication which had taken place in the province. There was thus a right of appeal against the sentence of an individual bishop, but only to the bishops of the province. This probably explains instances of synodical excommunication, which do not imply that the bishop had not an independent power to excommunicate, but that an appeal was made from his judgment to the provincial synod, whose sentence was only a more solemn confirmation of the bishop's.

The Apostolical Canons (74) decree that, if a bishop is accused he is to be summoned by the synod of bishops, and if he refuse to come two bishops are to go for him, and on his second refusal, to go again, and if he is still contumacious, the synod may proceed against him in his absence. Accordingly the episcopal rank of Nestorius required a synodical censure, which was pronounced by provincial synods under Cyril of Alexandria and Celestine of Rome, and confirmed 431 A.D. by the council of Ephesus. And Eutyches, who was an abbot and so far allowed the privileges of a bishop, was tried at the provincial synod of Constantinople under Flavianus, and on an appeal to a general council was again condemned and excommunicated at Chalcedon, together with Dioscorus of Alexandria.

II. MONASTIC EXCOMMUNICATION.

By the Benedictine rule contumacious monks incurred the penalty of the greater or the lesser excommunication according to the gravity of the offence, but not till admonition, first private and then public, had been tried on them in vain, nor in cases where, owing to moral stupidity, flogging was likely to be more efficacious (Reg. Bened. c. 23). These two kinds of excommunication are further defined as excommunication only from the common meal (a mensa) for slighter faults, and excommunication from the chapel also (a mensa et oratorio) for faults less venial. Thus the subdivision of monastic excommunication corresponds in its main features with the more minute subdivisions of ecclesiastical discipline generally (Ib. cc. 24, 25). Even under the lighter ban the offender was forbidden to officiate in the choir as reader or "cantor," and, according to some commentators on the rule, he was to lie prostrate before the altar-steps while the others were kneeling. In the refectory he was to take his food alone after the rest had finished (Martene, Reg. Comment. cc. 25, 44).

A monk under the graver excommunication was debarred not only from the common board, but also from all the chapel services as well as from the benedictory salutation, and indeed from all intercourse whatever with his brethren (Reg. Bened. c. 25). He was to lie outstretched at the doors of the chapel till re-admitted by the abbat; nor even then might he take any public part in the services without express permission (Martene, u. s. c. 44). Any monk speaking to an excommunicated brother was "ipso facto" excommunicated himself (Reg. Bened. c. 26). But it was kindly ordered by Benedict, that the abbat should send some sympathising brother to console the offender in his loneliness (Ib. c. 27; cf. Reg. Mag. cc. 13, 14; Reg. Cass. Arclat. c. 23; Id. ad Virg. c. 10).

The duration of the punishment varied, the intention being correctional rather than merely penal. By the rule of Fructuosus, a monk for lying, stealing, striking, false swearing, if incorrigible, was, after flogging, to be excommunicated and kept on bread and water in a solitary cell for three months (Reg. Fruct. c. 17). By the rule of Ferreolus, a monk for bad language was forbidden to be present at the mass or to receive the kiss of peace for six months (Reg. Ferr. c. 25). By the rule of Chrodegang a canon was excommunicated for what seems so slight an offence as sleeping after nocturns. It was for the abbat to fix the degree of excommunication (Reg. Bened. c. 24). Some commentators argue therefore, that the severest form of monastic excommunication cannot be tantamount to the severest ecclesiastical sentence of the kind (Mart. Reg. Comm. c. 25).

Mabillon cites instances (Annal. x. 46) of monks (Columbanus and Theodorus Studita) excommunicating lay people not belonging to their order. He relates an excommunication of one of the sisterhood by an abbas in the 7th century (Ib. xii. 36). Abbats and abbesses were themselves liable to this penalty. Gregory the Great reproves a bishop for harshness in excommunicating an aged abbat of good repute. The second council of Tours in A.D. 567 decreed sentence of excommunication against any abbat or prior allowing a woman to enter the monastery (Conc. Turon. c. 16). See further Bened. Annal. Concord. Regul. cc. 30–34 with Menard's Commentary, and Ducange, Gloss. Lat. a. v. [I. G. S.]

EXCUBIAE. [VIGIL.]

EXCUSATI. (1) Slaves who had fled for refuge to a church, and then—on the owners making oath upon the gospels that they would not punish them—been restored to their masters, were called excusati. If the master broke his oath he was punished by excommunication. See Conc. Aurel. I. cc. 1 and 3; III. c. 13; IV. c. 24.

(2) Those who under some terror or oppression had fled to a church or monastery and remained there were also called excusati (Charter of Charles the Great, quoted by Ducange, u. v.) [C.]

EXECUTORES. A name given either to the DEFENSORES themselves or to officers who performed analogous functions. In one of the canons of a council held at Carthage, A.D. 419 (Conc. Eccl. Afric. c. 96), it is decreed that permission should be demanded of the emperor for the appointment of five "executores," who should reside in the provinces, and be employed on all occasions of necessity on behalf of the church, "in omnibus desiderii quae habet ecclesia." These are evidently distinct from the "defensores scholastici," mentioned in the canon that follows. In a capitulary of Charles the Great, quoted by Thomassin (Vet. et Nov. Eccl. Discip. i. 2, c. 99, § 12), executores are mentioned in connexion with advocates and defenders, "executores, vel advocati seu defensores." Thomassin (Ibid. c. 98, § 3) speaks of the title being given to certain officials when employed in carrying into execution the will of the bishop of Rome, who is himself the executor and protector of the canons. [P. O.]

EXEDRA is explained by Ducange, Binterim, and others as a general term including all buildings annexed to a church, or contained within the consecrated area. In classical usage an exedra was a semicircular room, or large alcove with seats against the wall for the purposes of conversation (Cic. de Nat. Deorum, i. 6; de Orat. iii. 5). Exedrae are spoken of by Vitruvius (vi. 5) in connection with oeci (οἶκοι) as rooms for conversation and other social purposes. The two words are similarly coupled together by Eusebius (H. E. x. 4, § 44) when describing the church of Paulinus at Tyre. Here Eusebius writes "he provided spacious exedrae and oeci on each side (ἐξέδρας καὶ οἶκους τοὺς παρ' ἐκδοτέρα μέρησιν) united and attached to the royal fabric (βασιλείῃ) and communicating with the entrance to the middle of the temple." The church built by Constantine at Antioch is also described as "being surrounded with a large number of oeci and exedrae in a circle," οἶκοις τε πλείοσιν ἐξέδραις τε ἐν κύκλῳ (Euseb. de Vit. Const. lib. iii. c. 50). Augustine uses the word in the sense of a large room or hall annexed to the great church at Caesarea (de Gest. cum Emerito). The sixth canon of the council of Nantes prohibits interments except "in atrio aut porticu, aut in exedris ecclesiae." Bingham holds that baptisteries were included under exedrae. The apse of a basilica was also sometimes termed exedra from its similarity in shape to those of the baths.

(Bingham, Orig. Eccl. bk. viii. c. 7, § 1; Augusti Christ. Archaeol. i. 387; Valesius ad Euseb. Vit. Const. lib. iii. c. 50.) [E. V.]

EXEMPTION OF MONASTERIES. In the earlier stage of their existence, monasteries generally availed themselves gladly of the patronage of the bishop of the diocese [BISHOP, p. 231], but as they increased in wealth and power, struggled to emancipate themselves from his control. For instance, towards the close of the 6th century the abbess of Ste. Croix at Poitiers, after the death of Radegunde the foundress, who had become one of the nuns, requested the bishop to take the convent under his protection. After some hesitation, on account of the royal rank of the foundress, or because she had placed the convent under royal jurisdiction, he consented "to govern it as the rest of his parishes" (Mabill. Ann. O. S. B. VII. xxxix. xl.; Gregor. Turon. Hist. ix. 46). On the other hand, in the middle of the 7th century, or later, for the exact date of the deed is uncertain, a monastery at Vienne, apparently of monks and nuns under one constitution, obtained absolute exemption from the bishop's authority. By this deed, no bishop had any claim to any property of the monastery; no bishop, unless by invitation of the abbot or abbess, could consecrate altars or admit nuns, nor was any fee to be required for performing these ceremonies; and the diocesan was not to hinder any appeal of the monastery to the see of Rome (Mabill. Ann. O. S. B. XIII. ii. cf. App. tom. 1). In another fragment cited by Mabillon in the same place no bishop even by invitation was allowed to enter the more private parts of the convent; nor was any bishop to be entertained in the convent, lest this should be an expense and a distraction to the inmates, nor to interfere with the abbess in the correction of the nuns, for she was to be responsible only to the apostolic see. Instances might easily be multiplied of the almost continual collision in Western Christendom between the bishops and the monasteries in their dioceses; in which the monasteries, almost invariably, had the support of the pope, and, frequently, of the royal authority (cf. Martene, Regul. Comment. Bened. ap. Migne, Patrol. Lat. lxxvi. pp. 839, 840). And the same struggle was going on at the same time in the East. Thus, in the 7th century, the emperor Maurice granted to the monasteries of Theodorus Siceota entire exemption from all episcopal authority, except that of Constantinople (Mabill. Ann. O. S. B. xiv. 23). Monasteries subject only to emperor or king, were called "imperialia" or "regalia" (Ducange, Gloss. Lat. s. v.). [For exemption of monasteries from taxes see MONASTERY.] [I. G. S.]

EXEMPTIONS. [IMMUNITIES OF CLERGY.]

EXEQUIES. [BURIAL OF THE DEAD: OBSEQUIES.]

EXERCISES, PENITENTIAL. [PENITENCE.]

EXHORTATION (Exhortatio), is used in a special sense for the admonition on the duties of their office addressed by the ordainer to a person just ordained. See, for instance, the Coptic ritual of ordination, in Martene, De Rit. Ant. I., viii. 11, Ordo 23. [C.]

EXILE (Exilium, Peregrinatio). For certain offences a penitent was ordered to leave his country and pass some period of his penitence in distant lands. This mode of penance is found among the canons ascribed to some of the British councils of the 6th century; but there are strong grounds for believing that they are interpolations of a later period, and that the penance of exile cannot be traced to any earlier source than the 7th century. The Penitential of Theodore (I. ii. 16) appoints fifteen years of penance for incest, of which seven are to be passed in a foreign land (perenni peregrinatione). The Penitential of Egbert (iii.) declares seven years of exile to be part of the penance due to parricide; and (v. 9) orders a cleric who begets an illegitimate child to go into exile for either four, five, or seven years. Morinus, however, considers (de Poenit. vii. 15) that these wanderings of penitents soon led to abuses, and were checked in a capitulary of Charles the Great (vi. 379).

The practice thus begun in submission to a judicial penalty was continued as a voluntary self-discipline, and in the 10th century it began to be considered a meritorious action to leave home and country and make a pilgrimage to some spot consecrated by association with some holy man; the earliest of which places were Rome, Tours, and the supposed burial-place of St. James at Compostella. This tendency received a great impulse from the Crusades, and especially from the decree of the council of Clermont (Conc. Clarum. c. 2), which allowed a pilgrimage to Jerusalem to expiate all penance whatever. [G. M.]

EXOCATACOELI. Five great dignities of the patriarchal church of Constantinople, viz. the oeconomus or steward, the senior and junior keeper of the purse (σακελλάρχοι), and the senior and junior chartophylax, were anciently called ἐξοκατάκοιλοι. To these, in the 11th century, the defensor of the church was added. The etymology of the word is uncertain. That of Ducange (Gloss. Graec.) that they received their name from having their seats of dignity on a raised platform, not in the lower portion of the floor (κατακοίλι) where less distinguished persons sat, is perhaps as probable as any. (Thomassin, Ecc. Discip. I. ii. 99, § 10; Daniel, Codex Liturg. iv. 702.) [C.]

EXODIASTICON (Ἐξοδιαστικόν). As the departure of a Christian was frequently spoken of as ἔξοδος, the service at the death-bed is called in Greek office-books ἔξοδιαστικόν (Daniel, Codex Lit. iv. 608, 634). [BURIAL OF THE DEAD; SICK, VISITATION OF.] [C.]

EXOMOLOGESIS (Ἐξομολογῆσις, Confessio, ἔξομολόγησις, ἑξομολόγησις). The verb in St. Matt. xi. 25 expresses thanksgiving and praise, and in this sense was used by many Christian writers (Suicer's Thesaurus, s. v. ἔξομολ.). But more generally in the early fathers it signifies the whole course of penitential discipline, the outward act and performance of penance. From this it came to mean that public acknowledgment of sin which formed so important a part of penitence. Irenaeus (c. Hucres. i. 13, § 5) speaks of an adulteress who, having been converted, passed her whole life in a state of penitence (ἔξομολογούμενη, in exomologesi): and (ib. iii. 4) of Cerdon often coming into the church and confessing his errors (ἔξομολογούμενος). Tertullian (de Poenit. c. 9) considers the Greek word ἔξομολόγησις more suitable than the Latin confessio; and proceeds to define the term as "the discipline of humbling and prostrating a man." At the end of the same treatise he speaks of the king of Babylon's humiliation as an exomologesis, and of the king of Egypt's neglect of repentance and its attendant confession. The term occurs twice in Cyprian (de Lapsis, cc. 11, 18), and six times in his Epistles (Epist. 4, ad Pompon. c. 3; 15, ad Martyr. c. 1; 16, ad Cler. c. 2; 17, ad Lasc.; 55, ad Anton. c. 24; 59, ad Cornet. c. 18, Orf. ed.) in the sense of the course of penitence and public humiliation; three times (Epist. 18, ad Cler.; 19, ad Cler.; 20, ad Rom.-Cler. c. 2) referring to the confession of dying penitents: and once (de Lapsis, c. 19) as applied to Azariah and his companions, in the sense of confession of the lips generally. St. Basil, describing the morning service of his time (Epist. 207, ad Cler. Neocaesar.), says that after the antiphonal chant, at daybreak they all burst forth into the psalm of confession (ὅταν τῇ ἔξομολογήσει ψαλμὸν τῷ Κυρίῳ ἀναφέρουσι), meaning no doubt that which is emphatically a psalm of confession, the fifty-first. This psalm is also mentioned by Cassian (De Instit. Coenob. iii. 6) as occurring at the close of matins. Pacian in one place (Paraen. ad Poenit. p. 372, Orf. ed.) following Tertullian, speaks of the degradation of Nebuchadnezzar as exomologesis; in another (ibid. p. 373), in imitation of Cyprian, applies the term to the song of the "three children." At the council of Laodicea (can. 2) it is the whole course of penitence: "As to those who sin by divers offences and persevere in prayer of confession (ἔξομολ.) and repentance." With Chrysostom it is in one place (Hom. 10 in S. Matt. c. 4) the course of penitence; elsewhere (Hom. 5, de incomp. Dei nat. t. i. p. 490; Hom. 2, ad illum. Catech. t. i. p. 240, Bened. ed.) it is confession to God only. Isidore of Seville (Etymol. vi. 19) defines exomologesis to be that by which we confess our sins to the Lord. But at the end of the same chapter he adduces an entirely different meaning of the word. "Between litanies and exomologeses there is this difference, that exomologesis stands for confession of sins only, litany for prayer to God, and imploring His pardon; but now each word has the same meaning, nor is there any difference between the use of litany and exomologesis." The 17th council of Toledo, A.D. 694 (c. 6), orders litanies (exomologeses) to be said for a whole year for the church, for the sovereign, &c. &c. And the council of Mayence, A.D. 813 (Conc. Magunt. c. 32) quotes the exact words of Isidore on exomologesis being equivalent with litany (Comp. Morin. de Poenit. ii. 2; note L. on Tertull. de Poenit., in Oxford Library of the Fathers).

Of these meanings the first and last are quite foreign to the general ecclesiastical use of the word and need not be pursued any further; that which signifies the whole course of penitential discipline will be discussed under the article PENITENCE: this article will relate to exomologesis only so far as it signifies oral confession.

Public Confession.—i. Of public sin.—This was the first stage in the restoration of a penitent. So long as discipline was in force, any one guilty of a notorious crime which had subjected him to censure [EXCOMMUNICATION] was required to make an open acknowledgment of his crime at the beginning of his course of penitence. The confession took place after the Missae Catechumenorum, and when they and the hearers had been warned to withdraw from the church by the deacon. Then if any one had been recently convicted of any open sin, he confessed and bewailed it before the church, and in accordance with the gravity of his offence, his penitential station was assigned him by the bishop; sometimes, however, the bishop, yielding to the requests of the clergy and people who had heard the confession, allotted a less remote station. The bishop then addressed the congregation on the nature of the offence, and they offered up their prayers for the offender's repentance. This public confession was addressed not merely to the bishop or the priest in the presence of the congregation, but in a loud voice to the congregation at large. It signified that as the church had been scandalised by an open sin in one of its members, reparation should be made to it by an equally open admission of sin. It also manifested the earnestness of the offender's repentance that he was willing to undergo this public humiliation. But the chief object was that the offender might seek the prayers of the congregation to support and stimulate his conversion. If any one who was notoriously guilty failed or refused to confess, no one would communicate with him, in accordance with the apostle's precept (1 Cor. v. 11; Ephes. v. 11). Again, if he waited to be convicted, his censure was heavier than if he had made a spontaneous confession. The council of Elvira (Conc. Elib. c. 46) orders that if a deacon before his ordination had committed a mortal sin, and afterwards confessed, he should be restored after three years' penitence; but if detected, after five years, and only to lay communion. Basil (ad Amphiloc. cc. 7, 61) allows alleviation of punishment on three grounds, ignorance, confession, and lapse of time. This encouragement to confession reappears in the 8th century in the Rule of Chrodegand of Metz (c. 18), "he who voluntarily confesses his lighter sins shall be visited with lighter censures." And not only was an offender urged to confess for his own sake, but any who was privy to his crime was under a similar obligation to accuse him, for if he failed or even delayed to do so, he was himself exposed to censure (Basil, ad Amphiloc. c. 71).

ii. Of secret sins.—Such confession was at no time obligatory. Sometimes, however, under the direction of a priest who had been consulted, or moved by a sudden contrition and remorse, some would charge themselves with a secret sin before the congregation. Thus (Iren. c. Huores. i. 9) the virgins seduced by the heretic Marcus, and the wife of the deacon Aslanus made a public acknowledgment of guilt which was known only to themselves. One of the three men who had calumniated Narcissus of Jerusalem (Euseb. H. E. vi. 9) publicly acknowledged years afterwards, when his two associates had died from some painful disorder, that his charge against the bishop had been false. Some of the priests who had joined Novatian (ibid. vi. 43) spontaneously charged themselves before the church with heresy and other crimes; one of the bishops who had been induced to consecrate him publicly acknowledged his error, and Cornelius, in deference to the intercession of the people who witnessed the confession, admitted him to lay communion. But public confession of secret sins needed at a very early period to be checked and regulated; and the people were admonished to consult their priests before divulging their sins to the church [PENITENTIARY]. Anything which would create a scandal or endanger life or liberty was forbidden to be revealed. So Basil (ad Amphiloc. c. 34) would not permit a woman who had privately admitted the guilt of adultery to acknowledge it in the church or even to perform openly the penance generally demanded for such a sin, lest she should be murdered by her husband. Similar precautions are laid down by Origen, Augustine, and Caesarius of Arles (Morin. de Poenit. ii. 13). In the 8th century the practice arose of making confession of public sins to the bishop, of private to the priest.

iii. Before the bishop and his presbytery.—Tertullian (de Poenit. c. 9) says it is part of exomologesis for the penitent "to throw himself upon the ground before the presbytery, and to fall on his knees before the beloved of God." Cyprian (de Lapsis, c. 18) praises the faith of those who, having without any overt act meditated idolatry, made a confession "apud sacerdotes Dei." Gregory Nyssen (Ep. ad Letoium, in Marshall p. 195) speaks of a certain evil which had been overlooked by the ancient fathers, from whence it had come to pass, that no person who was brought before the clergy to be examined as to his life and conversation was at all examined upon that point. Before the presbytery confessions were made which criminated others; and this frequently happened; for any one making a public confession named his confederates, unless by so doing he exposed them to legal penalties. No ecclesiastical censure, however, fell on any who denied a crime which his associate had admitted: on the principle that penitence was a privilege not a punishment. The deacon and virgin whose case is decided by St. Cyprian and his presbytery (Epis. iv. ad Pompon.) must have had an information laid against them by some associate, for their guilt had been secret. This mode of confession was affected in the East by the appointment of the Penitentiary; but in the West so long as public penitence for secret faults prevailed, so long did public confession to bishops and their assistant priests. Probably this was the origin of the custom introduced into the Benedictine Rule of confession to the abbot surrounded by his monks.

Private Confession.—i. General account.—The testimony of the fathers will be discussed in detail later; here it is sufficient to say that the early fathers Irenaeus, Tertullian, Cyprian, hardly allude to private confession at all; and among the writers generally of the first 500 years those who mention it do so with some reference more or less direct to public discipline. But it is certain that public penitence was not assigned to all sins which were secretly confessed, but only to such as in the discretion of the priest required it. It is easy to understand that offences of a trivial nature might be confided to a priest, or offences of such a character as would scandalise the church were they openly divulged; and until this spiritual direction had been given, the offender would be in doubt whether or not a public acknowledgment would be expected from him. But it is equally clear that no absolution was given after direction of this sort, or until penitence had been performed. Such at least for many centuries was the practice in the Latin church (see PENITENCE, under which the question of absolution will be discussed); in the Eastern church a practice arose of pronouncing some preliminary absolution immediately after the utterance of the confession, and a second absolution when the penance had been performed. The evidence of this practice is to be found in the early Greek Penitentials at the end of the 6th century; but Morinus would carry back its origin to the time of the abolition of the office of Penitentiary at the end of the 4th. To resort to a spiritual guide for comfort and counsel was one thing; to obtain through his ministry by confession penance and absolution, reconciliation with God and communion with the faithful was another: and there is no proof that the two were combined, and that private sacramental confession had any existence in the first 500 years of the Christian church. The term itself is not found in any of the documents of the first eight centuries: and if the definition of Thomas Aquinas (Summa, pt. iii. qu. 84–90) is to be accepted as a theological definition of the term, its growth must be assigned to a much later period. There existed undoubtedly from a very early period private confession followed by no penitence, but also by no absolution; there was also private confession followed by public penitence, and generally by subsequent public confession, to which the private was a preliminary; and there was after the beginning of the 6th century private confession followed by private penitence, but the penance was always exacted, and differed only from public penance in solemnity; there is nowhere to be found in canons or sacramentaries or penitentials one punishment for private penitence and another for public. The sins thus privately confessed with a view to penitence were those only of a grievous character, sins which excluded from communion or public prayer, or even from the church itself, which required a long and painful course of penance before they were blotted out, and into which if the sinner relapsed, there was, certainly in the rigour of the primitive ages, no second door of reconciliation open to him. Sozomen indeed, writing at the end of the 5th century, says in reference to penitence that there is pardon for those who sin again and again, but this is not the language of antiquity. There was but one admission to solemn penance. Moreover, sins for which penance was to be performed were described by canons and in canonical epistles, and sins which did not fall within these canons were neither confessed nor made subject to penance. Sins of frailty incidental to mankind were to be healed by daily prayer and confession to God only. So, among numerous authorities that penitence, and confession as a part of penitence, was not exacted for venial sins, Augustine (de Symb. ad Catech. t. vi. p. 555, ed. Antv.), "those whom you see in a state of penitence have been guilty of adultery or some other enormity, for which they are put under it: if their sin had been venial, daily prayer would have been sufficient to atone for it." The Greek Penitentials of the end of the 6th century, and the Latin ones of a century later, give no hint of habitual confession of common infirmities, or of private confession being a matter of indispensable obligation, still less of the doctrine that one may daily confess and be daily and plenarily absolved.

ii. In the Western Church.—In the times of Tertullian and Cyprian public discipline was in full vigour, and as part of it a public acknowledgment of sins: the passages which have already been adduced from these fathers contain nothing to show that they regarded confession in any other light than as one stage of the act of penitence.

Ambrose (de Poenit. ii. 6) speaks of confession, but it is confession to God. "If thou wilt be justified confess thy sins; for humble confession looses the bonds of sin." Another passage, selected by Bellarmine to support secret confession, relates manifestly to the course of discipline; for having at the end of the previous section said that "very many, out of fear of future punishment, conscious of their sins, seek admission to penitence, and having obtained it are drawn back by the shame of public entreaty," Ambrose thus proceeds (ib. c. 10), "Will any one endure that thou shouldst be ashamed to ask of God, who art not ashamed to ask men? that thou be ashamed to supplicate Him from whom thou art not hid, when thou art not ashamed to confess thy sins to man from whom thou art hid?" Another passage (in Luc. i. 22, p. 5, 1787) commenting on St. Peter's denial of Christ and subsequent repentance, is inconsistent with the existence of a custom of private confession in his time. "Let tears wash away the guilt which one is ashamed to confess with the voice. Tears express the fault without alarm; tears confess the sin without injuring bashfulness; tears obtain the pardon they ask not for. Peter wept most bitterly, that with tears he might wash out his offence. Do thou also, if thou wouldest obtain pardon, wash out thy fault with tears."

Augustine's own confessions contain no hint that he either practised or inculcated private confession. "What have I to do with men that they should hear my confession, as if they could heal all my infirmities" (x. 3). Bellarmine quotes from the same writer (on P's. 66, c. 7)—"Be downcast before thou hast confessed; having confessed, exult; now shalt thou be healed. While thou confessedst not, thy conscience collected foul matter; the imposthume swelled, distressed thee, gave thee no rest; the physician fomented it with words, sometimes cuts it, employs the healing knife, rebuking by tribulation. Acknowledge thou the hand of the physician; confess; let all the foul matter go forth in confession; now exult, now rejoice, what remains will readily be healed." But Augustine is commenting on the text, "Sing unto the Lord all the whole earth;" and confession can be confession to God only, as surely the physician who heals by tribulation can be none other than God. In Serm. 181 (fin.) he speaks of daily prayer as the sponge which is to wipe away sins of infirmity and contrasts them with death-bringing sins for which alone penitence is performed. Elsewhere (de Symb. ad Catech. tom. vi. p. 555, ed. Antv.) he again speaks of the "three methods of remitting sins in the church, in baptism, in the Lord's Prayer, in the humility of the greater penitence," and he limits penance and consequently confession to sins which deserve excommunication. And in many similar passages he is a witness that up to his time no confession was required of any sins but such as subjected a man to penitential discipline.

Leo in his Epistle to Theodorus gives plain testimony of the connection of confession with penance (Ep. 91, c. 2). But in a letter to the bishops of Campania he gives some directions which mark if they do not make an era in confession in the Latin church. The epistle is too important not to be quoted at length (Ep. 80, ad Episc. Campan.). "That presumption, contrary to the apostolic rule, which I have lately learned to be practised by some, taking unduly upon themselves, I direct should by all means be removed, and that a written statement of the nature of the crimes of each should not be publicly rehearsed, since it suffices that the guilt of the conscience be laid open to the priests alone in secret confession. For although that fulness of faith, which out of the fear of God fears not to take shame before men, seems to be praiseworthy, yet because the sins of all are not of such sort, that they who ask to do penitence fear not their being published, let so unreasonable a custom be done away, lest many be kept from the remedies of penitence; either being ashamed, or fearing that actions for which they may be punished by the laws should be discovered to their enemies. For that confession suffices, which is made first to God, then to the priest also, who draweth near to pray for the sins of the penitents. For so at length may more be stirred up to penitence, if the sins confessed by the penitents be not published in the ears of the people." In the early ages public confession was only remitted in case of danger to the individual or scandal to the church: by this constitution of Leo secret confession to the priest was to take the place of open confession, and the priest's intercession of the intercession of the church. The door thus opened for escaping from the shame of public confession was never afterwards closed, and secret confession gradually became the rule of the church.

In the pontificate of Gregory the Great, a century and a half later, there is no evidence to be found of the existence of public confession: and even after private confession it was difficult to bring men to submit to public discipline (Expos. in 1 Reg. t. iii. 15, p. 342). "The sign of a true confession is not in the confession of the lips, but in the humiliation of penitence. . . . The confession of sin is required in order that the fruits of penitence may follow. . . . Saul, who confesses and is not willing to humble and afflict himself, is a type of those who make a sterile confession and bear no fruit of penance."

In the 7th century, the stern rule that solemn confession as a part of penitence was received only once, had become obsolete, but habitual confession had not yet taken its place. The first council of Châlons, A.D. 650 (1 Cabil. c. 8), declares that all agree that confession to the priest is a proof of penitence. The Penitential of Theodore (l. xii. 7) gives a rule which shows that auricular confession was not yet obligatory. "Confession if needful may be made to God only." [COMMUNION, HOLY, p. 417.] Bede (tom. v. Exp. in S. Jac. v.) reverting to the old practice draws a distinction between the confession of frailties and of heinous sins. "We ought to use this discretion, our daily light sins confess to one another, and hope that by our prayers they may be healed; but the pollution of the greater leprosy let us according to the law open to the priest, and in the manner and the time which he directs, purify ourselves." The second council of Châlons, A.D. 813 (2 Conc. Cabil. c. 32) complains that people coming to confess neglect to do so fully, and orders each one when he comes to examine himself and make confession of the eight capital sins which prevail in the world—which are then enumerated—and by implication, of no others. Theodulph's Capitulary (c. 30) draws a distinction between confession made to a priest and that to God only, and (c. 31) mentions the same eight principal sins as the council, and appoints that every one learning to confess should be examined on what occasions and in what manner he had been guilty of any of them, and consequently be subjected to no further examination. Chrodegand (c. 32) orders "confession to be made at each of the three fasts of the year, 'et qui plus fecerit melius facit'; and monks to confess on each Sunday to their bishop or prior." But there is no other document showing that confession had yet become periodical. That secret confession was not yet a matter of obligation is clear from the canon of the council of Châlons (2 Conc. Cabil. c. 33). "Some say they ought to confess their sins to God only, and some think they are to be confessed unto the priests, both of which not without great fruit are practised in the Holy Church. . . . the confession which is made to God purgeth sins, that made to the priests teacheth in what way those sins should be purged." And so it remained an open question for the next 300 years, for Gratian (de Poenit. Dist. i. 89) summing up the opinions of different doctors on necessity of confession leaves it still undecided. "Upon what authorities or upon what strength of reasons both these opinions are grounded, I have briefly declared; which of them we should rather cleave to is left to the judgment of the reader; for both have for their favourers wise and religious men." And it was not determined till the famous decree of the Lateran council, A.D. 1215 (4 Conc. Lateran. c. 21) ordering all of each sex as soon as they arrived at years of discretion to confess at least once a year to their own priest.

iii. In the Eastern Church.—The duty of consulting a priest when the conscience is burdened is urged more strongly by the Greek than by the Latin fathers; there are consequently more distinct traces of secret confession to be found in the Eastern than in the Western church. Origen has one passage speaking directly of confession, not to God only but to the ministers of the church; the purpose of the confession however is not to obtain absolution, but spiritual guidance; after having spoken of evil thoughts which should be revealed in order that they might be destroyed by Him who died for us, he continues (Hom. 17 in Luc. fin.), "if we do this and confess our sins not only to God, but to those also who can heal our wounds and sins, our sins will be blotted out by Him," &c. In another passage, which is even more explicit, he speaks of the care required in choosing a discreet and learned minister to whom to open the grief, and the skill and tenderness required in him to whom it is confided (Hom. 2 in Ps. 37, t. 11, p. 688, ed. Bened.).

Athanasius (Vit. Ant. Erem. p. 75, ed. Augs.) narrates an injunction of Anthony to his fellow-recluses, that they should write down their thoughts and actions and exhibit the record to one another, which probably was the beginning of habitual confession among monastic orders, where there are many grounds for supposing it prevailed long before it became the custom of the church. Basil lays it down even more definitely than Origen, that in cases of doubt and difficulty resort should be had to a priest; and in his time such a priest was specially appointed in each diocese, whose office it was to receive such private confessions and decide whether they should be afterwards openly acknowledged. [PENITENTIARY.] Thus in Basil, Reg. brev. tract. (Q. 229) the question is proposed, "Whether forbidden actions ought to be laid open to all, or to whom, and of what sort?" And the answer is, that as with bodily disease, "so also the discovery of sins ought to be made to those able to cure them." Again (Q. 288) Basil asks, "he who wishes to confess his sins ought he to confess them to all, or to any chance person, or to whom?" and replies, "it is necessary to confess to those entrusted with the oracles of God." There would have been no necessity for regulations like these had not private confession been in frequent practice. In Serm. Ascet. (t. ii. p. 323, ed. Bened.) monks are directed, by a rule similar to that of Anthony, to tell to the common body any "thought of things forbidden, or unsuitable words, or remissness in prayer, or lukewarmness in psalmody, or desire after ordinary life," that through the common prayers the evil may be cured. Like instructions are found in the Reg. fus. tract. (Q. 28) "On referring everything, even the secrets of the heart, to the superior."

Gregory Nyssen (Ep. ad Letoium, in Marshall, p. 100) in one place speaks of secret confession which is to be followed by penance: "he who of his own accord advances to the discovery of his sins, as by his voluntary accusation of himself he gives a specimen of the change that is in his mind towards that which is good, will deserve lighter correction," alluding to the well-established rule that voluntary confession was allowed to mitigate the subsequent penance: in another place he writes as if he commended the custom of confessing all transgression of positive law whether it involved penance or not, "if he who has transferred to himself the property of another by secret theft shall unfold his offence to the priest by secret confession, it will be sufficient to cure the guilt by a contrary disposition."

The abolition of the office of the Penitentiary made undoubtedly a great break in the practice of confession in the Eastern church. The account is given in Socrates (H. E. v. 19) and Sozomen (H. E. vii. 16). [PENITENTIARY.] It is difficult to believe that the scandal which had arisen in connection with the Penitentiary had not some influence on the teaching of St. Chrysostom, who immediately afterwards succeeded to the see of Constantinople. He both recommended and enforced penance, but any confession which had not immediate reference to discipline, he taught should be made to God alone. None of the fathers bear equally strong testimony against auricular confession (Hom. 5 de incomp. Dei nat. p. 480). "I do not bring you upon the stage before your fellow-servants, nor do I compel you to discover your sins in the presence of men, but to unfold your conscience to God, to show Him your ail and malady, and seek relief from Him." So (Hom. 20 in Gen. p. 175). "He who has done these things (grievous sins) if he would use the assistance of conscience for his need, and hasten to confess his sin, and show his sore to the physician who healeth and reproacheth not, and converse with Him alone, none knowing, and tell all exactly, he shall soon amend his folly. For confession of sins is the effacing of offences." For numerous other examples compare Daille (iii. 14, iv. 25), Hooker (vi. c. iv. 18), note on Tertull. de Poenit. in Oxford Library of the Fathers, p. 401.

From the time of Chrysostom to the time of the Greek Penitentials there is no material evidence. Joannes Climacus (cited by Daille) has a rule which points to the existence of confession in the eastern monasteries of the 6th century: a similar notice from Theodorus Studites, in his life of Plato, shows that the practice had a greater hold on the monks of the 9th century.

It appears from the Penitentials that some form of absolution was given in the east immediately after confession, a practice of which there is no trace for many centuries later in the Latin church. Joannes Jejunator orders that immediately after the confession is over and the priest has said the seven prayers of absolution, i.e., absolution in the precatory form, he is to raise the penitent from the ground and kiss him, and exhort him thus—"behold by the mercy of God who would have all men to be saved, you have fled for refuge to penitence, and made a confession, and been freed from all your former wicked works, do not therefore corrupt yourself a second time, &c. &c.;" after this the penitence is imposed. In the contemporary Penitential of Joannes Monachus the form of absolution directly after confession is still stronger. "May God who for our sake became man, and bore the sins of all the world, turn to your good all these things which you, my brother, have confessed to me, His unworthy minister, and free you from them all in this world, and receive you in the world to come, and bring all to be saved, who is blessed for ever." But this absolution did not entitle the penitent to Holy Communion, nor do away with the necessity of subsequent penitence, which often continued for years after this, and at the end of it another and more formal and perfect absolution was granted. (Morin. de Poenit. vi. 25.) On the practice of confession among the sects which broke away from the Orthodox church, see Daniel (Codex Liturgicus, iv. p. 590).

iv. Confession before receiving Holy Communion may have been an occasional practice, but the presumption is very strong against its having been a general one. Socrates (H. E. v. 19), in his account of the abolition of the office of the Penitentiary, states that Nectarius was advised to strike his name from the roll of ecclesiastical officers, and allow each one henceforward to communicate as his own conscience should direct; a notice which seems to imply that in the time of Nectarius, who was Chrysostom's predecessor at Constantinople, it had been the custom for the people to consult with the Penitentiary before presenting themselves to receive the eucharist. But the passage is an isolated one; it is supported by no other authority; and whatever value it may have, it is a two-edged testimony, for if it proves that the custom prevailed at that time, it also proves that after that time it ceased. On the other hand there is this class of indirect evidence, that no such preparation was generally enforced. Eusebius (H. E. vi. 43), relates that during the episcopate of Cornelius at Rome, 1050 widows and destitute people received alms from the church; the Roman church must therefore at that time have consisted of many thousands, to minister to whom were the bishop himself and forty-six presbyters; and when the frequency with which the faithful communicated even at the latter half of the 3rd century, is borne in mind, it would seem to be almost physically impossible that each one should make an individual confession before communicating. Similar evidence is furnished from the ancient liturgies, in which special directions are given to the deacon to warn to depart from the church the catechumens, penitents, and others who were not allowed to communicate, but no hint is given that those who had failed to confess were to be excluded. Stronger evidence is supplied by the absence of any mention of confession among the preparations required for a worthy reception of the sacrament. Clement of Alexandria (Strom. i. 1, p. 318, Potter) seems to imply that some ministers judged who were or were not worthy [COMMUNION, HOLY, p. 413], though he himself thought the individual conscience the best guide. Chrysostom (Hom. 27 in Gen. p. 268, ed. Bened.) similarly leaves each one to judge of his fitness, "If we do this [reconcile ourselves with the brethren], we shall be able with a pure conscience to approach His holy and awful table, and to utter boldly those words joined to our prayers—the initiated know what I mean; wherefore I leave to everyone's conscience how, fulfilling that command, we may at that fearful moment utter these things with boldness." Augustine also tells his hearers that their own conscience, and that alone, must determine their fitness (Serm. 46 de Verb. Dom.), "considering your several degrees, and adhering to what you have professed, approach ye to the flesh of the Lord, approach ye to the blood of the Lord; whose proveth himself not to be such, let him not approach." The second council of Châlons (2 Conc. Cabil. c. 46), gives detailed directions on the manner and order of receiving, but no word about confession—an omission which bears so much the more strongly upon the question, because private confession had undoubtedly begun to take the place of penitential confession in the 9th century.

v. At the hour of death.—The evidence on this head, still more than on the preceding, is negative. If confession immediately before death had been customary, some notice of it would have found a place in the narratives of the last hours of the saints and fathers of the early church. But no such records appear. Cyprian in three of his epistles (Ep. 18–20, Oxf. ed.), allows the confession of the lapsed to be received on their deathbed preparatory to imposition of hands; but this was only to meet the emergency of sudden illness overtaking penitents; it was no part of a systematic practice. Athanasius in his account of the death of Anthony (in Vit. Ant. Eremit. fin.), has no allusion to a previous confession. Equally silent is Gregory Nazianzen (Orat. 21), on the death of Athanasius; and (Orat. 19), on the death of his own father, Gregory bishop of Nazianzum; and (Orat. 20), in the eulogy which he delivered at the tomb of Basil. Gregory Nyssen (de Vit. Greg. Thaum.) has no account of the deathbed confession of Gregory Thaumaturgus; nor has Ambrose (de Obit. Theod.) of that of Theodosius. Augustine (Confess. ix. 10, 11), records the last hours of his mother, but he records no last confession; his own last hours which Possidius (de Vit. Aug. c. 31) has described, were spent in penitence, but the only confession made was to God, "He was wont to say to us that even proved Christians, whether clergy or laity, should not depart from life without a full and fitting penitence, and this he carried out in his last illness. For he had the penitential psalms copied out and arranged against the wall in sets of four, and read them as he lay in bed, all through his sickness, and freely and bitterly wept. And he begged that he might not be interrupted, and that we would not go into his room except when his physicians came, or he needed food. And all that time we neither read nor spoke to him." Bede, narrating (Ecol. Hist. iv. 3), the death of bishop Ceadde, and (ib. iv. 23), the abbess Hilda, and (Cuth. Vit. c. 39) Cuthbert, states that each received the Holy Communion at the last, but not that it was preceded by confession. Similar is Eginhard's account (Vit. Car. Mag.), of the death of Charles the Great (see Dailly iv. 3, where the evidence is drawn out in detail).

vi. Time and Manner.—The time of public confession was originally whenever the penitent felt moved to acknowledge his sin before the church; afterwards, in common with the whole course of discipline, the time was restricted to certain seasons [PENITENCE]. Private confession not being part of the recognized order of the church, had necessarily no time assigned to it. The capitulary of Theodulph (c. 36) indeed orders confessions to be made the week before Lent, but this is an exceptional instance. There is an example of a confession made in writing by Potamius, archbishop of Braga to the 10th council of Toledo, A.D. 656, charging himself with misdemeanours. The confession was entirely spontaneous, for the council having no suspicion of his guilt could not at first believe him; but on his reaffirming the fact, he was deposed and subjected to penitence for the remainder of his life; allowed, however, out of compassion to retain his title, his successor signing himself bishop and metropolitan. Robert, bishop of the Cenomani (Le Mans), also made a written confession, but the council to which it was made absolved him (Morin. de Poenit. ii. 2; v. 10).

It appears from the Greek Penitentials that confession was made sitting; the penitent kneeling only twice while making his confession, at the beginning, when the priest asked the Holy Spirit's aid to move the man to disburden his soul completely, and at the end, when a prayer was offered that he might obtain grace to perform his sentence conscientiously. The origin of this custom was the great length to which the form and process of confessing extended. The practice has since continued in the Greek church, for both priest and penitent to sit (Martene de Rit. i. 3; Daniel Codes Liturg. iv. p. 588). The Penitential of Joannes Jejunator gives the following instructions on the order and manner of confessing; "he who comes to confess ought to make three inclinations of the body as he approaches the sacred altar, and say three times 'I confess to thee O Father, Lord God of heaven and earth, whatever is in the secret places of my heart.' And after he has said this he should raise himself and stand erect; and he who receives his confession should question him with a cheerful countenance, which he who confesses should also if possible present, and kiss his hand, especially if he sees the penitent to be depressed by the severity of his sorrow and shame, and after that he should say to him in a cheerful and gentle voice" . . . and then follow 95 questions, and the priest orders the penitent, if not a woman, to uncover his head even though he wear a crown: he then prays with him: after that he raises him and bids him recover his head, and sits with him, and asks him what penance he can bear. The Penitential of Joannes Monachus directs that the priest should invite the penitent into a church or some other retired spot, with a cheerful countenance, as though he were inviting him to some magnificent feast, and exhort him to make a confession of his sins to him: the priest should then recite with him the 69th Psalm, and the Trisagion, and bid him uncover his head, and neither should sit down before the priest has minutely investigated all that is in his heart. The penitent should afterwards prostrate himself on the earth and lie there, while the priest prays for him: the priest is then to raise him and kiss him, and lay his hand upon his neck and comfort him, after that they are to sit together. Alcuin, or the author of De Divinis officiis, orders the penitent coming to confess to bow humbly to the priest, who is then on his own behalf to say "Lord be merciful to me a sinner," and afterwards to order the penitent to sit opposite to him, and speak to him about his sins; the penitent is then to rehearse the articles of his faith, and afterwards kneel and raise his hands, and implore the priest to intercede with God for all the sins which have been omitted in the confession; he is then to prostrate himself on the ground, and the priest is to suffer him to lie there awhile, and afterwards raise him and impose a penance upon him: afterwards the penitent is again to prostrate himself, and ask the priest to pray that he may have grace given him to persevere in performing his penance: the priest then offers a prayer, which is followed by six others, which are found in all the Western Penitentials; the penitent then rises from the ground and the priest from his seat, and they enter the church together, and there conclude the penitential service. Compare Morinus (de Poenit. iv. 18-19).

Literature.—Morinus (de Poenit. lib. ii. et passim) who is however hampered by the Roman doctrine of obligatory confession, and contains far fewer details on this than on the other stages of discipline. What is to be said on the distinctively Roman side of the controversy will be found in Bellarmine (de Poenit. lib. iii.); and on the Protestant side in Ussher (Answer to a Challenge, s.v. Confession, Lond. 1825). The subject is more thoroughly treated from the same side in Daille (de Auric. Confess. Genév. 1861), a very learned controversial work, and the source of most of the subsequent Protestant writings, which deal with confession. Also Bingham (Aniq. xviii. 3), Marshall (Penitential Discipline), and a long note on confession, founded on Daille, appended by the editor of the Oxf. Lib. of Fathers to Tertullian (de Poenit.). [G. M.]

EXONARTHEX (Ἐξωνάρθηξ). Monastic churches sometimes have (besides the ordinary NARTHEX at the west end) an outer narthex, where the monks may say those portions of their devotions which bear the character of penitence without being disturbed by the influx of the general congregation. Cedrenus says that the great church of St. Sophia at Constantinople had four nartheces, but other authorities attribute to it only two (Daniel, Codex Lit. iv. 202). [C.]

EXORCISM (ἐξορκισμός, ἐξορκισμὸς, ἀπορκισμὸς adjuration, incantatio) is the employment of adjuration, and especially the naming the name of Jesus Christ, with a view to expel an evil spirit. "Exorcismus est sermo increpationis contra immundum spiritum in argumentis sive catechumenis factus, per quem ab illis diaboli nequissima virtus et inveterata malitia vel excursio violenta fugetur" (Isidore, De Dis. Off. ii. 20).

1. To the early Christians the heathen world presented itself as under the dominion of evil spirits; everywhere they recognised the need of driving these spirits from their ancient seats, whether in the bodies and souls of men, in the brute creation, or in inanimate objects. They saw themselves surrounded by squadrons and groves of daemones, supernatural beings who worked for evil under their several captains (Origen, contra Celsum, bk. vii. p. 378, Spencer: viii. p. 398); daemons were the great officers of the evil world, and might well have fasces and toga praetexta (Tertullian, De Idolol. 18); the gods of the nations were daemones (ib. 20; Orig. c. Cels. p. 378, quoting Ps. xvi. 5); daemones were by some devilish magic compelled to inhabit the statues in an idol's temple (Minucius Felix, Oct. c. 27; Tert. u. s. 7 and 15; Orig. c. Cels. vii. p. 374); the theatre was the very special dominion of evil spirits (Tertul. de Spectac. 26). Demons ruled the flight of birds, the lots, the oracles; they troubled men's minds, disturbed their rest, crept with their subtle influence into bodies and caused disease, distorted limbs; they compelled men to worship them, in order that, fed with the savour of the offerings, they might release those whom they had bound (Minucius, Oct. c. 27). And the members of this great supernatural army were driven from their seats by the mere word of a simple Christian naming over them the name of Christ (Acts xix. 13; Justin Martyr, Apol. ii. c. 8; Dial. v. Trypho, c. 85; Tertul. ad Scorpulam, cc. 2 and 4, Apol. c. 23; Orig. c. Cels. iii. p. 153) with no parade of incantations or magic formulae, by mere prayers and adjurations (ἐπαράσεις, Orig. c. Cels. vii. p. 334), or by sentences of Scripture (ib. p. 376); and that not only from the bodies and souls of men, but from haunted places and from the lower animals; for these too fell under the tyranny of demons (l. c.). From such expressions as these it is evident that exorcism was practised from a very early period in the church.

In one form, indeed, exorcism was practised by the Lord Himself and His disciples, namely, in the casting out of evil spirits from those who were in a special sense "possessed" or "demoniac"; and such exorcism was continued for some generations in the church [DEMONIAC: EXORCIST]. But we are at present concerned with the more general form of exorcism, by which the inherent evil demon was to be expelled from some creature or substance not specially "possessed," but belonging to the "evil world."

2. It is not wonderful that when the minds of men were full of the conception of an all-pervading army of evil spirits in the world around them, they should endeavour to free from this influence those whom they received from heathenism into the holy ground of the church. Hence, at a comparatively early period, we find candidates for baptism not only renouncing for themselves all allegiance to Satan and his powers, but having pronounced over them a formula of exorcism.

It is probable that in the first instance the use of exorcism was confined to the case of those who entered the church from heathenism; but in the 4th century, if not earlier, it was clearly applied to all, for it is constantly appealed to as a conclusive proof that the church recognized the presence of original sin even in infants. Thus Optatus (c. Donatist iv. 6, p. 75) insists that no one, even though born of Christian parents, can be destitute of a foul spirit, which must be driven out of the man before he comes to the font of salvation; this is the work of exorcism, by which the foul spirit is driven forth into the wilderness. And pope Celestinus (Ad Episcop. Gall. c. 12) says that none came to baptism, whether infants or "juvenes," until the evil spirit had been driven out of them by the exorcisms and insufflations of the clerics. Compare Augustine, Epist. 194, ad Sixtum, § 46; De Symbolo ad Catechumenos, i. 5; Contra Julianum, i. 4.

Cyril of Jerusalem (Proochechesis c. 9, p. 7; Catech. i. c. 5, p. 18) begs his catechumens to be earnest in receiving their exorcisms (ἐπορκισμοῖς); whether they had been insufflated or exorcised (κὴν ἐμπίσηθῆς κὴν ἐπορκισθῆς), he prays that they may be blessed. And again (c. 13) he says, "when ye have entered before the hour of the exorcisms, let every one speak things that conduce to piety," as if the exorcisms began the catechetical office on each occasion. These instructions are evidently for all the catechumens, and not for those only who had come over from heathenism. And Chrysostom (Catech. I. ad Initian. c. 2, p. 227) speaks of the catechumens, after instruction, proceeding to hear the words of those who exorcise (τῶν ἐπορκιστῶν); to this exorcism they went barefooted and stripped of their upper garments. There can of course be no doubt that the great body of those whom Chrysostom catechised were born of Christian families.

3. Formulae of Exorcism.—Celsus, who wrote against the Christians probably in the middle of the 2nd century, says that he had seen in the possession of certain presbyters "barbaric books containing names of daemons and gibberish (τετρακεῖαι)" (Orig. c. Celsum, vi. p. 302); and again the same opponent says that, "to name the demons in the barbarous tongue (βαρβάρως) is efficacious; to name them in Greek or Latin is useless" (ib. viii. p. 402). Origen, in answer to this, alleges that Latin, Greek, or other Christians in their prayers use the name of God in the tongue in which they were born; but he does not deny the superior efficacy of names or formulae in one language over those in another. On the contrary, he admits (ib. i. p. 19) the mystic power of Hebrew names, and declares that Egyptian, Persian, and other names have a peculiar efficacy over certain demons; and elsewhere (In Matt. ser. 110, p. 232, ed. Wirceb.) complains that those who practised exorcisms (adjurationibus) used improper books, as, for instance, books derived from Jewish sources. From all this it seems clear that formulae of exorcism which to a Roman seemed "barbaric" were in use in the 2nd century. That written forms of exorcism were used in the 4th is clear from the 7th of the Statuta Antiqua [Conc. Carth. IV.], which orders the bishop to deliver to an EXORCIST on ordination a book containing such forms.

With regard to the form of exorcism, we find in ancient authorities the following particulars.

We have already seen that to name the name of Christ was regarded as being of the utmost efficacy for the expulsion of evil spirits. The passage of Justin Martyr (Dial. c. 85; compare c. 30) which says that every spirit (δαμόνιον) is conquered and subjected on being adjured "by the Name of the Son of God and first-born of every creature, Who was born of the Virgin and became Man capable of suffering (παθητοῦ), was crucified under Pontius Pilate by your [the Jewish] people, and died, and rose again from the dead, and ascended into heaven," renders it probable that a recitation of the redeeming acts of the Lord accompanied the naming of his name. And the same thing seems to be indicated by the words of Origen (c. Cels. l. p. 7), who says that demons were expelled by the name of Jesus, "together with the recitation of the acts related of Him" (μετὰ τῆς ἀπαγγελίας τῶν περὶ αὐτὸν ἱστοριῶν). See Probst, p. 49.

The words of Tertullian again (Apol. 23), that the power of Christians over evil spirits derives its force from naming Christ, "and from the making mention of those punishments which await them from God through Jesus Christ the judge," make it probable that the awful punishment which was to overtake the evil ones was spoken of in the formula of exorcism. So Tertullian: "representatione ignis illius" (Apol. 23). And if in another passage—"Satanas . . . quem nos dicimus malitiae angelum" . . . (De Testin. Animae, c. 3)—we are to take "dicimus" in a ritual sense, it would appear that the exorcists of Tertullian's time cursed and reviled Satan.

That prayer was added to the exorcism proper we know from the testimony of Minucius Felix (Octav. c. 27, § 5).

The actions which formed part of the rite of exorcism were touching and breathing on the afflicted, and signing them with the cross.

As to the first, Tertullian tells us (Apol. 23), that the evil spirits depart unwillingly from the bodies of men at the touch and on-breathing of Christians (de contactu deque afflatu nostro). Vincentius of Thibari (Sententiae Episcoporum, No. 37, in Cyprian's Works), contending that heretics require baptism at least as much as heathens, distinctly refers to the imposition of hands in exorcism, quoting (incorrectly) Mark xvi. 17, 18. So Origen (on Joshua, Hom. 24, c. 1) speaks of the imposition of the hands of the exorcists which evil spirits could not resist. Similarly the Arabic canons of Hippolytus (Can. 19, § 6, and Can. 29, quoted by Probst, p. 50). The same canon enjoins the exorcist, after the adjurations, to "sign" (no doubt with the cross) the breast, forehead, ears, and mouth. And at an even earlier date, when Justin (Dial. c. 131) speaks of the outstretched arms of Moses as a type of Christ, and then immediately after of the power of Christ crucified over evil spirits, it is not improbable that he alludes to the use of the sign of the cross. So when we read (Origen on Exodus, Hom. 6, § 8) how the demons tremble before the cross which they see on Christians, we may well believe that the reference is to the use of the cross in exorcism. Lactantius (Div. Inst. iv. 27) distinctly mentions the use of the sign of the cross (signum passionis) for the expulsion of evil spirits. The first council of Constantinople (c. 7) describes the course of proceeding with those heretics who were to be received as non-Christians (ὁὶ ἑταῖροι) as follows: "the first day we make them Christians; the second, catechumens; then the third we exorcise them, after breathing thrice upon the face and ears, and so we catechise them, and cause them to stay in the church and hear the Scriptures; and then we baptize them."

The ceremony took place in the church. "Shameless is he," says Pseudo-Cyprian (De Spectac. c. 4), "who exorcises in a church demons whose delights he favours in a theatre." During the exorcism the patient lay prostrate on the ground (Origen on Matt. Hom. 13, § 7).

Most of the characteristics of the form of exorcism which we have traced in ancient times are found in existing rituals. For instance, in the ancient Roman form of receiving a heathen as a catechumen (Daniel, Codex Lit. i. 171), after the admonition to renounce the devil and believe in the Holy Trinity, the priest "exufflat ab eo saevam maligni spiritus potestatem dicens—'Exi, immunde spiritus, et da locum Spiritui Sancto Paracleti.'" Then he signs him with the cross on the forehead and breast. At the seventh scrutiny [SCRUTINIUM], which took place on Easter Eve, after the recitation of the Creed by the candidates for baptism, the priest lays his hand on the head of each severally, saying—"Nec te lateat, Satanas, imminere tibi tormenta, imminere tibi diem iudicii, diem supplici, diem qui venturus est velut clibanus ardens, in quo tibi atque universis angelis tuis aeternus veniet interitus. Proinde, damnate, da honorem Deo vivo et vero: da honorem Jesu Christo filio ejus et Spiritui Sancto, in cujus nomine atque virtute principio tibi ut ex eas et recedas ab hoc famulo Dei, quem hodie Dominus Deus noster Jesus Christus ad suam sanctam gratiam et benedictionem fontemque baptismatis vocare dignatus est, ut fiat ejus templum per aquam regenerationis in remissionem omnium peccatorum: in nomine Domini nostri Jesu Christi, qui venturus est judicare vivos et mortuos et saeculum per ignem" (Daniel, u. s. 177). Then follows the epheta [EARS, TOUCHING OF], and the anointing on the breast and between the shoulders with holy oil.

In the Vetus Missale Gallicanum, published by Thomasius and reprinted by Mabillon (Lit. Gal. bk. iii. p. 338) the essential part of the form of exorcism is as follows: "Aggredior te, immundissime damnate spiritus . . . Te, invocato Domini nostri Jesu Christi nomine, . . . adjuramus per ejusdem majestatem adque virtutem, passionem ac resurrectionem, adventum adque iudicium; ut in quacunque parte membrorum latitas propria te confessione manifestes, exagatusque spiritalibus flagris invisibilibusque tormentis vas quod occupasse aestimas fugas expiatumque post habitationem tuam Domine derelinquas . . . Abscede, abscede quocunque es, et corpora Deo dicata ne repetas. Interdicta sunt tibi ista in perpetuum. In nomine Patris et Filii et Spiritus Sancti, et in gloria dominicae passionis, cujus cruce salvantur, cujus adventum expectant, iudicium constituentur. Per Dominum."

The Gelasian Sacramentary (i. 33), in the Exorcismi super Electos,^a gives the following form. The acolytes, laying their hands on the candidate, after praying God to send forth His angel to keep them, proceeds: "Ergo, maledicte diabole, recognosce sententiam tuam, et da honorem Deo vivo et vero, et . . . Jesu Christo Filio ejus et Spiritui Sancto; et recede ab his fumulis Dei; quia istos sibi Deus . . . vocare dignatus est: per hoc signum sanctae crucis, frontibus eorum quod nos damus, tu, maledicte diabole, nunquam audeas violare. . . . Audi, maledicte Satanas, adjuratus per nomen aeterni Dei et Salvatoris nostri Filii Dei, cum tua victus invidia, tremens gemensque discede."

And again, the foul spirit is adjured to depart, in the case of the males, in the name of Him who walked the water and stretched out His right hand to Peter; in the case of the females, in the name of Him who gave sight to him that was born blind, and raised Lazarus from his four days' death.

The form given from the Roman ritual by Probst (p. 53) presents a remarkable parallelism with the passage of Tertullian (Apol. c. 23) before referred to.

Greek forms similar in character to those given above may be seen in Daniel's Codex Liturg. iv. 493 f.

4. Representation of Exorcism.—Paciardi (De Christianorum Balneis, pp. 136 ff., 143 ff.) describes an urn or water-vessel found near Pisa, which he believes to be not of later date than the 7th century. One of the bas-reliefs on this vessel (see woodcut) evidently represents an exorcism. The contortions of the person on the ground seem to show that it was an exorcism of one possessed. Now, if the vessel was a font for holding the baptismal water, it would seem more appropriate to represent upon it the ordinary pre-baptismal exorcism. It seems therefore more probable that it was intended for the

^a i. e. the accepted candidates for baptism.

ATRIUM of a church, where it might be used to contain HOLY WATER.

5. Besides human beings, various inanimate objects were exorcised. Of these we may mention especially water [BAPTISM, §§ 30, 42: FONT, BENEDICTION OF: HOLY WATER], salt for use in sacred offices [SALT, BENEDICTION OF], and oil for various uses [CHRISM: OIL, HOLY].

EXORCISTS. Exorcists are only once mentioned in the New Testament (Acts xix. 13), and then without any reference to the power given to Christians to cast out devils. [See DICT. OF BIBLE.] In the early days of the church, it appears to have been considered that the power of exorcising evil spirits was a special gift of God to certain persons, who are therefore called exorcists. In the Apostolic Constitutions (viii. c. 26), it is said that an exorcist is not ordained, because the power of exorcising is a free gift of the grace of God, through Christ, and that whoever has received this gift will be made manifest in the exercise of it. It is added that if expedient an exorcist may be ordained bishop, priest, or deacon. Exorcists are not named among those who received ecclesiastical stipends, nor are they mentioned in the Apostolic Canons, though probably their office is alluded to in the direction that a Gentile convert who has an evil spirit may not be received into the church till he has been purified (καθαρισθῆις, Can. 70). Thomassin (Vet. et Nov. Eccl. Discip. i. 2, c. 30, § 1, 8), thinks that exorcists were either priests or deacons. So Eusebius makes mention of one Romanus, as deacon and exorcist in the church of Caesarea in Palestine (De Martyr. Palest. c. 2).

Tertullian speaks as if all Christians were exorcists, driving away evil spirits by the exorcisms of their prayers. Thus (De Idol. c. 11), he forbids Christians to have anything to do with the sale of things used for the purposes of idolatry, asking with what consistency they could exorcise their own inmates, to whom they had offered their houses as a shrine (cellarium); and in another place (De Cor. Mil. c. 11), uses as an argument against Christians entering the military service, that they might be called upon to guard the heathen temples, so as to defend those by night whom by their exorcisms they had put to flight during the day.

But it is evident that in later times they were reckoned among the minor orders of clergy. Cyprian (Ep. 69, Mag. Fil.), speaks of exorcists as casting out devils by man's word and God's power, and in his epistle to Firmilian (Ep. 75), says that one of the exorcists, inspired by the grace of God, cast out a certain evil spirit who had made pretensions to sanctity. Cornelius in his epistle (Euseb. H. E. i. c. 43) names forty-two exorcists among the clergy of the church of Rome. Epiphanius (Expos. Fid. c. 21), mentions them among the clergy, ranking them with the hermeneutae, immediately after the deaconesses. Paulinus of Nola (De S. Felix. Natal. arm. 4), speaks of St. Felix as having been promoted from the order of lectors to the office of exorcist. The council of Laodicea (c. 24), mentions them among the minor clergy, placing them between the singers and the doorkeepers, and, in another canon (c. 26), forbids any to exorcise either in church or in private houses, who had not been appointed to the office by the bishops. The council of Antioch (c. 10), places them after the subdeacons, among the clergy who might be appointed by the chorepiscopi. The 4th council of Carthage (c. 7), provides an office for the ordination of an exorcist. He was to receive from the hands of the bishop a book, in which were written forms of exorcism, with the bidding, "Take and commit to memory, and receive power to lay hands on energumens whether baptized or catechumens." The same council also provided that exorcists might lay hands on an energumen at any time (c. 90), and (c. 92) gave it into their charge to provide the energumens with their daily food while remaining in the church. [DEMONIACS.]

The names of four exorcists, designating themselves by no other titles, are found among the signatories of the first council of Arles (Routh's Reliq. Sac. iv. p. 312).

There seems little reason for connecting the exorcists with the form of exorcism that was used in the case of all catechumens. Their work, as expressly allotted to them by the 4th council of Carthage (c. 7), lay among all energumens, whether baptized or not. [P. O.]

EXPOSING OF INFANTS [compare FOUNDLINGS]. The frequency of the exposition of infants among the ancient heathens is a fact to which both the mythology and the history of Greece and Rome bear frequent witness. Among the early Christian writers we find exposition, together with actual infanticide, constantly cast in the teeth of their Pagan opponents. "I see you," writes Minucius Felix, "now casting forth the sons whom ye have begotten to the wild beasts and to the fowls of the air" (Octavius, c. 30, § 2; 31, § 4). Lactantius (bk. vi. c. 20) inveighs against the false pity of those who expose infants. Justin, Tertullian, Augustine and others might be quoted to much the same effect.

A law of Alexander Severus, which has been retained in Justinian's Code (bk. viii. t. lii. l. i.; A.D. 225), allowed the recovering of an infant exposed against the will or without the knowledge of the owner or person entitled to the services of its mother, whether slave or adscriptitiis, but only on condition of repaying the fair cost of its maintenance and training to a trade, unless theft could be established—an enactment obviously framed only to secure the rights of slave-owners, and not inspired by any consideration of humanity for the infants themselves. There is something of a higher spirit in a law of Diocletian and Maximian, A.D. 295 (Code, bk. v., t. iv., l. 16), enacting that where a female infant had been cast forth by her father and brought up by another person, who sought to marry her to his own son, the father was bound to consent to the marriage, or in case of refusal (if we construe the text aright), to pay for his daughter's maintenance. Constantine (A.D. 331), by a law contained in the Theodosian Code (bk. v., t. vii., l. 1), but not reproduced by Justinian, enacted that whoever took up an infant cast forth from its house by the will of a father or master, and nourished it till it became strong, might retain it in whatever condition he pleased, either as a child or as a slave, without any fear of recovery by those who have voluntarily cast out their new-born slaves or children. The growth of Christian humanity is shown in a constitution of Valentinian, Valens and Gratian, adopted by Justinian (Code, bk. viii., t. lii., l. 2; A.D. 374), which absolutely forbade masters or patrons to recover infants exposed by themselves, if charitably saved by others, and laid down as a duty that every one must nourish his own offspring. A constitution of Honorius and Theodosius, in the Theodosian Code (A.D. 412), repeated the prohibition, observing that "none can call one his own whom he condemned while perishing," but required a bishop's signature by way of attestation of the facts (bk. v., t. vii., l. 2).

The law just referred to may seem in some degree to explain a canon of the council or synod of Vaison, A.D. 442. There is a universal complaint, it says, on the subject of the exposition of infants, who are cast forth not to the mercy of others, but to the dogs, whilst the fear of lawsuits deters others from saving them. This therefore is to be observed, that according to the statutes of the princes the church be taken to witness; from the altar on the Lord's day the minister is to announce that the church knows an exposed infant to have been taken up, in order that within ten days any person may acknowledge and receive it back; and any who after the ten days may bring any claim or accusation is to be dealt with by the church as a manslayer (cc. 9, 10). A canon almost to the same effect, but in clearer language, was enacted by the slightly later 2nd council of Arles, A.D. 452, indicating that which serves to explain both the law of Honorius and the two canons just referred to, viz., that it was the practice to expose infants "before the church" (c. 51). The council of Agde, in 506, simply confirmed former enactments.

In the East, the full claims of Christian humanity were at last admitted by Justinian, as towards foundlings themselves, though without sufficient consideration for parental duties. He not only absolutely forbade the re-vindication of exposed infants under any circumstances, but also the treating of them, by those who have taken charge of them, either as slaves, freedmen, coloni or adscriptitii, declaring such children to be absolutely free (Code, bk. viii., t. lii., l. 3; A.D. 529; see also bk. i., t. iv., l. 24; A.D. 530). This applied to infants cast away either in churches, streets or any other place, even though a plaintiff should give some evidence of a right of ownership over them (bk. viii., t. lii., l. 4). The 153rd Novel, however, shows that it was still the practice in certain districts (Thessalonica is specified) to expose new-born infants in the churches, and after they had been brought up to reclaim them as slaves; and it again expressly enacts the freedom of exposed infants.

The Visigothic law contains some rather remarkable provisions as to the exposition of infants (bk. iv., t. iv., cc. 1, 2). Where a person has out of compassion taken up a foundling of either sex, wherever exposed, and when it is nourished up the parents acknowledge it, if it be the child of a free person, let them either give back a slave in its place or pay the price of one; otherwise, let the foundling be redeemed by the judge of the territory from the ownership of the parents, and let these be subject to perpetual exile. If they have not wherewithal to pay, let him serve for the infant who cast it forth, and let the latter remain in freedom, whom the pity of strangers has preserved. If indeed slaves of either sex have cast forth an infant in fraud of its masters, when he has been nourished up, let the nourisher receive one-third of its value, the master swearing to or proving his ignorance of the exposing. But if he knew of it, let the foundling remain in the power of him who nourished it.

In a collection of Irish canons, ascribed to the end of the 7th century, is one "on infants cast forth in the church," which enacts, in very uncouth and obscure Latin, that such an infant shall be a slave to the church unless sent away; and that seven years' penance is to be borne by those who cast infants forth (bk. xii., c. 22).

A capitulary of uncertain date (supposed about 744) enacts, in accordance with the canon of the synod of Vaison before referred to, that if an infant exposed before the church has been taken up by the compassion of any one, such person shall affix—probably on the church door—a letter of notice (contestatiois ponat . . . epistolam). If the infant be not acknowledged within ten days, let the person who has taken it up securely retain it (c. 1).

The "Lex Romana," supposed to represent the law of the Roman population of Italy in Lombard times, contains a less liberal provision on this subject, founded on the earlier imperial law. If a new-born infant has been cast out by its parents either in the church or in the precincts (platea), and any one with the knowledge of the father or mother and of the master has taken it up and nourished it by his labour, it shall remain in his power who took it up. And if a person knew not its father or mother or master, and wished nevertheless to take it up, let him present the infant before the bishop (pontificem) or the clerics who serve that church, and receive from the hand of that bishop and those clerks an epistola collectio, and thenceforth, let him have power either to give such infant liberty, or to retain it in perpetual slavery (bk. v., t. vii.). [J. M. L.]

EXPULSION FROM A MONASTERY.

So soon as there began to be any sort of discipline among the ascetics who dwelt together in a community, expulsion inevitably became a necessary part of it. In the so-called "Rule of Pachomius," expulsion (or a flogging) was the penalty for insubordination, licentiousness, quarrelling, covetousness, gluttony (cf. Cass. Inst. i. 14). Menard, however, thinks that this was only expulsion for a stated time (Bened. Antiqu. Concord. Regg. xxxi. 5). By the Regula Orientalis

(c. 35) obstinate offenders are to be expelled. Benedict, with characteristic prudence, prescribed expulsion for contumacy (Reg. c. 71), on the principle that the gangrened limb must be lopped off, lest the rest of the body should be infected with the poison (ib. c. 28), while with characteristic gentleness he allowed such offenders to be re-admitted, if penitent, so often as thrice, on condition of their taking the lowest place among the brethren (ib. c. 29). Some commentators, however, take this permission as not extending to the case of a monk expelled for such vices as could hardly fail to corrupt the community (Mart. Reg. Comm. loc. cit.). The Benedictine reformers generally made expulsion more common and readmission more difficult. Fructuosus orders all incorrigible offenders to be expelled (Reg. cc. 8, 16); and the Regula Cujusdam, still more severe, enacts expulsion for lying, fornication, persistent murmuring, and even abusive language (cc. 6, 8, 16, 18). At a later period, under the stern discipline of Cîteaux, a monk was to be unfrocked and expelled, even for theft above a certain value (Mart. Reg. Comm. c. 33). Obviously the frequency or infrequency of such a penalty as expulsion depended on the monastery being regarded rather as a reformatory or as a place of ideal perfection. [I. G. S.]

EYES, TOUCHING OF. 1. The first council of Constantinople (A.D. 381) laid it down (c. 7) that Arians and certain other heretics were to be received into the church, without rebaptism, on renouncing their heresy and being crossed or anointed with holy unguent (μύρον) on the forehead, eyes, &c. So in the form of baptism given by Daniel (Codex Lit. iv. 507) from the Greek Euchologion, the priest after baptism anoints the neophyte with holy unguent, making the sign of the cross on forehead, eyes, nostrils, mouth, ears, breast, hands, and feet, saying, "the seal of the gift of the Holy Spirit. Amen." Compare Martene, De Rit. Ant. I. i. 17, Ord. 24, 25.

2. In extreme unction, the eyes are anointed with holy oil. Thus, in the Ratold MS. of the Gregorian Sacramentary (p. 549, ed. Ménard), the priest is directed to anoint the eyes, with the words: "Ungo oculos tuos de oleo sanctificato, ut quicquid illicito visu deliquisti per hujus olei unctionem expietur."

3. It seems to have been the custom to touch the eyes, as well as the other organs of sense, with the moisture remaining on the lips after communicating (Cyril of Jerusalem, Catech. Myst. v. 22: see COMMUNION, HOLY, p. 413; EARS, TOUCHING OF). [C.]

Mention of this is occasionally found in various monastic rules. It is appointed as part of the furniture of a monk's couch in the Rule of St. Isidore (c. 14; p. 127, part 2, in Holstenius, Codex Regularum; ed. Paris, 1663). See also Magistri Regula, cc. 17, 19, 81 (op. cit. pp. 214, 216, 257). The last passage ordains that there shall be dealt out "singula facietergia per decadam." Gregory of Tours (Vitae Patrum, viii. 8; p. 1191, ed. Ruinart) speaks of the value set upon the "facietergium dependentibus villis intextum, quod Sanctus [i.e. Nicetius Lugdunensis] super caput in die obitus sui habuit." The facietergium used by nuns were at times embroidered (Caesarii Regula ad Virgines, c. 42; Holstenius, part 3, p. 22). Again, Venantius Fortunatus, in his life of St. Radegundis of France, describes her on one occasion as "circa altare cum facietergio jacentem pulverem colligens" (c. 2; Patrol. lxxii. 653). One more example may suffice, where the word, perhaps, appears in the transitional state of its meaning: "donata etiam particula sancti orarii, id est facialis" (Hypomnesticon de Anastasio Apocrimario, etc., in Anast. Biblioth. Collectanea: Patrol. cxxix. 685). For further examples, see Ducange's Glossarium, s. vv. [R. S.]

FAITH. [SOPHIA.]

FAITHFUL. The present article is intended to give an account of the principal names applied to Christians in early times, whether by themselves or by others.

The names most common among Christians in the apostolic and sub-apostolic ages seem to have been Saints (ἅγιοι), Elect (ἐκλεκτοί), Brethren (ἀδελφοί), and Faithful (πίστοι), often followed by the words, ἐν ᾧ Ἰησοῦ Χριστῷ.

The words πίστοις and Fideles were also used in a special sense to distinguish the baptized
Christian from the catechumen. Thus Augustine (Tract. in Joan. 44, c. 9) says that if a man tells us that he is a Christian, we have to ask further, whether he is catechumen or "fidelis." Hence such an inscription as CHRISTIANA FIDELIS (Le Blant, Inscript. de la Gaule, i. 373) is not a mere pleonasm. So the council of Elvira (C. Elib.
c. 67) seems to distinguish between "fidelis" and "catechumena." In the liturgies, the portion of the office at which catechumens were not allowed to be present was called Missa Fidelium, and the Lord's Prayer Fidelium Oratio. See Suicer's Thesaurus, s. v. Πιστός. Eusebius (Præp.
Evang. i. 1) repudiates the charge that Christians were called πίστοι from their credulity.

Fidelis is a frequent epithet in inscriptions, particularly in the case of young children, who might otherwise be supposed to have died un-baptized. Thus an inscription given by Maran-goni (Acta S. Victorini, 103) runs thus: HIC
REQUIESCIT IN PACE FILIPPUS || INFAS FIDELIS.
Similar inscriptions are given in the case of a child who died at the age of a year and nine months (Ib. p. 109), and of another who died at the age of five years and five months (Ib. p. 96).
Another may be seen in Cavedoni (Ant. Cimit. di
Chiusi, p. 33). On a marble at Florence (Gori, Inscr. Ant. Etrur. iii. 314) it is said of a child of three years and three months, ΠΙΣΤΗ ΕΤΕΛΕΥ- ΤΗΘΕΝ. In one case given by Marini (Frat.
Arval. p. 171), the inscription describes an ancestress (major) begging baptism for a child at the point of death: PETIVIT AD ECCLIA UT FIDELIS DE SECVLO RECECISSET (i. e. recederet).
In another case (Oderico, Inscr. Vet. p. 267), one of two brothers, who died at eight years old, is described as ΝΕΟΠΙΤΗΣ, while the brother, who died at seven, is described as FIDELIS. And again a guardian described as FIDELIS, erects a monument to a nursing who was yet among the "audientes" or catechumens: ALVΜΝΑΕ ΑΥΔΙΕΝΤΙ (Gori, u. s. l. 228).

Such inscriptions as VIXIT IN PACE FIDELIS, or REQUIESCIT FIDELIS IN PACE, are too common to need particularizing (Martigny, Dict. des Antiq. Chret. s. v. Fidelis).

Other names given to Christians were perhaps either (1) Designations of some peculiarity of their practice or profession, rather than recognized titles; more epithets than names; or (2) names given them by the outside world, either in derision or by mistake.

I. Under the first head may be classed (a) Ἰεσοῖται, Jesuaites, a name which Epiphanius (Haer.
29, s. 4) says may be derived from Jesus, or (as seems far-fetched and improbable) from Jesus, the father of David. Epiphanius (u. s.) considers this name earlier than that of "Christian."

Another such name was (b) γινωσκτοί, applied to Christians by Clement of Alexandria (Strom.
i. p. 294; ii. p. 383; vi. p. 665; vii. p. 748) as having the true knowledge. Later we find Athanasius (ap. Socrat. Hist. Eccl. iv. 23) using the term of the Ascetics of Egypt, and Socrates (ibid.) tells us that Evagrius Ponticus wrote a book for the use of these Ascetics, called "The Gnostic, or Rules for the Contemplative Life."

(c) Θεοφόροι, a name claimed by Ignatius in his interview with Trajan (Acta Ignat. ap. Græb-Spirit. t. ii. p. 10), because he "carried Christ in his heart," and seemingly conceded especially to him, was commonly used of all Christians, as Pearson (Vind. Ignat. par. ii. c. 12, p. 387) shows by quotations from many writers of the 2nd century.

Clement of Alexandria, agreeing about the meaning of the name, gives the varieties of it Θεοφορίαν and Θεοφοροῦμενος, and Eusebius (vii.
10) quotes a letter of Phileas, bishop of Thmuis, to his flock, in which he calls the martyrs Χρη-τοφόροι.

(d) St. Ambrose (de obit. Valentin. t. iii. p. 12) speaks of Christians as Χρηστί, i. e. "anointed," and justifies his use of the title by reference to Ps. cv. 15, "nolite tangere Christos meos," all Christians receiving the unction of the Holy Spirit, and Jerome commenting on the passage (Ps. civ. [cv.]), justifies it by the same reference.

(e) The name Ecclesiastici was used within the Christian body (Bingham, i. 1. § 8) to distinguish the clergy from the laity, and with a modification of this meaning of the word Eusebius
(iv. 7) speaks of "ecclesiastical writers;" and it was also used of Christians generally in contrast to those who did not belong to the ἐκκλησία, i. e.
Jews, infidels, and heretics. Bingham quotes
Eusebius (iv. 7, v. 27), and Cyril of Jerusalem (Catech. 15, n. 4), as employing the word in this sense, and Valesius (not in Euseb. l. u. c. 20) finds the same use of it in "Origen, Epiphanius, Jerome, and others" [ECCLIASTICI].

(f) Bingham asserts that Christians were called οἱ τοῦ θόγγου, "They of the Faith," giving as his authority for this statement the rescript of Aurelian against Paul of Samosata, quoted by Eusebius (vii. 30), in which the bishops of Rome and of Italy are called ἐπι-σκοποι τοῦ θόγγου.

(g) Christians also called themselves CATHOLICI
[see the word]; and (4) Ψαριῶται, alluding to the mystic Fish [BAPTISM, p. 171; FISH].

It is to be observed, says Bingham (i. 1. § 6) that all these names express some relation to God or to Christ, and that none of them were taken from the names of men, as was the case with the heresies and sects. He quotes Chrysostom (Hom. 33 in Act.), Epiphanius (Haer. 42, Marcionit., also Haer. 10.), Gregory Nazianzen (Orat. 31, p. 506) and others as noticing these opposite tendencies. The name of Christian was neglected by the heretics for the names of their leaders, while the Christians thought it enough without any other title derived from parents, country, city, quality, or occupation; see the case of the deacon Sanctus martyred in the reign of Antoninus, related by Eusebius (v. 1).

II. Among the names given to Christians from without their body are probably to be reckoned

(1) Χριστοί, a name which would easily arise from a misunderstanding or mispronunciation of the name Χριστός, and was naturally not refused by Christians; referred to by Justin Martyr (Apol. i. 4), Lactantius (Inst. iv. 7), Tertullian (Apol. c. 3), and others.

(2) It was quite to be expected that they would be called Jews by the heathen world, and there is evidence of this. Bingham (i. i. § 10) refers to a passage in Dio's Life of Domitian, in which he speaks of the Christian martyr Oclius Glabrio (Baronius, an. 94, § 1), being put to death for turning to the Jews' religion.

Again, Suetonius says (Claud. c. 28) that Claudius "expelled the Jews from Rome because they made disturbances at the instigation of Chrestus;" and Spartianus (in Caracal. c. i.) says that Caracalla's playfellow was a Jew, Caracalla, according to Tertullian (ad Scapul. c. 4), having been "lacte Christiano educatus."

(3) There remains to be considered the word Christian, a name which differs from those already spoken of in being traceable to a particular locality, and with great probability to a particular year. The reason why the name arose when and where it did, is probably to be found in the long stay—"a whole year"—(Acts xi. 26) made in Antioch by Paul and Barnabas after their return from Tarsus, in the assembly of the church there for the same time, and in the publicity given to the teaching of Christ by frequent addresses to the people.

The question whether the Christians assumed the name themselves or received it from the Jews, or from the Gentiles, can only be determined with an approach to certainty.

(a) The only reason for thinking that the Christians assumed this name is the language of Acts xi. 26, κηρυχθέντες τε πρῶτον ἐν Ἀντιοχείᾳ τοῖς μαθηταῖς Χριστιανούς, because κηρυχθέντες, when used of acquiring a name generally means to assume one; but on the other hand, both in the Acts and in the Epistles, Christians speak of themselves as "brethren," "believers," "disciples," "saints," and only in three places in the N.T. is the word Christian used (Acts xi. 26, xxvi. 28; 1 Peter iv. 16), in only one of which, and there doubtfully, is the word used by Christians of themselves.

(b) Nor is it likely that the Jews would give them a name which would virtually concede the claim made by Christians, and so strenuously denied by Jews. For "Christ" being the Greek equivalent of "Messiah," to call the followers of Christ "Christians" would be to acknowledge Christ as the Messiah; nor would they have used so sacred a name in derision even for the sake of insulting a despised and hated sect. When they wanted to designate them, they used a name derived from a place they held in contempt (John i. 46, vii. 41; Luke xiii. 2), and called St. Paul "a ringleader of the sect of the 'Nazarenes'" (Acts xxiv. 5).

(c) But it is not unlikely that the Gentiles, seeing the wide aim of this new community, its readiness to admit all sorts of people, and even to dispense with the rite of circumcision in its converts, should have early come to distinguish it from the sects of the Jews, with which they very naturally at first confounded it, and so should have attached to it a new name. And this probability is increased when we remember that "Christ" was the title of the head of the new sect, represented his peculiar office to them, and was the name by which he was generally known in their letters and conversation. It would be adopted, of course, by the Gentiles from them, as we know it was (Tacit. Ann. xv. 44), and in a city like Antioch, "notorious for inventing names of derision, and for turning its wit into channels of ridicule" (cf. Procopius, Bell. Pers. ii. 8, quoted by Conybeare and Howson, vol. i. p. 130), the new society would soon get its name. The form of the word indicates its Roman origin (cf. Sullani, Pompeiani, and later Othoniani and Vitelliani), and that it was first used as a term of reproach may be gathered from the use made of it by Tacitus in the passage referred to above, "quos per flagitia invidiosus vulgus Christianos appellabat." The great increase in the number of Gentile converts would soon turn what was at first a nickname into a title of honour, and the predominance of Rome in the world naturally made the Roman name what it has become, the universal one. It is interesting to contrast with "Christian" the name "Jesuit," as unlike the other in its comparatively modern date and Greek form as in its history and significance.

See Conybeare and Howson (vol. i. p. 129 ff.), from whom this note on the word Christian is derived. [E. C. H.]

III. The following names were appellations of scorn, or "nick-names," given to Christians by their enemies.

1. That they should be called Atheists was inevitable in an empire in which the vulgar at least knew of no gods that could not be represented by art and man's device. And Atheism was in fact a common charge against them. See Athenagoras (Leg. pro Christ. c. 3) and Justin Martyr (Apol. I. c. 6). "Down with the Atheists" (αἰπε τοὺς ἀθετοὺς) was a mob-cry against the Christians (Euseb. H. E. iv. 15, § 6).

2. From the time that Christians were first recognised as a sect, they were contemptuously called Nazarenes (Acts xxiv. 5; Epiphanius; Haeres. 29, c. 1; Jerome on Isaiah XLIX; Prudentius, Peristeph. ii. 25). This no doubt at first designated the supposed origin of the Lord and the disciples from Nazareth; but the variety of ways in which the word is written (Ναζαρηνοί, Ναζαραῖοι, Ναζωραῖοι, Ναζωραῖοι, Ναζωραῖοι) seems to show that in later times various senses were attached to it. It was also, perhaps, sometimes used to designate a sect of Judaizing Christians, rather than the whole body of the church.

3. The name Galilaei was one which the philosophic emperor Julian (Epist. 7) endeavoured to fix upon the Christians (see Gregory Nazianzen, Orat. iii. p. 81; Socrates, H. E. iii. 12), meaning, no doubt, to express the contempt of a cultivated man for a sect which arose in a despised district of Palestine, among shepherds and fishermen. His last words were, according to Théodoret (H. E. iii. 21), νυκίηνας, Γαλιλαῖε, "Thou hast conquered, O Galilaean!" Cyril of Alexandria (c. Julian. iii. p. 39) sets himself to show that the name "Galilaean," if it implied roughness and want of culture, was no more applicable to Christians than to Julian family was relieved from some of its most galling burdens. This happy change, however, it must be remembered, depended entirely upon the personal feeling and will of the master; for slavery was not legally and publicly alleviated to any great extent, until the time of Justinian, who did much to promote its extinction, after which it was gradually discontinued or changed to serfdom (Milman, Hist. Christ. iii. 343, and Latin Christ. i. 391; and SLAVERY in this work). In the mean time Christians in general did not think it wrong to have bondmen in their service (Clem. Alex. Paedag. iii. 12).

But besides particular results of this nature, Christianity to some extent changed the general habits of men, and tended to make them more domestic and less public in their feelings and pursuits. More especially, while Christians were small communities separate and distinct from the general mass of the population, they felt it necessary to withdraw themselves in some degree from public affairs; they were less frequent in their attendance on courts of law; they could not, without scruples and repugnance, be present at many of the ordinary amusements and popular festivities, mixed up as they were with the idolatry and some of the worst moral abominations of paganism. Thus they were thrown back more upon the society of each other, and upon their own family life. And although afterwards, when the new religion became dominant, and was at length the religion of the people, the objections to public life greatly disappeared, the family life with its attractions and its virtues continued to maintain a wholesome influence, which has indeed never since been lost. (See Milman, Hist. Christ. iii. 134.)

But to look more closely at the family life of Christianity, it must be observed that the abnegation of idolatry caused a displacement of the household and hearth gods—the Penates and Lares of the Romans,—together with all family rites which savoured of idol worship, and a substitution of Christian observances in their stead. And as it seems to have been the custom of religious Romans to offer their prayers the first thing in the morning, in the Lararium, or household shrine (Lampridius, Alex. Sever. 29. 31); so family prayer, in which the different members of a Christian household joined, appears to have had its place from the beginning of the new religion. Such united prayer seems to be alluded to in the remark, "that your prayers be not hindered" (1 Pet. iii. 7). And Clement of Alexandria, at the end of the second century, testifies to the same thing when, commenting on the words, "where two or three are gathered together in my name," he says that the three mean a husband, a wife, and a child (ἄνδρα, καὶ γυναῖκα, καὶ τέκνον τοῦς τρεῖς λέγει, Stromat. iii. 10). And the same author speaks expressly of "prayer and reading of the Scriptures (εὐχὴ καὶ ἀνάγνωσις) in Christian families (Paedag. ii. 194).

It is evident from the words of Tertulian (ad Uxorem, ii. 4) and subsequently of Cyprian (De Lapsis, c. 26) that Christians were in the habit of taking home portions of the eucharistic bread, and eating a small piece of it every morning, as an act of devotion (EULOGIAE, p. 629).

The practice also of making the sign of the cross upon the forehead, to which at a later period so much efficacy was superstitiously ascribed, had become before the beginning of the third century a perpetually repeated ceremony in Christian families, being used "on getting up and going to bed, on putting on their clothes or their shoes, on walking out or sitting down, at table or at the bath;" in short in every act or movement of the day (see Tertullian de Cor. Mil. § 3). This little symbolical action may in the early times have been a useful memento to Christians in the midst of so many things of a contrary tendency, however much, like some other practices once innocent and salutary, it was subsequently used in the service of formalism and error. And the same desire of being constantly reminded of their Christian position led them to adorn their goblets with the figure of a shepherd carrying a lamb, and their seal-rings with a dove, an anchor, and other similar devices. (Neander, Hist. Christ. p. 399.)

Besides these there were other domestic observances which from time to time interested the piety as well as the natural affections of Christian households, especially those which were connected with the baptism of children, marriages, and funerals, more particularly noticed in separate articles [BAPTISM, CHILDREN, MARRIAGE, BURIAL]. Christians cherished the memory of departed relatives as those with whom they trusted to be reunited in rest and glory, and not unfrequently held family banquets over their remains in a room provided for that purpose [CELLA MEMORIAE].

But besides those festivals which were exclusively Christian, there were some celebrations of an older date, in which, as they were not mixed up with any idolatrous rites, Christian families might unite with their pagan neighbours, and which they might retain for their own use. Even Tertullian, who was so strict in forbidding all semblance of participation in idol worship, saw no objection to Christians joining in the domestic ceremony of "putting on the toga virilis," which corresponded with our "coming of age," or to their being present at weddings, or the "naming of children" (Nominalia or Dies Iustitici; Tertul. de Idolol. 16).

As the facility of divorce was a primary principle of corruption in Roman social and family life; so Christianity, having invested marriage with a religious sanctity, and not allowing divorcement under any circumstances, except those mentioned by Christ himself, drew more closely together not only the husband and wife, but all other members of the family.

The relationship between parents and children was greatly influenced for good. The barbarous practice of infanticide, which prevailed among the Greeks and Romans, was immediately discontinued. Under the old Roman law parents might at any time put their children to death, or sell them as slaves; but this severity was at once voluntarily softened in Christian families; and the power was afterwards taken away by Christian emperors; who further directed that in cases of great poverty, when parents might be tempted to sell their children, relief might be given them out of the public revenues, thus affording an example of an incipient poor-law (Cod. Theod. vi. 27, in Bingham, xvi. ix. 1).

Parental authority, however, and family ties were strongly upheld. Children were not al-

ally realised, when the most powerful natural affections were shattered, and Christians were betrayed and denounced by their nearest relatives and given up to the persecutor's sword. See an early instance of this in Justin Martyr, Apol. ii. 2. [G. A. J.]

FAMILY—THE HOLY. The subject which bears this title in modern art is generally a group consisting of the Virgin Mother bearing the Sacred Infant, of St. Joseph, and frequently of the younger St. John Baptist, and occasionally of St. Elizabeth. It is frequently treated in an academic or purely artistic spirit, and chosen mainly for the sake of opposing the age of St. Elizabeth or maturity of St. Joseph, to the high ideal of feminine, infantine, or youthful beauty in the Blessed Virgin, the infant or St. John. As a complete and isolated group of this kind the subject is hardly ever treated in art of the earliest Christian age, unless the three Orants given by Martigny (from Bosio Roma Sott. p. 279; see woodcut) are to be considered as representing it. He is inclined to think so, though Bosio, Aringhi, and Bottari consider the group as an ordinary Christian family in the attitude of prayer, and though the boy is more decidedly in that attitude than either the father or the mother. He mentions another lately discovered, but also somewhat conjectural monument, in the cemetery of St. Priscilla, and says that the subject occurs on sarcophagi of the South of France, naming one in the museum of Arles, No. 26, where St. Joseph leads the Saviour by the hand to the Virgin Mother, probably representing Luke ii. 48, "Son, why hast thou thus dealt with us?" FAMILY TOMBS. [CATACOMBS, p. 300; CELLA MEMORIAE; CEMETERY.]

FAN. [FABELLUM.]

FANATICI. From their frequenting Fana, shrines of heathen deities, all heathen were sometimes called "fanatici"; thus Clovis before his conversion, is said (Gesta Reg. Franc. c. 10), to have been "fanaticus et paganus." In a special sense, priests of idol-temples were "fanatici" (Iso Magister on Prudentius, quoted by Ducange, s.v.); and those who professed to prophesy by the aid of the demon attached to the place [EXORCISM; and see Jerome on Isaiah,

c. 6, and Augustine on Psalm 40]; these were condemned with others who practised such evil arts (Code, lib. ix. tit. 16, l. 4; Macri, Hierolex. s. v.; Bingham's Ant. xvi. v. 4). [C.]

FANDILA, presbyter, martyr at Cordova; commemorated June 13 (Mart. Usuardi). [W. F. G.]

FANON. (1.) A head-dress worn by the pope when he celebrated mass pontifically. It is described by Ciampini (Vet. Mon. i. 239) and Macri (Hierolex. s. v.) as a veil variegated, like the Mosaic ephod, with four colours, symbolising the four elements, put over the head after the pope was vested with the alb, and tied round the neck, forming a kind of hood, the tiara or other head-dress being put on above it. The lower part was concealed by the planeta (Bona, Rev. Liturg. i. 24, 15). Ciampini gives the annexed figure from a small brass statue on the doors of the oratory of St. John Baptist at the Lateran. At the Pedicularium the "Caerimoniale Romanum" directs that the pope should wear the fanon alone without the mitre.

(2.) The napkin or handkerchief, mappula, sudarium, used by the priest during the celebration of the mass to wipe away perspiration from the face, &c. (Bona, Rev. Liturg. i. 24, 5; Rab. Maur. de Inst. Cler. i. 18; Augusti, Handbch. der Christ. Arch. iii. 504). [FACITERGIUM.]

(3.) In later times the white linen cloth in which the laity made their oblations at the altar. "Populus dat oblationes suas, id est panem et vinum, et offerunt cum fanonibus candidis," Ordo Romanus; "cum fanonibus offerunt," Amalar. de offic. Miss.; Martene, de Eccl. rit. lib. i. c. 4, § 6; Augusti, u. s. ii. 649. The word is sometimes erroneously spelt "facones."

(4.) A still later use of the word is for the church banners, "vexilla Ecclesiastica," employed in processions. This is perhaps not earlier than the French and German writers of the 11th century (Augusti, u. s. iii. 348, 355).

(5.) The strings or lappets of the mitre (Willemain, Monuments inédits. pla. 68, 76, 90) [E. V.]

FARA, virgin, of Meaux; "Natalis" Dec. 7 (Mart. Usuardi). [W. F. G.]

FARO, bishop, and confessor at Meaux; commemorated Oct. 28 (Mart. Usuardi). [W. F. G.]

FAST OF CHRIST IN THE DESERT. THE, is commemorated in the Aethiopic Calendar on Feb. 4 (Daniel's Codes, iv. 252). [C.]

FASTING (nyorela, jejunium, abstinentia). Fasting was total or partial abstinence from food for a certain period; it also signified abstinence from pleasure, or from the celebration of birthdays or marriages or church festivals; and it had the further spiritual signification of abstinence from sin. See the passages collected in Gunning (Lent Fast, pp. 130-150) on the spiritual meaning of fasting.

1. The stated fasts of the Western church were these:

(i.) The great ante-paschal Fast of LENT (Quadragesima).

(ii.) The fasts of the first, fourth, seventh, and tenth months, called also EMBER FASTS, or the fasts of the four seasons (jejunia quatuor temporum).

(iii.) The weekly fasts of the STATIONS, Wednesday and Friday (feria quarta et sexta, stationes, semijejunia, tempus vel waparusuh).

(iv.) The ROGATIONS (rogationes, litanies).

(v.) The Vigils or Eves of holy days (pernoctationes, pervigilia).

2. The Greek church kept in addition to Lent three fasts of a week each: 1st the Fast of the Holy Apostles, immediately after Pentecost [APOSTLES' FESTIVALS AND FASTS]; 2nd the Fast of the Holy Mother of God (Sanctae Deiparae) in August; 3rd the Fast of the Nativity (Suicer Thesaurus s. v. myoria; Neale Introduction to Eastern Church, p. 731). Some have supposed (Morinus de Penit., Appendix, p. 124) that the Fast Sanctae Deiparae at one period lasted forty days, and began originally on 6th of July and afterwards on 1st of August, and that the Fast of the Nativity was also one of forty days, and began on 15th of November.

3. Other fasts had only a local or partial observance. The council of Eliberis (c. 23) introduced into Spain fasts of superposition (jejuniorum superpositiones) for every month in the year except July and August. It does not appear on what days of the month they were kept, but their name implies that they were something over and above the usual fasting days. Bingham (Antiq. xxi. 11 § 5) quotes from Philastrius the mention of a fast of three days before Epiphany. In the Dialogue of Egbert of York (Hadden and Stubbs' Councils and Eccl. Documents, vol. iii. p. 413) there is the appointment, in addition to the Ember fasts, of a period of twelve days before the Nativity to be spent in fastings, watchings, prayers, and alms; on which twelve days not only were the clergy but laity also, with their wives and households, exhorted to resort to their confessors. The seventeenth council of Toledo A.D. 694 (c. 6) orders litany-fasts (exomologeses) to be kept every month in the Spanish and Gallic churches to supplicate "for the safety of the sovereign, for the preservation of the people, and the pardon of their sins, and the expulsion of the devil from the hearts of the faithful." The fasts to be observed throughout the year in the western monasteries are given in detail by the second council of Tours (A.D. 567, c. 17): "From Easter to Pentecost let dinner be served to the brothers every day except on Rogation-days; after Pentecost let them fast an entire week; thence till the 1st of August let all, except those who are suffering from illness, fast three days a week, second, fourth, and sixth days. In August because the Missa Sanctorum is daily celebrated, let them eat their dinner; through the whole of September, October, and November, fast three days a week, and in December every day till the Nativity. And because between the Nativity and the Epiphany all days are festivals, with the exception of the three when private litanies are to be said, they shall eat their dinner; and from Epiphany to Lent fast three days a week."

4. Special fasting was occasionally ordered or advised in a diocese by the bishop, as Tertullian (de Jejun. c. 13), after he became a Montanist unwillingly bears witness. It was also one of the means used for preparing for the reception of a sacred ordinance. Fasting before Holy Communion, if not invariable, had become a common practice in the 4th century [COMMUNION]. Fasting before baptism can be traced to a much earlier date. Justin Martyr (Apolog. i. 61) mentions among the customs of the Christian church that candidates "are taught to pray fasting, we fasting and praying with them." Tertullian (de Bapt. c. 20) exhorts those who are about to receive baptism to pray with frequent prayers and fastings. And the fourth council of Carthage, A.D. 398 (c. 85), appoints abstinence from wine and meat among the preparations for baptism (Apost. Const. vii. 22). The only authority which Martene (de Rit. viii. 4) discovers for the practice of fasting before ordination is from Leo, who (Ep. ad Diosc.) with reference to ordinations taking place on Sunday, speaks of the Saturday's fast continuing both for candidates and bishop till the ordination was over. No notice of fasting before confirmation is to be found before the 13th century (Martene de Rit. iv. 1).

5. Penitential Fasting.—For the first 500 years fasting does not appear to have been imposed as a special penance, or to have taken place of other penitential exercises; but in all ages, so long as penitential discipline was in force, a penitent was required to abstain from delicacies of food as from all other bodily gratifications during his period of punishment. Tertullian (de Penit. c. 9) defines a true exomologesis to consist, among other duties, in "the use of simple things for meat and drink, and in cherishing prayer by fasts." Pacian (Paroen. ad Penit. c. 19) makes his penitent, when invited to a feast, reply, "These things belong to the happy, but as for me I have sinned against the Lord." In the 6th century fasting began to be inflicted as a special and separate mode of penance. One of the canons of the council of Agde, A.D. 506 (c. 60), appoints to those who lapse into heresy, in place of the longer term of penance allotted by the early church, a fast of two years, to be kept on the third day of the week without any break; if at least that is the meaning of the rather obscure language of the canon (ut biennio tertio sine relaxatione jejunent). The penance of fasting is found in the early British penitential canons attributed to Gildas; and in the Penitential of Theodore sentences of a fast of so many days or weeks, or even years, are very common (Penitential l. viii. 3, 4, 8, 9; xii. 8; xiv. 9), and no less so in the Penitential of Bede (iii. 5; vii. 11), and in that of Egbert (iv. 6; v. 3; xiii. 4). The crimes for which these sentences were inflicted in these early English penitential books are such as could exist only among a people just emerging from heathenism. In the Penitential of Theodore (II. xiv. 1.) is found the first notice of the appointment of three regular fasts of forty days in the year (tria legitima quadragesima), forty days before Easter, forty days before the Nativity, and forty days after Pentecost. The Rule of Chrodegang (c. 32) with reference to the same observance, orders confessions to be made at each of these three annual quadragesimal fasts. And the Capitularies of Charles the Great (vi. 184) repeat in identical words the injunction of Theodore on the three quadragesimal fasts, and add that "although some of them lack canonical authority, yet it is well for all of us together to observe this custom in accordance with the practice of the people and of our forefathers." These fasts were probably first appointed as appropriate penitential seasons for the performance of long periods of penance; afterwards, as may be inferred from the canon in the Capitularies, they came into partial use with the people at large. There is no evidence that they existed earlier than the 7th century, for the councils prior to Theodore which are strict in ordering the people to keep Lent (e.g. Conc. Agath. c. 12; 4 Conc. Aurelian. c. 2), contain no hint of there being more than one such season in the year; and the canon of the second council of Tours which enumerates the fasts of the monks, and approaches nearer the time of Theodore, evidently recognises no Pentecostal Quadragesima, for it orders monks, whose self-denial would be more severe than that of the rest of the church, to fast only three days a week from Pentecost till August. Hence it is probable that Theodore introduced these as penitential fasts into the Western church from the East, for in the Greek Penitential of Joannes Jejunator two fasts of forty days in addition to Lent are imposed upon penitents, the former of which was called the Quadragesima of St. Peter and St. Paul, and the latter the Quadragesima of St. Philip. One of the councils of the Carolingian kings, about A.D. 821 (Conc. apud rilkam Theodonis cc. 2-5) held for the purpose of devising means for the protection of the clergy, inflicts five quadragesimal fasts on any one slandering or wounding a subdeacon, six on the slanderer of a deacon, twelve of a priest, and a lifelong fast on the slanderer of a bishop. Even after absolution, a penitent was sometimes ordered to fast one day a week for the remainder of his life—a sentence opposed to the earlier practice, by which admission to communion was a sign of the forgiveness of all past offences.

The penitential fasts were observed with various degrees of severity. In the East the Penitential of Joannes Jejunator allows penitents on the second, fourth, and sixth days of the week to eat oil and beans with oil, but orders them to abstain from cheese, eggs, flesh, and fish; on the third and fifth days eat everything freely except flesh; and on the first and seventh days use wine and flesh as if under no punishment. In the Anglo-Saxon church Egbert (Penitential iv. 15) directs penitents to fast three days each week, without specifying the days, from wine, mead (medo), and flesh, till the evening, and eat only dry food; and also keep three quadragesimal fasts in the year on dry food, two days a week till the evening, and three days till three o'clock. Burchard (Decret. xix. 9, 10) referring to this direction from the Penitential, states the following to have been the manner in which a fast of two years on bread and water was kept. "For first year fast three days in each week, second, fourth, and sixth, on bread and water; and three days, third, fifth, and seventh, abstain from wine, mead (medo), beer flavoured with honey (mellita cervisia) flesh and blood, cheese, eggs, and rich fish of various sorts, and eat only small fish if they are to be got, but if not, fish of one kind only, and beans, and herbs, and apples, and drink beer." This list makes no mention of Lent, because it is assumed to be spent entirely on bread and water. "The next year the penitent should fast two days, second and fourth, till the evening, and then refresh himself with dry food, i.e. bread and dry cooked beans, or apples, or raw herbs; let him select one of these three, and drink beer sparingly; on the sixth day let him fast on bread and water." In some cases no additional time of abstinence was imposed, but only a greater rigour during the ordinary ecclesiastical fasts. A very old sacramentary, assigned by Morinus to the 8th century, directs the actual incarceration of a penitent through Lent; "Take him in the morning of the first day of Lent and cover him with ashes, and pray for him, and shut him up till the Thursday of Holy Week (feria quinta in coena Domini), and on the Thursday of Holy Week he may come forth from the place in which he has performed his penance." A Gothic codex from the monastery of Remigius of Rheims, dating probably from the next century, also orders imprisonment through Lent, but instead of the whole body of the penitent being covered with ashes, directs that a few should be sprinkled on his head, and that they should be blessed. This severity was relaxed before the 10th century, and penitents were assigned a parish or district in which to confine themselves through Lent. But both incarceration and confinement within bounds were deviations from an older practice of shutting up a penitent in a monastery (1 Conc. Matiscon. cc. 5, 8).

6. Exemptions from Fasting.—A superstitious abstinence from flesh and wine on pretence of keeping a stricter fast was forbidden. The Apostolical Canons (cc. 52, 53) direct that if any of the clergy abstain from marriage, flesh, or wine, not for exercise, but abhorrence, forgetting that God made all things very good, they shall be deposed (Conc. Ancyra. c. 14; Conc. Gangra. c. 2). The first council of Braga, A.D. 563 (c. 14), orders, under pain of excommunication, clergy who have been in the habit of abstaining from meat, to eat vegetables boiled with meat, in order to avoid the suspicion of being infected with the Priscillian heresy.

Fasting was strictly forbidden on all Sundays throughout the year in every part of the church. The reason of this prohibition was that fasting was held inconsistent with the observance of so high a festival. [LORD'S DAY.]

The observance of Saturday was, as is well known, one of the points in dispute between the Eastern and Western churches. In the East it was always observed as a festival, with the exception of the Paschal Vigil, the Great Sabbath, in which Christ lay in the grave, which was kept as a fast both in East and West (Apost. Constt. ii. 59; v. 15, 20; vii. 23; viii. 33; Conc. Laod. cc. 49, 51; Conc. in Trull. c. 55). [SABBATH.]

It was not customary to fast on any festivals, nor consequently to hold festivals during seasons of fasting. The council of Laodicea, A.D. 320 (c. 51), forbids the celebration of festivals of martyrs in Lent, but orders them to be kept on Saturdays and Sundays. Another canon (c. 52) forbids the celebration of marriages or birthdays in Lent. The Greek church held no festival through Lent except the Annunciation, a festival which the tenth council of Toledo, A.D. 656 (c. 1), ordered to be held eight days before Christmas. [MARY THE VIRGIN, FESTIVALS OF.] The church at Milan held no missa sanctorum whatever throughout Lent.

The non-observance of a fast was permitted in the case of weakness or sickness (Apost. Can. 68, 2 Conc. Taron. c. 17). To these grounds of excuse the eighth council of Toledo, A.D. 653 (c. 9), adds old age or strong necessity. The council of Eliberis (c. 23) had allowed the Spanish churches to omit the monthly festa in the sultry heat of July and August.

7. Manner of Fasting.—A fast day in the early church was kept by a literal abstinence from food till the evening, and then a simple meal was eaten. Ambrose (de Elia et Jejun. c. 10) speaks of the fast during Lent continuing through the whole day; and Chrysostom (Hom. 8 in Gen. p. 80; Hom. 8 in Gen. p. 79) rebukes the folly of those who abstain all day from food and do not abstain from sin. There was no restriction upon the kind of food eaten at the evening meal, provided only it was partaken of sparingly. Many, no doubt, refused meat or wine during the greater fasts, and contented themselves with bread and water, Xerophagia (Tertullian de Jejun. c. 11); but that there was no settled rule, and that the choice of diet was left very much to individual discretion is evident from the account given by Socrates (H. E. v. 22) of the variety of the observances of the Western church; "some abstain from every sort of creature that has life; others eat fish only of living creatures; others eat birds as well as fish, because, according to the Mosaic account of the creation, they too sprung from the water; others abstain from fruit covered with a hard shell, and from eggs; some eat dry bread only, others not even that; others again when they have fasted till three o'clock eat varieties of food." The Greek church kept Lent very strictly, eating neither fish, nor eggs, nor milk, nor oil; but on the other fasts, except on the fourth and sixth days, these were allowed. The great Sabbath fast of the Paschal Vigil was sustained not only till the evening, but till cockcrow on Easter morning (Apost. Const. v. 18). But the other appointed seasons were kept with less rigour than that of Lent, and the fast, instead of continuing till the evening meal, was broken at the ninth hour (three o'clock), the hour on which our Lord expired on the cross. This was the hour at which the fast of the Stations ceased (Epiphanius Expos. Fid. c. 22). And the English council of Clovesho, A.D. 747 (c. 16), orders the Rogations to be kept till three o'clock. The food which was thus saved by abridging the number of meals it was considered a pious act to bestow upon the poor (Origen, Hom. 10. in Levit.; Leo, Serm. 3 de Jejun. Pentecost.; Chrysost. Serm. 8 de Jejun.). Another practice mentioned by Tertullian (de Orat. c. 18) was refraining from the kiss of peace while a fast lasted. A change of dress during fasting was confined chiefly to penitents [PENITENCE], although Tertullian (Apolog. c. 40), if his language is not merely rhetorical, speaks of pious Christians in contrast with heathen self-indulgence, "being dried up with fasting and prostrating themselves in sackcloth and ashes." And at a much later date the council of Mayence, A.D. 813 (c. 33), orders the greater Litany to be observed for three days by all Christians, "not riding nor clothed in rich garments, but barefoot and clothed in sackcloth and ashes." [G. M.]

8. Fast after Communion.—St. Chrysostom, on the First Epistle to the Corinthians, speaks as follows: "Before receiving thou fastest, that thou mayest by any means appear worthy of the communion. But when thou hast received, it being thy duty to persevere in self-control, thou undoest all. Not that sobriety before this and afterwards are of equal importance. For it is our duty, indeed, to exercise self-control at both times, but especially after receiving the Eucharist; before this indeed that thou mayest be worthy to partake; but afterwards that thou mayest not be found unworthy of that of which thou hast partaken. What! Ought we to fast after partaking? I do not say so, nor do I use constraint. For indeed this also is good, but I am not enforcing it, only advising you not to be self-indulgent to excess" (Hom. xxvii. ad c. ii. v. 27.) We should infer from this passage that the hearers of St. Chrysostom neither had themselves, nor knew of, any custom of abstaining from ordinary food, for however short a time, after receiving the Holy Communion. Nor have we any evidence that his advice led to the formation of such a habit in the members of the Greek or Oriental churches. In the West, on the other hand, we meet with occasional notices of the practice from the 6th century downwards; and it is probable that it survived, as the pious custom of a few, to the 14th, or even later. A canon of the council of Mâcon held in 585 contains the earliest reference, if the writer mistake not, to this post-communion fast. We give the decree in full: "Whatever relics of the sacrifices shall be left over in the sacrum after the mass is finished, let innocent children be brought to the church on Wednesday or Friday by him whose business it is, and, let them, being enjoined a fast, receive the said relics sprinkled with wine" (Can. 6; Labb. Conc. tom. v. col. 982). Among the Forged Decretals is an epistle purporting to be written by Clement of Rome to St. James the Lord's brother. The greater part of this epistle appears to have been composed in the 8th century, and in that earlier portion we find a direction to this effect, viz. that the remainder of the consecrated elements "is not to be kept till the morning, but is by the care of the clerks to be consumed with fear and trembling. But they who consume the remainder of the Lord's body, which has been left in the sacrum, are not to assemble forthwith to partake of common food, nor to presume to mix food with the holy portion . . . If therefore the Lord's portion be given to them at an early hour, let the ministers who have consumed it fast till the sixth; and if they have received it at the third or the fourth, let them fast till evening" (Præcepta S. Petri, inter Opp. S. Leonis, ed. Baller. tom. iii. p. 674). There is a law of Charlemagne, A.D. 808, with this heading, "Touching those who have communicated, that they wait three hours, on account of the mixing of the food." The decree itself says "two or three hours" (Capitularia Regum Francorum, tom. i. col. 1213. Similarly col. 1224). Regino (De Eccl. Discipl. lib. 1. c. cxv.) at the beginning of the 10th century, and Gratian (Decr. P. iii. Dist. ii. c. xxiii.) in the 12th give the passage from pseudo-Clement as above quoted. It was therefore well known during the latter part of the Middle Ages. In the 13th century we find it cited from Gratian by Thomas Aquinas, who acknowledges the principle, while he declares the rule obsolete (Summa Theol. P. iii. Qu. lxxx. Art. viii. ad 6m). There is, however, as we have already intimated, some reason to think that the practice which Aquinas evidently considered altogether gone by was yet observed by some long after his time. In England John de Burgo, A.D. 1385, refers to our subject in this manner: "After taking the eucharist it is meet for reverence thereof to abstain for some time from food, but not very long. For preparation by abstinence and devotion is more required before receiving the eucharist than after. For the sacrament has its effect at the reception itself, and therefore actual devotion is required then; but after the reception habitual devotion suffices" (Pupilla Oculi, P. iv. c. viii. ad lit. H.). It is also thus mentioned by Duranti, who was murdered by the partisans of the League in 1589, "Not only ought men to be fasting when about to sacrifice and communicate, but they ought also in honour of the sacrament to abstain from all food some time after" (De Rit. Eccl. L. ii. c. vii. § 6.)

FATHER (Pater). 1. A name rhetorically given to the priests of any religion (Arnobius, Adv. Gent. lib. 4. c. 19).

2. Commonly applied to Christian bishops. Epiphanius (Hæres. Adv. Aërian. n. 4) says that the reason of the title is that by their right of ordaining they beget fathers to the church. Jerome (Ep. 52, ad Theoph. ed. Migne) says that bishops are content with their own honour, for they know that they are fathers and not lords. Augustine (Comm. in Ps. 44) says that the church itself calls them fathers. Chrysostom (Hom. 3, ad Pop. Antioch.) speaks of looking to the bishop's throne and not seeing the father upon it. The decrees of the council of Nice are usually cited as those of the 318 fathers (I. Conc. Nic. Proem.; I. Conc. Constantin. c. 1).

3. To a godfather. In the life of Epiphanius it is said that one Lucian became his father in holy baptism (Epiph. Vita, n. 8). So Rufinus (in Hieron. Invect. c. 1) says that the same person was his instructor in the creed and his father.

4. It is said that Charles Martel sent his son Pepin to Luitprand, king of the Lombards, who cut his hair according to custom, "juxta morem," and thus became his father, "ei pater effectus est" (Paulus Diaconus, Hist. Longobard. vi. 53).

5. To the priest by whom baptism was administered. Avitus of Vienne (Hom. de Rogat.), says that Mamertus was both his predecessor and his spiritual father by baptism, "spiritualis a baptismo pater." So (Theodori Cantuar. Poenitentialis, II. iv. 8) it is stated that one father is sufficient to administer baptism, "in catechumeno et confirmatione et baptismo unus potest esse pater."

6. To a confessor. One of the Benedictine rules provided that no monk should become a spiritual father without the consent of the abbot (Reg. Tarnat. A.D. circa 570; Migne's Patrol. t. 66, coll. 977).

7. The title "father of fathers" was sometimes assigned to eminent bishops. In one place it is given to the apostle Paul (Quæst. ad Orthodox. c. 119, apud Justin Mart. Opp.). Athanasius (ad Solitar. Vit. Agent. c. 1) speaks of Hosius as being by universal consent called the father of bishops. Gregory Nazianzen (Orat. 19; De Funeb. Patr. § 44) says that his father was called the father of all the bishops (ἀρχιεπὶσ). Gregory the Great (Epist. vi.) addresses Lupus of Troyes, as "father of fathers, bishop of bishops." In a letter from the African bishops which was read at the 1st Lateran council, at the close of the epistle, Theodore, bishop of Rome, is styled "father of fathers." In a letter read at the 6th council of Constantinople (Act 13), Sergius is addressed in the same manner. At the 2nd council of Nice, A.D. 787 (Act 6), Gregory Nyssen is said to have been called "father of fathers" by universal consent.

8. The head of a monastery was naturally called Pater by Latins, as Abbas by Orientals; thus Augustine (De Mor. Eccl. Cath. i. 31) speaks of the respect to be paid by the Decani to the one "quem Patrem appellant;" and Gregory the Great (Dial. i. 1; cf. ii. 3; iii. 23) speaks of one who was "Pater" in a monastery over 200 monks. FEET, WASHING OF. [BAPTISM, §§ 34, 7; MAUNDY THURSDAY.]

FEILIRE, THE, OF AENGUS THE CULDEE. The word Feilire, derived from "feil" the Irish equivalent of vigilia, is applied to the metrical catalogue composed by Aengus the Culdee about the year 780. It is the most ancient of five martyrologies belonging to Ireland. The others are (1) The martyrology of Tamlacht, which must have been written after 845. (2.) That of Maelmuire na Gorman, dating from between 156-1173. (3.) The Saltair na Rann, which, however, contains only four Gaelic entries; and (4.) The Kalendar of the Drummond Missal, published in Bishop Forbes' Kalendars of the Scottish saints.

Of the personal history of Aengus we know that he was educated in Clonin Ednach in Queen's County, and travelling into Munster founded Disert Aengus in co. Limerick. At the time of the expedition of king Aedh Oirdnidhe against Limerick in 799 he was residing at Disert Bethac near Monasterevin. Latterly he went to abbot Maelduin at Tamlacht, when he from humility concealed his gifts, and passing himself as a serving man was entrusted with the charge of the mill and kiln, till at last his learning was discovered by accident.

The Feilire consists of three parts. 1. Five quatrains invoking a blessing on the poet and his work. 2. A preface of 220 quatrains; and 3. The festology itself in 365 quatrains for every day in the year (O'Curry, Early Eccl. Hist. of Ireland, pp. 359-371. [A. P. F.]

FELICIANUS. (1) Martyr at Rome with Fortunatus, Firmus, and Candidus; commemorated Feb. 2 (Mart. Hieron., Usuardi).

(2) Martyr at Rome with Primus under Diocletian and Maximian; commemorated June 9 (Mart. Rom. Vet., Bedae, Adonis, Usuardi, Cal. Ulati et Frontonis, Sacramentarium Gregorii).

(3) [VICTOR (10).]

(4) Martyr in Lucania with Jacinctus, Quintus, and Lucius; commemorated Oct. 29 (Mart. Hieron., Usuardi).

(5) [EXUPERIUS (3).] [W. F. G.]

FELICISSIMA, virgin, martyr at Falari with Gracilianus; "Passio" Aug. 12 (Mart. Usuardi). [W. F. G.]

FELICISSIMUS. (1) [HERACLIUS (3).]

(2) [FELIX (14).]

(3) [SIXTUS (2).]

(4) Martyr in Africa, with Rogatianus, the presbyter, under Decius and Valerian; commemorated Oct. 26 (Mart. Rom. Vet., Adonis, Usuardi).

(5) Saint, of Perugia in Tuscany; "Natalis" Nov. 24 (Mart. Hieron., Usuardi). [W. F. G.]

FELICITAS. (1) Martyr at Tuburbo (at Arthage, Bedae) with Perpetua, Revocatus, Saturninus, and Secundulus, under Severus; commemorated March 7 (Mart. Rom. Vet., Hieron., Bedae, Adonis, Usuardi, Cal. Bucher.).

(2) Martyr under Antoninus; commemorated Nov. 23 (Mart. Rom. Vet., Hieron., Bedae, Adonis, Usuardi). [W. F. G.]

FELICULA. (1) Martyr at Rome with

FEMORALIA or FEMINALIA. These are drawers or breeches covering the thighs and loins, as the derivation implies. (See Isidore Hispal. Etym. xix. 22.) They were an essential part of the dress of the Levitical priesthood (Ex. xxviii. 42, 43), and as such are often referred to by the fathers (see e. g. Jerome, Epist. 64, ad Fabiolam; i. 360, ed. Vallarsi), many of whom are delighted to find a symbolical meaning in this as in other vestments.

The injunction as to the wearing of breeches during divine service is repeated in sundry monastic rules. Thus the Rule of Fructuosus, bishop of Bracara, when settling the dress to be worn by monks, permits the use of femoralia to all, but "maxime his qui ministerio implicentur altaris" (Regula S. Fructuosi, c. 45: in Holstenius, Codex Regularum, part 2, p. 139, ed. Paris, 1663; cf. Grimalci Solitariorum Regula, c. 49; op. cit. p. 341). For general rules as to this and other articles of monastic dress see Magistri Regula, c. 81 (op. cit. p. 257). The Rule of St. Benedict enjoins that monks who were going on a journey should borrow femoralia from the Vestiarius, and on their return should restore them thither washed:—"femoralia, .ii qui diriguntur in via, de Vestiario accipiant, qui revertentes lota ibi restituant" (c. 55; p. 117, ed. Venice, 1723). For further references, see Ducange's Glossarium, s. vv., and Menard's note to the Concordia Regularum (Patrol. ciii. 1235).

FENCING-MASTERS. [GLADIATORS; LAMISTAE.]

FERETRUM, a bier on which the corpse, after washing, was placed and carried to burial [BURIAL OF THE DEAD]. It was as a rule made of wood, in which Ambrose (in Luc. vii. 14) sees a mystical allusion to the resurrection, drawn from the miracle at Nain (Durant. de Ritib. lib. i. c. 23). The feretrum of Constantine the Great appears to have been of gold, like his coffin (Euseb. Vit. Const. lib. iv. c. 66). The bier was covered with a pall, more or less costly, according to the rank of the deceased. That of Constantine was of purple (ἀλουργικὴ ἀλουργίδι). That of Blesilla, the daughter of Paula, was of cloth of gold, against which Jerome remonstrated vehemently as an unchristian extravagance (Hieron. Ep. 25). Constantine's bier was surrounded with a circle of lights burning in golden candlesticks (Euseb. u. s.). The bier was carried to the grave sometimes by relations or near friends, sometimes by officials designated to that duty (Copiatæ, decani, lecticarii), and in the case of persons of high dignity or sanctity by bishops and nobles, e. g., Basil by his clergy (Greg. Mag. Orat. xx.), his sister Macrina by Gregory Nyssen, and other clergy (Greg. Nys. Vit. Macr. tom. ii. p. 201); Paula, by the bishops of Palestine, "cervicem feretro subjicientibus" (Hieron. Ep. 27). [E. V.]

FERIA. The proper sense of this word is that of a holyday, of a festival viewed in the aspect of a day of freedom from worldly business. It is in this meaning that we find the word in classical Latin, though here it occurs exclusively in the plural. Besides this, however, the word has been used in a special sense in the Christian church from very early times to denote the days of the week, feria secunda, tertia, &c., for Monday, Tuesday, &c.
